[6, 7] That the witness Lloyd might have been placed upon the witness stand and asked as to all the facts tending to show his authorization to act as an agent for the defendant is really what is supported by the rule just stated, and not what he may have told somebody in relation thereto. This action being between the plaintiffs and the defendant, the witness Lloyd could have testified directly as to his agency by stating whatever there was, if anything, tending to show his appointment or authorization to act as agent, but to put a witness on the stand to testify to what she had heard Mr. Lloyd state or what representations he had made was an entirely different matter and not in any wise supported by the authorities cited, but absolutely contrary thereto. As a matter of fact, the record shows that Mr. Lloyd was placed upon the witness stand by the appellant, and our attention has not been called to any testimony given by him tending to show his agency for the defendant. The fact that H. A. Lloyd was a director of the corporation does not establish agency. The case of Maynard v. F. F. Insurance Co., 34 Cal. 48, 91 Am. Dec. 672, upon which the appellant relies in support of its contention that proof that one is a director tends to show agency, and from the opinion in which case a considerable excerpt is taken, does not support the appellants' contention. What is there said has to do only with the powers of the board of directors, not individual directors. The rule is that the power and authority to manage the affairs of the corporation is vested in the board of directors as a board and not as individual members. Section 305, Civ. Code. We may also cite Gashwiler v. Willis, 33 Cal. 11, 91 Am. Dec. 607, and Alta Silver Mining Co. v. Alta Placer Mining Co., 78 Cal. 629, 21 P. 373; also, Citizens' Securities Co. v. Hammel, 14 Cal. App. 564, 112 P. 731. To the same effect is the case of Hotaling v. Hotaling, 193 Cal. 368, 224 P. 455. In line with the cases which we have cited is the case also of Matheron v. Ramina Corp., 49 Cal. App. 690, 194 P. 86, dealing with the authority of officers of a corporation to bind the corporation by contract for the purchase of real property.

[8] That the resolution relied upon by the appellants did not constitute an acceptance, not being absolute, appears by section 1585 of the Civil Code, which reads:

> "Acceptance Must be Absolute. An acceptance must be absolute and unqualified, or must include in itself an acceptance of that character which the proposer can separate from the rest, and which will conclude the person accepting. A qualified acceptance is a new proposal."

See Four Oil Co. v. United Oil Producers, 145 Cal. 623, 79 P. 366, 68 L. R. A. 226; Niles v. Hancock, 140 Cal. 157, 73 P. 840, and cases cited on page 161 (73 P. 841, 842). Other authorities might be cited, but these state the accepted rule.

We need not consider the appellants' argument relative to their offer to comply with the memorandum of agreement, for the reason that, as we have stated, the record is silent as to the conditions and restrictions to be contained in the deed of conveyance and of any acceptance thereof. Nor do we need to consider the appellants' tender of proof to the trial court that they had been offered a sum of money for the 2½ acres of land in excess of the agreed purchase price. Neither do we need to consider the question of estoppel, for the reason that the testimony in the records shows that the two checks representing the $1,000 were never accepted by the defendant.

The judgment is affirmed.

HUFF v. COMPTON CITY GRAMMAR SCHOOL DIST. et al. (Civ. 3521.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 19, 1928.

1. Schools and school districts 🔑89—Incinerator in school yard held "dangerous or defective condition," within statute prescribing liability of school district for injuries (St. 1923, p. 675, § 2).

Incinerator in school yard held "dangerous or defective condition of * * * grounds, works, and property," within St. 1923, p. 675, § 2, relative to liability of school districts for injuries, notwithstanding that it did not contain fire at all times, where it was used daily for purpose of burning rubbish.

2. Schools and school districts 🔑89—Burning of rubbish in schoolyard while children were playing near by constituted negligence.

Burning of rubbish in incinerator in schoolyard while little children were playing around it held to constitute negligence.

3. Schools and school districts 🔑121—In action for schoolgirl's injuries, evidence held to show that school trustees knew of maintenance of incinerator in schoolyard (Pol. Code, § 1609).

In action for schoolgirl's injuries from burns due to incinerator in schoolyard, evidence held to show that trustees and district superintendent of school district, employed under Pol. Code, § 1609, knew of maintenance of incinerator in schoolyard in manner described in petition.

4. Pleading 🔑253—In action for schoolgirl's injuries, amendment alleging that incinerator was dangerous agency maintained by defendants, who had knowledge of its maintenance and dangerous character, held admitted by failure to answer amendment.

In action for injuries to schoolgirl from burns caused by incinerator in schoolyard, in which defendants failed to answer amendment to complaint alleging negligent maintenance of dangerous agency of which defendants had knowledge, allegations that incinerator was maintained by defendants, that it was dangerous agency, and that defendants had knowledge of maintenance and dangerous character held admitted by pleadings.

5. Negligence 🔑85(2)—In determining contributory negligence of child, jury must consider its age and inexperience.

In determining question of contributory negligence in action for schoolgirl's injuries from burns from incinerator in schoolyard, jury must consider age and inexperience of plaintiff.

6. Schools and school districts 🔑122—Contributory negligence of schoolgirl receiving burns from incinerator in schoolyard held for jury.

In action for injuries to schoolgirl from burns due to incinerator in schoolyard, question whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence held for jury.

7. Trial 🔑296(3)—In schoolgirl's action for injuries, instruction authorizing recovery for isolated act of negligence by district's employee held not prejudicial, in view of another instruction, pleadings, and proof (St. 1923, p. 675, § 2).

In action for injuries to schoolgirl receiving burns from incinerator in schoolyard, instruction authorizing recovery for injuries caused by isolated act of negligence by employee of district held not prejudicial, in view of another instruction substantially in language of St. 1923, p. 675, § 2, and fact that complaint was based on maintenance of dangerous condition which was admitted by pleadings and proved without contradiction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Action by Ruth Huff, a minor, by John Huff and wife, as guardians ad litem, against the Compton City Grammar School District and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and J. A. Tucker, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Joseph Scott, A. G. Ritter, and Leo B. Ward, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff was given judgment against the defendant district for damages resulting from serious burns alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants. The school district has appealed from the judgment.

The evidence shows that upon the school grounds, and about 20 feet from the steps leading into a lunch shed, was located what is termed by the parties an "incinerator," in which "waste papers and trash accumulated on the grounds were disposed of." This incinerator was in the form of an ordinary garbage can, "from 30 to 36 inches high." There was a lid over the top and the sides were perforated with numerous round holes about the size of the average index finger. The can was located on a mound of ashes and rubbish about 6 to 8 inches in height and about "6 feet across." It was in a portion of the grounds frequented by the school children. "The children had to go by there when they went to the playground. They passed there as they came out from the buildings." "There were no protecting mechanical arrangements around the incinerator in any way." The school grounds were about 700 by 600 feet in area, upon which there were two school buildings and "some other buildings." The grounds were all "used as a playground by the children except what was covered by the buildings." At about 1:15 o'clock in the afternoon of the day of the accident the janitor "filled the incinerator about two-thirds full" with lunch bags and papers and set them on fire. He remained there for about 5 minutes "until the flames disappeared." There were "smouldering pieces of paper in the incinerator" when he left and "smoke was coming out." At 3 o'clock that afternoon the plaintiff, then 9 years of age, and another girl of about the same age "came out at recess * * * to play hopscotch." The latter testified:

> "We made a hopscotch, and then we were going to start to play. Ruth was first, and she wanted to get her glass. She went to find one. She went to the incinerator. She went up to pick up a glass. When she stooped over, her dress caught fire. Her back was to the incinerator. * * * You could see fire in it. * * *
> "Q. Was it coming out of those little holes? A. Yes."

There is testimony that the location of the incinerator had not been changed for at least 18 months prior to the accident. The janitor testified that:

> He had been accustomed to burn, "every day, in the same incinerator, approximately the same amount of trash of the same character as that trash was. It took about one-half hour to burn the trash up so that there were no flames. * * * It would not consume the entire amount—it would leave a kind of charred coals in the center, but the loose paper and everything would be burned out so that there would be flames breaking through. Sometimes the charred debris or refuse would remain three or four hours—sometimes remained all night, depending upon the nature of the stuff that was put in there."

Section 2 of chapter 328 of the Statutes of 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 675) reads as follows:

> "Counties, municipalities and school districts shall be liable for injuries to persons and property resulting from the dangerous or defective condition of public streets, highways, buildings, grounds, works and property in all cases where the governing or managing board of such county, municipality, school district, or other board, officer or person having authority to remedy such condition, had knowledge or notice of the defective or dangerous condition of any such street, highway, building, grounds, works or property and failed or neglected, for a reasonable time after acquiring such knowledge or receiving such notice, to remedy such condition or failed and neglected for a reasonable time after acquiring such knowledge or receiving such notice to take such action as may be reasonably necessary to protect the public against such dangerous or defective condition."

[1, 2] Appellant contends that the incinerator was not dangerous in itself, but dangerous only when it contained fire and was left unguarded, and that, therefore, the evidence does not show a "dangerous or defective condition of * * * grounds, works, and property" of the defendant. But the evidence shows that the incinerator was maintained for the sole purpose of burning rubbish therein, and that it had been daily used for that purpose for many months. The defendants maintained the fire in the incinerator as well as the incinerator itself. If fires had been kept constantly burning therein, no one would contend that the district could escape liability on the ground that the incinerator would not be dangerous without fire therein. The fact that fire was maintained therein only part of the time can make no difference as to liability. It was necessary for the children to pass the incinerator on their way from the school building to the playground. It would be a very narrow construction of the statute to hold that the case made by the plaintiff does not come within its terms. It needs no argument to show that the burning of rubbish in the incinerator while little children were playing around it constituted negligence.

[3, 4] Appellant contends that the evidence does not show that the trustees knew of the maintenance of the incinerator in the manner described. The evidence shows that the district superintendent of the defendant was a "person having authority to remedy such condition," and that he "had knowledge * * * of the defective or dangerous condition, * * * and failed or neglected, for a reasonable time after acquiring such knowledge, * * * to remedy such condition." He was called as a witness by defendants, and testified:

> "My duties were * * * to give the teachers and janitors instructions as seemed necessary. * * * My duties as regards the school buildings and school grounds, in so far as they were to be kept clean and in repair, was that I was to report those things to the trustees and see that the school buildings and school grounds were kept in a clean, sanitary, and wholesome condition. I was to a certain extent responsible in a general way for what you might call the condition of the grounds in so far as an employee is responsible to his employer for the condition of the building that he might be superintendent of. I followed whatever instructions the trustees gave regarding the building and grounds, and, when they did not give instructions, I was supposed to use my own discretion. * * * I determined upon what portion of the school grounds the incinerator should be located. * * * There were at that time two distinct school buildings on the property. It was not my duty to act as principal as well as superintendent. I was superintendent of both schools and had a principal in each one of those buildings."

The trustees of the district and the district superintendent are named as defendants. Section 1609 of the Political Code provides that boards of trustees "may employ a district superintendent for one or more schools employing eight teachers or more under their control." Paragraph III of the complaint as originally filed alleged that on or about the 13th day of March, 1924, "through the negligence and carelessness of the agents and employees of said defendants herein, an incinerator situated and located on the playground of said Compton City grammar school was so negligently and unlawfully attended and operated by the employees of said defendants that a fire was permitted to be burning in said incinerator contrary to section 152 of the ordinances of the city of Compton; * * * that as a direct and proximate result of the negligent and unlawful operation of said incinerator and while said incinerator was unattended and while the plaintiff herein, Ruth Huff, was playing upon the school grounds, fire shot out from said incinerator," causing the alleged injuries. The defendants' answer to said paragraph III of the complaint admits the location of the incinerator on the school grounds and denies, on information and belief, "that a fire was burning in said incinerator due to the negligence and/or carelessness of the agents and/or employees of said defendants," or "that any injuries plaintiff may have received were a direct and/or proximate and/or any result of the alleged negligent and/or unlawful and/or any operation of said incinerator by the agents and/or employees of the defendants herein, or any of them." Nearly three months before the trial the plaintiff, by leave of the court, served and filed an amendment to the complaint, by which amendment a new paragraph was substituted for the original paragraph III thereof. The amendment alleged:

> "That at said time and place said defendants, their servants, agents, and employees, were negligently, recklessly and carelessly maintaining and allowing to be maintained under the direction and control of said defendants, and with the knowledge of said defendants, an incinerator for the burning of rubbish, papers, and trash, said incinerator being situated and located on the playground of said Compton City grammar school where the children attending said grammar school would come in contact with said incinerator; that said incinerator was at all times a dangerous agency and was so known to said defendants, but that said defendants nevertheless maintained, constructed, and allowed to be maintained and constructed said dangerous agency and said incinerator on said school grounds; that said incinerator did not have any shield or guard around the same to prevent persons from coming in contact therewith, all of which was to the knowledge of said defendants; that at said time and place said defendants, their servants, agents, and employees, so negligently, carelessly, and unlawfully operated and attended said incinerator that they allowed and caused rubbish, trash, and papers to be burned in said incinerator at said time and place, so that the children present on said playgrounds could come in contact with said incinerator, and so that said incinerator became so hot as to be capable of inflicting burns upon any one coming in contact therewith, and so that fire shot forth from said incinerator and the material being burned therein, and so that said incinerator thereby became a dangerous agency and instrumentality, all to the knowledge of said defendants; that at said time and place, and as a direct and proximate result of the negligent, unlawful, careless, and reckless maintenance, construction, and operation of said incinerator, and the failure on the part of said defendants to keep the same properly guarded by shields or by an attendant, said plaintiff, Ruth Huff, while playing upon said school grounds, came in contact with said incinerator and with the fire issuing therefrom while said incinerator was burning, and, as a direct and proximate result of said negligence, carelessness, and recklessness on the part of said defendants, received the burns herein complained of; that at said times herein mentioned said defendants had knowledge and notice of the maintenance and existence of said incinerator, and of the negligent, unlawful, reckless, and careless operation and maintenance of said incinerator by the servants, agents, and employees of said defendants, and of the fact that said incinerator was not guarded by any shields to prevent injury to the children who might be playing near by, and was not attended by any employee to prevent the children from coming in contact therewith while said fire was burning, and had knowledge of the fact that said incinerator was being used during the hours when children were on said playgrounds and might come in contact therewith."

The defendants failed to answer this amendment to the complaint. The complaint as originally filed counted on the negligent acts of the agents and employees of the defendants in the operation of the incinerator, while the amendment alleges the negligent maintenance of a dangerous agency or condition on the school grounds, of which the defendants had knowledge. The allegations, therefore, that the incinerator was maintained by the defendants, that it was a dangerous agency, and that the defendants had knowledge of its maintenance and dangerous character, stand admitted by the pleadings. The dangerous character of the situation was such as to demand its immediate remedy. Both the board of trustees and the district superintendent had authority to remedy the condition.

[5, 6] Appellant contends that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. She testified, on cross-examination:

> "I saw the incinerator there before. It was there all the time. I did not see any fire in it the day I went up there. I was not looking for fire. I don't know whether I looked at the incinerator or not. My mother and father had told me to keep away from fire. * * * I was not supposed to go near the incinerator. I never went to the incinerator. I went over to the ashes about 3 feet away from the incinerator."

Plaintiff's teacher gave her class instruction "about safety first rules * * * about three times a week." She had warned the class, including the plaintiff, three or four times prior to the day of the accident, "of the danger of playing near the incinerator." In determining the question of contributory negligence, it was the duty of the jury to take into consideration the age and inexperience of the plaintiff. Whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, was clearly a question of fact for the jury.

[7] The court gave certain instructions which, standing alone, would authorize a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for injuries caused by a mere isolated act of negligence by an employee of the district, even though such act had no relation to any dangerous or defective condition maintained by the district. The court also instructed the jury, at the request of the defendants, substantially in the language of said section 2 of the statute. The complaint, as amended, is based on the maintenance of the dangerous condition in the manner stated, and not on a mere act of negligence of an employee. Such maintenance was not only admitted by the pleadings, but proved without contradiction. The evidence shows without conflict that the district superintendent at all times had knowledge thereof, and the pleadings admit that all the defendants had such knowledge. Under such circumstances, it does not appear that the district could have been prejudiced by the instructions. In fact, it appears, as a matter of law, from the allegations of the complaint which are not denied and the uncontradicted evidence given at the trial, that the appellant was maintaining a dangerous condition upon its school grounds, with the knowledge of its trustees and its superintendent, and that they had authority to remedy the condition. The evidence also shows without conflict that the plaintiff's clothing was ignited by coming in contact with the fire in the incinerator, and the jury has found, on sufficient evidence, against the plea of contributory negligence. In that state of the record it is clear that the alleged error in the instructions has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

Respondent contends that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment, without showing knowledge of the dangerous condition on the part of the trustees or superintendent, under the provisions of section 1623 of the Political Code. That section provides:

> "Boards of school trustees, * * * are liable as such in the name of the district * * * for any judgment against the district on account of injury to any pupil arising because of the negligence of the district or its officers or employees."

Appellant contends that this section does not authorize an action for damages by an injured pupil on account of the negligence of an employee, but only creates a liability "for any judgment against the district" recovered pursuant to the provisions of the aforesaid statute of 1923. In view of the conclusion already reached and stated, it is unnecessary to consider whether section 1623 is applicable to the facts of this case.

The judgment is affirmed.

DALY v. OTIS et al., Pension Board, etc.

(Civ. 5909.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 29, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑714(5)—Only questions of fact quoted from transcripts on file may be presented in briefs.

No question of fact may be presented to courts of appeal in the briefs except such matters as may be quoted from the transcripts on file.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑187—Where only cause appearing for discharge was absence without leave, policeman was entitled to pension which ordinance denied on conviction for felony or notorious or consecutive insubordination or neglect (Alameda City Charter, art. 7, §§ 8, 10).

Where only offense appearing of record as cause for policeman's discharge was that he was absent without leave, right to pension was not forfeited by discharge, in view of Alameda City Charter (St. 1917, p. 1752), art. 7, §§ 8, 10, under city pension ordinance providing that removal of policeman who had served over ten years should not affect right to pension, if for any other cause than "conviction of felony, notorious or consecutive insubordination or neglect of duty, or in case of voluntary or involuntary resignation."

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action for a writ of mandamus by George A. Daly against Frank Otis and others, as members of the Pension Board of the Police and Fire Departments of the City of Alameda. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

L. R. Weinmann, of Alameda, for appellant.

Wm. J. Locke, City Atty., of Alameda, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to obtain a writ of mandamus commanding the defendants to draw a warrant in favor of the plaintiff in payment of an alleged pension. The defendants answered, and a trial was had before the court sitting without a jury. The trial court caused a judgment to be entered in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff has appealed. He has brought up what purports to be the judgment roll, but it contains no findings.

[1, 2] The city of Alameda is governed under a freeholders' charter. Stats. 1917, p. 1752. That charter created the office of city manager. The city manager has the power to appoint a chief of police and subordinate police officers, to make rules and regulations for the government of the police department, and to remove by dismissal officers from the police department. Article 7, § 8. It is provided in section 10 of the same article as follows:

> "Any charge brought by the city manager against a member of the police department or fire department who has been in the service of the city for five years at the time of the taking effect of this charter, which charge, if sustained, would warrant dismissal, shall be heard and determined by a board to be known as the police and fire board. Said board shall consist of the mayor, the police judge and the city attorney. A majority vote shall control. Any charge involving a penalty less than dismissal shall be determined by the city manager."

It is not required by the provisions of any statute, ordinance, or rule, properly before us, that any of the proceedings regarding a charge be reduced to writing, nor that any records be made thereon. By an initiative measure, a pension ordinance was adopted March 21, 1925. The plaintiff entered the police department November 10, 1911, and continued to act until November 9, 1925. From anything contained in the transcript it does not appear whether the city manager had promulgated any rules. Under the settled law of this state, no question of fact may be presented to courts of appeal in the briefs of counsel except such matters as may be quoted from the transcripts on file. Johnston v. Callahan, 146 Cal. 212, 214, 79 P. 870; Morris v. Iden, 23 Cal. App. 388, 392, 138 P. 120. The plaintiff frankly admits that he was legally dismissed; but he contends that the nature of his dismissal did not work a forfeiture of his pension. The pension ordinance was pleaded by the plaintiff in haec verba. Plaintiff's right, if any, depends on the provisions of sections 2 and 5 of the ordinance. Section 2 provides how the amount of a pension will be ascertained and determined. Section 5 provides as follows:

> "Any person having served ten (10) years or more as a member of the regularly constituted fire and police department, shall, if he be removed from said fire or police department for any cause other than conviction of a felony, notorious or consecutive insubordination or neglect of duty; or in case of voluntary or involuntary resignation; be entitled to all the provisions of section two (2) of this ordinance, in the proportion that the number of years he has served bears to twenty-five (25) years."

The question then arises: Was the plaintiff dismissed for any one of the causes just mentioned? But that issue is not before this court, and was not before the trial court. This is so because of the peculiar state of the record. On November 17, 1925, the city manager filed before the police and fire board a charge against the plaintiff. The charge was in writing. Later a trial was had, and on February 6, 1926, the board filed written findings. It may be conceded that the written charge and the findings thereon were highly ambiguous. Be that as it may, in paragraph 5 of the complaint in this action the plaintiff alleged the nature of his dismissal to be "absence without leave." In their answer, the defendants admitted the entire paragraph. Neither party alleged any other offense. Whether the plaintiff ever at any other time committed any offense does not appear; neither does it appear that at any time the offense which was pleaded, or any other offense, was "notorious" or "consecutive." Nor does it appear that the plaintiff voluntarily or involuntarily resigned. Nor does it appear that he has ever been convicted of a felony. From what we have said it thus appears that a member of the police force may not be dismissed on any charge until the charge has been heard and determined by the board. Stats. 1917, p. 1752, art. 7, § 10, supra. Furthermore, before the officer will forfeit his pension, it must appear from the charge found that the dismissed officer has suffered a conviction as for a felony or that he has been guilty of notorious or consecutive insubordination or neglect of duty. Ordinance, § 5, supra. The latter fact nowhere appears in this record.

The defendants earnestly contend that the ordinance is unreasonable. We think that under the facts of this case they have not brought themselves in a position where they are entitled to have that question determined. Presenting a record which contains no more of the facts surrounding a dismissal than are presented by this record does not even purport to show anything unreasonable.

It thus appears that on the undisputed facts the plaintiff heretofore became eligible to receive a pension, and nothing appears on the face of the record showing that he has forfeited that right.

It follows that the judgment should be reversed. It is so ordered.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ASSUR. CORPORATION, Limited, of London, England, v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 5891.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 22, 1928.

1. Master and servant 🔑361—One employed to render personal service otherwise than in independent calling, who remains entirely under employer's control, is servant or employee (Civ. Code, § 2009; Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 8(a).

Under Civ. Code, § 2009, and Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831), § 8(a), one who is employed to render personal service to his employer otherwise than in pursuit of an independent calling, and in such service remains entirely under the control and direction of the employer, is a servant or employee.

2. Master and servant ⚷403—Presumption is that one serving other than as independent contractor, or as expressly excluded by act, is employee (Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 8(a).

The presumption is that any person rendering services for another other than as an independent contractor or as expressly excluded by Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831), § 8(a), is an employee.

3. Master and servant ⚷403—Burden rests on person served to establish that one serving was acting as independent contractor (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 8(b), (c).

In proceeding for compensation under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831), burden of proof because of section 8(b), (c), rests on the person to whom services were being rendered to establish fact that the one rendering services was acting in capacity of an independent contractor.

4. Master and servant ⚷417(7)—Appellate court may interfere with trial tribunal's determination whether injured workman was independent contractor only where there was no substantial evidence thereon or, from evidence, fact finding was necessarily based on conclusion of law (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917).

Appellate court may interfere with trial tribunal's determination of question whether injured person was employee or independent contractor, under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831), only where there was no substantial evidence thereon or, from evidence, finding of fact was necessarily based on conclusion of law.

5. Master and servant ⚷414—Evidence adduced, with inferences, held to make determination of golf instructor's status as club's employee question of law and fact for Industrial Accident Commission (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, especially § 60(a).

Evidence adduced, together with inferences deducible therefrom, held, under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831), especially in view of section 60 (a), to make determination of question whether club golf instructor was club's employee a mixed question of law and fact for determination of the Industrial Accident Commission.

6. Master and servant ⚷417(7)—Commission's finding, supported by evidence, as to club golf instructor's assistant being club's employee, held binding on appellate court (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, especially § 8(a).

Industrial Accident Commission's finding, supported by evidence, as to club golf instructor's assistant being club's employee, within Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831), especially section 8 (a), held binding on appellate court.

Certiorari by the Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation, Limited, of London, England, to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission of California, awarding Lorne M. Campbell compensation for injuries. Award affirmed.

George H. Moore and Hubert Starr, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

HOUSER, J. The question presented for review herein is whether a person engaged to assist a professional golf instructor in the performance of his duties under a contract with a country club, as well as to assist such golf instructor in the conduct of a golf business located on the premises of the country club, the profits of which became the sole property of the golf instructor, was an employee of the country club and as such entitled to compensation for injuries received by him in the course of his employment, as provided by the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (Stats. 1917, p. 831).

The facts appear to be that one Hunter, who was a professional golf instructor, had a contract with the Brentwood Country Club evidenced by the following communication:

"December 10, 1924.

"Mr. Willie I. Hunter, Ambassador Gardens, Los Angeles, Calif.—Dear Sir: This will confirm the verbal arrangements made with you relative to your employment by this club as club professional, for one year, beginning January 1, 1925, at a salary of $100.00 per month; in addition to which you are to have the privilege of selling golf supplies of every kind, including club making, repairing, cleaning, and giving lessons. Your charge for lessons to members and their families, however, is to be limited to $4.00 per hour, or $2.00 per half hour, these being the rates already established by this club.

"In consideration of our paying you a salary, you are to give us the benefit of your knowledge, experience and time, whenever called upon in connection with the upkeep of the golf course or any changes or improvements to same.

"You are to employ a competent assistant and club maker at your own expense, and one of you is to be on duty at all times so as to serve the members of this club.

"Your acceptance of this letter will constitute an agreement between you and the Brentwood Country Club.

"Yours very truly,
"The Brentwood Country Club,
"[Signed] M. A. Leach,
"Chairman, Green Committee.

"Accepted:
"W. I. Hunter."

It further appears that under the provisions of such contract Hunter employed a man named Campbell to assist him in the performance of his duties as "club professional," as well as in the conduct of his "privilege to sell golf supplies," etc.; that in the course of business a golf club was sold to one of the members of the Brentwood Country Club, which golf club later required some repairs or alterations; and that in performing said work the employee, Campbell, was injured. Following an application to the respondent Industrial Accident Commission for adjustment of claim for compensation, an award as for permanent disability was made in favor of Campbell; and the insurer of the Brentwood Country Club has made application to this court to review the proceedings before the respondent commission leading to the order of such award.

The objection made by petitioner to the award in effect is that the evidence before the respondent commission was insufficient to sustain its finding of fact that Campbell "while employed as a club maker, * * * by the Brentwood Country Club, sustained injury in the course of and arising out of his employment."

It is conceded by petitioner that as to certain of the services rendered by Hunter to the Brentwood Country Club he was an employee of that association, as well as that when persons employed by Hunter were rendering such services in his stead they were engaged in the service of the Brentwood Country Club, and for any injuries which might be received in the course of or arising from such employment would be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act. But the specific objection of petitioner is based upon the alleged fact that, in addition to the salary paid to Hunter, he was granted the distinct and unrelated "privilege" of conducting the business of selling, manufacturing, and repairing golf clubs and supplies on the grounds of the Brentwood Country Club, and that it was while Campbell was engaged in the service of Hunter in connection with the conduct of such business that he received the injury of which he complains.

On the hearing before the commission of the application for adjustment of compensation, among other things, one of the directors of the Brentwood Country Club testified in substance that it was necessary, "in order to take care of the requirements of the members, that one or more men be on duty there at all times, to attend to their wants in the shop and about the place. The members have clubs that have to be cleaned and repaired, and looked after; also have to be supplied with the necessary implements that go with the game of golf, in addition to which they, as a matter of course, instruct the people in the lessons." Furthermore, that Hunter personally employed Campbell and paid him his wages. "* * * * Rather than have the club itself state the wages of these different individuals (including Campbell), why, that is left to the professional, and in fixing the professional's compensation that is taken into consideration, that he has to employ a certain number of men, and in turn it has to come out of the revenue being paid to the professional in his salary and his profits to be made in the handling of the shop, and the like of that; * * *" that, if Campbell or any man whom Hunter might employ did not give satisfaction to the members of the Brentwood Country Club, Hunter would be compelled to get other suitable help; that, while Hunter was the owner of the stock of golf goods and supplies kept on the premises of the Brentwood Country Club and derived the immediate profits from the sale of such merchandise, that fact was "taken into consideration with his main compensation that is being paid to Mr. Hunter for his services and that of his men"; and that, if Hunter did not receive the revenue derived from such source, "he would have to be paid an annual amount of from ten to fifteen thousand dollars." The president of the Brentwood Country Club, in substance, testified to the same effect; and Hunter corroborated their testimony so far as concerned the "control and jurisdiction" which the Brentwood Country Club had over the assistants employed by him.

[1-3] By section 8 (a) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act an employee is defined as any one "under any appointment or contract of hire. * * *" And if he be employed "to render personal service to his employer, otherwise than in the pursuit of an independent calling, and * * * in such service remains entirely under the control and direction of the latter, who is called his master," he is a servant or employee. Section 2009, Civ. Code; Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 810, 159 P. 723; Press Publishing Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 190 Cal. 114, 122, 210 P. 820. The presumption is that any person rendering service for another other than as an independent contractor, or as expressly excluded by the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, is an employee; and the burden of proof rests upon the person to whom the services were being rendered to establish the fact that the person rendering the services was acting in the capacity of an independent contractor. Section 8 (c), (b), Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, Stats. 1917, p. 831; Hillen v. Industrial Acc. Com., 199 Cal. 577, 580, 250 P. 570.

[4] The authorities indicate that ordinarily the determination of the question of whether an injured person was an employee or was an independent contractor rests with the trial tribunal. It is only either where no substantial evidence was introduced on the point, or where from the evidence the finding of fact was necessarily based on a conclusion of law, that an appellate court is authorized to interfere.

In the case of Roman Catholic Archbishop of San Francisco v. Industrial Acc. Com., 194 Cal. 660, 667, 230 P. 1, 4, one of the questions before the commission was whether a man who had been engaged at a fixed wage per hour to do a job of reshingling a building was an employee or was an independent contractor. Touching the point with reference to the conclusiveness of the finding of the Industrial Accident Commission in the matter, in part, the court said:

> " 'Whether a workman is an employee within the Workmen's Compensation Act or an independent contractor is a question of fact upon which the judgment of the Industrial Commission is conclusive where the facts are in dispute, and becomes a question of law only when but one inference can reasonably be drawn from the facts.' Federal Mining & Smelting Co. v. Thomas [99 Okl. 4], 225 P. 967. It was said in Western Pac. R. R. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 193 Cal. 413, 224 P. 754: 'It is the rule that where from the evidence two opposing inferences may be drawn, that inference which is accepted by the commission must be sustained if there is evidence in the record to support it and if it is a reasonable inference to be drawn from that evidence. Eastman v. Industrial Acc. Com., 186 Cal. 587, 589 [200 P. 17]; Polar Ice, etc., Co. v. Mulray, 67 Ind. App. 270, 119 N. E. 149.' See, also, Tartar v. Industrial Acc. Com., 191 Cal. 703 [218 P. 39]; Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 182 Cal. 612 [187 P. 42]."

In the case of Hillen v. Industrial Accident Commission, 199 Cal. 577, 250 P. 570, it appeared that Hillen was a builder; that one Downing, who was a shingler by trade, was engaged by Hillen at the rate of $1.25 per thousand shingles to place the shingles upon certain houses being built by Hillen. For the purpose of "rushing" on several different jobs, Downing procured other workmen to assist him. When each of the several jobs was completed, Downing collected compensation from Hillen in accordance with the specified rate and thereafter paid himself, as well as any extra workmen whom he had employed. During his employment, Downing was injured and thereupon, in an application presented by him to the Industrial Accident Commission for adjustment of compensation, the question arose as to whether he was an employee or an independent contractor. In considering the point, the court, in part, said that one of the best tests to determine whether the relation existing between the parties was that of independent contractor or that of employer and employee was the right on the part of the employer to direct the details—to control, to interfere—in the conduct of the work, and, finally, the legal right, without liability to the employer, to terminate the relationship or to discharge the employee. But, so far as concerns the instant proceeding, the important point decided in the Hillen Case is that the decision by the Industrial Accident Commission as to what relationship existed between the parties was binding on an appellate court. In treating that particular matter, the opinion contains the following language:

> "* * * Whether or not the relation of employer and employee existed in this case, under the oral contract entered into, is a question of mixed law and fact, to be proved like any other question. The finding of the commission, in effect, that the relation existed between Hillen and Downing, is binding on this court. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co. v. Industrial Accident Com., 180 Cal. 497, 499 [181 P. 788]. Unless there is such an entire absence of evidence in the record as to render the finding unreasonable, or in excess of the powers of the commission, the court is not empowered to set it aside. Eastman Co. v. Industrial Accident Com., 186 Cal. 587, 598 [200 P. 17]. The award of the commission may be annulled only if there is no substantial evidence in support of its findings. Press Pub. Co. v. Industrial Accident Com., 190 Cal. 114, 124 [210 P. 820]."

In the case of Montezuma Mountain Ranch School v. Industrial Acc. Com. (Cal.) 258 P. 84, the salient facts were that a man who owned a wood-sawing outfit was employed by the manager of a school district to saw certain wood. An oral contract was made whereby a stipulated sum per hour was to be paid not only to the owner of the wood-sawing outfit, but as well to certain of his employees. The manager of the school district reserved the right to terminate the work at will; also "the right of placing more men at work on the job than was necessary to complete the [ordinary] crew complement of three men." In the course of the employment a son of the owner of the wood-sawing outfit, who was one of the men working on the job, was injured and he sought from, and was awarded by, the Industrial Accident Commission compensation under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act. In a proceeding to review the findings and award of the commission in the matter, it was held that:

> "The burden of proving that claimant was an employee of an independent contractor and not a compensable employee was upon petitioners. * * * This burden they did not fully overcome, in the view of the commission, and we are not convinced that the award stands wholly unsupported by proof."

In the case of New York Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Accident Com., 80 Cal. App. 713, 252 P. 775, it was held that the evidence was sufficient to support the finding by the Industrial Accident Commission to the effect that a fellow employee, under whom the injured employee performed his work, was a foreman of his employer and not an independent subcontractor, where both the injured employee and the foreman received their compensation as wages and where the employer who contracted on the cost-plus basis retained the right to discharge the injured employee at any time, notwithstanding the injured employee received his instructions and wages directly from the foreman and the foreman furnished the material and charged the employer for the material, labor, and $1 per day extra for every man under him.

While from the ordinary legal standpoint it may be that in some respects the evidence to which reference has been had herein was not of the most satisfactory character for the purpose of establishing the question of whether Campbell, the man employed by Hunter, was an employee of the Brentwood Country Club, it should be remembered that in hearings before the Industrial Accident Commission the statute expressly provides that:

> Neither such commission nor its referees "shall be bound by the common law or statutory rules of evidence and procedure, * * * nor shall any order, award, rule or regulation be invalidated because of the admission into the record, and use as proof of any fact in dispute, of any evidence not admissible under the said common law or statutory rules of evidence and procedure." Stats. 1917, pp. 831, 871, § 60(a).

See, also, Pacific Gas & Elec. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 180 Cal. 497, 181 P. 788; Western Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 174 Cal. 315, 163 P. 60; Employers L. A. Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 179 Cal. 432, 177 P. 273.

[5, 6] Considering the evidence adduced, together with the inferences deducible therefrom, it becomes clear that the determination of the status of Campbell, the man employed by Hunter, involved "a question of mixed law and fact." The authorities to which attention has been directed, and especially the case of Hillen v. Industrial Acc. Com., 199 Cal. 577, 580, 250 P. 570, announce the rule with clarity and positiveness that such a situation must be met and proved like any other question of fact. With such an issue before the trial tribunal, where supported by substantial evidence, and in the absence of lack of jurisdiction, or of unreasonableness in its conclusions, the finding by such tribunal is conclusive on an appellate court.

As the evidence appears sufficient to justify the findings and award, and as neither the jurisdiction of the commission nor the reasonableness of its conclusion is the subject of attack, it follows that the award should be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; YORK, J.

ADAMS v. TUXEDO LAND CO. et al.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 29, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⚷1040(12)—Defendant having recovered no judgment for damages, whether court erred in overruling plaintiff's demurrer to cross-complaint for damages was immaterial.

Whether trial court erred in overruling plaintiff's demurrer to defendant's cross-complaint, wherein judgment was asked against plaintiff in specified sum, was immaterial, where no judgment for damages was awarded defendant.

2. Automobiles ⚷244(43)—Evidence held to warrant finding that automobile collision at intersection resulted from plaintiff's negligence in violating right of way rule (Motor Vehicle Act, § 12).

In action for injuries sustained in automobile collision at intersection, evidence held to warrant finding that collision was proximate result of plaintiff's own negligence in violating right of way rule of Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1919, p. 215) § 12.

3. Automobiles ⚷244(28)—Evidence held to warrant finding that employee was using his own automobile for own purposes, not in employer's business, at time of collision.

In action for injuries sustained in automobile collision at intersection, while defendant employee was driving his own automobile to defendant employer's pumping plant for purpose of eating his noon lunch, evidence held to warrant finding that defendant employee was using car for his own purposes, and not in defendant employer's business, and that employer was therefore not liable.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by J. R. Adams against the Tuxedo Land Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant.

Louttit, Stewart & Louttit and McNoble & Arndt, all of Stockton, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiff began this action to recover damages for injuries sustained in an automobile collision alleged to have been due to the negligence of John Stange, an employee of the Tuxedo Land Company. The defendants had judgment and the plaintiff appeals.

[1] Only two questions are presented for consideration: First, was the defendant John Stange guilty of negligence, proximately causing the injury? And, second, was he, at the time of the collision, acting within the scope of his employment as a laborer of the Tuxedo Land Company? The appellant urges an additional point for consideration, to wit, that the court erred in overruling plaintiff's de-murrer to the cross-complaint by John Stange, wherein judgment was asked against the plaintiff in the sum of $57. As no judgment for damages was awarded the defendant Stange, whether the court erred in so ruling is wholly immaterial.

The transcript shows that the Tuxedo Land Company is a corporation and the owner of a subdivision within the corporate limits of the city of Stockton. Its business was the sale of lots, laying of sidewalks, water pipes, setting out trees, and other work in connection with improving the subdivision known as Tuxedo Park. John Stange was an employee of the company. His duties were those of a laborer, and his work, principally, was laying sidewalks, planting trees, laying pipes, etc. The Tuxedo Land Company owned and maintained a pumping plant in the subdivision. At this place they had a storehouse. The defendant Stange drove to his work each morning in a Ford car owned by himself. The testimony shows that he would go to the storehouse, get such tools as he needed, put them in his car, and drive to the place where the work was to be done; that about 12 o'clock he would quit his work, get into his Ford car, and drive to the pumping plant, and there eat his lunch, after which, at about 1 o'clock, he would return to his work. The company owned and furnished a wheelbarrow for the transportation of tools, etc., but, as a matter of convenience, the defendant Stange usually transported such tools in his Ford car. At the time of the accident, which occurred during the noon hour, the defendant Stange was driving in his own Ford car from his work to the pumping plant for the purpose of eating his lunch. The testimony shows that at that time he was not transacting any business for the company. He was not going to the pumping plant on any mission for the company, nor was he transporting any property belonging to the company, but was going there to eat his own lunch, as herein stated.

At the time of the collision he was driving south on a certain street in Tuxedo Park known as and called Alston Way, while the plaintiff at the time of the collision was driving easterly on North Tuxedo avenue. The defendant was accompanied by a fellow workman named John Condon. At the time of the collision the Motor Vehicle Act provided that:

> "An operator of a vehicle shall yield the right of way at the intersection of their paths to a vehicle approaching from the right, unless such vehicle approaching from the right is further from the point of the intersection of their paths than the first named vehicle." St. 1919, p. 215, § 12.

The court found, among other things, that at the time of the collision the defendant John Stange was operating his Ford car at a speed of not more than 15 miles per hour, and that the plaintiff, at that period of time, was operating his automobile at a speed in excess of 25 miles per hour, and carelessly and negligently drove his automobile in front of the Ford car operated by the defendant Stange, and that at the time of the collision the plaintiff was negligently and carelessly operating his automobile, in violation of the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act, and that such negligent operation was the proximate cause of the collision and contributed directly to the plaintiff's injuries. The court further found that at the time of the collision the defendant John Stange was not operating his Ford car in the service of the defendant corporation, but was operating the same upon his own independent mission. And as a result of such findings it was adjudged that the plaintiff take nothing as against either defendant.

[2, 3] The testimony of the defendant Stange and of the witness Condon, who was riding with him, is to the effect that the defendant Stange, at the time he entered the intersection where the collision occurred, was driving the Ford car at a speed between 12 and 15 miles per hour, and that the plaintiff, at the time the Ford car, driven by Stange, entered the intersection, was some 75 feet distant therefrom, and, according to the testimony of Stange, traveling at the rate of 30 miles per hour. There is also testimony in the transcript to the effect that the plaintiff, after the collision, stated that he was to blame; that he was in a hurry, and wanted to catch a train; that he was intending to go up to the mountains to do some surveying. The testimony of the defendant Stange and the witness Condon is also to the effect that they were on their way from work to the pumping plant to eat their lunch; that they were riding in a Ford car belonging to the defendant Stange; that they were not transporting any property belonging to the company. The testimony to which we have referred, if believed by the trial court, amply supports the findings, and the findings support the judgment. That there may have been some conflicting testimony is wholly immaterial here. The evidence is likewise sufficient, if believed by the trial court, to show that at the time of the accident the defendant Stange was upon his own independent mission, and was not in the service of the defendant Tuxedo Land Company. The cases cited by the appellant, while applicable to the facts presented in each case, are not pertinent here by reason of the facts shown by the testimony as herein referred to. Under the facts presented by the record before us, the following cases set forth the law, showing that unless the defendant Stange, at the very time of the accident, was in the service of the Tuxedo Land Company, then and in that case the Tuxedo Land Company would not be responsible for his negligence. Mauchle v. Panama-Pacific International Exposition Co., 37 Cal. App. 715, 174 P. 400; Nussbaum v. Traung Label Co., 46 Cal. App. 561, 189 P. 728; Kish v. State Automobile Assn., 190 Cal. 246, 212 P. 27. Other cases might be cited, but these state the law applicable here.

The judgment is affirmed.

WATT v. COPELAND. (Civ. 6084.)★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 19, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Trial court's findings on conflicting evidence are conclusive, and all reasonable inferences are to be indulged in their support.

Findings of trial court on conflicting evidence are conclusive, and all reasonable inferences are to be indulged in support of the findings.

2. Appeal and error ⇨901—Appellant claiming error has burden of showing its existence.

The burden is on appellant who claims error to show its existence.

3. Appeal and error ⇨996—Reviewing court cannot substitute its deductions for those of trial court, where two inferences may reasonably be deduced.

Where two inferences may reasonably be deduced from a certain set of facts or circumstances, a reviewing court is not permitted to substitute its deductions for those of trial court.

4. Deeds ⇨208(1)—Finding that there was no irrevocable delivery of deed with intent to transfer title held fair inference from facts.

Finding that there had been no delivery of deed with intent on part of grantor to surrender all control and dominion over it, and to immediately vest in grantee title to property, held a fair and reasonable inference to be deducted from all the facts.

5. Deeds ⇨200—Acts and declarations of grantor while deed was in escrow held properly admitted on question whether there was effective delivery of deed in escrow.

Where controlling issue in case was whether or not grantor had parted with her title to property by making an effective delivery of the deed in escrow, facts and circumstances occurring at time of making of deed and grantor's acts and statements material to question of delivery during entire period that deed was in escrow were properly admitted.

6. Deeds ⇨200—Oral instructions by agent of grantor at time deed was deposited in escrow held properly admitted on question whether there was an effective delivery of deed.

In action involving question whether grantor made effective delivery of deed in escrow with intent to transfer title, evidence of oral instructions, given by one who was agent and attorney of grantor in preparation and delivery of deed, to bank cashier at time deed was deposited, which were in accord with subsequent acts and declarations of grantor, held properly admitted.

7. Appeal and error ⇨931(6)—Appellate court will assume that trial court disregarded incompetent evidence which it was impossible to prevent from finding its way into record.

Appellate court will assume that trial court, in reaching its conclusion, disregarded incompetent evidence which it was difficult, if not impossible, for trial judge to prevent from finding its way into record.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Richard L. Watt against Octavia Copeland. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Roy A. Bronson and E. D. Bronson, Jr., both of San Francisco, and W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

Barrett & McConnell, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

PRESTON, Presiding Justice pro tem. Plaintiff brought this action to quiet title to an undivided one-half interest in a tract of land situate near the town of Sonoma, in Sonoma county, and also to cancel a deed made in 1923 by Sarah Ellen Watt, as grantor, to defendant, Octavia Copeland, as grantee.

The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and judgment was rendered quieting the title of defendant, Octavia Copeland, in and to said undivided one-half interest in said land, and canceling a deed made in 1911 by Sarah Ellen Watt, as grantor, to plaintiff, Richard L. Watt, as grantee. From this judgment the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The facts are briefly these: Richard L. Watt, Sr., was the husband of Sarah Ellen Watt, and the uncle of plaintiff and appellant, and the owner of the entire tract of land in question. The property was community property. Richard L. Watt, Sr., died testate in 1889, and his estate was probated, and this land distributed as follows: An undivided one-half interest to appellant, Richard L. Watt, Jr., subject to a life estate therein to Sarah Ellen Watt, and the remaining undivided one-half interest to Sarah Ellen Watt in fee simple. Following the death of Richard L. Watt, Sr., Mathew Watt, the father of appellant, was the tenant in possession of the land for twelve years. In 1901 the appellant went into possession of the premises under a verbal lease from Mrs. Watt at an agreed rental of $450 per annum. This lease was renewed from year to year; the only change being that about the year 1911 the rent was raised to $550 per annum. Appellant remained in possession of the ranch as tenant from 1901 until the death of Mrs. Watt in September of 1924. Mrs. Watt, after her husband's death, and continuously until her death, resided with her cousin Octavia Copeland, the respondent herein. In 1911 Mrs.

Watt signed and acknowledged a deed, purporting to convey to appellant Richard L. Watt her undivided one-half interest in and to said property, and caused said deed to be deposited in the Sonoma Valley Bank, at Sonoma, Cal. This deed was prepared by Robert A. Poppe, an attorney of Sonoma, acknowledged before him as notary public, placed in an envelope and sealed, and upon the envelope Mr. Poppe wrote: "From Sarah Ellen Watt to Richard L. Watt. To be delivered upon my death." Immediately below this writing appeared the signature of Mrs. Sarah Ellen Watt. Mr. Poppe then took this envelope containing the deed and instructions to the Sonoma Valley Bank, in Sonoma City, and delivered it to Mr. Burris, the cashier of the bank. What took place between Mr. Burris and Mr. Poppe can best be related by quoting a portion of the testimony of Mr. Burris:

> "Q. Do you recall the occasion, Mr. Burris, some time about the year of 1911, when Robert Poppe, now deceased, but then a practicing attorney of Sonoma, came to your bank and delivered to you a paper in connection with some business for Mrs. Watt? A. I do.
> "Q. * * * Was any one else present within hearing, as far as you know? A. Not that I know of.
> "Q. Did Col. Poppe say to you at that time what the paper was that he was giving to you? A. He did not designate the paper as a deed, or bond, or anything of that kind.
> "Q. Did Mrs. Watt come to the bank with Col. Poppe at that time? A. I think not.
> "Q. Did you ever see or talk with Mrs. Watt in connection with that transaction? A. I never did.
> "Q. You say that at this time Col. Poppe handed you this paper? A. That is my recollection.
> "Q. And what was the paper? A. Well, it was simply an envelope.
> "Q. Do you know whether or not there was any writing on it? A. There was writing on the back of the envelope.
> "Q. To the best of your recollection, what was that writing? A. Well, it was simply, 'To be delivered to Mr. Watt' at her death.
> "The Court: You say, Mr. Burris, that the name, Richard Watt, and also Sarah Watt; how would her name come there, how did that appear, do you recall? A. I do not recollect only that he handed it to me and told me that that was a document that Mrs. Watt wanted placed in safe-keeping.
> "Q. What, if anything, did Mr. Poppe say to you in regard to that document when he handed it to you? A. Well, he handed me the document and told me, 'That is a document from Mrs. Watt,' and that he wished us to keep it there for safe-keeping until she called for it. * * *
> "Q. You did take the document? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. And it was thereafter kept in the custody of the bank? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. Did you issue any receipt for the document to Col. Poppe for Mrs. Watt? A. No receipt.
> "Q. Where was the deed or that envelope kept? A. It was kept in the vault in a pigeonhole where we kept other deeds and wills and other various papers that were left with us for safe-keeping."

There is some little conflict as to the handwriting and also as to the exact wording on the envelope containing the deed. The witness Perkins, an employee of the bank, testified in part as follows:

> "Q. Where was that envelope when you first saw it? A. That envelope was in a pigeonhole in a wooden case in the bank box with other papers.
> "Q. Now, what was the character of the other papers with which it was kept? A. Oh, deeds, and mortgages and satisfaction of mortgages.
> "Q. Papers belonging to the bank, or belonging to the bank's customers? A. Belonging to the bank's customers. * * *
> "Q. Just give us your best recollection of what the indorsement was, Mr. Perkins? A. Across the top of the envelope was marked 'Deed,' and just below, 'From Sarah E. Watt, to Richard L. Watt, to be delivered to him upon my death,' signed, 'Sarah E. Watt.' * * * I might state that the writing on the envelope was in the handwriting of the late Robert A. Poppe, except the signature of Mrs. Watt.
> "Q. You were familiar, were you, with Col. Poppe's handwriting? A. Very familiar.
> "Q. No question about that being his handwriting? A. No question at all."

Henry Webster, Jr., another employee of the bank, testified that the wording on the envelope containing the deed was as follows:

> "This deed to be delivered to Richard L. Watt by the Sonoma Valley Bank on my death. [Signed] Mrs. S. E. Watt."

Mr. Webster further testified that all the writing was in the handwriting of Mrs. Watt.

This deed was held by the bank from the time of its deposit in 1911 until the first week in September, 1923, at which time it was delivered by the bank to Miss Copeland upon the written order of Mrs. Watt. Miss Copeland took the envelope containing the deed and delivered the same to Mrs. Watt. The envelope, unopened, was deposited in a drawer in Mrs. Watt's home, where it remained for about two months. On or about November 1, 1923, Mrs. Watt sent for Mr. Grinstead, an attorney residing and practicing in Sonoma City, and who had taken over the practice of Mr. Poppe, who had died. Thereafter, and on the same day, Mr. Grinstead came to Mrs. Watt's home, and the envelope containing the deed was then opened by him and, after some conversation with Mrs. Watt, Mr. Grinstead drew a will for her, which she at that time duly executed, and in which she devised and bequeathed her entire estate to Miss Octavia Copeland, the respondent herein, and in said will recited that she was the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the lands in question. Mr. Grinstead took the deed and the envelope with the instructions indorsed thereon to his office. Thereafter, and on November 6th, at the request of Mrs. Watt, Mr. Grinstead drew a new deed conveying the undivided one-half interest in the land in question from Sarah Ellen Watt, as grantor, to Miss Octavia Copeland, as grantee, which deed was duly executed and delivered. This latter deed was held by Mr. Grinstead and recorded upon the death of Mrs. Watt. The envelope containing the instructions as to the deed of 1911 was torn up by Mr. Grinstead, and the deed itself was returned by him to Mrs. Watt through the mail and she thereupon destroyed it.

Evidence of statements, acts, and conduct on the part of Mrs. Watt was received in evidence as bearing upon the question of her intention at the time the deed to appellant was deposited with the bank in 1911. The respondent testified that in November, 1923, Mrs. Watt stated to her "that she did not know what was on the envelope; that she had never read it, and that said property was hers, and she had the right to do with it as she pleased."

On another occasion Mrs. Watt stated to the respondent "that she could mortgage her half of the property, or sell it, if it was necessary."

The witness Sophia Kramer, an intimate friend and neighbor for many years of Mrs. Watt, testified that in the year 1917 or 1918 she had a conversation with Mrs. Watt, in which Mrs. Watt urged her to deposit her bonds and other papers for safe-keeping in the bank, saying, "I have my papers there for safe-keeping, and you can get them for the asking; I can get them any time I want to and you can do the same." On another occasion the witness testified that Mrs. Watt stated to her that she had a right to sell her half of the ranch, if she so desired.

Another witness, Mrs. Burns, a nurse who cared for Mrs. Watt from time to time during the last years of her life, testified that Mrs. Watt told her "that her husband had left a will leaving Richard Watt half of her property, and had requested her to leave her other half to him also, and she intended doing so, although Mr. Poppe, the lawyer, told her she did not have to, as the will was not a just one. He said that she had the right to her own property and to half of his to do with as she pleased, but she thought she would carry out his wishes for some years afterwards, and did finally make a deed in favor of Richard Watt, and put it in the bank for safe-keeping, because there might be a fire or anything, and would destroy it if she kept it at home. She said she always kept any papers she had in the bank, but in later years Miss Copeland and she had lived together for 36 or 37 years, I think she said, and she had done so much for her, and had given up her business, so she could take care of her, and she said she would not be able to make a living by sewing, so, if I have anything to leave, she has the right to half of it, and I am making a new deed in her favor."

There were other witnesses who testified to similar conversations.

Appellant testified that Mrs. Watt had on several occasions told him that she was going to give him her half of the property upon her death, and that she had made a deed to him, and had deposited it in the Sonoma Valley Bank.

From all these facts and circumstances the trial court found, among other things:

> "That at the time said deed was so deposited with said Sonoma Valley Bank, and at all times thereafter until her death, it was the purpose and intention of said Sarah Ellen Watt that she should have dominion and control over said deed, and the right to withdraw and revoke the same, and that said Sarah Ellen Watt at the time said alleged deed was so deposited with the said Sonoma Valley Bank, and at all times thereafter until her death, did not intend to make absolute delivery of said deed or to make any delivery whatever of said deed other than to deposit the same for safe-keeping as aforesaid."

[1-3] Appellant contends that this finding is not supported by the evidence. The law is well settled that the findings of the trial court upon conflicting evidence are conclusive, and all reasonable inferences are to be indulged in support of the findings. Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 228 P. 25; Wilbur v. Wilbur, 197 Cal. 1, 239 P. 332. The law is equally well settled that the burden is upon appellant, who claims error, to show its existence. Hayne on New Trial and Appeal (Rev. Ed.) § 285, p. 1574; Wilbur v. Wilbur, supra. Where two inferences may reasonably be deduced from a certain set of facts or circumstances, a reviewing court is not permitted to substitute its deductions for those of the trial court. Wilbur v. Wilbur, supra, and cases there cited.

[4] The evidence in this case is not particularly conflicting, but it presents a state of facts from which the inference may be reasonably drawn that there had been no delivery of the deed with intent on the part of Mrs. Watt to surrender all control and dominion over the same, and to immediately vest in the grantee, Richard L. Watt, the title to the property; or the inference could also be drawn from the same facts and circumstances that Mrs. Watt, when she caused the deed to be deposited in the bank, intended to surrender all dominion and control over the deed, and that the title to the property should vest absolutely and immediately in the grantee, Richard L. Watt. Under such circumstances, we are not permitted to disturb the findings of the trial court.

The legal requirements to effect a valid delivery of a deed has often been stated by the Supreme Court of this state. In Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 638, 151 P. 3, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703, the Supreme Court states the rule as follows:

"It is essential to the validity of a transfer of real property that there be a delivery of the conveyance with intent to transfer the title, and the true test under which delivery is to be determined is in ascertaining whether in parting with the possession of the conveyance the grantor intended thereby to divest himself of title. If he did, there was an effective delivery of the deed. If not, there was no delivery. The solution of this question is grounded entirely on the intention of the grantor, and this essential matter of intention is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court from a consideration of all the evidence in a given case bearing upon the question." Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 451, 33 P. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186; Kenniff v. Caulfield, 140 Cal. 34, 73 P. 803; Estate of Cornelius, 151 Cal. 552, 91 P. 329; Follmer v. Rohrer, 158 Cal. 757, 112 P. 544; Reed v. Smith, 125 Cal. 491, 58 P. 139; Black v. Sharkey, 104 Cal. 279, 37 P. 939; Hibberd v. Smith, 67 Cal. 547, 4 P. 473, 8 P. 46, 56 Am. Rep. 726; Denis v. Velati, 96 Cal. 227, 31 P. 1; Hotaling v. Hotaling, 193 Cal. 382, 224 P. 455; Blackledge v. McIntosh (Cal. App.) 259 P. 770.

[5] Appellant contends that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence acts and declarations of Sarah Ellen Watt, made after the deposit of the deed in the bank, because her instructions to the bank were in writing, and were complete upon their face, and could not be varied or changed by parol evidence. We think this contention is without merit. The very question in issue in this case was whether or not Mrs. Watt, the grantor, had parted with her title by making an effective delivery of the deed in escrow. Therefore her acts and statements, material to the question of delivery during the entire period that the deed was in escrow, may be shown. Williams v. Kidd, supra, and cases cited; Smith v. Smith, 173 Cal. 725, 161 P. 495. Furthermore, the written instructions to the bank did not purport to be all the instructions given by Mrs. Watt. Mr. Burris, the only living person present when the deed was deposited with the bank, testified that Mr. Poppe handed him the document, saying: "She (Mrs. Watt) wants you to hold this document for safe-keeping until she calls for it if she sees fit." From this language alone, if it be given any consideration, it might well be concluded that the delivery was conditional, being merely deposited with the bank for safekeeping.

The rule that a written instrument may not be varied by oral testimony has no application in a case of this character. The vital question is, What was the intention of Mrs. Watt when she signed and acknowledged the deed, and caused it to be placed in the possession of the bank? and the law says that this can best be ascertained by showing all the facts and circumstances occurring at the time of the making of the deed, and also all the subsequent acts and declarations of the grantor in relation to the property. Smith v. Smith, supra; Gaston v. City of Portland, 16 Or. 255, 19 P. 127.

The case of Moore v. Trott, 156 Cal. 353, 104 P. 578, 134 Am. St. Rep. 131, relied upon by appellant, is not in conflict with the rule that oral instructions may be proved in connection with written instructions, if, as a matter of fact, such oral instructions were actually given. In Moore v. Trott, supra, the only instructions, as far as the record discloses, were in writing, and there the court properly held that the question of delivery depended upon a true construction of the writing. There was no other evidence in the case from which the real intention of the grantor could be determined. Furthermore, on the second trial of Moore v. Trott, supra, the subsequent acts and declarations of the grantor made to persons other than the depositor were admitted in evidence, notwithstanding the written letter of instructions, and the Supreme Court sustained the judgment of the lower court. Moore v. Trott, 162 Cal, 268, 122 P. 462.

[6] Appellant further contends that the court erred in admitting in evidence the oral instructions given by Mr. Poppe to Mr. Burris, the cashier of the bank, at the time the deed was deposited with the bank, for the additional reason that Mr. Poppe was not shown to have any authority to speak for Mrs. Watt. There is no merit in this contention. The record shows clearly that Mr. Poppe was the agent and attorney of Mrs. Watt in the preparation and delivery of the deed, and had implied, if not actual, authority to add oral instructions on her part to the written instructions given to the bank. Moreover, the instructions that Mr. Poppe gave to Mr. Burris are in accord with the subsequent acts and declarations of Mrs. Watt.

The appellant also contends that the court erred in other respects in the admission of certain evidence. We have examined all these alleged errors, and we find none of them of sufficient importance to demand particular mention.

[7] In a case of this character, it is difficult, if not impossible, for the trial judge to prevent some incompetent testimony from finding its way into the record, but it is to be assumed that the court in reaching its conclusion disregarded any such incompetent evidence. Roth v. Thomson, 40 Cal. App. 208, 180 P. 656.

We have examined the entire record with care, and find no prejudicial error therein. The case was carefully tried, and the conclusion reached by the trial court that there had been no delivery of the deed in question, with the intent to transfer the title is a fair and reasonable inference to be deduced from all the facts.

We think the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

ARATA & PETERS, Inc., v. SNOW MOUNTAIN WATER & POWER CO. et al.★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 26, 1928.

Mechanics' liens ⚬=45—One who furnished food to contractor, used during construction of dam, held not entitled to lien; "materials;" "provisions" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183).

One furnishing articles of food, consisting of fruit, vegetables, onions, beans, and tomatoes, to contractor erecting dam, which were used and consumed in the construction work, held not entitled to mechanic's lien under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, giving lien to persons furnishing materials; "materials" being distinguished from "provisions," which relates to a stock of food.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Materials; Provisions.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action by Arata & Peters, Inc., against the Snow Mountain Water & Power Company and others. Judgment for defendant named, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. T. Plunkett, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Max Thelen, of San Francisco, Benjamin C. Jones, of Lakeport, and Thelen & Marrin, of San Francisco (Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent Snow Mountain Water & Power Co.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to foreclose a mechanic's lien for foodstuffs furnished the contractor under a private contract. A demurrer to the third amended complaint was sustained without leave to amend, and a judgment of dismissal as to the water company followed. Plaintiff appeals upon a typewritten record.

The amended complaint alleges that the plaintiff furnished to the contractor certain articles of food consisting of fruit, vegetables, onions, beans, and potatoes, all of which "were actually used and consumed in the construction work" on a dam which the contractor was building for the water company under written contract. The usual allegations as to the failure to pay, the filing of a lien, and the amount due the contractor from the owner followed, but these do not call for consideration on this appeal. The essential question is whether a mechanic's lien will lie under our statutes for the character of supplies alleged to have been furnished.

Section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, permits "mechanics, materialmen, * * * and all persons * * * furnishing materials to be used or consumed in * * * the construction, * * * of any building, * * * or other structure" to have a lien upon the property "upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished materials, for the value of such * * * materials furnished and for the value of the use of such appliances, teams or power." Prior to the amendment of the section in 1911, it was held that the section did not authorize a lien for the wages of a cook engaged to cook meals for the employees of a contractor under a private contract (McCormick v. L. A. C. W. Co., 40 Cal. 185, 187), or for one who supplied meat to be consumed by the employees of a mine (Malone v. Big Flat G. M. Co., 76 Cal. 578, 586, 18 P. 772). The purport of the decisions is that the materials which are made lienable are those only which have entered into the construction of the structure under contract. Ensele v. Jolley, 188 Cal. 297, 300, 204 P. 1085, and cases cited. This rule has been uniformly followed in other states. Carson & Co. v. Shelton, 128 Ky. 248, 107 S. W. 793, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 509; Ferguson v. Despo, 8 Ind. App. 523, 34 N. E. 575, 576; Pennsylvania Co. v. Mehaffey, 75 Ohio St. 432, 80 N. E. 177, 181, 116 Am. St. Rep. 746, 9 Ann. Cas. 305; Armour & Co. v. Western Construction Co., 36 Wash. 529, 78 P. 1106, 1107; Tsutakawa v. Kumamoto, 53 Wash. 231, 101 P. 869, 871, 102 P. 766; Dudley v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. Ry. Co., 65 Mich. 655, 32 N. W. 884, 886.

Appellant argues that the rule of these cases is no longer applicable because the amendment to section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, in 1911, broadened the scope of the Mechanic's Lien Act so as to include all persons "bestowing skill or other necessary services" or furnishing materials to be used "or consumed" in the construction or alteration of any building or structure, and because the Legislature declared that the act of 1911 should be liberally construed. Section 14, St. 1911, p. 1313. The addition of the words "or consumed" has led to the ruling that a lien may be enforced for the value of lumber used as forms for holding concrete in place where such use destroyed the value of the lumber. Cons. Lumber Co. v. Bosworth, Inc., 40 Cal. App. 80, 91, 180 P. 60; Olson-Mahoney Lumber Co. v. Dunne Inv. Co., 30 Cal. App. 332, 344, 159 P. 178. But the rule of these cases is that the lumber was "material" used in the actual work of construction, and the word "materials" as used in the mechanic's lien statutes has been interpreted and applied to include "the substance or matter of which anything is made or may be made." Webster Dict. There is a well-defined distinction between the word "materials" as used in statutes of this nature, and the word "provisions," which relates to "a stock of food." Webster Dict. This distinction having been recognized long prior to the amendment of 1911, it is fair to assume that the Legislature used the word "materials" in accordance with the accepted meaning of the term, and that, if it had intended to grant a lien to one who has furnished provisions, such as foodstuffs, to be used and consumed by the employees of a contractor under a private contract, it would have used the term in the amendment.

Appellant insists that we should apply the rule of Bricker v. Rollins & Jarecki, 178 Cal. 347, 173 P. 592, where recovery was allowed for provisions furnished a contractor performing work under a public contract with a county. The case is not in point. It was a suit against the surety on a bond of the contractor, which was given under a special statute (Stats. 1897, pp. 201, 202), which required a bond conditioned that, if the contractor failed to pay for materials "or supplies" furnished under the contract, the surety would pay for them. The rule of the decision is that provisions furnished to be consumed by the men or the teams during the progress of the work came under the head of "supplies" as used in the bond. The distinction between the mechanic's lien statute and this statute relating to bonds required of contractors in public work is pointed out in Sherman v. American Surety Co., 178 Cal. 286, 289, 173 P. 161, and Pac. Wood & Coal Co. v. Oswald, 179 Cal. 712, 715, 178 P. 854. It is true that, in the latter case, the court said that an action would lie on the bond for feed furnished for the teams used by a subcontractor on the work, though the statute under which the bond was given did not expressly require surety for payment of "supplies," but the court took particular care to limit the holding to actions on bonds as distinguished from actions on liens filed under the mechanic's lien statutes.

DUNGER et al. v. WHITNEY et al.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 26, 1928.

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑299(3)—Rescission of contract would not be allowed purchasers, where they neither restored nor offered to restore land received (Civ. Code, § 1691).

In vendor's action to foreclose purchasers' rights arising out of contract of purchase and sale of real estate, rescission of such contract would not be, because of Civ. Code, § 1691, allowed the purchasers on their cross-complaint, where they neither had restored nor offered to restore what they had received.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑299(3)—In vendor's action to foreclose purchasers' rights, purchasers' allegations of disclaimer held insufficient to take place, in purchasers' rescission, of offer to restore (Civ. Code, § 1691).

In vendor's action to foreclose purchasers' rights in property, in which action purchasers filed their cross-complaint, purchasers' allegations disclaiming any interest in the property which was basis of plaintiff's suit held insufficient to take the place of the necessary offer, on rescission, to restore what one has received before he can rescind, as provided by Civ. Code, § 1691.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Walter Dunger and another against M. L. Whitney and another, in which defendants filed a cross-complaint. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

C. W. Braswell, of Long Beach, for appellants.

J. C. Thomas, of Visalia, for respondents.

BUCK, Justice pro tem. This action was brought for the purpose of foreclosing the rights of certain vendees arising out of a contract of purchase and sale of real estate. The form of the complaint was that of an ordinary action to quiet title. In their final pleadings the defendants, by way of cross-complaint, "disclaimed any interest in the aforesaid property upon which the plaintiffs have brought suit to quiet title," and alleged the contract in question was procured through the fraud of the plaintiffs, to the damage of the defendants in the sum of $5,500.

The court gave judgment that the defendants "have no interest in or to the aforesaid real property, and plaintiffs are hereby adjudged to own and possess the aforesaid real property," and also decreed that the defendants and cross-complainants recover damages from the plaintiffs in the sum of $5,500, together with interest and costs. From this judgment the plaintiffs appeal.

By the contract out of which the action arose, the plaintiffs agreed to sell to the defendants 160 acres of land lying in the county of Tulare, for the sum or price of $8,000, to be paid as follows, to wit, by the transfer by execution of a deed from the defendants to the plaintiffs of a house and lot in the town of Lindsay, "which is taken and received on the consideration herein of $8,000" for the sum of $2,000, and the remainder of said $8,000 to be paid "on or before 10 years from the date of this agreement." It was further agreed that the deferred payments shall bear interest for the first year at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum payable annually, for the second year at the rate of 4 per cent. payable annually, and for each succeeding year at the rate of 7 per cent. payable annually; and it was further agreed that the defendants should have the right to immediate possession of the premises, and in consideration thereof should pay the second installment of taxes for 1922–23, and, also, subsequent taxes, assessments, liens, levies, or charges which may be laid or placed upon said property, and not allow the same to become delinquent; and it was further agreed that the plaintiffs should execute to the defendants a deed of the above-described property when the defendants had kept and performed all the terms and conditions of the agreement; and the defendants also agreed "to make the payments as herein specified upon the dates and in the amounts as herein provided, and upon their failure so to do, the said parties of the first part shall be relieved from all and any obligations to deliver said deed and shall be relivered from" the return of any payment either of principal or interest made upon the purchase price as herein provided, and all payments upon the principal or interest shall be deemed and agreed to be liquidated damages for the use and occupancy of said premises during the continuance of the agreement, and the parties of the first part shall have the right to make entry in the event of the failure to perform the terms and conditions of the agreement, and shall be entitled to peaceable and quiet possession without court order or decree. And it was further provided that time should be the essence of the agreement. This agreement was executed on January 2, 1923, at which time defendants executed their deed to the lot in Lindsay and entered into possession of the land in question and commenced to cultivate the same. The lot in Lindsay was afterwards sold by plaintiffs.

The action was commenced on January 10, 1925, and the trial was had on September 26, 1925, and by leave of court afterwards obtained the defendants filed on January 19, 1926, their second amended cross-complaint which was used by the court as the basis of the findings that were filed herein on March 22, 1926. It was stipulated that the answer filed by the plaintiffs to the first amended cross-complaint should be deemed to be applicable to the second amended cross-complaint. In this cross-complaint plaintiffs, after alleging the contract of purchase and sale, allege that at the date of said exchange the plaintiffs did, in answer to the questions of the defendants, state the following:

> "That there was no black alkali upon the 160 acres aforesaid; that there was no hardpan thereon; that said quarter section of 160 acres was fine land, and very productive and good for farming purposes, and good to procure and grow alfalfa thereon, and other farm products, that the soil was the very best; as further inducement to obtain the signatures of cross-plaintiffs to the aforesaid contract of exchange, the plaintiffs did then and there promise and agree that if cross-complainants would sign the said contract aforesaid, he, the said plaintiff, Walter Dunger, would loan the defendants and cross-complainants the sum of $500 for the purpose of improving the said 160 acres of land mentioned in the aforesaid contract; that he utterly failed and refused to do so, and thereafter, to wit, stated that he did not have the $500, but if these cross-complainants would obtain the said $500 from some one, he, the said Walter Dunger, would cause a good and sufficient deed to be made to these cross-plaintiffs and let the cross-plaintiffs execute the first mortgage on the aforesaid 160 acres described in the contract aforesaid, and that the said Walter Dunger would take a second mortgage for what was due him on the said real estate; that the cross-plaintiffs did procure the said loan for the purpose of improving the said property, and then the said Walter Dunger refused and failed to make the deed to these cross-plaintiffs, and has continued to refuse hitherto."

The aforesaid matters are set out in paragraph IV of the second amended cross-complaint, and cross-complainants then further allege that:

> "By reason of the allegations, which were false guaranties and assurances, mentioned in paragraph IV of this amended cross-complaint, the cross-plaintiffs were induced to and did sign the aforesaid contract, and would not have signed it had not the plaintiff Walter Dunger made the said promises and assurances, and by reason of the said guaranties, assurances, and promises of said plaintiffs, the said cross-complainants did sign and convey away the aforesaid property."

The cross-complainants further allege: That by reason of "the aforesaid false and fraudulent promises by the plaintiffs" defendants did spend in work and labor the sum of $3,500, and did part with their house and lot aforesaid—that the value of said house is $2,000, with and including the lot upon which it is situated. That the cross-plaintiffs were damaged $2,000 by reason of being induced by plaintiff to exchange the premises at Lindsay. The aforesaid 160 acres described in the contract is worthless for farming purposes and is strongly impregnated with black alkali, except in small patches, and that for farming purposes the same is worthless.

Cross-plaintiffs further allege:

> "That the cross-complainants have been damaged as follows: In the fact that the plaintiff refused to loan the cross-complainants the sum of $500, as aforesaid, for the improvements, and the sum of $3,500 for work and labor performed in the improvements of the said property, expending thereon the sum of $3,500, as aforesaid, in improvements."

In its findings, based upon the foregoing pleading, the learned trial judge finds that "the defendants and cross-complainants have disclaimed any right, title, or interest in and to the real estate upon which the plaintiffs brought action to quiet title," and the court finds "that each and every allegation of the defendants' second amended cross-complaint are true"; and the court further finds that the plaintiffs did make the representations charged in the cross-complaint, and did further find that "by reason of such allegations, guaranties, and assurances" that the defendants were induced to and did sign the contract, and that by reason of the "aforesaid false and fraudulent promises by the said plaintiff, defendants did expend in work and labor the sum of $3,500 and did part with their house and lot, as aforesaid, and that the value of the house and lot is $2,000, and that the defendants were damaged $2,000 by reason of being induced by the plaintiff to exchange the property at Lindsay, and that the aforesaid 160 acres is worthless for farming purposes and is strongly impregnated with black alkali except in small patches, and that for farming purposes the same is worthless," and the court further found "that each and all of the statements and averments were untrue and known by the plaintiff to be untrue; that neither of the defendants or either defendant knew that any of the said statements or averments were untrue, but believed said statements of the plaintiff and averments to be true and acted upon them, and but for them having been made by the plaintiff, defendants and cross-complainants would not have executed and delivered the aforesaid agreement." And as its conclusions of law the court found that the defendants and cross-complainants are entitled to $5,500 as prayed for in their second amended cross-complaint.

From the evidence taken at the trial it appears that immediately upon the signing of the contract in January of 1923, the defendants went into possession of the premises, and there is no evidence that they have ever surrendered, or offered to surrender, the premises to the plaintiffs, or have vacated them. Also, there is evidence tending to show that defendants, as early as the spring of 1923, were aware of the fact that the land was impregnated with alkali, and that the hardpan was very near the surface and that it was not suitable for the raising of alfalfa; also, the evidence shows, without conflict, that as a part of the consideration for their purchase, the defendants received personal property of the value of $550. The evidence also shows, without conflict, that no part of the annual interest on the balance of $6,000 was ever paid; and the evidence also shows, without conflict, that no part of the taxes due since 1923 have been paid by the defendant, but that they went delinquent and the plaintiff was obliged to pay them and, furthermore, that nothing has been paid on the contract since it was signed.

In the recent case of Paolini v. Sulprizio, decided July 29, 1927, 258 P. 380, our Supreme Court in bank, after a full review of the authorities, stated that:

> "Three remedies are open to a party defrauded in a contract for the purchase of real estate. One is rescission, whereby, upon the discovery of the fraud, he repudiates the contract, offers to return what he has received, and seeks a restoration to his original position, claiming whatever damage he may have suffered by reason of the unconscionable conduct of the party; or, too, he may affirm the contract, retain what he has received, and sue for his damages in an action for deceit. * * * He consents to be bound by the provisions of the agreement, but does not thereby release or waive his claim for damages arising from a fraud collateral to the agreement. He must, himself, be willing and able to perform on his part, and it must be conclusively taken that he stands ready and willing to pay the full consideration called for by the contract. * * * From any award which may be made because of the fraud must be deducted any unpaid part of the purchase price. * * * In harmony with this principle, which permits the buyer to retain the property and bring suit for the recovery of the damages which he has sustained, there is a third course open to a defrauded vendee. He may set up the seller's fraud as a partial defense or counterclaim without any offer of restitution, and recoup his damages in the action brought by the guilty party to the contract."

[1] It is unmistakably evident, both from the evidence and findings touching his proposed measure of damage as well as from the position which counsel takes in his pleadings and argument, that the defendant and cross-complainant is not affirming the contract and is not treating his cross-complaint as an action for deceit. In his brief, learned counsel argues, "We practically rescind the contract by our disclaimer." On the other hand, the measure of damage which he seeks to apply and sustain is nowise responsive to any plea of deceit. Pembrook v. Houston, 41 Cal. App. 54, 56, 181 P. 828; Foster v. Gorham, 63 Cal. App. 601, 219 P. 476; Paolini v. Sulprizio, supra, citing Pierce v. Hellenic Co., 76 Misc. Rep. 473, 135 N. Y. S. 605; and Stearns v. Kennedy, 94 Minn. 439, 103 N. W. 212.

It is therefore evident that learned counsel is seeking to avail himself of the fraud of the plaintiff to rescind the agreement and obtain "a restoration to his original position, claiming whatever damage he may have suffered by reason of the unconscionable conduct of the plaintiff." But in assailing the unconscionable conduct of the plaintiff for purposes of rescission, he has failed to observe that portion of the rule which requires that he also do equity and restore or offer to restore what he has received under the contract which he is seeking to annul. Section 1691, Civ. Code; Gates v. McLean, 70 Cal. 42, 50, 11 P. 489. It is true, he has inserted in his cross-complaint the averment that:

> "The plaintiff herein has brought suit to quiet title to the aforesaid property, that the cross-complainants disclaim any interest in the aforesaid property upon which the plaintiffs have brought suit to quiet title thereto."

And in his brief counsel states:

> "We practically rescind the contract by our disclaimer."

[2] And it is true that the learned trial court apparently so found, and did decree that the cross-complainant "had no interest" in the aforesaid real property, and the plaintiffs were accordingly adjudged "to own and possess" the aforesaid real property. Such a mere allegation in the pleadings cannot be held to be sufficient to take the place of the necessary offer to restore possession. Hammond v. Wallace, 85 Cal. 522, 531, 532, 24 P. 837 (20 Am. St. Rep. 239); Zeller v. Milligan, 71 Cal. App. 617, 625, 626, 236 P. 349; Maddock v. Russell, 109 Cal. 417, 426, 42 P. 139. Also, there is no evidence in the record showing or tending to show that the cross-complainants have ever restored or offered to restore the personal property of the value of $550 which they received as a partial consideration for their agreement.

[3, 4] Furthermore, as regards the allegations and findings of fraud on the part of the plaintiff, while it is alleged that plaintiff promised to loan the defendant at the time of the agreement the sum of $500, there is no averment in the complaint to support any finding that such promise was made by the plaintiff without any intention on the part of the plaintiff to perform the same, or with intent to deceive or mislead the defendants. As stated in Hickman v. Johnson, 36 Cal. App. 342, at page 346, 178 P. 145, 147:

> "There is no such allegation. It is not sufficient to allege that such promise was false and fraudulent. Rheingans v. Smith, 161 Cal. 362 (119 P. 494, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1140)."

But the trial court evidently allowed its finding of damage to be based to some extent upon the alleged breach of the merely collateral verbal promise to make the $500 advance. For the court does find that:

> "The cross-complainants were induced to and did sign the aforesaid contract and would not have signed it had not the plaintiff, Walter Dunger, made the said promises and assurances, and by reason of the said guaranties, assurances, and promises of the said plaintiffs the said cross-complainants did sign and convey away the aforesaid property. That by reason of the aforesaid false and fraudulent promise by plaintiffs, defendants and cross-complainants did expend in work and labor the sum of $3,500, and did part with their house and lot aforesaid. That the value of said house is $2,000, with and including the lot upon which it is situated."

But, as already indicated, to the extent that this resulting loss of $5,500 is charged to have been brought about by plaintiff's failure to keep his collateral promise to loan the $500, the finding of damage is uncertain and cannot be sustained. "The mere failure to perform a parol agreement * * * made in good faith is not fraud." Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 525, 529, 21 P. 984, 986 (4 L. R. A. 826, 12 Am. St. Rep. 162).

If it be conceded, as learned counsel vigorously contends in his brief that the defendants have been defrauded by the plaintiffs, it fails to appear that the defendants, through their learned counsel, have chosen to avail themselves of some one of the plain and ample remedies that could and would have been given them by the court under the law of the land if properly invoked.

The judgment appealed from is therefore reversed.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF TULARE v. ANDREAS et al. (Civ. 3437.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 19, 1928.

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑194—Purchaser let into possession has same general rights with respect to crops raised as mortgagor.

Purchaser let into possession has same general rights with respect to crops raised by him as mortgagor would have, and so long as there has been no default on his part or he is permitted to remain in possession, the crops raised and harvested belong to him.

2. Chattel mortgages 🔑139—Contract for sale of premises held to create secret lien for vendor on personalty, invalid against chattel mortgagee taking mortgage on crops in good faith and without notice.

Contract for sale of premises whereby vendor retained title and ownership of crops and profits to be received therefrom, but, contradictory thereto, obligating vendor to apply proceeds of crop to payment of existing indebtedness between himself and purchaser and to deliver the balance thereof to purchaser, latter provisions, being inconsistent with any claim of absolute ownership, held to create a secret lien on personal property invalid as against subsequent chattel mortgagee in good faith and without notice holding mortgage on crops grown.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of Tulare against Jacob Andreas and another for replevin of crop of grapes. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant George Van Vleet appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Kauke, of Fresno, for appellant.

Russell & Heid, of Tulare, for respondent.

BUCK, Justice pro tem. Replevin by the holder of a chattel mortgage to recover a crop of grapes grown on land the subject of an unrecorded agreement of sale between the defendant owner of the land and one Andreas. The crop mortgage in question was executed to the plaintiff by Andreas while Andreas was in possession of the land under his agreement of purchase from the defendant.

Defendant, relying upon certain provisions pertaining to the crops in the agreement of sale, alleges in his answer that he is the sole owner of the crops of grapes and that plaintiff acquired no interest therein by reason of the crop mortgage from Andreas.

The case was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment was given for the plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are fully set out in the findings, and the appeal is on the judgment roll alone.

The contract of sale and purchase of land between the defendant and Andreas is, so far as the land is concerned, in the usual form. The purchase price was to be paid in yearly installments and the vendee, Andreas, entered into possession.

From the beginning, the courts have held that the position of a vendor where the purchaser is in possession under the contract is "analogous to that of a mortgagee." Salmon v. Hoffman, 2 Cal. 143, 56 Am. Dec. 322, and Willis v. Wozencraft, 22 Cal. 607, at page 616. Also, as stated in the recent case of Orange Cove Water Co. v. Sampson, 78 Cal. App. 334, at page 341, 248 P. 526, 529, with numerous citations:

> "Such a contract to convey, if enforceable, has the effect of vesting the equitable estate in the vendee, leaving in the vendor the dry legal title. It is in effect a grant of the whole beneficial interest in the land. * * * The rule in equity is that by a contract of sale of real property for an adequate and sufficient consideration the vendee acquires an equitable title to such property and thereby becomes the equitable owner. The vendee, from the time of the making of such contract, is by equity treated as trustee of the purchase money for the vendor, while the latter is regarded as holding the land in trust for the purchaser as security for the payment of the purchase price until a conveyance of the legal title to the vendee is finally made."

And, as regards the situation of a mortgagor and mortgagee touching the crops growing on mortgaged lands, the rule in this state is fully stated in the cases of Simpson v. Ferguson, 112 Cal. 180, 40 P. 104, 44 P. 484, 53 Am. St. Rep. 201; Modesto Bank v. Owens, 121 Cal. 223, 53 P. 552; Cowdery v. London, etc., Bank, 139 Cal. 298, at page 309, 73 P. 196, 96 Am. St. Rep. 115, and the recent case of Binney v. San Dimas, etc. (Cal. App.) 253 P. 346.

[1] In its general effect, the rule is that until foreclosure, the mortgage creates no estate in the mortgagee and the mortgagor is entitled to such an absolute right and dominion over the crops that a crop mortgage executed by him to a third party takes precedence over any terms in the original mortgage seeking to give a prior security on the crops to the mortgagee. "A purchaser let into possession has, it is said, the same general rights with respect to crops raised by him as a mortgagor would have, and so long as there has been no default on his part or he is permitted to remain in the possession, the crops raised and harvested belong to him." 27 R. C. L. p. 541, citing Killebrew v. Hines, 104 N. C. 182, 10 S. E. 159, 251, 17 Am. St. Rep. 672, where the rule is applied in a case somewhat analogous to the one at bar. See, also, Able v. Gunter, 174 Ala. 389, 57 So. 464, and Speicher v. Lacy, 28 Okl. 541, 115 P. 271, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1066.

But it is defendant's contention that, by reason of certain provisions inserted in the agreement of purchase and sale of the lands, Andreas, the vendee therein, became divested of his right to dispose of the crops while in possession of the premises, while it is the contention of the respondent that, by virtue of the provisions inserted in the contract construed as a whole, the vendor at the most was attempting to acquire a secret lien on the crops, which was void and invalid as against the properly recorded crop mortgage of the plaintiff.

As already noted, the land was to be paid for in yearly installments, and the contract also provided that the vendor might make advances to the vendee, and it was provided that all such advances made or indebtedness due from the vendee to the vendor or interest on such amounts from date of loan or advancement shall be payable to the vendor on the 1st day of November of each year, and may be kept and retained out of and from the moneys received from the marketing and sale of the crops. It was also provided as follows:

> "That each year the (vendee) will protect the crops of fruit and grapes growing and to be grown on said premises and when the same are in a condition for harvesting (he) will in a first-class, good and farmer-like manner, pick and prepare all said crops for market and will deliver all said crops in the market in the name of and as the property of the said Geo. Van Vleet (the vendor), and that at all times while said crops are growing and thereafter when harvested and delivered in the markets, the title and ownership thereof and the proceeds to be received therefrom shall be deemed to be and shall be vested in the said Geo. Van Vleet, and shall not be incumbered or disposed of, save and except as marketed in his name and his property, and all payments made on the sale thereof shall be payable to and shall be made to him by the respective purchasers thereof. * * *
> "That as money and proceeds from the marketing and sale of said crops are received, the said first parties (the vendor) may and shall take therefrom any and all moneys that may have been advanced by them, or either of them, as hereinabove provided for, and may and shall also take therefrom the amounts due or to become due in such year as installment of principal and interest on the purchase price of said property, and shall thereupon credit and apply same in payment of said sums respectively, and whenever the said first parties (the vendor) shall have received and applied the proceeds from the crops in any such year, or have otherwise received from the said second parties (the vendee) all amounts to be paid by them in such year, whereby all amounts due and to become due in such year for said advances and installments of principal and interest on said purchase price have been satisfied and discharged, then the said first parties (the vendor) will deliver over the balance of the proceeds from the sale of said crops to the second parties or to their order; or in the event that the full amount of said proceeds have not been collected and received by the said first parties, but are owing from the purchaser of any of said crops then such remaining balance (after said first parties have received the amounts so to be received by them in such year) shall be released unto and transferred over to and shall belong to the said second parties whereby collection of such balance may thereupon be made direct by the said second parties. * * * That should the gross proceeds from the sale of all the crops grown and produced on said premises in any year (through no neglect or fault of the said second parties) be insufficient to pay and discharge the installments of interest and principal of said purchase price to be paid in any such year as hereinabove set forth, then the said first parties will not require the said second parties to make up the deficiency from other sources, but the amount of such deficiency shall be added to or remain a part of the unpaid portion of said purchase price and bear interest at the rate hereinabove specified (7 per cent. per annum) until paid."

[2] An examination of the foregoing provisions relating to the crops growing on the premises would indicate that though in good, set terms the vendor has stated that "the title and ownership" of the crops and the proceeds to be received therefrom "shall be deemed to be and shall be vested in the vendor," that nevertheless the vendor has by the same contract assumed obligations which are inconsistent with and nugatory of his asserted claim of absolute ownership. For, first, after he has had the crops marketed by his vendee, he ceases to enjoy any right as owner to apply the proceeds thereof to his own benefit generally, but he becomes immediately obligated to apply such proceeds to the payment of the existing indebtedness between himself and the vendee; and, second, the vendor further obligates himself, after he has made such application for the benefit of the vendee, to "then * * * deliver over the balance of the proceeds from the sale of such crops to" the vendee. To say the least, these provisions are each of them inconsistent with any claim of absolute ownership, and are consistent only with the position of a creditor who is attempting only to secure the payment of a specific debt. As was stated in the case of Stockton Savings & Loan Society v. Purvis, 112 Cal. 236, 44 P. 561, 53 Am. St. Rep. 210, where a similar question was involved:

> "It further appears that the grain was to be hauled to a certain warehouse when harvested, and thereupon sold by plaintiff [the asserted owner as here], and the proceeds applied, first, to the payment of its cash rent of $2,140.00, and the balance, if any, to go to the lessee. It would be a peculiar construction of this contract, and even an absurd one, to hold that plaintiff was to sell his own crop of grain, and apply the proceeds to the payment of a claim owned and held by it against its lessee. This clause of the contract plainly indicates an attempt by the lessor to hold the crop, when harvested, as security for the rent."

Also, the provisions of the contract relating to the crop fail to create a conditional sale of the crop for the reason that they nowhere provide that the vendee may or shall by the fulfilment of any condition ever become the buyer or owner of said crop. Therefore no analogy arising out of cases upholding conditional sales exists in this case, since the reason for the rule favoring conditional sales is not applicable herein. As stated in the case of Marker v. Williams, 39 Cal. App. 674, at page 679, 179 P. 735, 737:

> "The law of California very properly favors the conditional contract of sale. It has become very largely a factor in the purchase and sale of personal property, and, too, of that class of machinery and appliances commonly used in connection with real estate. It should be the policy of courts to afford every proper protection to upholding the conditions of such sales, both in the interest of the buying and selling classes."

Also, the cases cited by counsel pertaining to the relation of landlord and tenant are not entirely applicable. It is true, of course, that the law does uphold provisions in an agreement between landlord and tenant, by which the landlord, in order to obviate the strict terms of the lease, protects himself by making himself a tenant in common of the crop prior to its severance. Baughman v. Reed, 75 Cal. 319, 17 P. 222, 7 Am. St. Rep. 170; Woodsend v. Chaton, 191 Cal. 72, 214 P. 965. But our courts have not gone to the extent of allowing the landlord, by the use of words in conflict with the actual substance of the contract, to secure himself by a secret lien on all the crops for advances made by himself, as against a third party holding a properly executed chattel mortgage on the crops. In this particular, the rule applied by our courts is not in harmony with the rule applied in the North Dakota cases cited by counsel, notably the case of Merchants' State Bank v. Sawyer Farmers' Co-operative Association, 47 N. D. 375, 182 N. W. 263 (also reported with annotations on pages 1362 to 1368 of 14 A. L. R.). See, also, Ferguson v. Murphy, 117 Cal. 134, 48 P. 1018, and Stockton Savings & Loan Society v. Purvis, 112 Cal. 236, 44 P. 561, 53 Am. St. Rep. 210; also, Kelley v. Goodwin, 95 Me. 538, 50 A. 711, and McNeal v. Rider, 79 Minn. 153, 81 N. W. 830, 79 Am. St. Rep. 437. In fact, the rule applied in our courts seems to be in full harmony with the vigorous dissenting opinion reported in the Dakota Case relied upon by the appellant herein.

Since, therefore, the contract in the case at bar is in substance and effect no more than an attempt, in contravention of the statute, to create a secret lien on personal property against a subsequent incumbrancer in good faith and without notice, the judgment of the lower court herein is affirmed.

GLUCKSTEIN v. RAPPAPORT et al.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. May 29, 1928.

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑80(3)—Rescission by subtenants is deemed effective as of date of rescission.

Act of rescission of contract by subtenants is deemed to take effect as of date of rescission, notwithstanding subsequent commencement of action to have court declare sublease canceled, since any judgment confirming rescission must have declared rights terminated as of date of rescission.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑34(1)—Lessor's rescission held not invalid for failure to restore or offer to restore everything of value received, though sublease was still of record (Civ. Code, § 1691).

Rescission of hotel lease on ground that hotel was not built according to specifications held not invalid under Civ. Code, § 1691, on ground that lessee did not restore or offer to restore everything of value received, where sublease was rescinded by undertenant and lessor entered premises and relet them, notwithstanding outstanding record of sublease in county recorder's office.

3. New trial 🔑70—Trial court has absolute discretion in granting new trial for insufficiency of evidence, where it would have supported verdict for unsuccessful party.

Where verdict for plaintiff would have had support in evidence, trial court is invested with absolute discretion in matter of granting new trial for insufficiency of evidence after verdict and judgment for defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Joseph Gluckstein against Morris Rappaport and another, in which defendants filed a cross-complaint. The action was dismissed as to defendant Amelia Rappaport, and after judgment had been entered for defendant Morris Rappaport a new trial was granted for insufficiency of evidence, and defendant Morris Rappaport appeals. Affirmed.

Isaac Pacht and Clore Warne, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Haas & Dunnigan, H. E. Forster, and J. Marion Wright, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. In this action plaintiff prayed judgment against defendants Morris Rappaport and Amelia Rappaport for money had and received in the sum of $12,500. By their answer defendants made specific denial of the allegations of the complaint and filed a cross-complaint for attorney's fees wherein it was sought to enforce the provisions of a certain lease alleged to be a part of the transaction and contract upon which the action was brought. Plaintiff filed appropriate answer thereto. Thereafter the action was dismissed as to the defendant Amelia Rappaport, and the jury before which the action was tried returned a verdict in favor of defendant Morris Rappaport, whereupon judgment on the verdict was entered. Subsequently, upon due notice a motion for a new trial was granted by the court on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, and from this order granting a new trial defendant Morris Rappaport has appealed.

The facts show that on February 6, 1924, appellant, being the owner of certain lots situated at Seventh street and Ceres avenue in the city of Los Angeles, intended to improve such lots by erecting thereon a hotel building, and entered into a lease agreement with respondent under the provisions of which appellant covenanted to cause to be erected and ready for occupancy by October 1, 1924, a building for hotel purposes of Class A construction containing 83 rooms and to have such building erected according to plans submitted and approved before the execution of the lease and constituting part of the lease, it being further agreed that any changes in the plans or specifications should only be made upon the written consent of respondent as lessee. Under the terms of the lease respondent paid to appellant $12,500. The lease gave to respondent the right to assign the lease or sublet the premises to Japanese or other financially responsible people on payment to appellant of the sum of $200. On March 10, 1924, respondent sublet the entire premises to K. Fukuda and S. Miyoshi, Japanese, paying to appellant $200 for his consent to the making of the sublease. Notice was duly given to respondent and the sublessees that the building would be ready for occupancy on or about July 15, 1924, and subsequently a further notice was given that occupancy could be had on August 1, 1924.

On July 15, 1924, the Japanese lessees, after inspecting the building, became aware of the irregular shape of many of the rooms and sent to respondent a notice of rescission of the sublease, setting forth in such notice that the building was not built according to the plans and specifications agreed upon and left with Fukuda and Miyoshi, upon which were set forth and delineated the shape of the building to be erected and setting forth the size and shape of the rooms in the hotel building, showing the rooms to be of certain designated size and showing all of the rooms to be rectangular in form, 38 of which could be occupied by two persons, yet that in the building as actually constructed there are only 26 of such rooms. Fukuda and Miyoshi in such notice offered to reconvey and assign back the lease and offered to return everything of value they had received in connection with the sublease, and demanded the return of $3,500 paid thereon and the cancellation and return of a promissory note given by them for $2,000.

Respondent, who had been in New York since the early part of June, 1924, discovered on his return towards the end of July that the Japanese sublessees had rescinded the sublease on the ground that the building had not been erected according to the plans approved, and on August 1, 1924, served on appellant a notice of rescission of the main lease, setting forth the facts wherein the building was not constructed in accordance with the plans and specifications agreed upon, demanding repayment of $12,500 paid on entering into the lease agreement on February 6, 1924, and offering to return appellant everything of value received from him. On August 19, 1924, appellant entered into the premises and relet the same for the full term demised to respondent.

Three separate actions arose out of these facts. Respondent instituted the action which is the subject of this appeal; appellant brought an action against respondent, alleging that because of respondent's failure to take possession of the premises he had relet the same for the term demised to Max Kirschbaum, that by reason of certain expenses, counsel fees, etc., he has suffered damage; while Fukuda and Miyoshi brought suit against respondent seeking enforcement of the rescission of their sublease. The first two actions were by stipulation of the parties ordered consolidated and were tried together. The jury rendered its verdict in each case for the defendant, and in each case a new trial was granted.

Appellant urges:

> "(1) That in order to accomplish a rescission it was incumbent on respondent to first place appellant in status quo and deliver up to him everything of value received by him, or offer so to do. (2) That respondent did not place nor offer to place appellant in status quo. (3) That therefore no rescission accomplished, no judgment other than in favor of appellant could be rendered or given, and the trial court erred in granting motion for new trial."

[1, 2] The contention that respondent did not restore to appellant everything of value received or make an offer to do so is without merit. The sublease was rescinded by the undertenant on July 15, 1924, the rescission itself being based on the same failure of consideration relied on by respondent in his notice of rescission given on a subsequent date. The act of rescission by the subtenants is deemed to take effect as of the date of the rescission, to wit, July 15, 1924, and this must be so irrespective of the fact that the Japanese sublessees later commenced an action to have the court declare the sublease canceled, as any judgment of the court confirming the rescission of the sublease must have declared the rights terminated under the sublease as of the date of rescission. Wilcox v. Lattin, 93 Cal. 588, 595, 29 P. 226.

The testimony admitted on the trial of the two actions consolidated shows that appellant was fully aware that the subtenants had rescinded the sublease because of the numerous changes made in constructing the hotel. This is further demonstrated by the fact that appellant relet the premises on August 19, 1924, to one Max Kirschbaum for the full demised term. No property under the lease ever came into respondent's possession, nor in fact into the possession of the subtenants, as both the lessee and the sublessees refused to accept the building due to the unauthorized departures from the plans agreed on and made a part of the lease.

In Lupton v. Domestic Utilities Mfg. Co., 173 Cal. 415, 160 P. 241, cited by appellant, the facts are not analogous to the facts here. The opinion in that case discloses that the plaintiff had transferred title to 1,667 washers to her husband, and that he still held title at the time of attempted rescission by plaintiff, his wife. The opinion of the court reversing the judgment shows that at the date of rescission the plaintiff had divested herself of the title to part of the property received from defendant, and that the plaintiff made no tender or offer to restore title to the property she had parted with, but in fact rested her defense for failure to return on the ground of fraud, which the court held could not be sustained.

In Herman v. Haffenegger, 54 Cal. 161, cited by appellant, while plaintiff received something of value from defendant, he made no return or offer to return what he had received. Bailey v. Fox, 78 Cal. 389, 20 P. 868, was an action to rescind a contract of sale of a one-third interest in a business the stock of goods of which had been depleted in the interim between the contract and attempted rescission, and Kelley v. Owens, 120 Cal. 502, 47 P. 369, 52 P. 797, cited, sustains the general rule that there can be no rescission of an executed contract upon the ground of fraudulent misrepresentation without restoration before suit by the party seeking to rescind of everything of value he had received.

Section 1691 of the Civil Code requires as a condition in rescinding that everything of value received be restored, or an offer must be made to restore the same upon the condition that such party shall do likewise. It appears that there has been a sufficient compliance with the italicized portion of the section of the Code in both instances of rescission. The notices of rescission by the sublessees and the main lessee are sufficiently clear in respect to the offer to restore everything of value to satisfy the Code provisions and the many decisions of this state.

An analysis of the facts presented reduces the issues on this appeal to the bare proposition of whether or not the outstanding record in the county recorder's office in Los Angeles county affecting the sublease was sufficient to defeat the right of plaintiff to rescind.

In Kelley v. Owens, supra, cited by appellant, the court, in discussing those cases where restoration or an offer to restore before suit is not necessary, says:

> "There are exceptional cases where restoration or an offer to restore before suit brought is not necessary—as, for instance, where the thing received by the plaintiff is of no value whatever to either of the parties; or wherein plaintiff has merely received the individual promissory note of the defendant; or where the contract is absolutely void; or where it clearly appears that defendant could not possibly have been injuriously affected by a failure to restore."

The closing portion of this quotation, italicized, seems apropos here when considered in relation to the facts presented. While appellant insists that respondent could not by his offer succeed in effectually rescinding the contract, the appellant himself on the 19th day of August, while the sublease was still of record, entered into the premises and relet the same for the full demised term without prejudice or injury resulting from the fact that the sublease was of record. Section 1691 of the Civil Code provides in alternative terms either for the restoration of everything received or a clear offer to restore. In the present case we think the notice of rescission is sufficient in its offer to restore everything of value received from the defendant.

[3] Furthermore, the rule is well recognized in this state that the appellate court will not reverse an order of the trial court granting a new trial, where there is any conflict in the evidence, unless from a review of the record furnished on appeal it clearly appears that no other judgment but one in favor of appellant could be granted. Here a verdict in favor of respondent would have had support in the evidence, and therefore the trial court is invested with absolute discretion in the matter of granting a new trial. Wendling,

PEOPLE v. HARRINGTON. (Cr. 1587.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 29, 1928.

1. False pretenses ⚷49(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction of obtaining property by false pretenses.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of obtaining property by false pretenses, as showing that complaining witness was induced to part with valuable corporation stock by defendant's false representations that she would be amply secured by another corporation's stock, which had no market value and was not delivered to her.

2. False pretenses ⚷4—Essence of obtaining property by false pretenses is deception for purpose of unfairly and unjustly obtaining property.

The essence of the offense of obtaining property by false pretenses is deception practiced on victim for purpose of unfairly and unjustly obtaining latter's property.

3. False pretenses ⚷38—Proof of one material misrepresentation warrants conviction of obtaining property by false pretenses.

To authorize conviction of obtaining property by false pretenses, it is sufficient if one material misrepresentation be proved.

4. False pretenses ⚷49(3)—Contract for transfer of corporation stock, defendant's and his witness' testimony, and other circumstances, held sufficient corroboration of complaining witness in trial for obtaining property by false pretenses.

In trial for obtaining property by false pretenses, contract for transfer of corporation stock, defendant's testimony, and that of his witness, together with other circumstances, held sufficient corroboration of complaining witness, under Pen. Code, § 1110.

5. False pretenses ⚷49(6)—Evidence held to show that complaining witness parted with title to, not merely possession of, corporation stock alleged to have been obtained by false pretenses.

In trial for obtaining property by false pretenses, defendant's testimony that he wanted complaining witness' stock for purpose of selling it and buying it back at lower figure, and contract reciting that complaining witness "hereby assigns, transfers, and sets over all her right, title, and interest in and to" such stock, and authorizing defendant to sell or dispose of it as he sees fit, being obliged only to return like number of shares at end of year, sufficiently showed that complaining witness parted with title thereto, not merely with possession.

6. Indictment and information ⚷171—Evidence supports conviction, notwithstanding immaterial variance between particular allegation and proof, if otherwise sufficient.

If variance between particular allegation and proof is immaterial, evidence is sufficient to sustain conviction, if otherwise so, though failing to support such allegation.

7. False pretenses ⚷4—Elements of offense of "obtaining property by false pretenses" are intent to defraud, and actual fraud accomplished by false pretenses used for such purpose.

The elements of the offense of obtaining property by false pretenses are intent to defraud, actual fraud committed, false pretenses used for accomplishing fraud, and accomplishment thereof by means of such pretenses.

8. False pretenses ⚷38—Variance between allegation and proof as to exchange of corporation stock held immaterial, in trial for obtaining stock by false pretenses.

Where defendant's promise to deliver corporation stock without market value to complaining witness was not alleged as false representation, accomplishment of fraud by means of false pretenses would have been proven on showing that defendant obtained possession of and title to complaining witness' valuable stock by means of false representations, whether on promise to hypothecate such worthless stock as security for promise to return same or equal number of shares of stock obtained at some future date, or on promise to exchange, so that variance between allegation and proof respecting exchange was immaterial, as acquittal of offense charged would have barred prosecution for offense based on promise to hypothecate security, and defendant was not prejudiced.

9. Indictment and information ⚷171—Whether variance between allegation and proof is material depends on whether defendant was misled or placed in danger of being twice in jeopardy.

The test of whether variance between allegation and proof is material depends on whether defendant was misled in making defense or placed in danger of being twice in jeopardy, considering proof introduced against him.

10. Criminal law ⚷1169(3)—Admission of evidence of market value of corporation stock at time of trial, rather than transaction complained of held not prejudicial error, in view of defendant's testimony that it had no market value.

In trial for obtaining property by false pretenses, error, if any, in permitting witnesses to testify to market value of corporation stock, which defendant promised to exchange for, or hypothecate as security for promise to return same number of, shares of stock obtained from complaining witness, at time of trial, rather than of transaction, held not prejudicial to defendant, in view of his testimony that he told complaining witness that former stock had no market value.

11. Criminal law 🔑829(1)—Refusal of instructions covered by instructions given is not error.

The refusal of instructions which are covered by instructions given is not error.

12. Criminal law 🔑763, 764(6)—Instruction in trial for obtaining property by false pretenses, that contract was not false token, but circumstance for consideration in determining whether complaining witness' testimony was corroborated, held not erroneous or misleading as commenting on facts (Pen. Code, § 1110).

In trial for obtaining property by false pretenses, instruction that complaining witness' contract to assign her stock in corporation for one year to defendant, who was to loan, sell, or pledge it and return same, or like amount of same, securities at end of such time, and deliver other stock as security for performance of agreement, was not a false token or written document contemplated by statute, requiring corroboration of complaining witness' testimony (Pen. Code, § 1110), but a circumstance to be considered in determining whether such testimony was corroborated, held not erroneous or misleading as commenting on facts, in view of instructions on necessity of corroborative testimony in absence of false token or writing.

13. Criminal law 🔑823(4)—Instruction quoting statute, defining fraud as including promise without intention of performing, held not erroneous nor prejudicial, in view of instructions given (Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 4).

In trial for obtaining property by false pretenses, instruction setting forth verbatim Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 4, providing that promise made without intention of performing it constitutes actual fraud, held not erroneous or prejudicial to defendant as violating rule that misrepresentation must be of existing or past fact, and cannot relate to future or be mere promise to pay, nor as warranting jury in believing that they should convict, if promises to pay complaining witness stated monthly sum and dividends on stock assigned by her to defendant and return such stock or same number of shares at end of year, were made without intention to perform, in view of instructions indicating that at least one of specific misrepresentations alleged in indictment must be proven and shown to be inducing cause of complaining witness parting with her stock.

14. False pretenses 🔑51—Whether exchange of corporation stock was essential element of offense of obtaining property by false pretenses, held question of law improperly submitted to jury.

In trial for obtaining property by false pretenses, court erred in instructing jury that it was for them to say whether exchange of corporation stock was essential element in case; that being purely a question of law, not of fact.

15. Criminal law 🔑1172(1)—Instruction submitting question whether exchange of corporation stock was essential element of offense of obtaining property by false pretenses held not prejudicial error.

In trial for obtaining property by false pretenses, instruction that it was for jury to say whether exchange of corporation stock was essential element in case held not prejudicial error, particularly as variance between allegations and proof respecting exchange was immaterial.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Shelley J. Higgins, Judge.

R. E. Harrington was convicted of obtaining property by false pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Henry G. Bodkin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

THOMPSON, J. The appellant was accused by indictment of the offense of obtaining property by false pretenses, in that he did, with intent to defraud, falsely and feloniously represent to one Cora I. Greene that he was possessed of 6,000 shares of class A, common stock of the Postage Press Corporation, which said shares exceeded in value 600 shares of the capital stock of Monolith Portland Cement Company; that the Postage Press Corporation was backed by the United States government; that the machine put out by the Postage Press Corporation was used by a large number of business houses; and that the stock was as good and safe as government bonds. It is also alleged that the defendant caused Cora I. Greene to believe these representations, and thereby induced her, relying thereupon, to deliver to him the 600 shares of the capital stock of the Monolith Company of the value of $6,000 in exchange for 6,000 shares of the Postage Press Company stock, which latter was of no value whatever, and there also follows the usual allegation that all of the representations were false, and that defendant knew that they were false. A second count of the indictment charging the defendant with larceny was dismissed by the trial court. The jury returned a verdict of guilty upon the first count, and this appeal is prosecuted from the judgment pronounced thereon and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The first assault upon the judgment is upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. The prosecuting witness testified that the appellant told her, with respect to the stock of the Postage Press Corporation:

> That "it was a very fine investment; that it was better than government bonds, and that it was backed by the government; * * * that they had a machine whereby they stamped envelopes; * * * that he showed" her "a long sheet that thousands of commercial firms, throughout the United States that were using that stamped envelope, purchased of them"; that the list of names "were business firms using it."

A contract was introduced which reads as follows:

"This agreement, made and entered into this eighteenth day of March, nineteen hundred and twenty-seven by and between Cora I. Greene, hereinafter referred to as party of the first part, and Patton & Co., hereinafter referred to as party of the second part, witnesseth:

"Whereas, the party of the first part, is the owner and holder of six hundred shares of preferred stock in the Monolith Portland Cement Company, hereinafter referred to as first party's stock and is desirous of obtaining a larger income than she is now receiving; and

"Whereas, the party of the second part, is conducting a business in the city of Los Angeles, state of California, and is in a position to use the aforesaid first party's stock to the mutual benefits of both parties to this agreement:

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the sum of fifty-four dollars ($54.00) per month payable on the seventeenth day of each month plus a sum equal to any and all dividends declared and paid on first party's stock and continuing for a period of one year or longer, the first party hereby assigns, transfers and sets over all her right, title, and interest in and to the above-mentioned first party's stock over unto the party of the second part for a period of not less than one year from date hereof or longer as agreed upon by both parties at the expiration of the aforesaid one year period. The party of the first part hereby agrees that the above-mentioned first party's stock may be loaned or sold by the party of the second part or may be pledged by it, either separately or together with other securities either for the full market value or for a lesser or greater sum, or may be used by the party of the second part in making deliveries or making substitutions in its business, all without further notice to the undersigned, provided, however, the above-mentioned first party's stock shall be delivered to the party of the first part on, but not before the expiration of this agreement, and the party of the second part shall not be obliged to return to the party of the first part the specific shares mentioned in this agreement, but may deliver in place thereof a like amount of the same securities.

"The party of the first part has obtained outside information, and has made her own independent investigation of this agreement, and has been informed and is of the opinion that its execution will be to her benefit.

"As collateral security for their performance of this agreement, the party of the second part will deliver to the party of the first part six thousand shares of the class A, common (REH C. I. G.) stock in the Postage Press Corporation, which is personally owned stock, which will be returned to the party of the second part at the expiration of this agreement or any additions hereto. It is understood that these shares are not to be sold or disposed of in any way or in any amount for any sum whatsoever but are a pledge and as such may be forfeited if the terms of this agreement are violated.

"This agreement contains the entire agreement between the parties hereto and all prior agreements are merged herein; and no person or persons has the power or any power to change or alter its terms, and any representatives other than those herein set out, and all representations upon which this agreement is based and not set out herein, are, by each of the parties hereto, hereby expressly waived.

"(Mrs.) Cora I. Greene,
"Party of the First Part.
"Patton & Co.,
"Party of the Second Part,
"By R. E. Harrington."

Mrs. Greene also testified that she signed this contract after the appellant had explained in detail his familiarity with stock investments and after he had elaborated upon the success he had had in this field and how he could make her a lot of money if she would transfer her stock to him; she was apparently lured by the bait of a larger income, but wanted to be secured by other stock. She says:

"I didn't know anything about that Postage Press Corporation stock, and he went on and told me what very fine security he was giving me, and he seemed to leave with me the impression that he had other securities also that he could give me, but, after speaking so finely on that particular Postage Press Corporation stock, it having the government backing it, and one thing and another, I did not see that anything else could excell it, so I took that."

However, at the time the contract was executed, the appellant apologized for not having the Postage Press stock with him, and promised to send it to her shortly; that, although she trusted him, he never delivered it to her. He paid $54 a month for three months, and then refused any further payments. Testimony was also adduced that the stock of the Monolith Company had a market value of between $9 and $10 per share, and that the Postage Press Corporation stock had no market value whatever.

In addition to the general contention that the evidence is insufficient, appellant argues that it fails because of the following particulars: (1) It shows that complainant parted merely with possession and not with the title to her property; (2) the corroboration was insufficient; (3) the evidence does not support the allegation that it was an exchange of stock. It must be observed that the appellant's testimony, as might be expected in this character of charge, is at variance with that of the complaining witness, although he does in some respects corroborate testimony adduced by the prosecution. For example, the appellant testified that the stock of the Postage Press Corporation had no market value; that he told Mrs. Greene that he did not want "the Postage Press stock" he "was giving to her as security to be used by her to be offered for sale or anything, because" they "did not try to create a market for it, because there was no reason for it"; that the reason he did not deliver the stock to her at the time of executing the contract was that he had sent it to Nevada for transfer on the books of the corporation; that he had other securities, but did not want to give her an active stock, one that was rising and falling on the market, because he could make money out of such a stock; that the market value of Monolith stock was artificial, and he was certain that it would drop.

A Mr. Spriggs, who introduced the appellant to the complainant, testified that a few days before the introduction appellant asked him if he knew anyone who owned Monolith stock, stating that he had an angle on it whereby he could make some money. This witness also testified that Mrs. Greene asked for security, and that appellant then told her about the Postage Press Corporation, in which he and four or five people were interested, which company was organized for the purpose of manufacturing and selling a machine for stamping envelopes; that appellant showed Mrs. Greene a list of business houses over the country which were using the stamped envelope; that appellant stated to Mrs. Greene that he thought so much of it that he wanted to keep it; that the day after the general conversation with Mrs. Greene the witness called upon her and secured the 600 shares of Monolith stock without indorsement. He testified that he immediately mailed the stock to the appellant, and on the next day Mrs. Greene called upon him and was worried because he had sent it on, and wanted the witness to wire for its return. On his assurance that the appellant would be back as soon as the stock could be back, she was willing to wait. The appellant did return on the following day, and, after again going into the details of the arrangement and telling the merits of the Postage Press Corporation stock, the contract was signed.

[1-4] It seems obvious from a recital of the testimony that there is ample evidence to uphold the verdict of the jury. There can be no doubt but that the controlling factor which induced Mrs. Greene to part with her property, delivering it over to the appellant to do with as he pleased, was her belief that she would be amply secured by the stock of the Postage Press Corporation, a stock of such great value that the appellant exacted from her the promise not to sell or trade it to any one, and by the fact that it was only one of many fine investments of which this gentleman of successful finance was possessed. That this was untrue, and that he imposed upon her unfamiliarity with transactions of this character is evident from his own lips, when he admitted that the latter stock had no market value. Also it might be asked why there was no delivery of this latter stock. The jury may have believed that it, as well as the other securities, existed only in his fruitful imagination. This would seem to establish the essence of the offense: Deception practiced upon Mrs. Greene for the purpose of unfairly and unjustly obtaining her property. People v. Wieger, 100 Cal. 352, 34 P. 826. It is sufficient if one material misrepresentation be proved. People v. Fraser (Cal. App.) 253 P. 340; People v. Griesheimer, 176 Cal. 44, 167 P. 521. Here the testimony of the complaining witness unequivocally supports the verdict on more than one allegation, and, as we have just observed, the contract, the appellant's testimony, and the testimony of his witness Spriggs, together with other circumstances, corroborate the complainant sufficiently to meet all the requirements of section 1110 of the Penal Code which provides that in order to convict of the offense here charged, there shall be either two witnesses or a witness and corroborating circumstances in the absence of a writing or false token. It is said in People v. Wymer, 53 Cal. App. 204, 199 P. 815:

> "In this class of cases the circumstances connected with the transaction, the entire conduct of the defendant, and his declarations to other persons are proper matters for the consideration of the jury, and may be looked to to furnish the corroborative evidence contemplated by the law. People v. Gibbs, 98 Cal. 661, 33 P. 630; People v. Martin, 102 Cal. 558, 565, 36 P. 952."

To the same effect may also be cited People v. Mace, 71 Cal. App. 10, 20, 234 P. 841, 844, and People v. Murray (Cal. App.) 261 P. 740.

[5] Nor can the appellant successfully urge that the evidence is insufficient because it shows that complainant parted merely with possession and not with the title to her property. Assuming the necessity for the state to establish that she did part with title, it appears that the burden was successfully shouldered. According to appellant's testimony, he wanted the stock for the purpose of selling it at its then high price, anticipating that he could buy it back at a lower figure; that he had in the past by that process made from $40 to $50 a share on stock obtained from other parties. The contract recites that Mrs. Greene "hereby assigns, transfers, and sets over all her right, title, and interest in and to" the stock for a period of not less than one year. It also provides in effect that appellant may sell, hypothecate, or dispose of the stock in any way he sees fit, being obliged only at the end of the time to produce a like number of, but not the same, shares of stock. It is difficult for us to understand how by this arrangement it can be seriously contended that appellant was not clothed with title. Suppose $600 in currency had been obtained instead of stock, to be dealt with as appellant saw fit and to be returned at the end of the time, it certainly could not be argued that the title to the specific money had not been transferred. To emphasize the situation here, we direct attention to the fact that the situation might have been altogether different had the appellant been under obligation to return the identical shares, and had he not had the express power to transfer title to another.

[6-9] In determining the contention that the evidence was insufficient because it failed to support the allegation of an exchange, we shall first assume that the testimony fails in this particular. It will then be apparent that there is a variance between the allegations and the proof, and it becomes necessary to ascertain whether it is a material one. If not, we can say that the evidence is sufficient, if otherwise so, even though it fails to support the particular allegation. In People v. Rabe (Cal. Sup.) 261 P. 303, we read:

> "It is the act of getting possession of or of obtaining property by false and fraudulent representations which the law punishes as a crime."

In the earlier case of People v. Cadot, 138 Cal. 527, 71 P. 649, based upon the authority of People v. Wasservogle, 77 Cal. 173, 19 P. 270, it is determined that the elements of the offense are four, as follows: (1) An intent to defraud; (2) an actual fraud committed; (3) false pretenses used for the purpose of accomplishing the fraud; and (4) the accomplishment of the fraud by means of the pretenses used. In the instant case, bearing in mind that the promise to deliver to complainant 6,000 shares of Postage Press Corporation stock was not alleged as a false representation, the fourth element would have been proven upon showing that the appellant obtained possession and title to the 600 shares of Monolith stock by means of the false representations, and it would be of no consequence whether it was upon promise to hypothecate with complainant 6,000 shares of Postage Press Corporation stock as security for the promise to return her the same or a different 600 shares of the former at some future date, or whether it was upon promise to exchange. Under these conditions we fail to find that the variance is material, for the reason that it is obvious that an acquittal of the offense here charged would have been a complete bar to a prosecution for an offense framed in language indicating a promise to hypothecate the security. Taking into consideration also the proof here adduced, it is equally clear that the appellant was not misled to his prejudice in making his defense nor deprived of any substantial right. Since the test of whether a variance is material is made to depend upon whether the defendant is misled in making his defense or placed in danger of being twice in jeopardy, taking into consideration the proof introduced against him (People v. Terrill, 132 Cal. 497, 64 P. 894, People v. Terrill, 133 Cal. 120, 65 P. 303, and People v. Evanoff, 45 Cal. App. 108, 187 P. 54), we are compelled to say that there was not a material variance between the allegations and the proof.

[10] Appellant argues that the court erred in permitting two witnesses to testify to the market value of the Postage Press Corporation stock at the time of the trial rather than at the time of the transaction, and also complains that with one of these witnesses the proper foundation was not laid. The appellant testified while he was on the stand that he told Mrs. Greene that this "stock had no market value of any kind," and again that they "did not try to create or cause a market for it because there was no reason for it." It is immediately obvious, in view of this testimony, that if there were error in the introduction of the testimony complained of that appellant could not possibly have been prejudiced thereby or complain thereof.

[11] Lastly, the appellant asserts that the court erred in its refusal to give and in the giving of certain instructions. He specifies five refusals and eight instructions given. It would unduly lengthen an opinion already giving the appearance of violating the form of desirable brevity to treat each one of them separately. Suffice it to say that, after a painstaking examination of the first five specifications, two of the instructions offered were not pertinent to the cause on trial, that the other three were covered by instructions given, and that one of them involved a misstatement of law.

[12] We have also examined all of the instructions given, and find that it is not necessary to do more than call special attention to the three last complained of. In the first of these the court instructed the jury as follows:

> "You are instructed that the contract, Defendant's Exhibit A, is not a false token or written document as is contemplated by the statute requiring corroboration; but it is a circumstance to be considered by you in determining whether or not the testimony of Mrs. Greene is corroborated."

Appellant's objection to this instruction is that the latter portion is a comment upon the facts. It is said in People v. Martin, 102 Cal. 558, 566, 36 P. 952, 953, where a similar offense was under consideration and where a written contract had been executed:

> "The contract is simply a piece of evidence in the case, and stands upon the same plane as any other piece of evidence, and is weighed in the same scales."

As we read the instruction, it simply told the jury that the contract was not a false token required by law, but only a piece of evidence to be considered by them as any other piece of evidence in determining whether there was any corroborating testimony. The court had given full and explicit instructions covering the necessity of corroborative testimony, in the absence of a false token or writing, and in view of those instructions, we are of the opinion that the jury must have understood the instruction as we do.

tion 1572 of the Civil Code, which section defines actual fraud and the fourth subdivision of which provides that "a promise made without any intention of performing it" constitutes actual fraud. Appellant, upon the authority of People v. Green, 22 Cal. App. 45, 133 P. 334, which says that "to constitute a false pretense in law the misrepresentation must be of an existing or past fact, and cannot relate to the future, or be a mere promise to pay," argues that it was error to include this fourth subdivision of the section in the instruction, and, further, that, in view of the promise of appellant to pay $54 per month and also return a like number of shares at the end of the year, the jury was warranted in believing that the court intended to tell them that, if these two promises were made without intention of performance, they should convict. However, in another instruction the court very properly said:

> "You are instructed that, if you find that Cora I. Greene was not induced by representations falsely made by defendant, to believe that (1) 6,000 shares of Postage Press Corporation stock exceeded in value 600 shares of Monolith Portland Cement Company stock, (2) that Postage Press Corporation was backed by the United States government, (3) that the machine put out by Postage Press Corporation was used by a large number of business houses, (4) that the stock in said corporation was fully as good and safe as a United States bond, or either or any of said alleged representations, and was then and thereby induced to part with her property, but you do find that the promise made by defendant in the written contract to pay $54 per month, to pay her the dividends accruing on the stock and to return said stock or an equivalent number of shares at the end of one year's time, was the main cause of inducing said Cora I. Greene to part with said stock, then it is your duty to acquit defendant of count I."

There were at least five other instructions which pointed their minds to the specific misrepresentations alleged in the indictment, and indicating that at least one of them must be proven and shown to be the inducing cause. It is difficult for us to believe that a reasonable juror could have placed the interpretation on a part of a general instruction defining fraud which counsel does. At least appellant could not possibly have been prejudiced by its statement in face of the care exercised to direct their minds to the allegations of the indictment.

[14, 15] It is apparent that the court was in error when it gave the following instruction:

> "You are instructed that the allegation 'exchange' in the indictment may or may not be an essential allegation in stating the offense charged; it is for you members of the jury to say whether or not the element of exchange is an essential element in this case, and then whether or not an exchange took place."

Whether the allegation of an "exchange" was or was not material or essential to the indictment was purely a question of law and not of fact, and was a matter of no concern to the jury. The instruction should not have been given. Counsel has not, however, suggested to us any manner in which it might have prejudiced or affected any substantial right of appellant, and we can conceive of none, particularly in view of the conclusion to which we have come that there was not a material variance between the allegations and the proof on this angle of the case.

Judgment and order affirmed.

In action against driver of automobile for death of pedestrian, evidence held to show that car was being driven negligently at time it collided with pedestrian, in that it was being driven at an excessive speed.

2. Negligence ⚷119(6), 122(2)—Contributory negligence is affirmative defense, and, unless evidence of plaintiff shows contributory negligence, defendant must show it by preponderance of evidence.

Contributory negligence is an affirmative defense, and must be pleaded and proven by defendant, and, unless evidence on part of plaintiff shows injured party was guilty of contributory negligence, defendant must show by preponderance of evidence that injured party was guilty of such negligence.

3. Automobiles ⚷217(6)—Pedestrian is not contributorily negligent merely because he attempts to cross street when automobile is approaching.

Pedestrian cannot be said to be guilty of contributory negligence merely because he attempts to cross street when automobile is approaching.

4. Automobiles ⚷217(6)—Pedestrian may expect that those operating automobiles will operate them in customary manner and speed.

Pedestrian has right to expect that those operating automobiles on public street will operate them in manner and at speed customary at particular place.

5. Appeal and error ⚷909(1)—Reviewing court on appeal after judgment for plaintiff must assume that decedent looked for approaching automobile, where there was no proof that he did not do so.

In action for death of pedestrian struck by automobile, where there was no proof that deceased did not look in direction of defendant's approaching machine before he attempted to cross the street, reviewing court on appeal after judgment for plaintiff must assume that he did so.

6. Automobiles ⚷245(72)—Contributory negligence of pedestrian in crossing street in front of approaching automobile held for trial court.

Whether pedestrian attempting to cross street when automobile was approaching was guilty of contributory negligence held for trial court.

7. Appeal and error ⚷1008(1)—Trial court's finding as to negligence of decedent attempting to cross street in front of approaching automobile held conclusive on appeal.

In action for death of pedestrian struck by automobile, finding of trial court on whether decedent acted negligently in attempting to cross in front of defendant's approaching machine held conclusive on appeal.

8. Automobiles ⚷243(14)—Testimony of witnesses, not at scene of collision until four or five hours thereafter, as to skid marks on street, held admissible.

In action for death of pedestrian struck by automobile, admitting testimony of witnesses, who were not at scene of accident until four or five hours thereafter, that they observed skid marks on the street, held not error, where it appeared there had been no great amount of travel on street between time of collision and when witnesses observed the skid marks, and defendant's objection going more to weight of evidence than its competency.

9. Appeal and error ⚷1051(1)—Testimony that witnesses observed skid marks on street, if error, held not prejudicial in action for pedestrian's death, where case was established by other evidence.

In action for damages for death of pedestrian when struck by automobile, admission of testimony of witnesses that they observed skid marks on street morning of collision, if error, held not prejudicial, where, because of other testimony, proof of skid marks were not in any way essential to establishment of plaintiff's case.

Department One.

Appeal from Superior Court of Santa Cruz County; H. C. Lucas, Judge.

Action by Johannan Flach, as administratrix of the estate of Conrad Flach, deceased, against Charles J. Fikes for damages for death. Judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. Hampton Hoge, of San Francisco, and R. H. Smith, of Santa Cruz, for appellant.

H. J. Bias, of Santa Cruz, and J. E. Gardner and Wyckoff & Gardner, all of Watsonville, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. [1] Action brought by the administratrix of the estate of Conrad Flach, deceased, under section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure to recover damages from defendant by reason of the death of said deceased, alleged to have resulted from the negligence of said defendant in the operation of the latter's automobile. The trial was had before the court without a jury, and resulted in a judgment in plaintiff's favor, from which the defendant has appealed. Defendant's first contention is that the evidence fails to show that he was negligent in the operation of his automobile. There is no contention but that the defendant, in driving his automobile, collided with and struck the deceased, inflicting upon him fatal injuries from which he died a few hours thereafter. The collision occurred at about half past 2 o'clock in the morning of January 8, 1922, on Soquel avenue, a business street in the city of Santa Cruz. The deceased had just alighted from an automobile driven by F. K. Lang, and was in the act of crossing said street to his residence when he was struck by defendant's machine. The question of defendant's negligence depended entirely upon the rate of speed he was traveling at the time he struck the deceased. He claims that his machine was traveling at that time between 14 and 15 miles per hour. In proof of this fact he testified that he brought his machine to a full stop within 35 feet after he struck the deceased. If this were so, it appears to be conceded that he was not exceeding the lawful rate of speed along said street at the time of the collision. On the other hand, it is the theory of the plaintiff that if he did not bring his machine to a stop substantially within said distance he was guilty of negligence in exceeding the lawful speed limit, which was 15 miles per hour on said street at the point where the collision occurred. There is ample evidence in the record that defendant traveled from 54 to 65 feet after his machine had struck the deceased and before he had brought it to a full stop. One witness put the distance at 70 feet. There were found on the street immediately after the collision in one place a number of pieces of broken glass which, the evidence indicated, came from one of the front lights on defendant's machine, which was broken as a result of the collision. There was also found some distance from these pieces of glass a pool of blood in the street, which evidently came from the deceased's body, after it had been dragged by defendant's machine from the point of the collision to the point where defendant brought his machine to a stop. This distance between the broken pieces of glass and the pool of blood was roughly measured by a number of persons on the morning of the collision, with the result that, though their testimony differed as to the exact number of feet between the two points, none of them gave it at less than 54 feet, while others placed it at a greater number. The trial court evidently adopted their statements regarding this distance and accordingly found that defendant was negligently driving his automobile at the time it collided with the deceased. The evidence was undoubtedly sufficient to sustain this finding.

[2-7] The next contention made by appellant is that the evidence shows that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to cross Soquel avenue in front of defendant's moving machine. Contributory negligence is an affirmative defense, and it must be pleaded and proven by the defendant. Unless the evidence on the part of the plaintiff shows that the injured party was guilty of contributory negligence, the defendant must show by a preponderance of the evidence that said injured party was guilty of such negligence. The evidence shows that the deceased alighted from Lang's machine and started to cross Soquel avenue when he was struck by defendant's automobile. There is no evidence that he did not look in the direction of defendant's approaching machine before he attempted to cross the street. He may have done so, and, believing that he could cross the street before defendant's machine reached the point where he was to cross, attempted so to do. This may or may not have been negligence on his part. It cannot be said that a person is guilty of contributory negligence merely because he attempts to cross a street when an automobile is approaching. If that were so, he never could attempt to cross a street upon which automobiles are being operated, and consequently, where there is almost always an approaching machine. He has a right to expect that those operating automobiles upon a public street will operate them in the manner and at the speed customary at the particular place. Whether such a person is guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to cross a street in front of an approaching automobile would depend upon all the circumstances under which he acted. This question is one for the determination of the jury or the trial court, and their finding thereon is binding upon an appellate court. Scott v. San Bernardino Valley etc. Co., 152 Cal. 604, 93 P. 677; Clark v. Bennett, 123 Cal. 275, 277, 55 P. 908; Schneider v. Market Street Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 482, 488, 66 P. 734. While the above authorities all deal with the rights and duties of a pedestrian in crossing a city street in front of an approaching street car, we think the same rule should govern in the case of persons crossing in front of a moving automobile. As there is no proof that the deceased did not look in the direction of defendant's approaching machine before he attempted to cross the street, we must assume that he did so. If he did he must have seen defendant's machine approaching him. He may well have reasoned that defendant was traveling at a lawful rate of speed and therefore he could cross the street before defendant's automobile would reach the point in the street over which deceased would be required to pass in crossing the same. Had defendant been traveling at a lawful rate of speed, decedent might have crossed the street in safety. Under the circumstances, whether he acted negligently or not was for the trial court, and its findings as to his negligence will not be disturbed on appeal.

business streets of said city, the evidence shows that there had been no great amount of travel thereon between the time of the collision and the time when these witnesses observed the skid marks on the street. The objection of defendant would go more to the weight of this evidence than to its materiality or competency. If it were error, however, to admit this testimony, such error did not prejudice the rights of the defendant. He testified that immediately on striking the deceased he applied both his foot and emergency brakes, that his brakes were in good order, and that he kept his brakes on until his car was brought to a full stop. From his evidence it is apparent that his car must have left skid marks on the street over which he traveled while his brakes were set. Then again, as we have already observed, the point where defendant's car struck the deceased was marked by a large number of broken pieces of glass and the point where the car evidently was brought to a full stop was indicated by a pool of blood. There was, therefore, ample evidence furnished by these objects on the street, aside from the skid marks, to furnish a basis of determining the distance the defendant's car traveled after striking the deceased. Proof that there were skid marks on the street was not in any way essential to the establishment of plaintiff's case.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: PRESTON, J.; SEAWELL, J.

HIGGINS v. EVA. (S. F. 11242.)

Supreme Court of California. May 25, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1176(1)—Direction by District Court of Appeal to reverse judgment for plaintiff and enter judgment for defendant held erroneous, where all trial court's findings were for plaintiff.

Where trial court found in favor of plaintiff on all issues arising out of pleadings in action, and District Court of Appeal in reversing judgment directed that judgment be entered for defendant, held, that such direction was error, since there were no findings in favor of defendant to support judgment.

2. Maritime liens 🔑60—Proceeding in rem against vessel in federal court held sole remedy of co-owners, voluntarily advancing money for salvaging and repairs of wrecked vessel.

Where part owners of wrecked vessel voluntarily provided funds for salvaging and repairs without any agreement by defendant co-owner to share such expenses, the remedy of such persons was solely in rem against the vessel, and hence within exclusive jurisdiction of the federal courts.

3. Shipping 🔑21—Managing owner, as such, cannot bind co-owners personally for repairs at home port.

A managing owner of a vessel, as such, cannot bind his co-owners, to a personal liability for repairs at a home port.

4. Limitation of actions 🔑28(1), 39(1)—Action by part owners of vessel, if treated as one, for money judgment for defendant's proportionate share of cost of repairs, held barred by limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 343, and § 339, subd. 1).

Action, if treated as one, by part owners of vessel to recover money judgment against defendant co-owner for his proportionate share of cost of salvaging and repairs, held barred by two-year and four-year statute of limitations, Code Civ. Proc. § 343, and § 339, subd. 1.

5. Tenancy in common 🔑29(2)—Cotenant's interest is subject to lien for improvements authorized or assented to, though personal judgment for cost thereof cannot be had against cotenant, in absence of contract.

If a cotenant has assented to or authorized improvements to be made, he is answerable therefor, and a lien exists against his property for the amount thereof; but, in the absence of contract, one cotenant cannot recover a personal judgment against another for cost of improvements.

6. Tenancy in common 🔑32—Cotenant in possession may deduct from rents or profits cost of working, developing, or protecting property.

A cotenant in possession is entitled to deduct from rents or profits received the cost of all proper expenditures made in working the property and developing it or in protecting the common estate.

7. Shipping 🔑21—Tenancy in common 🔑1—Tenancy in common can exist in personalty, as well as realty, and, ordinarily, owners of merchant vessels or steamers so hold.

Though definitions of tenancy in common generally relate to tenancy in common in real property, such a tenancy can exist in personalty, as well as in realty, and, ordinarily, the owners of merchant vessels or steamers hold their interest therein as tenants in common.

8. Shipping 🔑21—In absence of contrary agreement, ship owners hold as tenants in common and not as partners.

Ships are chattels of which the owners, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, are possessed as tenants in common and not as partners.

9. Shipping 🔑21—Part owners held not entitled to personal judgment against co-owner for cost of unauthorized alterations.

Plaintiffs, part owners of vessel, held not entitled to judgment against co-owner for his proportionate share of cost of alterations and repairs, in the absence of any contract authorizing such expenditures.

10. Shipping ⟹21—Co-owner's silence, coupled with knowledge of salvaging and repairs of vessel, held not to warrant personal judgment for proportionate cost thereof in excess of profits.

Mere silence of co-owner of vessel, coupled with knowledge of expenditures for salvaging, reconstructing, and repairing vessel, will not warrant a personal judgment against such co-owner for his proportionate share of such expenditures in excess of profits earned, on theory that contract resulted.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by C. H. Higgins, for himself and for and on behalf of his co-owners of record in the American steamship Fort Bragg, other than the defendant, against William J. Eva, for specific performance of alleged contract and for money judgment. From the judgment rendered, defendant appeals. Reversed.

For opinion of District Court of Appeal, see 259 P. 502.

Randolph V. Whiting, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edwin T. McMurray, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. [1] A hearing was granted by this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal in and for the First Appellate District, reversing the judgment and directing the trial court to enter judgment in favor of the defendant. Upon a further consideration of the questions involved in this appeal, we are of the opinion that the District Court of Appeal was correct in its opinion reversing said judgment. We are not, however, in accord with the order of the District Court of Appeal wherein the trial court was directed to enter judgment for the defendant, who is also the appellant herein. The trial court found in favor of the plaintiff upon all the issues arising out of the pleadings in said action. There are, therefore, no findings to support a judgment in favor of the defendant. Accordingly, a judgment could not be entered in his favor, except upon a retrial of said action and upon findings of fact favorable to him. The opinion of the District Court of Appeal, however, as written by Mr. Justice Campbell, pro tem., is hereby adopted as the opinion of this court, which said opinion is as follows (259 P. 502):

The steamer Fort Bragg was owned by appellant, respondent, and others as tenants in common. The steamer was wrecked in the Gulf of California; it was salvaged, repaired, and lengthened by respondent and other owners, not including appellant; appellant did not pay any portion of the cost of salvage, etc.; and this action involves the respective rights of the parties as the result of appellant's failure or refusal to pay his proportionate part of the cost of such salvage and moneys expended in repairing and lengthening the vessel.

According to the allegations of the complaint the steamer in question was wrecked; its owners are numerous, and it is impracticable to bring them all before the court; and that the questions involved are of common interest to all record owners, with the exception of defendant owner, Eva. Plaintiff was acting as managing owner. The vessel was determined to be a constructive total loss, and the underwriters paid the insurance carried by the several owners on their respective interests in full, thereby acquiring a 69 per cent. ownership in the wreck; that for approximately two months prior to January 17, 1916, the plaintiff, as managing owner and representative of the original owners of the steamer, undertook to sell the wreck and salvage the vessel for the account of those interested therein, but no substantial offer could be obtained therefor. On account thereof on or about January 17, 1916, plaintiff undertook to secure financial co-operation of the underwriters with the original owners in chartering, fitting out, and dispatching a steamer to the wreck in an attempt to float and tow it to an American port. Said underwriters declined to assume any portion of the financial hazard or obligation of such an undertaking, but, in order to induce said original owners to make an effort to float said steamer, agreed with plaintiff, as the representative of said owners, that, if they would assume the financial risk of such a venture, the underwriters would transfer their entire interest in said steamer to said owners without consideration, upon the condition, however, that, if said vessel were successfully floated, said owners would pay therefor on the basis of a valuation of $10,000 for the entire vessel, and upon the basis of a valuation of $15,000 for the entire vessel, if said owners succeeded in reaching an American port with said wreck. Immediately all of the owners, including the defendant, Eva, were advised and notified of said offer by said underwriters, and certain of the owners, including plaintiff, believed that an effort to float and repair said wreck should be made and agreed together with all other owners who should signify their willingness to pay pro rata to assume the expense thereof, upon the condition, however, that any or all of the other owners who did not desire to assume the risk and hazard and pay their portion of the expense would transfer their interest upon the same terms and conditions as the underwriters had agreed to do. There was no opposition or objection and all the owners who had declined to participate in the undertaking, excepting defendant, Eva, transferred their interests. A steamer was chartered, equipped, and dispatched to said wreck, and said vessel was floated and towed into the port of San Francisco at an expense of $17,264.77, and was reconstructed and repaired at a cost of $78,175.30, which amounts were paid by the original owners who had agreed to bear the same. The amount due defendant, Eva, under the agreement was tendered to him in due course and at various times up to and including July 20, 1920, and he at all times refused to transfer his interest, and his interest in said steamer still stands of record in his name in the United States custom house at San Francisco. At various times subsequent to the completion and repair of said vessel said owners offered to waive any right of transfer of said interest provided defendant, Eva, would be willing to assume the responsibility of an owner for the expense incurred aforesaid. Defendant at all times has consistently refused to admit any liability. Since the repair of said vessel it has been operated at a loss, and on March 1, 1921, an assessment of $348.26 was levied against each interest therein. All of said expense and losses chargeable against the interest of defendant, Eva, have been paid by plaintiff. The complaint further alleges that the registration in said custom house of the interest of William J. Eva is prejudicial to and a cloud upon the title of the owners therein who assumed the financial risk and hazard of operating said steamer. The prayer of the complaint is for judgment against defendant for the execution and delivery, by said defendant, Eva, of a good and sufficient bill of sale conveying said interest to plaintiff as the managing owner of said steamer upon payment to him by said owners of $150, or such other sum as the court may find to be just and equitable, or for such other and further relief as the court may deem fair and equitable in the premises.

Defendant demurred to the complaint on numerous grounds, among which being that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that the court has not jurisdiction of the subject of the action; and that the alleged cause of action is barred by sections 339 and 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The demurrer being overruled, defendant sets up in his answer, as further and separate defenses, the bar of the statute of limitations under the provisions of sections 339 and 343 of the Code referred to, and that the court has not jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, alleging that the action is a civil cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States District Court.

From an examination of the allegations of the complaint in the light of the specific prayer thereof, it appears the action was intended as one to compel appellant to transfer his interest in the steamer to respondent and the other owners. The complaint, however, does not allege, nor does the evidence show, any agreement whereby appellant agreed to transfer his interest, and our attention has not been called to any statutory authority for compelling him to do so. The relief prayed for being in rem against the vessel and not a common-law remedy giving the plaintiff a right to proceed in personam against the defendant, the power to grant such relief was vested exclusively in the United States District Court. Fischer v. Carey, 173 Cal. 185, 159 P. 577, L. R. A. 1917A, 1100. However, in so far as this appeal is concerned, this theory of the case may be dismissed, for even though respondent had pleaded an agreement by appellant to convey his interest and the evidence had been sufficient to justify such a finding, the trial court did not grant any such relief, but specifically found "that specific performance of defendant's agreement to transfer his $\frac{1}{100}$th interest in the steamer Fort Bragg should not be enforced."

[2] The allegations of the complaint, which the court found to be true, show that the several payments made by respondent and certain other owners for salvaging and repairs were voluntary payments and without any agreement by appellant to bear any part of the expense; therefore the only remedy of the former was in rem against the vessel. The Steamboat Mayflower v. The Steamboat Sabine, 101 U. S. 384, 25 L. Ed. 982.

While the court found that specific performance of defendant's agreement to transfer his interest in the steamer should not be enforced as prayed for by plaintiff, it did find "that defendant refused to pay the portion of said amount chargeable to his $\frac{1}{100}$th interest, to wit, $954.40; and on or about September 1, 1916, plaintiff, as managing owner of said vessel, was required to borrow, and did borrow, the said amount in order to meet the indebtedness so incurred," and also "that on or about December 28, 1920, the amount of $34,826 was expended by the owners of said steamer in making necessary alterations and repairs, and defendant refused to pay the portion thereof chargeable to his $\frac{1}{100}$th interest amounting to $348.26; and plaintiff was required to borrow, and did borrow, the said sum of $348.26 to pay for said repairs and alterations," and concludes from such facts that plaintiff is entitled to a money judgment against defendant. From what has been said it follows that in our opinion these amounts claimed to be due for salvaging the vessel and repairing it under the circumstances here disclosed, in the absence of any authorization by appellant, cannot be recovered in an action in personam, but must be maintained in rem in the federal court, which has exclusive jurisdiction.

[3] The evidence also shows that the repairs were made in San Francisco, the home port of the steamer Fort Bragg. A managing owner as such—and respondent was no more than that—cannot bind his co-owners to a personal liability for repairs at a home port. Woodall v. Dempsey (D. C.) 100 F. 653; The William Thomas v. Ellis, 4 Har. (Del.) 309; Hill v. Crocker, 87 Me. 208, 32 A. 878, 47 Am. St. Rep. 321; Benson v. Thompson, 27 Me. 470, 46 Am. Dec. 617; Pentz v. Clarke, 41 Md. 327.

Respondent in his brief states that there is practically no conflict as to the facts; that "a controversy arose and existed at the time the action was brought between the several owners, not partners, in the steamer Fort Bragg arising out of the salvaging and repair of the vessel after being wrecked in the Gulf of California. On one side of the controversy is the appellant, owning a $1/100$ interest in the steamer, and on the other, the owners of the remaining $99/100$. The action was brought by respondent, the acting managing owner of $99/100$ interests, under section 964 of the Civil Code to determine this controversy." The section of the Code referred to provides:

> "If a ship belongs to several persons, not partners, and they differ as to its use or repair, the controversy may be determined by any court of competent jurisdiction."

We are unable to find any evidence in the record to support respondent's claim that the parties to the action differed either as to the use or as to the repair of the vessel, or that any controversy whatever arose over its use or repair. It appears that respondent, without any suggestion or interference on the part of appellant, repaired, reconstructed, and lengthened the vessel. The controversy seemed to be over the sale of the vessel. Respondent was seeking to compel appellant to sell his interest in the vessel for an amount that was not satisfactory to him, while appellant was claiming a right to inspect the books—to an accounting.

[4] If, however, the action be treated as one for a money judgment, it is clear that the claim for $954.40, which plaintiff as managing owner borrowed on September 1, 1916, and paid on the salvage indebtedness and the reconstruction expenditure to cover the proportionate share of defendant, arose in September, 1916, when the money was paid, and as the complaint was not filed until December 1, 1921, it is apparent such cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations, whether we apply the two-year limitation for implied oral contracts provided by subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure or the four-year limitation prescribed by section 343 of the same Code for causes of action not coming within one of the other sections of the Code, as more than four years elapsed between the time the cause of action accrued and the action was commenced.

As to the $348.26, which the court found was chargeable to appellant's proportionate share, paid by respondent for repairs and alterations on or about December 28, 1920, and for which an assessment was levied on March 1, 1921, and concerning which there is no evidence to show that such repairs or alterations were authorized or agreed to by appellant or that he had any knowledge concerning the making of such repairs or alterations, it may be said:

> "Neither cotenant has any power to compel the other to unite with him in erecting buildings or in making any other improvements upon the common property." Freeman on Cotenancy (2d Ed.) par. 262.

[5, 6] If a cotenant has assented to or authorized the improvements to be made, he is answerable therefor, and a lien exists against his property for the amount thereof (Robinson v. Bledsoe, 23 Cal. App. 687, 139 P. 245; Arroyo Ditch & Water Co. v. Bequette, 149 Cal. 543, 87 P. 10, but we know of no authority, and none has been called to our attention, holding that one cotenant can recover a personal judgment against another cotenant in the absence of contract to that effect. A cotenant in possession, however, is entitled to deduct from the rents or profits received the cost of all proper expenditures made in working the property and developing it, and protecting the common estate (McCord v. Oakland Q. M. Co., 64 Cal. 134, 27 P. 863, 49 Am. Rep. 686; Raun v. Reynolds, 18 Cal. 275), which the evidence shows was done in this case; profits having been earned and payment of appellant's proportionate share withheld.

[7, 8] While definitions of tenancy in common generally relate to tenancy in common in real property, this tenancy can exist in personalty, as well as in realty (Haven v. Mehlgarten, 19 Ill. 91; Livingston v. Lynch, 4 Johns Ch. [N. Y.] 573), and authority generally holds that owners of merchant vessels or steamers holding their interests therein as tenants in common are governed by the rules of law applicable to that species of tenure. See authorities, 36 Cyc. 29, note 31. Ships are declared to be chattels, of which the owners, in the absence of agreement to the contrary, are possessed as tenants in common and not as partners. Thorndike v. De Wolf, 6 Pick. (Mass.) 120.

[9] While the court found in finding that all the allegations of the complaint are true that an assessment of $348.26 expended in making alterations and repairs in December, 1920, was levied in March, 1921, against appellant, respondent pleads no contract authorizing the levy of an assessment, nor did he prove any such contract; neither did he plead nor prove any corporate status or other relationship giving any right to levy or collect by personal action an assessment to cover a deficit in operating expenses.

As has been said, according to the complaint, this action was brought for the purpose of enforcing specific performance of a contract of sale, the basis of the action being an implied agreement or acquiescence in the terms of a contract contained in a circular letter mailed to all of the owners of the steamer Fort Bragg, advising them that effort would be made to salvage such vessel, and explaining to them that it was proposed to charter and equip a steamer for that purpose, and advising any owners not wanting to incur the financial risk involved to join in the proposal made by the underwriters; that before anything could be done it would be necessary for those electing to join in the attempt to salvage the steamer to make their election and obligate themselves to pay their portion of the expense in writing. It also provided that, if no objection was made to the plan of procedure within a reasonable time, which was definitely specified, the plan would be considered approved and the proposed action taken, and that any of the owners not expressly making an election under the plan within the time specified would be considered as approving the plan and electing to join in the offer made by the underwriters; that is, to accept as payment for their respective interests what their proportionate interest bears to a valuation of $15,000 for the steamer, the steamer being floated and towed to the port of San Francisco.

[10] The appellant claims that he never received a copy of the circular letter, and, while the court made no finding that he did in fact receive such letter, it did find that appellant "had full knowledge of the action of his coowners in the steamer Fort Bragg in reference to salvaging, repairing, and reconstructing said steamer, and ratified the same by his acquiescence." In other words, that mere silence on his part, coupled with knowledge of the fact of the salvaging, reconstruction, repair, and lengthening of the vessel, bound appellant to a contract upon which recovery could be had by way of personal judgment; that under such circumstances one tenant in common can enforce a personal judgment for money in excess of the profits earned. Respondent has not cited us to any authority sustaining such a position and what authority we have found is to the contrary. We do not deem it necessary to a decision of the case to discuss the points raised on demurrer, as the case can be disposed of on its merits.

From what has been said, it follows that we are of the opinion that if the action be one as indicated by the prayer of the complaint for the execution and delivery by defendant, Eva, of a bill of sale conveying his interest in the vessel to plaintiff, Higgins, as the managing owner of the steamer upon payment therefor, such action is one in rem and in the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal court; that if it be construed to be an action for the recovery by one tenant in common against another tenant in common for money paid in protecting, improving, and repairing the common property, no authorization existing therefor, no personal judgment may be had against the cotenant defendant, and, further, that the claim for money borrowed and paid by respondent, Higgins, to cover the proportionate share of appellant in salvaging, lengthening, and repairing the vessel in 1916 is barred by the statute; that the item of $348.26, which respondent borrowed and paid in December, 1920, as the proportionate share of appellant, as the court found, to cover the cost of repairs, and that an assessment was levied to cover this item, which occasioned a loss in operating expenses, no authorization by appellant being shown, cannot be recovered by way of personal judgment.

ALBERTI v. JUBB. (Sac. 4056.)

Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1928.

1. Pleading 🔑248(6)—Amendment to complaint for breach of warranty of title held properly allowed to rescind contract for misrepresentations as not stating new cause of action.

In action to rescind contract for purchase of electric violin piano for false and fraudulent misrepresentations as to playing condition of instrument, amendment alleging breach of implied warranty of title by seller did not state new cause of action, but was merely additional ground for rescission and was properly allowed.

2. Sales 🔑120—That purchaser's possession was not disturbed did not prevent rescission of contract for breach of implied warranty of title.

Finding that purchaser was entitled to rescind contract for purchase of musical instrument on ground of breach of implied warranty of title held not precluded by fact that possession of purchaser had not been disturbed.

3. Sales 🔑118, 126(1)—Purchaser must rescind promptly and may thus protect himself from being required to make monthly payments on discovering property belongs to person other than seller (Civ. Code, § 1691).

Under Civ. Code, § 1691, purchaser is required to rescind promptly and is entitled to thus protect himself from being forced to make monthly payments on notes given for property purchased which he has discovered belongs to another, and which is liable to claim and removal by such person at any time.

4. Sales 🔑120—Fraudulent intent is not necessary element of action to rescind contract for breach of warranty of title.

In action to rescind title for breach of warranty of title, fraudulent intent is not necessary element of action.

5. Sales 🔑118—Contract may be canceled for mistake of fact as to title of property sold without showing misrepresentation (Civ. Code, § 1689, subd. 1).

Mistake of fact as to title to musical instrument sold, though no misrepresentation is shown, would be valid ground on which equity could decree cancellation of contract, under Civ. Code, § 1689, subd. 1.

6. Sales 🔑283—Piano left on partnership premises by owner after dissolution of partnership and sold by remaining partner to plaintiff's seller held not abandoned property in suit to rescind for breach of warranty of title.

Where electric piano purchased under conditional sales' contract for music company was permitted to remain on partnership premises occupied by remaining partner after dissolution, though not considered partnership property, and was subsequently purchased by defendant from remaining partner and sold to plaintiff, piano could not be considered as abandoned property in action to rescind sale for breach of warranty of title.

7. Abandonment 🔑2, 5—"Abandonment" must be voluntary act of owner and clearly proved.

"Abandonment" must be voluntary act of owner and must be clearly proved.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Abandon—Abandonment.]

8. Sales 🔑130(3½)—Failure to find purchase-money notes were in purchaser's possession held immaterial in action to rescind for breach of warranty of title.

In action to rescind contract for fraudulent representations and breach of warranty of title in which seller produced and deposited notes for purchase money, failure of court to find that purchaser had notes in his possession was immaterial and did not constitute prejudicial error, where findings fully disposed of issues in case.

9. Sales 🔑130(4)—Judgment authorizing purchaser to retain piano until surrender of notes and cancellation of contract for breach of warranty of title held not erroneous for failure to order delivery to seller.

Where judgment in action to rescind purchase of piano for breach of warranty of title only authorized retention of piano by purchaser until surrender of notes and cancellation of contract, right of possession was good only as against claims of seller and terminated on seller's compliance with judgment after which purchaser could not resist seller's demand for possession nor guarantee delivery of piano to seller, since true owner might reclaim same, and hence judgment was not erroneous for failure to order delivery of piano to seller.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; K. Van Zante, Judge.

Action for rescission of contract by G. Alberti against C. E. Jubb. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Clark Clement, of Lemoore, for appellant.

John G. Covert, John F. Pryor, and George L. Reimbold, all of Hanford, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. This is an action in equity for the rescission of a written agreement entered into between the parties for the sale by defendant and purchase by plaintiff of an electric violin piano for the sum of $1,600 and to obtain cancellation and surrender of 40 promissory notes of $40 each, executed by plaintiff and delivered to defendant to provide payment in monthly installments for said instrument.

The complaint was based upon allegations of false and fraudulent misrepresentations made by defendant seller as to the playing condition of said instrument. Upon these grounds the trial court found in favor of defendant to the effect that the piano was at all times in the condition of an ordinary secondhand instrument and was bought by plaintiff as such.

During the trial, however, plaintiff for the first time learned of the condition of title to the instrument, and was permitted by the court to file an amendment to his complaint alleging breach of implied warranty of title by the seller, based upon facts substantially as follows, admitted in evidence over the objection of defendant: One Craine obtained possession of the instrument under a conditional sales contract between the Irvine Music Company and himself, but title never passed from the company to him. With $1,400 still due the music company upon the purchase price of $1,650, said Craine dissolved a partnership which he had entered into with one Bartlett and allowed the piano to remain upon the partnership premises, which Bartlett continued to occupy, although said instrument was never considered partnership property. Still later defendant purchased it from Bartlett for $100, which amount was characterized as being about right for storage. Bartlett, however, took no steps to foreclose a lien, if any he had, on said instrument for storage, and the rights of defendant were based solely upon his aforesaid purchase from Bartlett. Craine testified that until the trial of this action he was unaware that the piano had been sold to defendant and, as against every one except the music company, he claimed to be entitled to possession of it under the aforesaid conditional sales agreement.

Upon this issue the court found that defendant had falsely represented to plaintiff that he was the owner of and entitled to possession of said instrument, and if plaintiff had not believed said representations he would not have entered into said agreement with defendant. Judgment accordingly was entered canceling the agreement, declaring the notes void, and ordering them to be surrendered and delivered to plaintiff. Defendant has appealed.

[1] Appellant's first contention is that the amendment to the complaint was an attempt to state a new cause of action and therefore it was improperly allowed by the court. It is plain, however, that the amendment stated the same cause of action, with additional grounds of complaint, to wit, a cause for rescission of said agreement between the parties based upon new and further allegations of misrepresentation. No abuse of discretion by the trial court is shown, and we hold that said amendment was properly allowed.

Disregarding the undisputed fact that he contracted to sell for $1,600 an instrument which he had purchased for $100 and to which he had acquired no title and hence could pass none, appellant claims that the record does not show a fraudulent intent on his part nor had respondent a cause for rescission of the agreement so long as his possession of the piano remained undisturbed.

[2, 3] While the rule as to disturbance of possession laid down in the authorities cited by appellant (Courtney v. Gordon, 74 Mont. 408, 241 P. 233; Gross v. Kierski, 41 Cal. 111) might apply were the action one for damages, the conclusion that respondent is entitled to rescind the contract upon the ground of breach of implied warranty of title by appellant (36 A. L. R. note p. 482, 27 R. C. L. § 410; §§ 1765 and 1786, Civ. Code; Burks v. Davies, 85 Cal. 110, 24 P. 613, 20 Am. St. Rep. 213; Milton Realty Co. v. Butterfield, 54 Cal. App. Dec. 1411) is not precluded by the fact that the possession of respondent has so far remained undisturbed. The element of damages does not enter into the case. Respondent is required to rescind promptly (Civ. Code, § 1691; Garstang v. Skinner, 165 Cal. 721, 134 P. 329) and he is entitled to thus protect himself from being forced to make monthly payments on notes given for property which he has discovered belongs to another and is liable to claim and removal by such person at any time.

[4, 5] The same result may be reached upon other grounds. Fraudulent intent is not a necessary element of an action of this character. There can be no doubt that respondent entered into the agreement with appellant under a misapprehension of the true facts as to title to the instrument. Such mistake of fact, even were no misrepresentation shown, would be a valid ground upon which equity could decree cancellation of the contract. Civ. Code, § 1689, subd. 1; Hannah v. Steinman, 159 Cal. 142, 112 P. 1094; Robertson v. Robertson, 137 Va. 378, 119 S. E. 140, 36 A. L. R. 479, 482.

[6, 7] There is no merit in the contention that the piano was abandoned property. The doctrine of abandonment is well stated in 1 Cal. Jur. pp. 1–16. The abandonment must be the voluntary act of the owner and it must be clearly proved. Here the necessary elements are neither shown nor proved.

[8] The court found that just prior to commencement of this action appellant was endeavoring to transfer the notes in question to another for value; they were, however, produced and deposited under stipulation pending final determination of the cause. Appellant complains of failure of the court to find that he had the notes in his possession. The absence of such finding is immaterial and does not constitute prejudicial error, as the findings made fully dispose of the issues in the case. Hertel v. Emireck, 178 Cal. 534, 174 P. 30.

[9] Appellant complains of other minor matters, which have received our careful attention but which are not worthy of discussion. We find all his various contentions to be without merit, including his criticism relating to failure of the judgment to order delivery of the piano to him. The judgment only authorizes retention of the piano by respondent until surrender of the notes and cancellation of the contract, and this right of possession is, of course, good only as against the claims of appellant. The necessary interpretation of the judgment is to terminate, upon compliance by appellant therewith, respondent's claim to possession of the instrument. Respondent cannot in such event resist appellant's demand for possession; neither can he guarantee to deliver the instrument to appellant, as the true owner may reclaim in the meantime. The wording of the judgment is proper.

Judgment affirmed.

WHITE v. JACOBS et al. (L. A. 8847.)

Supreme Court of California. June 11, 1928.

1. Pleading 🔑120(1)—Denials of first two counts of complaint, relating to transactions detailed in third count, held without greater effect than denials of indebtedness arising from such transactions.

Where it is conceded that three counts in complaint relate to same transaction, denial of first two counts must be held to refer to existence of indebtedness arising out of detailed transactions set forth in third count, and hence without other or greater effect than denials of indebtedness arising out of such transactions.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⚷39—That one suing for money paid for lots, sold by reference to map, knew that map was unrecorded, is no defense (St. 1907, p. 290).

That one seeking to recover money paid on account of illegal and void contract for sale of lots by reference to unrecorded map or plat, in violation of St. 1907, p. 290, knew that map referred to was unrecorded, is no defense.

3. Costs ⚷260(4)—Defendants' appeal from judgment on pleadings held frivolous, where sole defense was held without merit in prior court decision (St. 1907, p. 290).

Appeal from judgment for plaintiff on pleadings in action for money paid on account of contract for sale of lots by reference to unrecorded map or plat, in violation of St. 1907, p. 290, held frivolous, as without merit and taken for purposes of delay, where only defense set up was plaintiff's knowledge that map was unrecorded, which was held no defense by prior decision of Court of Appeals.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action by Jeanette P. White against Edward A. Jacobs and others. From a judgment against defendant Jacobs and certain other defendants, they appeal. Affirmed.

Oliver O. Clark, J. Sanford Wilson, Walker R. Flint, and Dan V. Noland, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Loewenthal, Lissner, Roth & Gunther, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is prosecuted by certain of the defendants herein from a judgment rendered against them upon the pleadings in an action wherein the plaintiff sought to recover certain sums of money, with interest, claimed to be due her on account of a certain agreement in writing which proved, for reasons hereinafter to be stated, to have been illegal and void. The plaintiff's complaint was in three counts, the first of which was in the form of a common count wherein the defendants, and each of them, were alleged to have become indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $3,500 for money had and received by said defendants for the use and benefit of plaintiff, no part of which had been repaid. The second count was in the same form, alleging an indebtedness in the sum of $514.50, which remained due and unpaid. By the third count the plaintiff proceeded to set forth the details of a certain real estate transaction whereby the defendants undertook and agreed in writing to sell to the plaintiff certain parcels of real estate which were described therein by reference to a certain map which had never been recorded as required by the provisions of an act of the Legislature, adopted in 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 290), requiring the recordation of maps of subdivisions of land for purposes of sale and prohibiting the selling or offering for sale of lands by reference to said maps unless the same were recorded. The plaintiff alleges that pursuant to said contract she paid to the defendants the sums of money which are referred to in the first two counts of her complaint, and which aggregate the sum of $4,014.50, and for the recovery of which she sues, basing her right thereto upon the claim that said transaction was illegal and void as in violation of the aforesaid statute.

[1] The defendants Edward A. Jacobs, Teckla S. Jacobs, B. W. Marks, and Otillie Schaus appeared separately, and, answering said complaint, denied any indebtedness under the first two counts thereof, but, as to the third count or cause of action, admitted making the said written agreement and the payments made by the plaintiff thereunder, and also admitted the fact of the lack of recordation of the map of the tract wherein the lots referred to in said writing were located. The defendants, however, denied any indebtedness to the plaintiff under the averments of the third count of her cause of action, basing their denial upon the averment in their answer that the plaintiff, prior to and at the time of entering into said agreement, knew that the map of the tract wherein said lots were situated had not been recorded. Upon the coming in of said answer the plaintiff moved the trial court for judgment upon the pleadings, as against the defendants above named, which motion was granted by the trial court. As to the other defendants in the action, the cause proceeded to trial with what result is not material to this appeal. The sole question which the above-named defendants present upon this appeal relates to the right of the plaintiff to a judgment on the pleadings in view of the foregoing denials and admissions in their answer. It is an obvious and conceded fact that the three counts in the plaintiff's complaint relate to the same transaction. Denials which said defendants presented to the first two counts of the complaint must be held, therefore, to have reference to the existence of an indebtedness arising out of the detailed transaction set forth in the third count of the complaint, and hence to have no other or greater effect than the said defendants' denials of any indebtedness arising out of the transactions therein detailed. This being so, and the sole defense of the said defendants to the third count or cause of action being the defense that the plaintiff knew at the time of entering into the agreement therein set forth that the map therein referred to was an unrecorded map, it follows that, if the defendants' averments in that regard constituted no defense, the trial court acted correctly in granting the motion of the plaintiff for a judgment against said defendants on the pleadings.

[2, 3] In the case of Smith v. Bach, 183 Cal. 259, 191 P. 14, it was held by this court that the sale or offer for sale of lots of land by reference to an unrecorded map or plat was expressly prohibited by the terms of the aforesaid statute and that contracts for such sales based thereon were illegal and void. In a later decision of the same case by the District Court of Appeal (Smith v. Bach, 54 Cal. App. 236, 201 P. 611) it was held that the fact that the plaintiff, who was seeking to recover the money paid on account of such illegal and void transaction, knew that the map referred to therein was unrecorded, constituted no defense to her right of recovery. We have no doubt as to the correctness of the foregoing decision by the appellate tribunal and expressly approve the same, and, in so doing, hold not only that the trial court in the instant case acted correctly in granting the plaintiff's motion for a judgment on the pleadings and in entering such judgment, but but that this appeal is frivolous and without merit and was taken for purposes of delay.

A penalty of $100 is hereby imposed upon the appellants herein for having taken and prosecuted a frivolous appeal.

TOMASINI v. HYATT, State Engineer.★

Rehearing Denied June 4, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 23, 1928.

1. Navigable waters ⟹20(7)—It is only in relation to navigable streams that state engineer must designate width of draw in proposed bridge (St. 1881, p. 76, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1542, especially § 4).

Under St. 1881, p. 76, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1542, especially section 4 of the amendatory act, it is only in relation to navigable streams that the state engineer is required to designate the width of the draw in a bridge proposed to be constructed.

2. Navigable waters ⟹1(6), 20(7)—"Navigable stream" does not include San Francisco Bay so as to require state engineer to designate width of draw in proposed bridge (St. 1881, p. 76, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1542, especially §§ 5, 7, 8, Act 1881, and § 4, of amendatory act).

Under St. 1881, p. 76, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1542, especially section 4, and in view of sections 5, 7, 8, of Act 1881, the words "navigable stream" do not include San Francisco Bay so as to make it the state engineer's duty to designate width of draw in bridge proposed to be constructed thereon; "navigable" stream, as used in said section 4 of amendatory act, meaning a navigable river flowing between well-defined channels in a continued course, and not including any of the other natural objects, conditions, or situations mentioned in title of act.

Application by T. A. Tomasini for writ of mandate, prayed to be directed to Edward Hyatt, as State Engineer, requiring him to designate length of spans and width of draw of a certain bridge. Writ denied.

Joseph E. Bien, Frederick Olds, Werner Olds, and Stanley Jackson, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. This cause is before us upon the petition of the above-named T. A. Tomasini praying that an order be issued by this court directed to the said Edward Hyatt as state engineer of the state of California, commanding him to show cause why a writ of mandate should not be granted requiring him to designate the length of spans and width of draw necessary to permit the free flow of water through and under a certain bridge across a portion of San Francisco Bay for the construction of which the petitioner has made application for permission and for a franchise to maintain and operate as a tollbridge.

The line along which the bridge is proposed to be constructed is set forth in the petition, with the beginning point in the town of Sausalito and the point of termination in the town of Belvedere, in the county of Marin, and extends across a portion of the Bay of San Francisco, which portion is a part of the navigable waters of San Francisco Bay.

The petition herein is based upon the provisions of a certain act entitled, "An act to provide for bridges across navigable streams and across estuaries, ponds, swamps or arms of bays that may be outside of the line of navigable waters," approved March 14, 1881 (Stats. 1881, p. 76), as amended by the act of the Legislature approved May 26, 1927 (Stats. 1927, p. 1542).

[1, 2] This title limits jurisdiction to navigable streams and such portion of estuaries, fords, etc., that are not navigable, and the amendment approved in 1927 does not, in our opinion, extend the scope or power or jurisdiction, or require the state engineer to do anything not required of him by the act of March 14, 1881. Section 4 of the amended act refers only to a bridge across a navigable stream. This definition does not include bays, swamps, or estuaries. A stream of water is defined by Webster as "a current, of water flowing as a river, brook, etc., in a continued current or course." Ordinarily, it is understood to be a river having well-defined banks flowing in a continued course, the word "navigable" relating only to the uses that may be made of such stream. Thus, as used in section 4 of the amendatory act of May 26, 1927, it means a navigable river flowing between well-defined channels in a continued course, and does not include any of the other natural objects, conditions, or situations mentioned in the title of the act, and it is only in relation to a navigable stream that the state engineer is required to designate the width of the draw in a bridge proposed to be constructed. The second paragraph of section 4 of the amendatory act does not extend the engineer's duties beyond the scope of navigable streams. Section 5 of the act of 1881 only provides for what shall be done with the Engineer's plans, and the giving of certain notices therein specified. Sections 7 and 8 of the original act refer only to bridges built by one or more counties. The circumstances presented here are almost identical with those considered by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of Western Pacific R. R. Co. v. Southern Pacific Co., 151 F. 376, where it was held that the words "navigable stream" do not include San Francisco Bay.

Being of the opinion that the act approved March 14, 1881, as amended by the act of May, 26, 1927, does not apply to the bridge on the line proposed to be constructed by the petitioner, it follows that the application for an order to show cause should be and the same is hereby denied.

SPECK v. SPECK. (Civ. 6341.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 2, 1928.

1. Divorce ⟹225—Allowance of attorney fees to wife in action for divorce held not abuse of discretion because wife had funds.

In wife's action for divorce, allowance to her of $200 for counsel fees held not abuse of discretion because it was shown that wife had some $1,400 of her own, in absence of showing that funds were immediately available for purpose.

2. Divorce ⟹249(4)—Interlocutory decree should award husband land purchased with separate funds.

In wife's action for divorce, where undisputed evidence showed that husband had purchased with separate funds two tracts of land, interlocutory decree awarding him one of tracts should be modified and both tracts be awarded him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. W. Muller, Judge.

Action by Edith Catherine Speck against David Benjamin Speck. Cross-complaint by defendant. From an interlocutory decree in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Todd, Pawson & Watkins, of Long Beach, for appellant.

Carl V. Hawkins and Ben W. McLendon, both of Long Beach, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued the defendant for a divorce on grounds of extreme cruelty. The defendant answered and filed a cross-complaint charging similar grounds. The cause was tried before the court and resulted in an interlocutory decree in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant. The latter has appealed upon a bill of exceptions.

The appellant has advanced three grounds for a reversal: First, that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding of extreme cruelty; second, that the decision is contrary to law in that it awards to the parties in equal shares certain real property which was acquired by the appellant as his separate estate; and, third, that the trial court abused its discretion in allowing the respondent attorney's fees.

After a fair and impartial hearing of all the witnesses called by both parties, the trial court found that the acts complained of constituted extreme cruelty on the part of the appellant. Nothing would be gained by reciting here the evidence on that issue. It is sufficient to say that our examination of the record satisfies us that there is evidence which supports a finding of this character.

[1] The sum of $200 was allowed the respondent for attorney's fees for the prosecution of the action pursuant to a motion made for that purpose prior to the trial. The appellant insists that the trial court abused its discretion in this respect because it was shown that the respondent had some $1,400 of her own separate estate. The allowance of attorney's fees in a case of this character is a matter which is left to the discretion of the trial court in view of the circumstances and necessities of the several parties (Turner v. Turner, 80 Cal. 141, 144, 22 P. 72), and it is only in a case of an abuse of this discretion that the finding of the trial court can be disturbed on appeal. The mere fact that the wife has some funds of her own without showing that they were immediately available for the purpose does not satisfy us that error has been committed.

[2] The undisputed evidence shows that the appellant purchased with his separate funds two pieces of property, described in the complaint and referred to throughout the proceedings as the lots in the McDonald home tract and the lot in tract No. 6521, in Virginia City, Los Angeles county, Cal. In entering the interlocutory decree, the trial court awarded the lots in the McDonald home tract to the appellant as his separate property, but failed to make a similar award as to the lot in the Virginia City tract. The interlocutory decree should therefore be modified to the extent that this lot in Virginia City be awarded to the appellant as his separate property, but in all other respects it should be affirmed.

The interlocutory decree as modified herein is affirmed, with costs to the respondent.

HANSEN v. HANSEN & JOHNSON, CONTRACTORS INC., et al. (Civ. 5624.)★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 26, 1928.

Contracts 🔑193—Assignee of note, required to take over property securing it, held not liable under agreement to pay assignor sum collected over certain amount.

Under agreement whereby vendor transferred $11,000 note, received in part payment, to another, with provision that he was to receive nothing until the sum of $9,000, together with interest, had been collected, he was not entitled to recover the sum of $2,000, where assignee, being unable to collect note or interest thereon, in good faith accepted a conveyance of property from purchaser and subsequently sold it at a loss; there being no voluntary or express trust under which assignee held note and trust deed in trust for benefit of vendor to collect sum of $2,000.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Action by Carsten Hansen against Hansen & Johnson, Contractors, Incorporated and others, wherein defendants filed a counterclaim. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John F. Barnett, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edward J. Lynch, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment rendered in favor of defendants, as executors of the last will of Peter H. Johnson, deceased, in an action to recover $2,000 claimed to be due as a result of a real estate transaction had between plaintiff and Johnson. Respondents urged as defenses a denial of liability and the statute of limitations, and they also set forth two counterclaims. The trial court found against appellant on the merits of his action, and held that the same was barred by the statute of limitations, and found against respondents on the merits of their counterclaims.

The controversy grew out of the following facts, which are without substantial dispute: Johnson, the deceased, and Hansen, were engaged in the contracting business under the corporate name of Hansen & Johnson, Contractors, Incorporated, and during their operations acquired considerable incumbered property. Hansen became indebted to Johnson on account of advances made by the latter from time to time in order to carry on the business, and the parties eventually decided to adjust their financial affairs and divide up the property. Accordingly, on February 25, 1915, pursuant to the terms of a written agreement which they entered into, a parcel of land on Filbert street, San Francisco, carrying a mortgage of $12,000 in favor of one Crim, and another parcel not here involved, were conveyed to appellant, and all of his corporate stock was transferred to Johnson, and in addition appellant and his wife executed a promissory note in favor of Johnson for the sum of $9,000, secured by a second mortgage on the Filbert street property. The note bore interest at 6 per cent., payable quarterly, and the principal matured in annual installments of $1,000 each. Said agreement also provided that appellant should assume and pay the indebtedness to Crim, including interest, and protect and save Johnson harmless from any loss or payment on account thereof. On July 24, 1916, in accordance with an arrangement made between appellant and Johnson, appellant sold the Filbert street property to one Smith, and as part payment of the purchase price Smith and his wife executed and delivered to Johnson their promissory note for the sum of $11,000, payable three years after date, with interest at 7 per cent., secured by a trust deed, which was made subject to the first mortgage of $12,000 to Crim, whereupon, and on the same day, July 24th, another and separate written agreement was entered into between appellant and Johnson, substituting the Smith note of $11,000 for appellant's note of $9,000, and in consideration of the delivery to Johnson of the Smith note Johnson promised and agreed "that, after there shall have been paid to him on account of the said principal the sum of $9,000, together with the interest on said $9,000, he will pay to the said Carsten Hansen all moneys received on account of the principal of said promissory note, and that, upon the payment to him of the interest accruing on the said $9,000 as the same becomes due, he will then pay to Carsten Hansen all interest received by him on account of the balance of $2,000 of said note belonging to Carsten Hansen," and Hansen agreed to accept payment of the $2,000 and interest as in said agreement provided.

Simultaneously with the execution of this latter agreement, a resolution was passed by said corporation, which had the effect of ratifying and confirming said agreement, and provided, accordingly, that the Smith note should be made payable to Johnson, and that the trust deed given as security therefor "be made to trustees designated by him (Johnson) for his benefit, and that the said promissory note and trust deed shall be delivered to said Peter H. Johnson to be owned and held by him." In conformity with said agreement and resolution, Hansen was released from liability on the $9,000 note to Johnson, and the Smiths' note for $11,000 was made out directly to Johnson, and the deed of trust securing the same was made out directly to trustees for Johnson, thus giving Johnson complete control over the collection of the $11,000.

The Smiths remained in possession of the property from July, 1916, to July, 1917, during which time they did not pay the taxes, the insurance premiums, the accrued interest on the first mortgage, or the interest on the second deed of trust. As a consequence Johnson's security was being constantly diminished, because the items mentioned constituted liens on the property which were prior to the lien created by Johnson's deed of trust, and under the circumstances he was entitled to cause a sale of the property under his deed of trust, but, instead of doing so, the Smiths, on July 14, 1917, conveyed the property to Johnson, in consideration of which Johnson canceled the Smiths' note for $11,000 and granted them an option to repurchase the property within one year for the sum of $21,000; but, up to April, 1918, they failed to exercise the option, at which time Johnson sold the property for $20,000 to one Kathrine Gallwey, subject to the outstanding Smith option.

The division of the interests of Johnson and Hansen under the corporate name did not end their business association, however, and for several years thereafter they engaged in other joint enterprises during which time they were in frequent personal touch with each other. Appellant claims, however, that he did not learn of the sale of the Filbert street property until the fall of 1921, more than four years after the conveyance thereof to Johnson by the Smiths. In this regard appellant testified that he had "heard it was sold," but how or exactly when he gained the information does not appear. In the fall of 1921, however, he called upon his present attorney, who had acted for both parties in the settlement of their affairs, for the purpose of ascertaining the circumstances of the sale, and was at that time told, so appellant claims, that the property had been sold, but that "he need not worry about the $2,000, because Mr. Johnson was a man who would pay him all right." During that same year appellant and Johnson continued to do business together, the evidence in this regard showing that as late as 1921 appellant talked with Johnson, and at that time delivered to him certain promissory notes for money he had borrowed, but at no time did he bring up the matter of the sale of the Filbert street property, or the alleged indebtedness from Johnson to him now sued upon. The year following, to wit, in May, 1922, Johnson died, and notice to creditors was published in July, 1922; but appellant did not present his claim against the estate until May 4, 1923, a few days prior to the expiration of the 10-months period allowed by law for the presentation of claims.

The theory upon which appellant seeks a judgment for $2,000 against Johnson's estate, as stated by appellant, is this: That the agreement of July 24, 1916, "created a voluntary or express trust under which Johnson held the [Smith] note and trust deed in trust for the benefit of Hansen and to collect for Hansen the $2,000 belonging to him," and that the "surrender and cancellation of the Smith note by Johnson, in consideration of the conveyance to him of the property which was security for the note, was a breach of trust, and made him liable to Hansen for money had and received for Hansen's benefit to the extent of $2,000, which belonged to Hansen, with interest thereon." In other words, appellant contends that the implication arising from the agreement is that it was Johnson's duty to sell the property at trustees' sale, if the Smiths defaulted in carrying out the terms of their note and deed of trust, and that the acceptance by Johnson of a deed from the Smiths, instead of selling the property at trustees' sale, was equivalent to collecting the full amount of the Smith note, and consequently, immediately upon the acceptance of the deed, Johnson became liable to appellant for the amount due appellant thereunder.

We find nothing in the agreement to justify such construction. Its terms, reasonably construed, were that appellant was to receive nothing until "after there shall have been paid to him [Johnson] on account of said principal the sum of $9,000, together with the interest," and it was shown without conflict that Johnson never did receive the full amount of his $9,000 (which represented the original indebtedness from Hansen to Johnson) out of the property. The evidence on this point discloses that, although the property eventually sold for a gross price of $20,000, the deduction of the $12,000 first mortgage, accrued interest, taxes, insurance premiums, and expenses of sale, reduced the net amount received by Johnson to a sum approximately $2,800 less than the $9,000 due him.

Appellant makes no claim of fraudulent conduct on Johnson's part, or that he was in any manner neglectful in selling the property or in trying to obtain the best price therefor. With respect thereto the evidence shows that Johnson made every reasonable effort, through real estate agencies and by granting the Smith option, to obtain the best price possible, but that $20,000 was all that could be secured, and furthermore the fact that the Smiths were unable to sell the property for $21,000 during the 18 months they were entitled to dispose of the same, and that during the time they held legal title thereto they could not pay the taxes, interest, or insurance thereon, clearly indicates that they overestimated the value of the property when they purchased the same for $23,000.

Nor is there anything in the agreement which imposed a duty upon Johnson to resort to the expense and delay of foreclosure proceedings instead of accepting a deed from the Smiths, and the fact that the agreement provided that the Smith note should be made payable directly to Johnson, and that the obligation under the deed of trust should run directly to Johnson's trustees, shows that it was doubtless the intention of the parties to vest Johnson with complete title to and control over the promissory note and trust deed, and, consequently, in the absence of express provision in the agreement to the contrary, he was entitled to exercise his best judgment as to the most profitable method of realizing on the outstanding indebtedness. And the results would seem to show that his judgment was wisely exercised, because, aside from the matter of the expense and delay of a forced legal sale, the parties under such sale would not have received the benefit of the services of the real estate agencies employed by Johnson to make a private sale. But, in any event, in the absence of charges of fraud or neglect, we think that under the circumstances appellant is without legal ground for complaint.

Evidently, to warrant a judgment in favor of appellant for money had and received, it would have been necessary for the trial court to have found as a fact that Johnson had received $2,000 belonging to appellant, and, as shown, there is no evidence whatever to support such a conclusion; nor does the evidence show any breach of trust on Johnson's part. Therefore, in our opinion, the trial court properly entered judgment in favor of respondents.

The case of Wagner v. Wedell, 3 Cal. App. 274, 85 P. 126, upon which appellant seems to rely, is materially different in its facts from the one before us. In that case there were two mortgages; the amount of the first being $1,500 and the second $1,000. The second mortgagee assigned his mortgage to the first mortgagee under a power of attorney and an agreement whereby the first mortgagee agreed to foreclose both mortgages and bid in the property for enough to cover the total sum due. Instead of complying with the agreement to foreclose, he acquired title from the mortgagor, satisfied both mortgages of record, and then sold the property to others accepting in payment $1,000 cash and two notes secured by mortgages, one for $1,500 and the other for $1,350, and he refused to pay the second mortgagee the amount due on his mortgage. It was apparent, therefore, that there was not only a lack of good faith on the part of the first mortgagee, but a clear breach of an express trust. There are no such circumstances here.

In view of the conclusion we have reached upon the question of the merits of appellant's cause of action, a discussion and decision upon the issue of the statute of limitations, or upon the other points urged by respondent in support of the judgment, are deemed unnecessary.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS

GLADIUM COMPANY, Inc. (a Corporation), Plaintiff and Appellant, v. F. M. THATCHER, Defendant and Respondent. (Civ. 3213.) District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 29, 1928. Appeal by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court of Butte County, H. D. Gregory, Judge. Motion to affirm judgment denied. J. Oscar Goldstein, of Chico, for appellant. Guy R. Kennedy, of San Francisco, and George F. Jones, of Oroville, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to affirm the judgment of the trial court, on the ground that the appellant has failed to set forth in its opening brief, or in a supplement thereto, in accordance with the requirements of section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, "a sufficient part of the record to justify a reversal of the judgment." The brief contains a statement of the points on which the appellant relies and cites the pages of the transcript on which it is claimed the evidence sustains the contentions made. Brief excerpts, selected from other parts of the evidence, are set forth. While the brief is on the border line of insufficiency, it appears that the ends of justice will be best served by a decision on the merits, rather than on the technical ground urged by the respondent. The motion is denied.

PEOPLE of the State of California, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. Robert ARTER, Defendant and Appellant. (Cr. 1465.) District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 31, 1928. Appeal by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, Harold Louderback, Judge, of conviction of grand theft and from an order denying motion for new trial. Affirmed. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The defendant and Bert Palmer were jointly charged with the crime of grand theft. They were tried before a jury, and both convicted, but the trial court granted Palmer a new trial. The defendant has appealed from the judgment following his conviction and from the order denying him a new trial, but has not supported his appeal by either brief or oral argument. We have, nevertheless, examined the record, and are satisfied that he was fairly tried and convicted. Judgment and order affirmed.

1. Partnership 🔑64—Partnership whose name contained names of both members held entitled to maintain suit without filing certificate required of partnerships having fictitious names (Civ. Code, §§ 2466, 2468).

Where name under which partnership was doing business contained names of both of members of partnership, partnership designation was not fictitious, so as to require compliance with Civ. Code, §§ 2466, 2468, requiring filing and publication of certificate of partnership as condition to maintaining suit.

2. Mechanics' liens 🔑78—Owner's personal oral notice that she would not be responsible held insufficient notice of nonliability in mechanic's lien foreclosure suit (Code Civ. Proc. § 1192).

Personal oral notice by owner of premises to the effect that she would not be responsible for any work done by contractors on building constructed under contract with lessee was insufficient, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1192, in contractors' suit for foreclosure of mechanic's lien.

3. Names 🔑16(2)—Designation of lessee in claim for mechanic's lien as "Robert Hankins" under contract giving name as "Robert Hankines" held sufficient (Code Civ. Proc. § 1187).

Variance between name of contracting lessee given in contract as "Robert Hankines" and as "Robert Hankins" in claim of mechanic's lien held not to render lien insufficient, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, in view of rule of idem sonans.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Floyd Flora and W. J. Mahedy, copartners doing business as Flora & Mahedy, against Robert Hankins and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Sarah Holzberg appeals. Affirmed.

Shapiro & Shapiro, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Glen Behymer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. [1] This action is one for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien upon certain real property in the county of Los Angeles; the plaintiffs and lien claimants therein being copartners doing business under the firm name of Flora & Mahedy. In the month of December, 1923, the defendant and appellant, Sarah Holzberg, being the owner of said real estate, rented the same to her codefendant Robert Hankins upon a month to month tenancy. In February, 1924, Hankins, having entered into possession of the premises under such tenancy, made a contract with the plaintiffs for the erection thereon of a one-story brick building for use as a garage, and which, by the terms of said contract, was to be constructed and completed between said date and the 15th of March, 1924. The plaintiffs having performed said contract, and the defendant Hankins having paid only a portion of the contract price, the plaintiffs filed a contractor's lien for the balance thereof, and within the time required by law commenced this action for the foreclosure of said lien. The trial court gave its judgment in the plaintiffs' favor for the recovery of the sum of $1,140.75, with interest and costs, against the defendant Hankins and for foreclosure of said lien as against the property of the defendant and appellant, Holzberg. The latter appeals from the judgment and urges as her first point upon the appeal that the plaintiffs are not entitled to maintain the action, for the reason that being a copartnership and doing business as such under the name of Flora & Mahedy, which the appellant alleges to be a fictitious name, the plaintiffs not having been shown to have filed or published the certificate of partnership provided for under sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code, they have no capacity to sue. The answer to this contention is that the plaintiffs are not doing business under a fictitious name, since it appears that the name under which they are doing business as copartners contains the names of both and all of the members of the partnership, and it has been long held by this court that such a partnership designation is not fictitious so as to require compliance with the aforesaid sections of the Civil Code. Pendleton v. Cline, 85 Cal. 142, 144, 24 P. 659; Carlock v. Cagnacci, 88 Cal. 600, 26 P. 597.

[2] The next contention of the appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to show that she, as the owner of the property to be subjected to said lien, had sufficient knowledge of the fact that said building was in the course of construction upon her said premises so as to have been required to give the notice of nonliability required by section

1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Upon this point the evidence is in substantial conflict, and the trial court resolved such conflict in the plaintiffs' favor. The only notice which the appellant claims to have given to the plaintiffs was that of personal oral notice to the effect that she would not be responsible for any work done by them upon the building in question. Such notice is clearly insufficient under the express terms of the aforesaid section of the Code of Civil Procedure. Pasqualetti v. Hilson, 43 Cal. App. 718, 185 P. 693; Pacific Sash & Door Co. v. Bumiller, 162 Cal. 664, 124 P. 230, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 296.

[3] The only other contention made by the appellant is that the claimed lien was not sufficiently specific in the matter of its compliance with section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure to entitle the plaintiffs to their claim of lien. The only basis for this contention seems to be that of a variance between the name of the contracting tenant as it appears in the builder's contract and as it is given in the plaintiffs' claim of lien. In the former the name of the tenant is given as "Robert Hankines," while in the latter it appears as "Robert Hankins." It requires no citation of authority, however, to uphold the view that the rule of idem sonans applies to such a case.

COULTER v. HENSEN et al. (L. A. 9281.)

Supreme Court of California. June 11, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⟹882(11)—Omission to introduce assignment after laying foundation did not prevent reversal of nonsuit, where assignment sued on was treated as in evidence.

In action to establish liens under assignment of claims for work and labor, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, omission of plaintiff to introduce the assignment in evidence, after objection and laying of foundation for their admission, held not to prevent reversal of judgment for defendant entered on nonsuit, where record showed that the assignment was treated as having been introduced in evidence and that no reference was made to its nonintroduction on motion for nonsuit.

2. Mines and minerals ⟹112(1)—Where it was not shown that assignors of labor claims on oil property were married, failure of wives to join did not render assignment invalid (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183).

Assignments of claims of labor liens on oil property, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, were not invalid, in suit by assignee, on ground of failure of wives of assignors to join, where it was not shown that any of the assignors were married.

3. Pleading ⟹376—Landowners sued by assignee of claims for labor performed on oil well obviated necessity of proof of lease by alleging its existence.

In suit by assignee of labor claims arising from construction and alteration of oil well to establish liens, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, owners of land, who in answer alleged existence of lease and referred to the record thereof, relieved plaintiff from necessity of proving the lease or the contents thereof.

4. Mines and minerals ⟹117—Assignee's right to lien on land for labor performed by assignors drilling oil well held for jury (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183).

In action against owners of property to establish claims for laborers' liens under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, for labor performed in construction and alteration of oil well under agreement entered into by owners' lessee, evidence that plaintiff's assignors performed labor on the premises under company contracting with the lessee, together with evidence of rate of wages, made issue for jury on defendant's motion for nonsuit.

5. Mines and minerals ⟹117—Whether owners of oil land posted notice of nonresponsibility held for jury in action by assignee of labor claims to establish lien (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1183, 1192).

In suit by assignee of labor claims to establish lien on oil lands, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, issue whether owners posted notice of nonresponsibility on the premises under requirements of section 1192 held for jury, in view of testimony of owner when examined as a hostile witness and as a party, under section 2055.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. C. Valentine, Judge.

Action by J. C. Coulter against Theodore D. Hensen and others. From a judgment for the defendant named, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with instruction.

Louis N. Whealton and Will H. Winston, both of Long Beach, for appellant.

R. M. Sherwood, of Long Beach, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This action was one commenced by the plaintiff, purporting to act as the assignee of a number of labor claimants who are alleged to have performed work and labor upon certain real property owned by the defendant Hensen, which consisted in and contributed to the construction, alteration, and repair of an oil well upon the defendant's property and for which the persons performing the same claimed they were entitled to laborers' liens thereon. The property in question had been leased by Hensen and his wife to a certain voluntary association known as Motion Picture Oil Syndicate No. 1, which had theretofore been authorized by the corporation commissioner of the state of California to transact business within this state, and which association, after procuring said lease, had entered into a contract with the Hogan Drilling Company, a corporation, to drill an oil well thereon, in the course of which the Hogan Drilling Company are alleged to have employed the laborers, some 16 in number, who assigned their labor claims to said plaintiff. The answer of the defendant Hensen herein contains specific denials of practically all of the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, and in addition thereto contains certain specific defenses, among which is the defense that Hensen had within due time filed and recorded the notice of nonresponsibility provided for in section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The trial court at the close of the plaintiff's case granted a motion for nonsuit and having done so made and entered its judgment in favor of defendant Hensen thereon. It is from such judgment that this appeal has been taken.

[1] It is the contention of the appellant that the evidence sufficiently showed that the persons who were alleged in the complaint to be the assignors of the plaintiff performed the work and labor referred to in said complaint and upon which their respective claims of laborers' liens under the provisions of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure are based, and that the evidence also sufficiently showed that these persons are the persons who executed the assignment of their aforesaid labor claims to the plaintiff, and that the evidence also sufficiently showed that Hensen had actual knowledge of the construction of said oil well upon his said property, and that no notice of nonresponsibility was given, posted, or recorded as required by law. In response to these several contentions the respondent urges as his first contention that the assignment of the labor claims upon which the plaintiff relies for his right to sue in this action was never introduced in evidence, and that hence upon the very threshhold thereof his action failed. It is true that the record in the case discloses that when the assignment was first offered in evidence several objections were urged to its admittance, the first and chief of which was that no proper foundation had been laid for its introduction by proof that the labor claimants named therein were the persons who had executed such assignment. The court in the first instance held this objection to be good and directed that the offered assignment be marked by the clerk for identification. Thereafter the plaintiff sufficiently proved by proof or offer of proof that said assignment had been executed by the individual assignors named therein; but it seems that having made such showing the subsequent offer of the assignment itself in evidence was not made by plaintiff, but was apparently overlooked by all concerned. The record, however, sufficiently discloses that throughout the later progress of the trial the assignment was considered as being in evidence in the case to the extent that the defendant in his motion for nonsuit did not refer to its nonintroduction as one of the grounds of his motion, and that the court in granting the motion did so entirely upon other grounds. This being so, we are inclined to the view that the respondent's contention in the foregoing regard, and which is for the first time made upon appeal, is without merit.

[2] The respondent makes the further contention that the aforesaid assignment was invalid for the reason that it was not signed or otherwise consented to in writing by the wives of the assignors; but this contention is without merit for the reason, among others, that there is nothing in the record tending to show that there were any wives of the assignors, or any of them.

[3, 4] The respondent makes several other contentions with regard to the state of the evidence which may be briefly disposed of. As to the proof of lease between the Hensens and the Motion Picture Oil Syndicate, the defendants Hensen in their answer alleged the existence of such a lease and referred to the record thereof, and by so doing obviated the necessity of proof thereof or of its contents on the plaintiff's part. As to the proof that the oil well in connection with which the plaintiff's assignors and each of them performed labor under employment by the Hogan Drilling Company, through its authorized agent, there is ample evidence going to show that the Hogan Drilling Company was engaged in the drilling of said well upon the defendants' premises under some sort of an arrangement with the Motion Picture Oil Syndicate, the defendants' lessee, giving it the right so to do, and the plaintiff's assignors were its employees in that undertaking, and that they and each of them performed labor for the period of time and at the rate of wages covered by their respective labor claims and liens, and that the wages which they were to receive for so doing were in accordance with the union scale of wages. This evidence, whether presented by the plaintiff, either in actual testimony or of offers of proof at the trial, was sufficient to satisfy the requirements of law upon a motion for nonsuit.

[5] The respondent makes several other assignments of insufficiency in the plaintiff's case, which, without specification, but upon an examination of the record, we hold to be unmeritorious. This leaves as the only remaining question in the case the question as to whether the plaintiff had sufficiently shown an absence on the part of the defendant Hensen of compliance with the precise requirements of section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This section, among other things, requires the posting of a notice of nonresponsibility upon the premises by the owner or owners thereof. The plaintiff produced at the trial a considerable number of the persons whose names are represented in these assigned labor claims and who each positively testified that no such notice as the statute requires was ever posted upon the property during the time they were performing work thereon; and while it is true that the defendant Hensen, when examined as a hostile witness and as a party under the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, testified that he had posted such a notice upon the premises, he admitted that he did not record such notice until the work covered by these labor claims had been practically completed, and when for the first time he learned that these laborers were not being paid. The foregoing evidence was, we think, amply sufficient to show noncompliance on the part of the defendant Hensen with the aforesaid provisions of the Code, and was therefore, with the other evidence introduced or offered by the plaintiff, sufficient to make out a prima facie case and to require a denial of the said defendant's motion for a nonsuit. It follows that the trial court was in error in granting said motion and in the entry of its judgment thereon.

The judgment is reversed, with the instruction to the trial court to enter an order denying the motion for nonsuit, and, having done so, to proceed with the trial of the cause.

O'MEARA v. HAIDEN et al. (S. F. 11952.)★

Rehearing Denied July 12, 1928.

1. Release 🔑16—Release for injuries to boy, later dying, did not cover death, where injury causing death was not known at time (Civ. Code, § 1542).

Release from liability for injuries to plaintiff's minor son, later dying, could be avoided on ground of mutual mistake, where injury which was cause of boy's death was not known to either party at date of release, and release did not extend to plaintiff's claim for damages arising from death, under Civ. Code, § 1542, relating to releases.

2. Release 🔑24(2)—Where release covering injuries to boy, later dying, did not cover damages for death, it was unnecessary to restore consideration received before instituting action for death (Civ. Code, § 1542).

Where release from liability for injuries to plaintiff's son, later dying, was made at time when neither party knew of injury causing death, so that release did not cover damages for death, under Civ. Code, § 1542, relating to releases, it was not necessary for plaintiff to rescind release and restore consideration received therefor before instituting action for son's death.

3. Contracts 🔑266(1), 271—Plaintiff must rescind contract and tender consideration received before commencing action to cancel contract on ground of fraud, mistake, etc.

Where purpose of action is to cancel or set aside contract on ground of fraud, mistake, or other reason, plaintiff must rescind contract and tender back consideration received before commencing action, or he will be precluded from recovery.

4. Release 🔑24(1)—Where plaintiff sues for injury and defendant pleads release, plaintiff may show invalidity of release, if he makes timely offer to rescind and restore consideration after commencing action.

Where plaintiff seeks to recover unliquidated damages for injury and defendant relies on release as defense, plaintiff may show invalidity of release, if he has made timely offer to rescind same and restore consideration, even if offer is made after commencement of action.

5. Evidence 🔑18—Courts, in passing on excessiveness of verdict, must take judicial notice that value of dollar has materially changed.

Courts, in passing on question of excessiveness of verdict, must take judicial notice of fact that value of dollar has materially changed from what it was some 10 to 15 years ago.

6. Death 🔑99(3)—$10,000 for death of son aged 7 years held not excessive.

Verdict for $10,000 for death of plaintiff's son, 7 years of age, held not excessive.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1047(5)—In action for death of boy, permitting mother to identify photograph of her deceased son held harmless error.

In action for damages for death of 7 year old boy, admitting photograph of deceased, and permitting mother on witness stand to identify photograph, where mother wept as she identified her son's picture, held harmless error.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1066—In action for death of boy, in which defendant pleaded release, reference in instruction to procuring release by fraud, where case was tried on theory of mistake only, held harmless error.

In action for death of boy, in which defendant pleaded release, instruction that, if plaintiff's consent was given to release "by mistake or obtained through fraud," then it was legal right of plaintiff to rescind same, where there was no claim that release was procured by fraud, and case was tried on theory of mistake only, held harmless error.

Thereafter and on the 8th day of April, 1923, the boy was again taken sick. Dr. Nichols who attended him on this occasion, as well as at the time he was first injured, pronounced his recent ailment as measles. He died on the 13th day of the same month.

Upon the death of his son the plaintiff brought this action for damages under section 376 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the amended complaint therein having been filed July 23, 1923. On September 7, following, defendant Haiden filed his answer to the complaint, setting up the foregoing release. On October 15, 1923, plaintiff served upon defendant Haiden a notice of rescission of said release, and tendered to said defendant the sum of $250 paid by defendant to plaintiff at the time of the execution of said release, which tender was refused by defendant.

The action came on for trial on January 22d, following, and a verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $10,250. From this judgment the defendant Haiden has appealed. It may be conceded that plaintiff's son received his injuries through the negligence of defendant and that said injuries were the proximate cause of his death. The court so found, and there was ample evidence to sustain this finding. The principal contentions of appellant on this appeal are, first, that the release was a complete defense to this action; that it was binding upon plaintiff and could not be rescinded; and, second, that, if the release could be rescinded, the action was prematurely brought, as it was instituted almost three months prior to any attempted rescission.

It is conceded that at the time of the payment of the sum of $250 to plaintiff and the execution of said release neither party thereto had in mind that the boy would die. The appellant testified that—

> "At the time this release was obtained I did not have in mind that the boy was likely to die. The fact that the boy might die from his injuries was not in contemplation at all at the time the release was executed."

The evidence shows that the cause of the boy's death was abscess of the spleen, and the physician testified that this abscess was, in his opinion, caused from a bruise over the abdomen, producing a possible hemorrhage in the spleen which was not visible to the naked eye. He further explained how death resulted from a complication of the bruised condition of the spleen and the infection of measles. Under these circumstances, are the parties bound by the release in this action brought to recover damages for the injury fatal in its nature and effect when, at the time of its execution, neither of them had knowledge of such an injury, and neither of them contracted with such an injury in mind?

[1] Section 1542 of the Civil Code provides that—

> "A general release does not extend to claims which the creditor does not know or suspect to exist in his favor at the time of executing the release, which if known by him must have materially affected his settlement with the debtor."

This court, in considering the extent to which a general release is binding upon the parties thereto, has said in Meyer v. Haas, 126 Cal. 560, 563, 58 P. 1042, 1043:

> "That portion of the contract, therefore, purporting to release and satisfy the claim upon which the action is based is, on the findings of the jury, absolutely void for the reason that the mind of plaintiff never consented to any such a release. * * *"

In that action the plaintiff, who had suffered injuries due to the negligence of the defendant, claimed, and the jury found, that the release given by the plaintiff was only in satisfaction of his claim for loss of time, although it purported on its face to be a release in full of all damages sustained as a result of said injuries. It is true that it was alleged and proven that said release had been procured by the fraud of the defendant therein; but this court has further held that a mutual mistake of fact concurred in by the parties invalidates a release. Miller v. Brode, 186 Cal. 409, 199 P. 531. In the case of Richardson v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 157 Minn. 474, 196 N. W. 643, cited by appellant, the correct rule appears to be stated. In that action the court said:

> "Where the consideration received for a release is intended as compensation for the injuries sustained, and it subsequently develops that a substantial injury existed which was not known to the parties when the settlement was made and consequently was not taken into account in making it, the release may be avoided on the ground of mutual mistake."

This language is peculiarly applicable to the facts in this case. The evidence shows that the injury was sustained on September 14, 1922, and that as a result thereof the boy was sent to the hospital, from which he returned about two weeks thereafter. The doctor who attended the injured boy testified:

> "My first call was made on September 14, 1922, upon an automobile accident; he had muscular bruises over his right leg and arm and bruises over his abdomen; if I recall correctly, I think there were small cuts which probably would be termed as bruises. I saw him on the 14th, and 16th, and 19th and the 30th of September, and on the 4th of October; about the 4th of October, so far as the bruises were concerned, he seemed to be recovered, and from the immediate accident, so far as I could determine."

The boy was in this condition on November 1, 1922, when the release was executed. It was not until the following March or April that his condition again became serious. Continuing, the doctor testified:

> "On the 29th day of November I examined him; there were no notes made relative to that; that was an office visit; the boy did not recuperate as rapidly as—to make a statement, I never saw the boy before the 14th of September, 1922. He didn't seem to be recuperating as rapidly as he might have done; he didn't seem to be up to par, to be normal at these dates; he was pale; he was anæmic; he was nervous. I saw him again on the 2d of March, I saw him again on the 8th day of April, 1923, at his home; I recall it was on a Sunday night along in the evening; he had the measles; I saw him on the following morning on the 9th; that was a call at home; I didn't see him any more until the 12th; upon that day his condition was critical."

As already stated, the boy died on April 13, 1923. From this testimony of the doctor who attended the boy, it appears that he did not visit or see the boy after the 4th of October, 1922, until the 29th day of November, 1922, and, as stated by him, "about the 4th day of October, so far as the bruises were concerned, he seemed to be recovered, and from the immediate accident, so far as I could determine." It was during this time when the boy "seemed to be recovered from the immediate accident" that the parties entered into negotiations which resulted in the execution and delivery of the release. The evidence, as before observed, shows that at the time of its execution neither party had in mind the possibility that the boy might die, or that he had sustained any more than superficial wounds or bruises by reason of the accident. It is quite evident that the settlement made by the defendant and the delivery and acceptation of the release was simply for the injuries sustained by the boy, and which were then known to the parties, and from which, from the testimony of the doctor, the boy had recovered.

A further distinction is made in the case of Richardson v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., supra, between the injury sustained and the effects or results from such injury. If the injury is known at the time of the settlement, the release is binding upon the parties, even if unknown or unexpected consequences result therefrom; but, if the injury is unknown, and the parties purport to settle for all injuries sustained, then the release will not be held to be binding upon the parties as to the injury which was unknown to the parties at the time of executing the release:

> "To avoid such a release, the rule requires clear and convincing proof that a substantial injury, which was not discovered until after the settlement, had in fact been sustained in the accident and existed at the time of the settlement. That unknown and unexpected consequences resulted from known injuries is not sufficient." Richardson v. Chicago Elec. Ry. Co., supra.

The testimony of Dr. Nichols is that the boy died from an injury to his spleen received at the time he was run over by the defendant's automobile, and that such injury was not visible to the naked eye. The only conclusion to be drawn from his testimony as recited in this opinion is that he did not know of the injury to the boy's spleen at the time he ceased his visits to the boy on October 4, 1922; that his first knowledge that the boy had sustained any such injury was after the boy had come down with the measles, which was the following April, and which was long after the execution of the release.

It is not contended, nor is there any showing, that the plaintiff had any knowledge of this injury except as he was informed thereof by the doctor. It appears, therefore, beyond question, that at the date of the release the injury which was the cause of the boy's death was not known to either party. It was not in the minds of the parties at the time of the settlement which resulted in the execution of this written release. Accordingly, although the release may purport upon its face to extend to the plaintiff's claim for damages arising from the death of his son, yet, in reality it does not do so. Section 1542, Civ. Code. It is unreasonable to suppose that plaintiff would have entered into said agreement of settlement whereby he released the defendant of all damage for the sum of $250 had he known that there was any possibility that the boy had received this fatal injury to his spleen. Such knowledge would have materially affected his settlement with defendant. To hold him to the terms of the release would not only be manifestly unfair and unjust, but it would be against the law of this state as we understand the same and as we have attempted to state it in the foregoing pages of this opinion.

> "It will be seen from these special findings of the jury, considered in connection with their general verdict, that the jury were of the opinion that plaintiff executed the alleged release under a mistake as to its contents, that he believed he was receiving the $25 and giving the receipt in discharge of any claim he might have for loss of time merely, and that he was led into this error by the artifice and deception of Kurtz as to the contents of the instrument, Kurtz acting as the agent of defendants and being in their employ, and at the same time pretending to act for plaintiff. The case is not without evidence to support such conclusions. That portion of the contract, therefore, purporting to release and satisfy the claim upon which the action is based is, on the findings of the jury, absolutely void for the reason that the mind of plaintiff never consented to any such a release, and the plaintiff should be bound only to the release and satisfaction of his claim for loss of time. This view of the case makes it clearly distinguishable from most of the cases cited by appellant. In those cases generally the parties sought to avoid or rescind contracts, the nature and contents of which they understood correctly, but they had been led to execute them by fraud or deception as to something other than the contents of the contract; and in such a case the contract would not be void but only voidable, and the rule requiring a return of everything received on the faith of the contract before it could be rescinded or avoided would apply; but this rule as to a return of everything received does not apply where a party is tricked or deceived into signing a contract different in its terms and objects from the contract which he has made and which he understands that he is executing. The contract under such circumstances will be held to be what the maker of it intended it should be, and not what it was made to appear to be by the deception practiced. The $25 paid plaintiff may, therefore, properly be said to have been received in payment for the loss of time during his illness, and not in satisfaction of anything that his mind never consented that it should satisfy. The claim sued upon does not include this loss of time, and the court instructed the jury that they could find nothing against defendants for loss of time. No offer to return the money was necessary, for the reason that the plaintiff in this case 'is not attempting to avoid a contract which he has made, but is showing that he did not make the contract which he apparently made.' Mullen v. Old Colony R. R., 127 Mass. 86, 34 Am. Rep. 349; Chicago, etc., Ry. Co. v. Lewis, 109 Ill. 120; Senter v. Senter, 70 Cal. 619 [11 P. 782]; Wilson v. Moriarty, 77 Cal. 596 [20 P. 134]; 88 Cal. 207 [26 P. 85]; Sullivan v. Moorhead, 99 Cal. 157 [33 P. 796]."

The present action in principle is much like the case of Meyer v. Haas, except that no fraud is claimed or proven to have been practiced by the defendant in the procurement of the release involved herein. In this action, however, the uncontradicted evidence, as we have already seen, shows that neither party to the release at the time they made the settlement evidenced by the release had in mind the injury which resulted in the boy's death. As to the damages sustained by the father for the death of his son due to defendant's negligence, we have held that the release did not cover any damages sustained by reason of the boy's death. It only extended to damages for those injuries known to the parties at the time of executing it. The present action was by the instructions of the trial court limited to such damages as the father may have sustained by reason of his son's death. As plaintiff herein has not recovered any damages sustained by him for injuries, which were covered by the release, it was not necessary for him to rescind said release and restore the consideration received therefor before the institution of this action. Lumley v. Wabash R. Co. (C. C. A.) 76 F. 66; McGill v. Louisville & N. R. R. Co., 114 Ky. 358, 70 S. W. 1048; Bliss v. N. Y., etc., Railroad, 160 Mass. 447, 36 N. E. 65, 39 Am. St. Rep. 504. This we understand to be the effect of the holding of this court in Meyer v. Haas, supra. In that action, however, the plaintiff did not either after or before the commencement thereof offer to rescind and restore the consideration received by him from the defendant Haas. In the present action, after the commencement thereof and before the trial, the plaintiff herein offered in writing to rescind and tendered the defendant the $250 received at the time of executing the release, which the defendant refused to accept. There is creditable authority to sustain plaintiff's contention that the rescission, assuming that a rescission was required, attempted to be made by plaintiff herein after suit began, was timely, and was sufficient to entitle plaintiff to litigate the validity of the general release at the trial of the action.

> "Undoubtedly no duty exists to return the consideration until the fraud or other invalidity is discovered. Beyond this the authorities are in conflict as to when the restoration of consideration or tender thereof must be made. Some cases, in many of which cancellation of the release is asked in the complaint or statement of claim, decide that such return or tender must be made before the releasor institutes suit on the cause of action released. Other decisions take the view that a credit on the verdict is sufficient, and hence no actual tender is apparently required at any time. Furthermore, authority is not lacking for the statement that restoration or tender at any time during the pendency of the suit is early enough. But the clearest and soundest rule is that no restoration or tender need be made until an attack is made on the release. Such attack generally occurs when the ground of invalidity, as fraud, is replied in avoidance to a plea of the release to the original right." 34 Cyc. 1072.

In Rockwell v. Capital Traction Co., 25 App. D. C. 98, 4 Ann. Cas. 648, the following rule is enunciated:

> "We see no good reason why one party more than the other should be required to anticipate a defense founded on the instrument [a release], and offer to return the consideration as the condition of bringing the action. We are of the opinion that it is time enough to make the tender in either case after the release shall have been pleaded in bar. Tender or offer to return then accomplishes all the purposes for which it is required. * * * Some of the cases to which our attention has been called, where the doctrine has been declared that tender or offer to return is a condition precedent to the institution of the suit, were either suits to rescind, or suits in courts of blended jurisdiction where cancellation was part of the remedy sought. [Citing cases.] * * * On the other hand, many cases, some of which are cited, expressly decide that the offer to return may be made after the institution of the suit and while it is pending. O'Brien v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 89 Iowa, 644, 57 N. W. 425; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Lewis, 109 Ill. 120; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Doyle, 18 Kan. 58."

[3, 4] There are cases to the contrary and some of those cited by defendant in his brief belong to that class, but in most of those cases we find simply general language purporting to uphold defendant's contention. And upon examination of these cases we find that the real point that we are here considering was not involved in any of said actions. Among the cases cited by defendant in support of his contention that rescission and restoration of consideration must precede the institution of the action are the following: Reed v. John Gill & Sons Co., 201 Mo. App. 457, 212 S. W. 43; Reid v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (Mo. Sup.) 187 S. W. 15; Althoff v. St. Louis Transit Co., 204 Mo. 166, 102 S. W. 642; McCoy v. James T. McMahon Const. Co. (Mo. Sup.) 216 S. W. 770; and Randall v. Port Huron, etc., Co. (Mich.) 184 N. W. 435. In none of these cases, however, did the plaintiff, as the plaintiff did in this case, tender back and offer to restore the consideration before the trial. In Garcia v. California Truck Co., 183 Cal. 767, 192 P. 708, relied upon by defendant, the plaintiff therein made no offer to rescind the release either before or after the institution of the action. The court held he could not recover for that reason and reversed the judgment in his favor.

We think the true rule is that, when the purpose of the action is to cancel or set aside a contract on the ground of fraud, mistake, or other reason, then it is necessary for the plaintiff therein to rescind said contract and tender back the consideration received prior to the commencement of the action, or else he will be precluded from recovery; but, where plaintiff seeks to recover unliquidated damages for an injury sustained and the defendant relies upon a release as a defense to said action, the plaintiff is not precluded from showing the invalidity of said release, if he has made a timely offer to rescind the same and restore the consideration, even if said offer is made after the commencement of the action.

In the present action, immediately upon the service of defendant's answer upon plaintiff, in which the defendant set up said release as a defense to plaintiff's action, the latter served upon defendant his written rescission of said release and a tender of said sum of $250, being the consideration received from defendant on execution and delivery of said release. It does not appear that plaintiff's attorneys knew of the execution of said release, prior to the time they were served with a copy of defendant's answer, nor does it appear that plaintiff himself had any real understanding of its legal effect before the matter had been brought to his attention by his attorneys after they had been served with said answer. The court found under these facts and circumstances that the plaintiff had acted with due promptness in rescinding the release and tendering back the consideration received thereunder. Under the authorities cited above we believe said finding was fully justified.

[5-7] While the mother of the boy was on the stand she was shown and asked to identify a photograph of her deceased son. This was objected to by the defendant, but the court overruled the objection. Upon her testimony that the photograph shown her was that of her son it was admitted in evidence. There was no dispute as to the identity of the boy injured. Just what the purpose of offering in evidence his photograph is not apparent from the record, unless it was to unduly prejudice the jury in favor of the plaintiff. The reporter's transcript shows that the mother wept as she identified her son's picture. The effect of such procedure cannot aid in the rendition of a just and fair verdict by the jury, which should be the purpose of all trials by jury. To permit the introduction of the dead boy's photograph under the circumstances shown in this action was undoubtedly error and in a closely contested case would result in serious prejudice to the cause of the defendant, and would therefore call for a reversal of the judgment. We are not prepared to say that it had that effect in this proceeding. There was little question but that the boy's death was due to the negligence of defendant's servant who was operating defendant's machine at the time of the boy's injury. The main questions involved in the case were of a legal character and have already been considered by us. The objectionable testimony just referred to had no bearing upon any of them.

There is, however, one phase of the case upon which such testimony might have had a material bearing, and that is embraced in the further contention of defendant that the verdict was excessive. The verdict was for $10,250, the $250 evidently being to cover the amount paid out by the plaintiff for the funeral expenses of his son. The complaint alleges that this amount was expended for that purpose. This leaves a verdict of $10,000 for general damages due to the death of the son. In the case of Wiezorek v. Ferris, 176 Cal. 353, 167 P. 234, this court reversed a judgment in that amount in favor of a parent for the death of his minor son, his only child, a boy 6½ years of age, solely upon the ground that the amount thereof was excessive. Were we to follow that case we would be compelled to grant a reversal of the judgment herein. That case was decided in October, 1917, almost 11 years ago. Since the decision thereof radical changes have taken place in social conditions, and particularly in conditions affecting the costs of living. Courts have recognized this fact in passing upon the size of verdicts and have almost invariably made allowances therefor. Martin v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. (Cal. App.) 255 P. 284; Bowes v. Public Service Ry. Co., 94 N. J. Law, 378, 110 A. 699; Quinn v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 162 Minn. 87, 202 N. W. 275, 46 A. L. R. 1228. In the last one of these cases the Supreme Court of Minnesota said:

> "In recent years there has been a noticeable increase in the size of verdicts in personal injury cases. The courts approve of verdicts today which would have been unhesitatingly set aside as excessive 10 or 15 years ago. Measured in money, the earning capacity of most men has increased; measured by its purchasing power, the value of a dollar has decreased. No immediate change in the situation is in sight. It is only right that these well-known facts should be taken into consideration."

In the case of Bowes v. Public Service Ry. Co., supra, decided in 1920, the Supreme Court of New Jersey expressed similar views in which it further said:

> "At a period when the purchasing power of the dollar has in the language of the day been 'cut in half,' the value of the sum awarded here is not to be estimated in the numerical quantum of the recompense, but in its comparative ability to furnish the necessities of life."

In view of the changed conditions that now prevail from those existing some 10 years ago, we do not feel that we would be justified in following at this time the views expressed by this court in Wiezorek v. Ferris, supra, regarding the subject of excessive verdicts. Under the present conditions that case cannot be accepted as a final authority in determining whether the verdict in the present action is excessive or not. On the other hand, the present verdict must be considered under the conditions prevailing at the present time, or at least at the time it was rendered in January, 1925. We must, as courts in other jurisdictions have done in passing upon similar questions as that involved herein, take judicial notice of the fact that the value of the dollar has materially changed from what it was some 10 to 15 years ago. Whether it is "cut in half," as intimated by the excerpt from one of the above-mentioned authorities, or not, it is universally admitted that it has materially decreased in value from what it was a few years ago. There has been a corresponding increase in wages and salaries as well as in the cost of living in all walks of life. The sum of $10,000 when measured by its present purchasing power is far less than what it formerly was. A verdict, therefore, in this amount for personal injuries, may well be sustained by the courts of to-day, when formerly it would have been their duty to set it aside as excessive. Before the advent of the present day conditions verdicts for the death of a child amounting to $5,000 or more were frequently rendered by juries, and sustained by the courts. One of such cases was decided by the District Court of Appeal in 1910 and a petition to hear the same was denied by this court. The verdict was for $5,000, and, in sustaining the same, Mr. Justice Hart, speaking for the court, said:

> "The jury were authorized, as the court properly instructed them, to consider and take into account, as an element affecting the pecuniary value of the service of deceased to the plaintiff, the fact that plaintiff has, by his death, been deprived of the comfort, society and protection of her son. * * * And, obviously, this element of loss of society, comfort and protection of the son to be reckoned in determining the pecuniary value of the service of the deceased to his mother is difficult to measure in mere dollars and cents, and manifestly must, with the whole question of damages, be left to the good sense and sound discretion of the jury to be exercised in the light of all the circumstances of the case." Clark v. Tulare Lake Dredging Co., 14 Cal. App. 414, 434, 112 P. 564, 572.

If, then, this court looked with approval upon a verdict in an amount of $5,000, in an action for the recovery of damages for the death of a child under former conditions, we can have no reasonable or legal grounds now for withholding such approval of the verdict in the present action. Taking all things into consideration, we are of the opinion that this verdict is not excessive. The erroneous admission of the boy's photograph in the manner already described did not then, in our opinion, have the effect of influencing the jury to render an improper verdict against defendant, and the error in admitting it was not prejudicial to the defendant.

[8] In one of the instructions given by the court the jury were told that, if the consent of plaintiff was given to the release in question "by mistake or obtained through fraud," then it was the legal right of plaintiff to rescind the same. As we have said above, there was no claim that the release was procured by fraud and the case was tried upon the theory of mistake only. The only reference to fraud throughout the record is in this instruction. Just how the court happened to mention in said instruction "fraud" as one of the grounds of avoiding the release is in no way explained. It may have been inadvertently done. In any event, we are not convinced that defendant was seriously prejudiced by this one reference to fraud, when the record shows plainly that plaintiff made no claim that the release was fraudulently obtained, and the sole contention of plaintiff throughout the trial was that the release was of no binding effect upon him by reason of the fact that it was executed under a mutual mistake of the parties.

In our opinion the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

I concur: PRESTON, J.

SEAWELL, J. I concur in the conclusion announced by the main opinion. I do not concur in the portion thereof which holds that the admission of a photograph taken of the minor two weeks before he received the fatal injuries was error. It would certainly have been proper to have shown the physical condition and mental precocity of the youth by oral testimony as matters pertinent for the consideration of the jury in determining the extent of damages sustained by the parents. A photograph, the integrity of which could not be doubted, would, in my opinion, have given the jury a truer conception of the youth's physical appearance than could have been conveyed to the jury by the descriptive power of speech. So, too, it would reflect something of the mental force of the subject. Emotional manifestations are not alone produced by the exhibition of photographs in cases of this class. Such manifestations are to be expected where mothers are called to the witness chair to speak upon any branch of the case. I am of the opinion that no error was committed by the admission of the photograph.

PACIFIC STATES SAVINGS & LOAN CO. v. HARWELL et al.

ZANOLA v. SAME.

Supreme Court of California. June 14, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑148—Stranger to ejectment proceeding, by connecting himself with cause, has right of appeal from order denying motion to recall and annul writ of assistance.

Stranger to ejectment proceeding, without right to appeal from original order, by connecting himself with cause on motion to recall and annul writ of assistance, and by having been given status of mover by the court, has right to appeal from order denying such motion.

2. Ejectment 🔑122—Stranger to ejectment proceeding, entering premises without collusion, cannot be removed by writ of restitution after judgment.

One who, after ejectment proceedings have been commenced, enters the demanded premises, not under the defendant, nor by collusion with him, and is likewise not a party to the action, cannot be removed by writ of restitution issued after judgment.

3. Assistance, writ of 🔑2—Writ will not issue, so as to affect new and independent right to property.

Where a new and independent right to property has been acquired, or where a prima facie showing of acquirement of such right is made, writ of assistance should not issue, and cannot operate to affect such new and independent right, in that writ relates back to and operates on those rights only which have been determined by the judgment.

4. Mortgages 🔑544(3)—Court obtained jurisdiction to determine claim to possession of stranger voluntarily becoming party to foreclosure proceedings.

Where stranger to foreclosure proceeding voluntarily became a party thereto by filing a motion to dissolve writ of assistance theretofore issued, the court obtained jurisdiction to try and decide his claim to possession of property.

5. Mortgages 🔑544(3)—Naked trespasser held not entitled to annulment of writ of assistance theretofore issued.

Naked trespasser held not to have such reasonable claim to possession of property as required court to grant motion to recall and annul a writ of assistance theretofore issued.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Claude F. Purkitt, Judge.

Action by the Pacific States Savings & Loan Company against S. B. Harwell and others, wherein C. Zanola filed a cross-complaint. From an order refusing a motion to recall and annul a writ of assistance theretofore issued, G. M. Harwell appeals. Affirmed.

Guy L. Louderback and C. L. Donohoe, both of Willows, for appellant.

Duard F. Geis and Carroll F. Byrd, both of Willows, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. This is an appeal in the above-entitled proceeding from an order refusing the motion of one G. M. Harwell to recall and annul a writ of assistance theretofore issued and still outstanding in said proceeding, the same being in foreclosure. Respondent received the sheriff's deed, and sought and secured the writ complained of, the command of which is as follows:

> "Therefore we command you that, immediately after receiving this writ, you go to, and enter upon, the said piece or parcel of land above described, and that you eject the said defendants S. B. Harwell and Nannie A. Harwell, and any and all persons claiming under them, or either of them, since the commencement of the above-entitled action, and all persons claiming to have acquired any interest or estate in the premises subsequent to the filing of the lis pendens in the above entitled action that may be in possession of said premises, and all and every other person or persons holding or detaining the said premises, and that you deliver to said C. Zanola, or his assigns, the possession of said premises without delay, and him, the said C. Zanola, or his assigns, from time to time, maintain, keep, and defend, or cause to be kept, maintained, and defended, according to the true intent of said decree."

This writ does not in terms mention appellant. Appellant asserts that as a tenant of respondent he is in possession of the premises, and for that reason asks that said writ be recalled and annulled. The trial court treated the motion of appellant as proper, heard it upon evidence, both oral and documentary, and later refused to grant the relief sought, holding in effect that appellant was not a tenant of respondent, but in reality a trespasser upon the premises.

[1] The facts of this case bring appellant within the exception to the general rule that one may not appeal from an order refusing to vacate and annul an appealable order. Appellant, being a stranger to the proceeding, could not have appealed from the original order, but by connecting himself with the cause and having been given the status of a mover by the court, he may appeal. People v. Grant, 45 Cal. 97; Green v. Hebbard, 95 Cal. 39, 30 P. 202; Pignaz v. Burnett, 119 Cal. 157, 51 P. 48; Credits Com. Co. v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 82, 73 P. 1009; Elliott v. Superior Court, 144 Cal. 501, 509, 77 P. 1109, 103 Am. St. Rep. 102; Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Calif., etc., Co., 159 Cal. 484, 488, 114 P. 838; Estate of Baker, 170 Cal. 578, 584, 150 P. 989.

[2] It is also true that one who, after ejectment proceedings have been commenced, enters the demanded premises, not under the defendant, nor by collusion with him, and is likewise not a party to the action, cannot be removed by a writ of restitution issued after judgment. Mayo v. Sprout, 45 Cal. 99; Bull v. Coe, 77 Cal. 54, 18 P. 808, 11 Am. St. Rep. 235.

[3] We also reannounce the doctrine set forth in Kirsch v. Kirsch, 113 Cal. 56, 62, 63, 45 P. 164, 166, as follows:

> "Reserving for the moment, the consideration whether a writ of assistance may issue at all in an action such as this, we are well satisfied that, where a new and independent right to property has been acquired, or where a prima facie showing of the acquirement of such a right is made, the writ should not issue and cannot operate to affect such new and independent right. The writ relates back to and operates upon those rights only which have been determined by the judgment. The reason for the issuance of the writ is to give effect to rights awarded by the judgment. It should not and cannot operate to establish in the one party, or to destroy in the other, any rights to the property independent of those determined by the judgment. So it would follow if appellant in this case had made even a prima facie showing of a new title by adverse possession, the issuance of the writ which would have passed judgment upon that title would have been improvident and irregular. But, while appellant claims a new title by adverse possession, the bald assertion of an unsupported claim is not a sufficient warrant for asking the court to withhold its process. If appellant, six months after the entry of the decree, should resist the issuance of the writ, upon the claim that she had, since the entry of the decree, acquired title by adverse possession, the groundlessness of the contention would entitle it to no consideration. The claim, in short, must be reasonable, and supported by a reasonable showing."

[4, 5] But the court here finds that appellant is a naked trespasser; hence his claim is "unsupported," and the showing is not "reasonable" within the meaning of the above-quoted doctrine. Moreover, appellant having voluntarily become a party to the foreclosure proceedings, the court obtained jurisdiction to try and decide his claim to possession of the property. In Dobbins v. Economic Gas Co. (on rehearing) 182 Cal. 638, 189 P. 1073, the court met and considered a principle kindred to the one here involved, and disposed of it in harmony with the announcement above made.

We have been furnished with practically no authorities on the questions above discussed; hence we do not feel called upon to pursue legal questions further. Respondent cited no authorities on the merits of the appeal, and rested practically his whole defense upon the contention that the order must be affirmed, because of the failure of appellant to present a properly authenticated bill of exceptions or reporter's transcript. The certificates of clerk and judge are each defective, but a question arises as to the waiver of these defects in the record by stipulation made by counsel. A consideration of these questions would take more time than to examine the order appealed from on its merits, treating the record before us as complete. This we have done, and we find no showing whatever from which it can be said that the order of the trial court was without support.

The order is affirmed.

FERGUSON v. KOCH. (Sac. 4151.)

Supreme Court of California. June 12, 1928.

1. Sales 🔑41—Generally rule of caveat emptor applies, but not where seller makes false statements as of own knowledge; falsity being unknown to buyer.

General rule is that, where parties deal fairly or at arm's length, the rule of caveat emptor applies, but, where honest dealing is departed from by seller making false statements as of his own knowledge, falsity of which are not known to buyer, such buyer has undoubted right to rely implicitly upon such statements, and principle has no application.

2. Sales 🔑267—Buyer purchasing used truck under contract providing that chassis was sold "as is" could rely on representations concerning model of motor and capacity of truck.

Where contract for conditional sale of used truck prepared by seller contained assurance that motor was in very good condition, further reciting that chassis was sold "as is" for reason that certain parts were missing, and fraud charged was that seller made misrepresentations concerning model of truck and its capacity which were not apparent for examination, held that buyer, having no knowledge of subject, was entitled to rely on seller's statements.

3. Sales 🔑52(1, 7)—Independent investigation of truck did not show buyer relied on own judgment rather than upon seller's representations, nor give rise to such presumption.

In seller's action on conditional sale contract, mere circumstance that buyer had made independent investigation of truck did not necessarily show that he relied on own judgment rather than upon representations of seller, nor did it give rise to presumption of law to that effect.

4. Sales 🔑38(7)—Buyer may rely on seller's representations of facts not within knowledge, and seller cannot escape responsibility by showing buyer might have ascertained falsity.

Buyer has right to rely on representations of seller as to facts not within his knowledge, and the seller cannot escape responsibility by showing that buyer might have ascertained upon inquiry that representations were untrue.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—On appeal, judgment in seller's action for breach of contract of conditional sale of used truck must stand where finding of seller's false representations was sustained by competent evidence.

In seller's action for breach of contract conditional sale of used truck, where trial court found that false representations were made by seller and there was ample competent evidence in record to support conclusion, held on appeal that judgment must stand.

6. Evidence 🔑397(2)—Where parties have reduced to writing complete and certain agreement, parol evidence will not be received, in absence of fraud.

Where parties have reduced to writing what appears to be complete and certain agreement, it will, in absence of fraud, be conclusively presumed that writing contains whole agreement between parties, and parol evidence of prior, contemporaneous, or subsequent conversations or representations or statements will not be received for purpose of adding to or varying written instrument.

7. Evidence 🔑434(11)—Writing may be impeached for fraud and parol warranty may then be relied upon rather than fraudulent written one.

Writing may be impeached for fraud, and parol warranty really made may then be relied upon rather than written one thus shown to be fraudulently imperfect or defective.

8. Evidence 🔑434(11)—Parol evidence is admissible to prove fraud; hence fact that sale of used truck was evidenced by written contract did not prevent buyer from proving fraud by parol.

Parol evidence is always admissible to prove fraud, and it was never intended that parol evidence rule should be used as a shield to prevent proof of fraud; hence fact that sale of used truck was evidenced by written contract did not prevent buyer from proving by parol evidence that sale was induced by fraud, and this is true even though contract recites that all conditions and representations are embodied therein.

9. Evidence 🔑434(8)—In actions for rescission for fraud, statutory provisions as to effect of written contract have no application (Code Civ. Proc. § 1856; Civ. Code, § 1625).

In action for rescission on ground of fraud, statutory provisions that, when terms of agreement have been reduced to writing, such writing is to be considered as containing all terms (Code Civ. Proc. § 1856), and that execution of contract supersedes all prior negotiations or stipulations (Civ. Code, § 1625), have no application and do not control.

10. Sales 🔑251—There is no distinction between fraudulent representations inducing contract and representations in nature of warranties.

There is no distinction between fraudulent representations going to induce making of contract and representations in nature of warranties.

11. Courts 🔑89—Case not passed upon by Supreme Court is not controlling in Supreme Court.

Case not passed upon by Supreme Court because no petition for transfer was applied for is not controlling in Supreme Court.

12. Trial 🔑395(6)—Finding of fact that all matters set forth in answer are true as alleged is sufficient.

Blanket finding of fact that all matters set forth in defendant's answer are true as therein alleged is sufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by E. A. Ferguson against Fred Koch, upon a conditional sale agreement. From a judgment for the defendant, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal. 261 P. 489.

W. E. Davies, of Marysville, for appellant.

A. G. Bailey, Hudson Grant, and Grant & Bailey, all of Woodland, for respondent.

TYLER, Justice pro tem. Action to recover the purchase price of a certain used autotruck sold under a written agreement. Defendant by his answer admitted the sale, but, by way of defense, alleged that he was induced to make the purchase by means of fraudulent representations. Judgment was rendered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. The facts, briefly stated, are as follows: On the 14th day of December, 1925, plaintiff was the owner of a 1916 year model Reo automobile, which he had commenced to convert into a light delivery truck. Defendant, a contractor, after examining the same, entered into negotiations with plaintiff for its purchase. Terms of sale were agreed upon, and the machine was towed to defendant's place of business, where further examination was made by him of the truck. The parties thereupon entered into a written agreement of sale, the material portions of which are as follows:

"Robbins, Sutter Co., Dec. 14, 1925.

"This is to certify that E. A. Ferguson agrees to sell to Fred Koch the following described property: One Reo chassis, year model 1916, as is. E. A. Ferguson, the sole owner of said Reo for several years past, agrees to give a clear title to said Reo to Fred Koch, the buyer. The Reo chassis is sold as is due to the fact that certain parts belonging to chassis are not attached thereto. E. A. Ferguson, to the best of his knowledge, states that the motor of said Reo is in very good condition.

"[Signed] E. A. Ferguson.
"Fred Koch.

"Witness: J. P. Ponne."

Defendant having refused to make the payments provided for under the contract, for reasons hereinafter stated, this action was brought to recover the purchase price. In his answer, defendant alleged, in substance, that plaintiff, in order to induce him to purchase the automobile, represented that the truck was a Reo speed wagon, that it was a 2½-ton truck, such as defendant desired, and would carry the desired weight, and, further, that it had the same motor in it as the Reo Company installed in its new cars for the year 1925; that in truth and in fact the auto was not a Reo speed wagon; that the motor was not the one described, it being the type used by the company in the year 1917 for passenger automobiles, and not in speed wagons; that the truck had a carrying capacity of three-fourths of a ton only. It is then charged that plaintiff knew the representations to be false and fraudulent and were made for the sole purpose of inducing defendant to enter into the contract. Further allegations recite that immediately after the purchase defendant discovered the falsity of the representations and thereupon offered to redeliver the auto to plaintiff and demanded the cancellation of the obligation. At the trial, plaintiff offered the written contract in evidence, and denied having made any false representations. Defendant, over objection, then testified as to the misrepresentations contained in his answer, and judgment went in his favor. It is here claimed by plaintiff, appellant herein, that the doctrine of caveat emptor applies to the facts of the case; it being clearly shown by the testimony that defendant had full opportunity of examining the car, and that, having availed himself thereof, and entered into the written contract agreeing to take the automobile "as is" and pay for the same, he thereby became bound by his agreement. It is further claimed that the parol evidence received was inadmissible to change or vary the terms of the written instrument. We will discuss the points in the order stated.

[1] The general rule is well established that, where parties deal fairly or at arm's length, the rule of caveat emptor applies, but, where honest dealing is departed from by the vendor making false statements as of his own knowledge, the falsity of which is not known to the purchaser, such purchaser has the undoubted right to rely implicitly upon such statements, and the principle has no application. In other words, the vendor must stand mute, or at least refrain from making statements calculated to deceive.

[2-5] Here the contract, prepared and written by plaintiff, contained the assurance that the motor was in very good condition, and it further recited that the chassis was sold "as is" for the reason that certain parts were missing. These assurances have relation to the mechanical condition of the truck, as to which no fraud is alleged and of which no complaint is made. The fraud charged, and which it is claimed induced the purchase, consists in the misrepresentations concerning the model of the motor and the capacity of the truck. The capacity of the truck was not a matter that could be ascertained by the exercise of reasonable care in the examination thereof, that fact not being apparent from such examination, and the vendee, having no knowledge upon the subject, was therefore entitled to rely upon the vendor's statement, which the evidence shows he made, that he had used the car and it would carry the desired load. The same may be said with reference to the misrepresentations concerning the motor. The evidence shows that the vendee was not familiar with the different types of motors in use in Reo cars, but had merely heard that those used in the speed wagon type of auto were very good machines. The mere circumstance, therefore, that the vendee made an independent investigation of the truck does not necessarily show that he relied on his own judgment rather than upon the representations of the other party, nor does it give rise to the presumption of law to that effect. A purchaser has a right to rely on the representations of his vendor as to facts not within his knowledge, and the vendor cannot escape responsibility by showing that the purchaser might have ascertained upon inquiry that the representations were untrue. Sullivan v. Helbing, 66 Cal. App. 478, 226 P. 803; Whiting v. Squeglia, 70 Cal. App. 108, 232 P. 986. The trial court having found that the false representations were made, and there being ample evidence in the record to support the conclusion, the judgment must stand unless it can be said that the evidence concerning the false misrepresentations was improperly received.

[6] This brings us to the question whether or not parol evidence is proper to prove false representations where there is a written contract of sale. The rule is, of course, well settled that, where the parties have reduced to writing what appears to be a complete and certain agreement, it will, in the absence of fraud, be conclusively presumed that the writing contains the whole of the agreement between the parties, and that it is a complete memorial of the same, and parol evidence of prior, contemporaneous or subsequent conversations or representations or statements will not be received for the purpose of adding to or varying the written instrument. If, therefore, such a writing exists between the parties, and it contains no warranty at all, no warranty can be added by parol; if it contains a warranty of some kind or to some extent, parol evidence will not be admitted to extend, enlarge, or modify that which the writing specifies. United Iron Works v. Outer H., etc., Co., 168 Cal. 81, 141 P. 917; 2 Mechem on Sales, § 1254.

in the writing, and the parties will be held to their agreement and to no other. It is equally well settled, however, that a writing may be impeached for fraud, and a parol warranty really made may then be relied upon rather than the written one thus shown to be fraudulently imperfect or defective. Id. § 1257; 9 Ency. of Ev., p. 492. Parol evidence is always admissible to prove fraud, and it was never intended that the parol evidence rule should be used as a shield to prevent the proof of fraud. Hence, the fact that the sale of an automobile is evidenced by a written contract will not prevent the purchaser from proving by parol evidence that the sale was induced by fraud. And this is true even though the contract recites that all conditions and representations are embodied therein. Mooney v. Cyriacks, 185 Cal. 70, 195 P. 922; Hunt v. Field (Cal. Sup.) 262 P. 730; Whiting v. Squeglia, 70 Cal. App. 108, 232 P. 986. There is no such sanctity surrounding a writing that parties may not be permitted to go back of it and show that there was such fraud practiced in the procurement of the same as to vitiate the writing. The law never countenanced a rule which would deny to one the right to prove that fraud had been practiced upon him. Avery v. Staples (Tex. Civ. App.) 183 S. W. 43; Berry on Automobiles (4th Ed.) § 1561; Huddy on Automobiles (7th Ed.) § 1116, and cases cited.

[9-11] In actions for rescission on the ground of fraud, the statutory provisions that, when the terms of an agreement have been reduced to writing, such writing is to be considered as containing all the terms (Code Civ. Proc. § 1856), and that the execution of a contract supersedes all prior negotiations or stipulations (Civ. Code § 1625), have no application, and do not control (Mooney v. Cypriacks, supra). Appellant has cited us to certain earlier cases in our reports which he claims make a distinction between fraudulent representations going to induce the making of a contract and representations in the nature of warranties. There is no reason why any such distinctions should exist, and, in fact, none does exist. See Hayes v. Gammon, 168 Ark. 1116, 272 S. W. 644; Martin v. Shoub, 62 Ind. App. 586, 113 N. E. 384; 26 Cyc. p. 1145. The Mooney and Hunt Cases above cited had to do with fraud concerning warranties, and what was said in those cases applies to fraud exercised in this connection. An examination of the cases relied upon by appellant shows that in most of them the question of fraud was not involved. For the most part they are cited and distinguished in the Mooney Case, and a further review of them would answer no useful purpose. The case of Yuba Mfg. Co. v. Stone, 39 Cal. App. 447, 179 P. 418, chiefly relied on by appellant, contains language that supports his contention. The case, however, is based upon decisions where fraud was not alleged. While recognizing the rule that a defrauded party cannot, by the "simple device of a written instrument," be deprived of the right to prove fraud, it concludes with the statement that parol evidence cannot be permitted to nullify the further rule in relation to the effect of written instruments by the claim that the vendee was deceived by certain oral representations. Such, as we have pointed out, is not the law. This case was not passed upon by this court; no petition for a transfer having been applied for. It is therefore not here controlling.

[12] And, finally, it is claimed that the findings of fact are not supported by the evidence and are defective in form. What we have said disposes of the first objection. The blanket finding is made that all matters set forth in defendant's answer are true as therein alleged. This form of finding has always been held sufficient. Fritz v. Mills, 170 Cal. 449-459, 150 P. 375.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Action by Blanche Ritchey against A. B. Watson, doing business under the fictitious firm name and style of the Crown Stage Line. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Clyde Bishop, of Santa Ana, and B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

S. M. Davis, of Santa Ana, for respondent.

TYLER, Justice pro tem. Action for damages for personal injuries. The complaint alleges, in substance, that on July 13, 1925, plaintiff was riding with her husband in an automobile truck which was being driven in a careful and prudent manner in a northwesterly direction along and upon a public highway in the county of Orange; that, when the truck had reached a point directly opposite to the home of plaintiff, her husband made a left-hand turn in order to enter his private road, at which time defendant, operating an automobile bus going in the same direction, carelessly, recklessly, and negligently, and in utter disregard to the rights and safety of other drivers, collided with the truck, striking the left wheel thereof with such force and violence as to overturn it, pinning plaintiff and her husband underneath thereof, and causing the injuries complained of. Judgment was prayed for in the sum of $10,087.25. The answer denied negligence in the operation of the motorbus, and alleged that the driver of the truck turned the same from the right-hand side of the road toward the left-hand side thereof in a negligent manner and without the exercise of ordinary care, and the damage suffered by plaintiff was due to and caused by the fault of the driver of the truck by reason of his failure to exercise such requisite care. After trial before a jury, plaintiff recovered a verdict in the sum of $3,000. From this judgment defendant prosecutes this appeal.

[1, 2] It is here claimed that the verdict is contrary to the evidence and is contrary to the law in this: (1) That the proof discloses no negligence on the part of defendant; (2) that plaintiff and her husband were guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law for the violation of the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517), and, in particular, for failing to look to the rear before turning to the left, such violation and negligence being the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries. It is further claimed that the trial court erred in permitting testimony relating to the speed of the bus at a point distant from the scene of the accident as being too remote, and that the court likewise erred in the giving and refusing to give certain instructions to the jury. With reference to the question of negligence, there is evidence to show that plaintiff and her husband were traveling on the public highway in a light Ford truck and which was turned across to the left for the purpose of entering their private driveway. Prior to making this turn, and when some 50 or 60 feet therefrom, the husband slowed down, looked back, and also looked in his rear view mirror to ascertain if any vehicles were approaching, at the same time extending his hand to indicate his intention to make the turn and continuing to do so until he had accomplished his purpose. Before his rear wheels had cleared the road, his truck was struck by defendant's bus, overturned, and plaintiff and her husband were pinned beneath the same. There was also testimony to show that immediately prior to the accident, and when the bus was about 500 feet from the point in the road where the accident occurred, it was traveling at a high rate of speed, estimated at from 35 to 40 miles an hour, and had been traveling at a speed of nearer 50 miles just prior thereto. It further appeared that immediately prior to the impact, and when some 250 feet away from the scene of the accident, the driver of the bus began to swing his vehicle from the right-hand side of the road toward the left-hand side in an attempt to pass the truck in which plaintiff and her husband were riding. It is manifest that under these facts defendant was guilty of negligence and that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, as claimed. It is true that there was conflict in the evidence, but with that we are not concerned. The question of negligence or contributory negligence is one of fact for the jury to determine, and its finding cannot here be disturbed by reason of a conflict, nor can it be disturbed because of the fact that different inferences might reasonably be drawn from the evidence. The evidence is ample to support the judgment.

[3, 4] Nor is there any merit in the claim that the trial court committed error in admitting evidence of the speed of the bus in approaching the scene of the accident when a few hundred feet away therefrom. The question as to whether or not this evidence was objectionable as being too remote was a matter of discretion of the trial court. No hard and fast rule can be laid down upon this subject. Traynor v. McGilvray, 54 Cal. App. 31, 200 P. 1056; 1 Wigmore on Ev. 574 et seq. Even assuming that, standing alone, the evidence might be considered too remote, still the positive testimony as to the speed of the bus at the time of the accident makes it legally relevant as affording an inference with respect thereto. Davies v. Barnes, 201 Ala. 120, 77 So. 612; Sterler v. Busch, 197 Iowa, 231, 195 N. W. 369. The weight of such evidence is a question for the jury.

[5-8] Equally without merit is the claim that the court erred in giving certain instructions requested by the plaintiff, for the reason that they were misleading on account of the order in which they were given. The issues were plain and simple. Each party was entitled to have instructions given, based on his theory of the case, if there was any evidence to support it. Both parties fully availed themselves of this privilege, for the instructions are voluminous. Some of the instructions asked for by the defendant were refused, and rightfully so, for the reason that other instructions upon the subject presented the law fully to the jury. The order in which the trial court read the instructions to the jury is of no consequence. Whether the first or the last made the greater impression upon the minds of the jury, or which were the most lasting, presents a question upon which minds might differ, but in any event the objection "borders on the realm of psychology, wherein the law seems loath to enter." Grillich v. Weinshenk, 64 Cal. App. 474, 222 P. 160. We have read the instructions, and fail to find objection to any of them, either in form or substance. As above stated, the issues were plain and simple. The instructions fully and fairly covered the questions involved and properly presented all issues to the jury. The only objection we see to them is that they are too voluminous. The more simply and plainly instructions can be framed and cover the issues, the better the jury will understand them, and the less likely will they run counter to some rule of law. Estate of Keithley, 134 Cal. 9-13, 66 P. 5. The appeal is devoid of merit.

Where asserted interpretation of statute will lead to injustice, oppression, or to absurd consequences, the general terms used in statute will be limited in their scope so as to avoid such a result.

2. Licenses 🔑16(9)—Exemption provision of Gasoline Tax Act held inapplicable to executory contracts of sale permitting distributor to add tax to fuel sold (Gasoline Tax Act, § 10).

Provision of Gasoline Tax Act (St. 1923, p. 571) § 10, exempting from tax any motor vehicle fuel delivered under contract entered into prior to May 14, 1923, held inapplicable to executory contracts of sale entered into prior to such date, which in terms or in effect permits the distributor to protect himself against operation of the tax by securing a price for the fuel sold which may have as an added constituent factor thereof a sum equivalent to tax fixed by the statute.

3. Constitutional law 🔑205(2)—Licenses 🔑7(3)—Statutes 🔑74(1), 95(2)—Construction of exemption provision of Gasoline Tax Act so as to apply to executory contracts permitting distributor to add tax to selling price would render act unconstitutional (Gasoline Tax Act, § 10; Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21; art. 4, § 25, subd. 19).

Construction of exemption provision of Gasoline Tax Act (St. 1923, p. 571) § 10, so as to apply it to executory contracts wherein distributor may add tax to selling price, would render statute in violation of Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21, and article 4, § 25, subd. 19, in that it would create an unwarranted and baseless discrimination in the operation of statute by conferring a benefit on certain persons and corporations which is denied to others under same circumstances.

4. Constitutional law 🔑154(1)—Imposition of tax on future sale does not interfere with obligation of contract, where seller may add tax to selling price.

It is in no sense an interference with obligation of a contract to impose a tax on a future sale to be made thereunder, where seller is given free rein to add to selling price in such commodity tax imposed by law.

5. Constitutional law 🔑43(1)—Estoppel 🔑52—Party may waive special benefits conferred by statute or Constitution.

A party may waive the benefits specially conferred on him by statute or Constitution.

6. Constitutional law 🔑43(1)—Estoppel 🔑58—Party waiving right to special benefits conferred by statute or Constitution is estopped to rely on exemption where inequitable or unjust to permit it.

When a party waives benefits specially conferred upon him by statute or Constitution, estoppel to rely on exemption will arise in any case, where it is inequitable or unjust to permit it.

7. Licenses 🔑19(3)—Distributor by adding tax to selling price held estopped to deny waiver of right to rely on exemption provision of Gasoline Tax Act (St. 1923, p. 571, § 10; Civ. Code, § 3513).

Exemption provisions of Gasoline Tax Act (St. 1923, p. 571) § 10, being enacted solely for benefit of distributor, held that, under Civ. Code, § 3513, distributor by adding tax to selling price of gasoline is estopped to deny waiver of right to rely on exemption or to claim benefit of it.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by the People against the Ventura Refining Company to recover gasoline tax. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank L. Guerena, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

Charles W. Slack and Edgar T. Zook, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. This is an action by the people against the defendant to recover the two-cent per gallon license or excise tax provided by the Gasoline Tax Act (Stats. 1923, c. 267, p. 571) upon 2,041,922 gallons of motor vehicle fuel sold by defendant to five different concerns under five different executory contracts of sale made prior to May 14, 1923, the completed sales being made during the first quarter of the year 1924. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiff people have appealed on a stipulation of facts, a provision of which is that, should plaintiff finally prevail, it shall have judgment against defendant for the sum of $40,822.86, together with interest and costs as prayed for in the complaint.

Each of the five executory contracts above referred to contains a price-fixing provision substantially as follows:

> "The price fixed for gasoline deliverable hereunder contemplates that the jobber shall be entitled to a spread, or margin, of one and one-half (1½) cents per gallon of delivery hereunder, to compensate him fully for his outlay and services in receiving, storing and distributing gasoline delivered hereunder to the trade in tank-wagon lots and should any federal, state, municipal, or district tax, or taxes, be imposed on gasoline deliverable hereunder, not to the extent thereof reflected in the prevailing price at which standard grades of gasoline, conforming to United States Navy specifications, then in effect may be sold in tank-wagon lots at * * * California, at time of such delivery, the basis for arriving at the price of gasoline to the jobber then remaining deliverable hereunder shall be so altered as to insure to the jobber such spread, or margin, of one and one-half (1½) cents per gallon of delivery hereunder, to compensate him fully for his outlay and services in receiving, storing and distributing gasoline, then remaining deliverable hereunder."

These contracts were interpreted in practical operation as follows:

> "That each and all of the said sales and deliveries of gasoline embraced in the said sales of the said aggregate amount of 2,041,144 gallons were made to the purchaser thereof at a price one and one-half (1½) cents less than the prevailing price at which standard grades of gasoline, conforming to the United States Navy specifications, then in effect, was being sold in tank-wagon lots at the several places of delivery provided in the said respective contracts; that the said prevailing price was determined by the price at which Standard Oil Company, Shell Oil Company, Union Oil Company, and Associated Oil Company were then selling gasoline in the territories mentioned in the said several contracts; and that, at the time that the license tax provided in the statute hereinabove referred to went into effect, the prevailing price of such gasoline was increased by the action of the said last-mentioned corporations two (2) cents per gallon over the price at which such gasoline had been selling prior thereto."

The statute referred to is the so-called Gasoline Tax Act hereinbefore cited, which is entitled:

> "An act to regulate and license the business of producing, refining or distributing gasoline, distillate and other motor vehicle fuels. * * *"

Section 1 defines certain terms used in the act. Section 2 provides for the registration of distributors of motor vehicle fuel. Sections 3 and 4 fix the amount of the tax at two cents per gallon of fuel distributed and the time for payment thereof. Sections 5 to 9 make certain provisions for records to be kept by the distributor and the manner of computation of the tax. Then follows section 10, a portion of which, constituting the basis of controversy here, reads as follows:

> "The provisions of this act requiring the payment of license fees shall not be held or construed to apply to * * * any motor vehicle fuel delivered under contracts entered into prior to the fourteenth day of May, 1923. * * *"

The question presented for our consideration under these facts is: May the respondent in this action rely upon the exemption last above quoted and refuse to comply with the demand of the state for the payment of said tax so levied?

It is the contention of respondent that the language of the statute proclaiming the exemption contains no uncertainty or ambiguity, but in plain words applies to any contract executed prior to May 14, 1923, the terms of which require the distributor to deliver motor vehicle fuel pursuant thereto.

The contention of the people, on the other hand, is that the exemption in said provision cannot be thus broadly interpreted, but must be limited to that class of contracts which contain as an integral part thereof a provision which compels the distributor to sell and deliver motor vehicle fuel at a fixed price and prevents him from adding the two-cent tax thereto. In other words, the contention of the people is that the tax in reality is not paid by the distributor, but is collected from the consumer, and that any contract which allows the distributor to reimburse himself for the tax levied is not within the terms of said exemption. The contention is further made that under the plain terms of the contracts here in suit, coupled with the further facts found, the price was not fixed, but, on the contrary, the distributor not only had the right to add the tax to the selling price, but in effect it was added and actually passed on to the consumer.

It is further urged by the people that, if the broad interpretation contended for by defendant is indulged, the effect will be to render the whole tax exemption unconstitutional and void because when thus interpreted it is discriminatory in character, inasmuch as there is no reasonable basis for declaring that a sale made at a price to be thereafter determined under an executory contract made prior to May 14, 1923, differs from a sale made under a similar contract of subsequent date.

[1] Where the interpretation claimed leads to injustice, oppression, or to absurd consequences, the general terms used in a statute will be limited in their scope so as to avoid such a result. In Ex parte Lorenzen, 128 Cal. 431, 438, 439, 61 P. 68 (50 L. R. A. 55, 79 Am. St. Rep. 47), the court had before it a city penal ordinance regulating the issuance and delivery of street car transfers and prohibiting the giving of them by passengers to others for their use in continuing the journey over a connecting road. The ordinance, if literally enforced, would have made it a penal offense for a passenger, after paying the fare of himself and his family or guests and securing transfers, to deliver such transfers to the other members of his party. The court, restricting the literal language of the ordinance and holding that the legislation did not apply to an innocent use of a transfer, said:

> "But for the more substantial objection that the ordinance by its terms would oppress and lead to the conviction of persons guilty of no fraudulent act, it is to be remembered that the letter of a penal statute is not of controlling force, and that the courts, in construing such statutes, from very ancient times have sought for the essence and spirit of the law and decided in accordance with them, even against express language; and in so doing they have not found it necessary to overthrow the law, but have made it applicable to the class of persons or the kind of acts clearly contemplated within its scope."

The above language is cited with approval in People v. Earl, 19 Cal. App. 69, 71, 72, 124 P. 887. In that case the defendant was indicted under a section of the Penal Code prohibiting the disclosure by any person of a telegraphic or telephonic message addressed to another, without permission of the addressee. Limiting application of the statute to offenses committed by persons having a duty to perform with respect to the dispatch, transmission, or delivery of such messages, in accordance with the obvious legislative intent, the court said:

> "The function of the courts in construing statutes is not constricted to a view which shall give literal effect to every word and phrase appearing by the letter of the law. In that analysis reason must have its just proportion, and the intent of the lawmakers is to be ascertained by taking into account several considerations, as: The history of the legislation upon the subject treated of, and concurrent legislation affecting the same or closely kindred subjects. The fact that the enforcement of a statute according to its literal import will have the effect of prohibiting otherwise necessary and useful acts may also furnish an entirely sufficient reason for concluding that the intent of its framers was not that it should so operate. Our Supreme Court, in Ex parte Lorenzen, 128 Cal. 431, 79 Am. St. Rep. 47, 50 L. R. A. 55, 61 P. 68, has declared the rule thus: [Citing from said case the language hereinabove quoted.] * * * As an illustration, the old Bologna law, which provided in literal terms for the punishment of a person who should let blood in the streets and which was held not to apply to a barber performing the office of a surgeon, is given, among others. The expression of Mr. Justice Field, used in United States v. Kirby, 7 Wall. 482, 19 L. Ed. 278, is also quoted: 'All laws should receive a sensible construction. General terms should be so limited in their application as not to lead to injustice or oppression or an absurd consequence. It will always be presumed that the Legislature intended exceptions to its language which would avoid results of this character. The reason of the law in such cases should prevail over its letter.' "

The rule is followed in Re Haines, 195 Cal. 605, 612, 613, 234 P. 883, 885, where the court extended the application of the provisions of a penal statute to both classes of prisoners, misdemeanor and felony, although the precise language thereof included only, "Every prisoner charged with or convicted of a felony." It is there said:

> "Matter of Zany, 20 Cal. App. 360, 129 P. 295, is cited by respondent to the effect that a statute should always be so construed as to give a sensible and intelligent meaning to every part, to avoid absurd consequences, and, if possible, so as to make every provision thereof valid and effective. General terms should be so limited in their application as not to lead to an absurd consequence. People v. Earl, 19 Cal. App. 69, 124 P. 887. To arrive at the legislative intent in the interpretation of statutes the original purpose and object of the legislation must be considered. Mackey v. Mott, 25 Cal. App. 110, 142 P. 1082. Statutes must be read and considered in conjunction with the legislative intent and then be liberally construed with the object in view of giving effect to such intent. Odell v. Rihn, 19 Cal. App. 713, 127 P. 802. A construction or conclusion plainly not contemplated by the Legislature should not be given to a statute if it can be avoided. When a statute is fairly susceptible of two constructions, one leading inevitably to mischief or absurdity and the other consisting of sound sense and wise policy, the former should be rejected and the latter adopted. San Joaquin & K. R. C. & I. Co. v. Stevinson, 164 Cal. 221, 128 P. 924.
> "Absurd or unjust results will never be ascribed to the Legislature and it will not be presumed to have used inconsistent provisions as to the same subject in the immediate context. The courts will be astute to avoid such results. Wells Fargo & Co. v. Mayor, etc., of Jersey City [D. C.] 207 F. 871. In the interpretation of statutes courts are not bound by grammatical rules, and may ascertain the meaning of words by the context. Cavender v. Hewitt, 145 Tenn. 471, 22 A. L. R. 755, 239 S. W. 767.
> " 'The mere literal construction of a section in a statute ought not to prevail if it is opposed to the intention of the Legislature apparent by the statute; and if the words are sufficiently flexible to admit of some other construction it is to be adopted to effectuate that intention. The intent prevails over the letter, and the letter will, if possible, be so read as to conform to the spirit of the act. "While the intention of the Legislature must be ascertained from the words used to express it, the manifest reason and the obvious purpose of the law should not be sacrificed to a literal interpretation of such words." Words or clauses may be enlarged or restricted to effectuate the intention or to harmonize them with other expressed provisions. Where general language construed in a broad sense would lead to absurdity it may be restrained. The particular inquiry is not what is the abstract force of the words or what they may comprehend, but in what sense they were intended to be used as they are found in the act.' Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) § 376, p. 721."

In the case of People v. Kaufman, 49 Cal. App. 572, 193 P. 953, defendant was charged with violation of a section of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 409, § 21) requiring the driver of a motorcar which had collided with another to take any one who was riding in the other car to a surgeon upon the request of such person. Holding that the statute should not be so strictly construed against one accused of felony as to make it applicable to the facts of the case, the court said:

> "In the present case the complaining witness was driving alone. With the appellant, in the car he was driving, were four other persons. If none of them was hurt or required medical or surgical treatment, any one of the five in the appellant's car might first have asked the complaining witness for transportation to a surgeon, and he might have been accused of felony if he had said 'there is no reason why I should provide transportation for you.' Upon no reasonable hypothesis can the criminality of either of two actors be made to depend entirely upon which of the two shall first make a request of the other. Every statute must receive reasonable construction, and this is particularly true of statutes defining crimes. 'It is to be remembered that the letter of a penal statute is not of controlling force, and that the courts in construing such statutes, from very ancient times have sought for the essence and spirit of the law and decided in accordance with them, even against express language; and in so doing they have not found it necessary to overthrow the law, but have made it applicable to the class of persons or the kind of acts clearly contemplated within its scope.' Ex parte Lorenzen, 128 Cal. 431, 79 Am. St. Rep. 47, 50 L. R. A. 55, 61 P. 68. 'General terms should be so limited in their application as not to lead to injustice or oppression or an absurd consequence.' People v. Earl, 19 Cal. App. 69–72, 124 P. 887, 888; United States v. Kirby, 7 Wall. [U. S.] 482, 19 L. Ed. 278. See, also, Rose's U. S. Notes."

[2] Applying these principles to the provisions of the statute before us, we do not hesitate to declare the legislative intent to be that contracts of the type here considered should not be exempted from consideration in measuring the amount of the tax imposed. The clear intent of the law was to levy an excise or occupation tax upon distributors of motor vehicle fuel, giving such distributors, however, ample opportunity to fully indemnify themselves by adding the amount of the tax to the selling price of the fuel and thus in effect collect the tax from the consumer. The exemption, in other words, was to be a shield for their protection, but not a sword to be used for gaining a profit from the public. It is admitted in this case that in practical effect the two-cent tax was added to the selling price by respondent and presumably indirectly paid by the consumer.

There is, therefore, no equity in the contention of respondent. We hold the exemption to be inapplicable to any executory contract of sale entered into prior to May 14, 1923, which in terms or in effect permits the distributor to protect himself against operation of the tax by securing a price for the fuel sold which may have as an added constituent factor thereof a sum equivalent to the tax fixed by said statute.

[3] The same result is also reached by holding as we do that to broadly apply the exemption to contracts such as are here in suit would be to create an unwarranted and baseless discrimination in the operation of said statute in that it would confer a benefit upon certain persons and corporations which is denied to others under the same circumstances in violation of article 1, § 11, article 1, § 21, and article 4, § 25, subd. 19, of the Constitution. The statute is prospective in its operation and the tax imposed is measured by completed sales made after its enactment and during its operation. It is a tax measured by completed and not executory sales. All deliveries made under executory contracts which do not fix a selling price are in the same class regardless of the date of execution of such contracts.

[4] It is in no sense an interference with the obligation of a contract to impose a tax upon a future sale to be made thereunder where the seller is given free rein to add to the selling price of such commodity the tax imposed by law. Whether the executory contract of sale in such case be made on one date or another is entirely immaterial. Under the exemption here considered and applied to the contracts before us a sale made thereunder on January 1, 1924, will be exempt, whereas a sale under a contract dated May 15, 1923, identical in all other respects, made at the same time and at the same price will be taxed. The provision of the statute here under consideration could not validly operate, therefore, to effect the object contended for by respondent.

[5, 6] Again, we see no answer to the contention that the exemption set forth was enacted solely for the benefit of the distributor and under the facts here shown respondent by adding the two cents to the selling price of its product estopped itself to claim the benefit of said exemption. Section 3513 of the Civil Code provides:

> "Any one may waive the advantage of a law intended solely for his benefit. * * *"

It has been held many times in this state and the rule is universal that a party may waive the benefits specially conferred upon him by statute or Constitution. 6 Cal. Jur. § 78, p. 120; 5 Cal. Jur. § 55, p. 626; Wells, Fargo & Co. v. Enright, 127 Cal. 669, 60 P. 439, 49 L. R. A. 647; State Loan, etc., Co. v. Cochran, 130 Cal. 245, 62 P. 466, 600; Knarston v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co., 140 Cal. 57, 63, 73 P. 740. When this waiver is made, estoppel to rely on the exemption will arise in any case where it is inequitable or unjust to permit it.

In Maine a statute in the nature of imprisonment for debt exempts a married woman from arrest for tort in an action for damages against her, but it does not exempt a single woman in a like case. In holding that defendant by posing as a feme sole when in fact she was a feme covert waived the exemption, the court in the case of Kalloch v. Elward, 118 Me. 346, 348, 108 A. 256, 258, 8 A. L. R. 750, 752, said:

> "In the case at bar the exemption is created by statute, but there is no reason why the doctrines of waiver and estoppel should not apply and work their legitimate effects the same as if the exemption were created at common law or under the Constitution. A statute cannot stand in the way of waiver or equitable estoppel when the facts demand their application in the interest of justice and right."

Also in Hallowell Nat. Bank v. Marston, 85 Me. 488, 27 A. 529, it is said:

> "A statutory, or even a constitutional, provision, made for one's benefit, is not so sacred that he may not waive it, and, having once waived it, he is estopped from thereafter claiming it."

[7] It seems clear to us, for reasons based upon public policy, if upon no other ground, that respondent may not deny that it has waived the right to rely on the exemption by collecting the equivalent of the tax indirectly from the public. And this must follow, even though by its terms said exemption would otherwise shield and protect it. If it be said that in no event is the state entitled to the tax, the ready answer is that respondent was able to secure this advantage by reason of the statute, and public policy forbids it to deny the full operation of said section 3 of the act under which it is entitled in the absence of an exemption to the tax here claimed.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for plaintiff and against defendant for the sum of $40,822.86, with interest and costs as prayed.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; RICHARDS, J.; SHENK, J.; CURTIS, J.

LANGDON, J. I dissent. There is no uncertainty or ambiguity in the language of the statute under consideration, and consequently, no occasion for judicial construction. Such statute provides that—

> It "shall not be held or construed to apply to * * * (c) any motor vehicle fuel delivered under contracts entered into prior to the fourteenth day of May, 1923. * * *"

The Legislature may have had in mind, as contended by the Attorney General, only contracts providing a fixed price for fuel, but it has not so restricted the term and to amend the statute by judicial construction seems to me an usurpation of legislative power which is unjustified even in the interests of public policy.

PEOPLE v. GENERAL PETROLEUM CORPORATION. (S. F. 11940.)

1. Licenses 🔑16(9)—Exemption provision of gasoline tax act held inapplicable to executory contracts of sale permitting distributor to add tax to fuel sold (Gasoline Tax Act 1923, § 10).

Provision of Gasoline Tax Act 1923 (St. 1923, p. 571) § 10, exempting from tax any motor vehicle fuel delivered under contract entered into prior to May 14, 1923, held inapplicable to executory contracts of sale entered into prior to such date, which in terms or in effect permits the distributor to protect himself against operation of the tax by securing a price for the fuel sold which may have as an added constituent factor thereof a sum equivalent to tax fixed by the statute.

2. Statutes 🔑121(1)—Title of Gasoline Tax Act held not defective, in that subject-matter is not suggested (Gasoline Tax Act 1923).

Title of Gasoline Tax Act 1923 (St. 1923, p. 571) in part reading "An act to regulate and license the business * * *" held not defective, in that the subject-matter thereof is not suggested therein nor thereby.

3. Constitutional law 🔑43(1)—State held not estopped from asserting that construction of exemption provision of Gasoline Tax Act to apply to executory contract permitting distributor to add tax to selling price would be unconstitutional (Gasoline Tax Act 1923, § 10).

The tax imposed by Gasoline Tax Act 1923 (St. 1923, p. 571) being of a flat one measured by volume of sale, and if state does not get its quota of revenue, there being no way to recoup loss by such method of taxation, state is not estopped to assert that construction of exemption provisions of section 10 so as to apply to executory contracts permitting distributor to add tax to selling price would violate certain provisions of Constitution.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by the People against the General Petroleum Corporation to recover gasoline tax. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank L. Guerena, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

A. L. Weil, of San Francisco, and Salisbury & McNeil and Verne E. Robinson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. [1] The state in this action sues defendant for the two-cent tax levied under the provisions of the Gasoline Tax Act of 1923 (Stats. 1923, c. 267, p. 571), and measures the amount of the claim by the sale during the second quarter of the year 1924 by defendant of 6,945,356 gallons of motor vehicle fuel, the sum demanded being $10,749.10, together with interest and costs. The record is presented upon an agreed statement of facts. The sole question is the applicability of the exemption provision found in section 10 of said act, which reads as follows:

> "The provisions of this act requiring the payment of license fees shall not be held or construed to apply to * * * any motor vehicle fuel delivered under contracts entered into prior to the fourteenth day of May, 1923. * * *"

The executory contracts under which the sales here involved were made contained the following provision:

> "* * * Any internal revenue tax, impost, custom duties, or other charge or tax of any kind created or increased during the life of this contract and levied by governmental authority on any matter connected with this contract, or on the performance thereof, or on the product sold thereby, shall be added to the purchase price and shall be paid by the second party while same is in effect."

This case is ruled by the case of People v. Ventura Refining Co., 268 P. 347, this day determined. It is true that respondent urges that the tax is upon executory sales and not upon executed sales and that the word "sold" in section 3 of the act should be so construed; and from this it is argued that the tax period begins with contracts made on and after September 30, 1923, thus excluding the contracts in question. But we have held otherwise in said cause above cited and see no reason to place such construction upon the act, which, considered as a whole, compels the contrary conclusion.

The further contention that in other cases existing contracts made prior to the passage of the act have been made a legal basis for a classification between such contracts and contracts made subsequent to the act argues nothing of a conclusive character here. The holding here made is that the nature of the contracts before us does not furnish a sufficient reason for a separate classification. Other contracts could well be drawn which would furnish a reason for such a classification, but the contracts before us are not of that type.

[2] The contention that the title of the act is defective, in that the subject-matter thereof is not suggested therein or thereby, we deem unnecessary to discuss, as the title "An act to regulate and license the business * * *" answers this contention amply and should satisfy even the most hypercritical mind.

[3] The same remarks must be applied to the contention that the state is estopped to assert that the construction of the exemption in the manner claimed by respondent would violate certain well-understood safeguards found in the Constitution. The tax is a fat one, measured by the volume of sales, and, if the state does not get its quota of revenue, there is no way to recoup the loss by this method of taxation upon this industry. If the state may not have the standing granted to other litigants in like circumstances, it might be severely hampered in its operation of the various departments thereof. The case of San Francisco v. McGovern, 28 Cal. App. 491, 152 P. 980, is not in point.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a judgment for plaintiff against the defendant for the sum of $10,749.10, together with interest and costs of suit as set forth in the stipulation of facts.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; RICHARDS, J.; SHENK, J.; CURTIS, J.

LANGDON, J. I dissent. There is no uncertainty or ambiguity in the language of the statute under consideration, and, consequently, no occasion for judicial construction. Such statute provides that—

> It "shall not be held or construed to apply to * * * (c) any motor vehicle fuel delivered under contracts entered into prior to the fourteenth day of May, 1923. * * *"

The Legislature may have had in mind, as contended by the Attorney General, only contracts providing a fixed price for fuel, but it has not so restricted the term, and to amend the statute by judicial construction seems to me an usurpation of legislative power which is unjustified even in the interests of public policy.

On Petition for Rehearing June 29, 1928.

1. Licenses 🔑16(9)—Exemption provision of Gasoline Tax Act held inapplicable to executory contracts of sale permitting distributor to add tax to fuel sold (Gasoline Tax Act, § 10).

Provision of Gasoline Tax Act (St. 1923, p. 571) § 10, exempting from tax any motor vehicle fuel delivered under contract entered into prior to May 14, 1923, held inapplicable to executory contracts of sale entered into prior to such date, which in terms or in effect permit the distributor to protect himself against operation of the tax by securing a price for the fuel sold which may have as an added constituent factor thereof a sum equivalent to tax fixed by the statute.

PRESTON, J. On the authority of People v. Ventura Refining Co., 268 P. 347, this day decided, the judgment in this cause must be affirmed.

The contracts here involved are summarized by appellant as follows:

> "Class A agreements, where the purchaser agrees to purchase and the Richfield Oil Company agrees to sell the entire requirements of the purchaser in his business for a period of one or more years, and daily thereafter until the agreement is canceled by either party upon a 90 days' written notice of cancellation to the other. The price of the motor vehicle fuel sold thereunder was to be cash paid on delivery, 3 cents per United States gallon under the retail market price as maintained by the Standard Oil Company of California in the city of Los Angeles at the time of delivery.
> "Class B agreements are in general in the same form as those of class A, except that the agreement of this type has no fixed term or period, but remains in effect from the date of execution thereof until the same is canceled by either party upon a 90 days' written notice of cancellation to the other. Price provisions are the same.
> "Class C agreements, where the buyer purchases from the Richfield Oil Company certain property and equipment used in the ordinary gasoline station, such as pumps, tanks, piping, etc. The purchaser under this agreement agrees to pay for such property or equipment in installments running over a period of 10 months or more, the purchaser agreeing, during which period and until the property is paid for, to use said property and equipment exclusively for the purpose of storing, distributing, and vending petroleum products which may be sold or furnished to him by the Richfield Oil Company, and also agrees, during all of said time, to regularly handle and sell or offer for sale through and by means of said property and equipment such petroleum products sold and furnished to him by said Richfield Oil Company. In this type of agreement there is no provision regarding the purchase price of the motor vehicle fuel to be sold and delivered thereunder."

[1] These contracts are even more flexible as to price than those considered in the case above noted. In fact, one set of the contracts has no price feature of any kind. The market price controls in all of them and this price, of course, reflects the two-cent tax. This is conceded by appellant; hence there is no basis for a different holding.

[2] In answer to the claim of the state that to allow the broad construction contended for by appellant would be to allow an unjust discrimination between persons of the same class, appellant replies that, this being an excise and not a property tax, certain constitutional provisions are inapplicable here. But the constitutional provisions invoked (article 1, § 11; article 1, § 21; and article 4, § 25, subd. 19) apply as well to a statute imposing an excise tax as to any other. In re Richardson, 170 Cal. 68, 73, 148 P. 213.

LANGDON, J. I dissent. There is no uncertainty or ambiguity in the language of the statute under consideration, and, consequently, no occasion for judicial construction. Such statute provides that—

It "shall not be held or construed to apply to * * * (c) any motor vehicle fuel delivered under contracts entered into prior to the fourteenth day of May, 1923. * * *" St. 1923, p. 571, § 10.

The Legislature may have had in mind, as contended by the Attorney General, only contracts providing a fixed price for fuel, but it has not so restricted the term, and to amend the statute by judicial construction seems to me an usurpation of legislative power which is unjustified even in the interests of public policy.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. On petition for rehearing herein it is urged that this court has erroneously "assumed that there were two types of contracts in existence, i. e., contracts having (a) a fixed sales price, and (b) a flexible sales price"; whereas, it is insisted, "it is apparent from the record, either directly or by necessary inference, that the so-called fixed price contracts do not exist." It is therefore contended that a conclusion cannot be drawn that the Legislature had in mind two types of contracts and by its action intended to provide only for a fixed price contract.

Assuming that the record is susceptible to the construction placed upon it by counsel, namely, that only flexible sales contracts were in existence at the effective date of the act, the correctness of the conclusion that the contractors thereunder would be in no different situation so far as the license tax was concerned than those having no contracts outstanding is further emphasized. The opportunity of those in each class to protect themselves against the burden of the license tax was the same. The operation of the law with the exemption in it would therefore confer upon those attempted to be exempted a special privilege or immunity not accorded to others similarly situated. The exemption, then, would effect an unlawful discrimination as between those in the same class and would be void under section 21 of article 1 of the Constitution. See Bacon Service Corporation v. Huss, 199 Cal. 21, 248 P. 235. The fact that the unlawful exemption was stricken from the statute by later enactment of the Legislature could not affect the petitioner's obligations under the act with the void exemption in it.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. RICHFIELD OIL COMPANY, a Corporation, Defendant and Appellant. (L. A. 8980.)

The contracts here are identical with the contracts considered in the case last above cited. The only reason for separate appeals in the two cases was that in one of them the question arose as to when the appellant should have claimed the exemption; but, in view of our conclusions announced in these cases, this question becomes immaterial.

PER CURIAM. GOLDEN GATE FERRY CO. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA. (S. F. 12388.)

1. Ferries 🔑15—Railroad abandoning carrying vehicles on ferry for over 32 years held not obligated to render such service as regards necessity of securing certificate of convenience and necessity (Public Utilities Act, § 50 (d), as amended by St. 1923, p. 836).

Where railroad company had abandoned ferry on which it carried vehicles for period in excess of 32 years, though it operated boats for transportation of passengers carried on its trains, held, that there was no obligation on part of company to render service for vehicles, and no right in public to insist on receiving it as regards necessity of company to secure certificate of convenience and necessity, under Public Utilities Act (St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 18, as amended) § 50 (d), as amended St. 1923, p. 836, to operate vehicular ferry.

2. Statutes 🔑184—Court must construe ambiguous act with reference to purposes sought to be served.

Where it is apparent that act under consideration is not clear and definite, it becomes duty of court to construe same with reference to purposes sought to be served and public policy underlying the legislation.

3. Ferries 🔑15—Railroad operating passenger ferry on effective date of act could not operate vehicular ferry over different route without certificate of public convenience and necessity; "operating vessels in good faith" (Public Utilities Act, § 50 (d), as amended by St. 1923, p. 836).

Under Public Utilities Act (St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 18, as amended) § 50 (d), as amended by St. 1923, p. 836, providing no corporation shall operate vessels between points exclusively on inland waters of state without first having obtained from Railroad Commission certificate declaring public convenience and necessity, unless corporation is actually operating vessels in good faith at time act became effective, "operating vessels in good faith" means operating them in essential and inherent features of service sought to be continued after effective date of act, hence railroad company operating ferry for passengers transported over its railroad on effective date of act was not entitled to operate vehicular ferry over a different route and to render a different class of service without certificate of public convenience and necessity.

4. Ferries ⟹15—Ferry passenger carrier must secure certificate of convenience and necessity to operate vehicular ferry, though filing tariff therefor; "addition of commodity to passenger traffic" (Public Utilities Act, § 50 (d), as amended St. 1923, p. 836).

Where railroad company was engaged in operating ferry for transportation only of passengers transported over its railroad, and it had no tariff on file for transportation of freight of any kind, filing of tariff for operation of vehicular ferry having no connection with operation of railroad service held not addition of commodity to passenger tariff, precluding necessity of securing certificate of convenience and necessity to operate vehicular ferry, under Public Utilities Act (St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 18, as amended) § 50 (d), as amended by St. 1923, p. 836.

Application by the Golden Gate Ferry Company for certiorari to review an order of the Railroad Commission declaring that the Southern Pacific Company was not required to secure a certificate of public convenience and necessity for adding additional facilities to its existing ferry service. LANGDON, J. This is an application for a writ of review. The petitioner, the Golden Gate Ferry Company, alleges that it was and now is engaged in the business of operating a public ferry for which tolls are charged for the transportation of passengers and self-propelled and other vehicles on, over, and across the waters of the San Francisco Bay; that it is the owner and in the possession of a franchise granted by the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco authorizing the establishment, operation, and maintenance of a public ferry between points in the said city and county of San Francisco and the city of Alameda, county of Alameda; that on the 26th day of March, 1926, petitioner filed its application with the Railroad Commission of the state of California, pursuant to the provisions of section 50d of the Public Utilities Act (Stats. [Ex. Sess.] 1911, p. 18, and amendments thereto), requesting said commission to issue and grant to petitioner a certificate of public convenience and necessity to operate vessels between the city of San Francisco and the city of Alameda; that a hearing was had thereon by said commission, but no decision or order has as yet been made or rendered therein; that on or about September 3, 1926, the Southern Pacific Company, a railroad corporation, commenced the operation of a public vehicular ferry between a point within the city of San Francisco and a point within the city of Alameda; that in commencing said vehicular ferry service between said points, the Southern Pacific Company for the first time put into operation between said cities an entirely new, different, and distinct type of vessel, namely, that type of vessel which is designated as a vehicular ferry; that vessels of such construction and type had never theretofore been operated by said Southern Pacific Company between any points in San Francisco and Alameda; that on July 15, 1926, and prior to its operation of said vehicular ferry between San Francisco and Alameda, the Southern Pacific Company filed with the respondent commission an amendment to its tariff schedules, naming rates for vehicular ferry service between, among other points, San Francisco and the Alameda pier; that said amendment was the first filing by the Southern Pacific Company of any rate for vehicular ferry service between any point in San Francisco and any point in Alameda; that prior to said amendment the Southern Pacific Company had no rate on file with the respondent commission or any tariff applicable to the transportation of vehicles between any point in San Francisco and said Alameda pier, or any other point in Alameda; that said Southern Pacific Company has never received or petitioned for or in any manner sought from the respondent commission a certificate of public convenience and necessity to operate vessels in vehicular ferry service between San Francisco and the Alameda pier or any vehicular ferry service between the city of San Francisco and the city of Alameda; that there has never issued to the Southern Pacific Company nor to any of its lessees or subsidiaries any such certificate of public convenience and necessity as required by the provisions of section 50d of the Public Utilities Act, and said Southern Pacific Company is without lawful right, authority, or privilege to operate said or any vessels for automobiles or other vehicular ferry service between the city of San Francisco and the said city of Alameda; that the Southern Pacific Company had not for a period of 32 years prior to September 3, 1926, engaged in the transportation of vehicles between any point in the city of San Francisco and the city of Alameda; that the respondent commission, of its own motion, instituted a proceeding having for its purpose an investigation into the construction of facilities and the rendering of a vehicular ferry service by the Southern Pacific Company between said two points without first having obtained a certificate of public convenience and necessity; that the respondent commission permitted the petitioners herein to intervene in said proceeding as an interested party; that petitioner has been and now is an interested party in said proceeding and in the action, determination, and decision therein; that the respondent commission on the 17th day of December, 1926, made, rendered, and filed its opinion and order, concurred in by a majority of its members, declaring, in effect, that the Southern Pacific Company was and is not required to secure a certificate of public convenience and necessity under the provisions of section 50d of the Public Utilities Act, authorizing it to inaugurate a vehicular ferry service between the city of San Francisco and the Alameda pier; that thereafter and within 20 days from the making of said order and decision the petitioner herein filed with the respondent commission its petition for rehearing, which said petition was denied on January 6, 1927; that the majority opinion and order of the respondent commission, declaring that the Southern Pacific Company was and is not required to secure a certificate of public convenience and necessity under section 50d of the Public Utilities Act for the operation of a vehicular ferry service between the city of San Francisco and the city of Alameda, is illegal, void, and in excess of the jurisdiction of the respondent commission. Wherefore the petitioner prays that this court enter its decree and judgment annulling and setting aside the majority opinion and order of the respondent commission referred to above.

The sole question presented in this proceeding for a review of said order revolves about the interpretation to be given to section 50d of the Public Utilities Act, as amended in 1923 (Stats. 1923, pp. 834, 836). The section reads:

> "No corporation or person, their lessees, trustees, receivers or trustees appointed by any court whatsoever, shall hereafter operate or cause to be operated, any vessel between points exclusively on the inland waters of this state, without first having obtained from the railroad commission a certificate declaring that present or future public convenience and necessity require or will require, such operation, but no such certificate shall be required of any corporation or person which is actually operating vessels in good faith, at the time this act becomes effective, between points exclusively on the inland waters of this state under tariffs and schedules of such corporations or persons, lawfully on file with the Railroad Commission."

It is contended by the Southern Pacific Company that its operation is and has been such as to bring it within the exemption contained in section 50d; that is to say, it is urged by said company that on August 16, 1923, the effective date of section 50d of the Public Utilities Act, it was operating vessels in good faith between points exclusively on the inland waters of this state and more particularly between the city and county of San Francisco and the Alameda pier, under tariffs and schedules lawfully on file with the respondent commission. In view of the existence of these facts, it is urged by the Southern Pacific Company that it may properly operate and maintain, by virtue of the exemption provision found in section 50d a public vehicular ferry service between said points without first acquiring from the respondent commission a certificate of public convenience and necessity.

Petitioner contends, on the other hand, that the operation of a vehicular ferry service by the Southern Pacific Company between San Francisco and the Alameda pier does not fall within the exemption provided for in said section 50d, for "that section exempted any existing operator from the necessity of obtaining a certificate of public convenience and necessity for any operations being conducted in good faith on that date, or for the exercise of any rights being exercised on that date, but did not exempt any operator from securing a certificate of public convenience and necessity for the commencement of any new operations not theretofore being conducted or for the exercise of any rights not theretofore being exercised."

[1] It is undisputed that for a period in excess of 32 years preceding September 3, 1926, Southern Pacific Company operated no vessels between any point in Alameda and any point in the city and county of San Francisco, except for the transportation of passengers carried on its trains. Prior to 1894 said company operated vessels which were used to transport vehicles between its Alameda pier and a point in San Francisco. In December, 1894, however, the plank road along the Alameda pier was torn up and since that time and until a new road was built in 1926 no service was offered to the public by Southern Pacific Company for the transportation of vehicles between any point in Alameda and any point in San Francisco. It is apparent, therefore, that whatever service the Southern Pacific Company or its predecessors may heretofore have offered to the public in the way of vehicular transportation between Alameda and San Francisco was abandoned. It would seem to follow that, after such service was abandoned, the obligation to render it ceased and the right of the public to insist upon it was terminated. A similar situation was presented in the case of Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Co. v. Railroad Commission, 173 Cal. 577, 160 P. 828. There railroad service between two points had been discontinued for about 20 years. A complaint was filed with the Railroad Commission to require the re-establishment of that service. The commission made an order requiring the railroad company to re-establish the service. Upon appeal, it was held that the commission acted beyond its jurisdiction, the following language being used:

> "Nor is the fact that a railroad line had once existed between Fallbrook and Temecula a factor of any moment in the present inquiry. No question is made of the authority of the Railroad Commission to compel a railroad company or other public utility to restore a service which it has been furnishing. Here, however, the line between Fallbrook and Temecula had been destroyed for about 20 years before the action of the commission was invoked, and, indeed, before the enactment of the law upon which the commission relies for its authority to act. It is expressly found that 'that portion of the line was left abandoned and service discontinued. It has remained abandoned ever since.' In view of this fact, it cannot be doubted that any obligation of the predecessor of the Santa Fé Company to maintain and operate the line from Fallbrook to Temecula had long since ceased (Public Service Com. v. Philadelphia, etc., Ry. Co., 122 Md. 438 [89 A. 726]), and that no such obligation ever rested upon the Santa Fé Company itself. The duty to maintain the line was dependent upon the right to maintain it, and this right was lost by abandonment (Home Real Estate Co. v. Los Angeles Pac. Co., 163 Cal. 710 [126 P. 972]), without regard to the question whether it had been forfeited under the provisions of section 468 of the Civil Code. The case must therefore stand precisely as it would if there had never been any connection between these two points."

Likewise, in the instant case, it would appear that vehicular service between the points in question having been abandoned by Southern Pacific Company and its predecessors, there was no obligation upon the part of the company to render it and no right in the public to insist upon receiving it.

[2, 3] Nor can it be said that a certificate of public convenience and necessity was unnecessary to inaugurate this service because the Southern Pacific Company was "actually operating vessels in good faith under tariffs and schedules lawfully on file with the Railroad Commission," within the meaning of the Public Utilities Act. The briefs on file herein present three possible interpretations of the language just quoted: One, a legislative purpose to exempt a corporation operating vessels in any type of service on the inland waters of this state from securing a certificate; two, a legislative purpose to exempt a corporation that is operating a similar service to the one sought to be inaugurated from securing such a certificate; and, three, a legislative purpose to exempt a corporation that is operating, at the time the act becomes effective, a service which is later to be continued, from securing such certificate.

We are of the opinion that the third alternative is the one which was intended by the Legislature, i. e., that a corporation is exempted from obtaining the certificate if it was, at the effective date of the act, actually operating a service in all respects substantially the same as the service to be rendered after the act became effective. Since it is apparent that the section of the act under consideration is not clear and definite in expressing any of the above-suggested alternatives, it becomes the duty of this court to construe the same with reference to the purposes sought to be served and the public policy underlying the legislation. An examination of the entire act under consideration evinces a determined purpose to give to the Railroad Commission power to regulate transportation on the inland waters of the state by granting or refusing certificates of public convenience and necessity, and a construction of the act, such as contended for by respondents, so as to exempt any person or corporation from applying for such a certificate if he or it has been operating any type of vessel in any type of service before the act became operative, would leave with the Railroad Commission but a semblance of power, and to construe the act so as to exempt a corporation from securing a certificate to carry freight if it had previously carried freight over a different route, but one comparable in some of its features to the new route sought, would be to give an elasticity to the language and the action to be taken under it which would result in confusion and litigation and impotency on the part of the commission. The safe, definite rule, and the one supported by the reason and purpose of the Public Utilities Act, would seem to us to be to construe the language "operating vessels in good faith" to mean operating them in good faith in the essential and inherent features of the service sought to be continued after the effective date of the act. It seems apparent from the admitted facts that the Southern Pacific Company was not operating such a service at the date mentioned. A different type of vessel is to be used by the Southern Pacific Company from that used at the date of the act; a different route is to be taken, and a different class of service rendered.

The Legislature, in 1917, enacted a statute regulating transportation by automobile stage (Stats. 1917, p. 330, as amended in 1919 [Stats. 1919, p. 457]), and therein relieved from the necessity of obtaining a certificate of public convenience and necessity companies actually operating in good faith at that time. The exemption portion of the statute was construed by this court in the case of Motor Transit Co. v. Railroad Commission, 189 Cal. 573, 209 P. 586, the court saying:

> "The purpose in so exempting such companies was to refrain from interfering with the operations as then carried on—in other words, to confirm in these operators the rights they were at that time exercising. But such exemption was, obviously, only to the extent of the operations then conducted. To hold that by the operation of a through line on that date petitioners were given a franchise to operate to any extent that they, in their judgment, might see fit, limited solely by the restriction that the operations must be between the same termini and over the same route, would be to materially decrease the power of the commission over these lines and thus overlook the primary purpose of the enactment which was to give to the commission, in the interest of the public, the fullest power possible to regulate the operation of auto stage companies."

[4] We see no essential legal distinction between the portion of the statute considered in the last-cited case and the portion of the statute under consideration here. Nor can we agree with respondents that the filing of a tariff amendment to the creek route vehicular tariff is the addition of a commodity to the Alameda passenger tariff. The tariff which was amended covered no service whatever between any point in the city of San Francisco and any point in the city of Alameda. At the time of the tariff amendment the Southern Pacific Company was engaged in the operation of vessels between Alameda pier and the Ferry building in San Francisco for the transportation only of passengers transported over its railroad. It had no tariff on file for the transportation of any freight of any kind whatever. The operation of a vehicular ferry has no connection with the operation of a railroad service. It is in no way an adjunct of the railroad operation. A vehicular service could just as well be rendered by a corporation which had no rights whatever to operate a railroad. The Southern Pacific Company, in another action, successfully maintained this contention before this court. Southern Pac. Co. v. Richardson, 181 Cal. 280, 184 P. 3.

The order of the respondent Railroad Commission filed herein is annulled.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; RICHARDS, J.; SEAWELL, J.; CURTIS, J.; SHENK, J.

PRESTON, J. I concur in the judgment, but prefer to base my conclusion upon the following grounds: This proceeding requires the court to declare the legislative mind when enacting on the 15th day of June, 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 834), subdivision (d) of section 50 of the Public Utilities Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, pt. 2, p. 2683, tit. 464), which reads in part:

> "No corporation or person, their lessees, trustees, receivers or trustees appointed by any court whatsoever, shall hereafter operate or cause to be operated, any vessel between points exclusively on the inland waters of this state, without first having obtained from the Railroad Commission a certificate declaring that present or future public convenience and necessity require or will require, such operation. * * *"

—together with the following exception, or proviso:

> "* * * But no such certificate shall be required of any corporation or person which is actually operating vessels in good faith, at the time this act becomes effective, between points exclusively on the inland waters of this state under tariffs and schedules of such corporations or persons lawfully on file with the Railroad Commission."

The effective date of this amendment was August 16, 1923. Our particular task lies in declaring the scope and meaning of said proviso as applied to the following undisputed facts: The Southern Pacific Company, a Kentucky corporation, on the effective date of said amendment, was operating across San Francisco Bay, inland waters of the state of California, a motor vehicular ferry service between San Francisco and a point at the foot of Broadway in Oakland, Cal., situated upon the north bank of a stream commonly called San Antonio estuary, being navigable waters leading into San Francisco Bay. This ferry was known as the Oakland creek route ferry. It was also operating at the same time a line of vessels between a point on the San Francisco shore of said bay and a point on the opposite shore known as Alameda mole, said mole forming in fact the southern bank of said San Antonio estuary, the center line of which said estuary marks the dividing line between the municipalities of Oakland and Alameda. This Alameda line of vessels, however, was not used as a general ferry, but was used exclusively as an extension of the suburban railway system of said corporation. Said Southern Pacific Company on said date had a set of one-way and commutation passenger tariffs on file with the Railroad Commission of the state, but it had no commodity tariffs on file for service between said points. It carried no passengers who were not to use or who had not used its railway lines. Its service at that point connected with no highways, nor was there any highway at all leading from the Alameda mole to the mainland. It possessed no local ferry franchises either from the city and county of San Francisco or from the county of Alameda nor from any municipality for such operation. The public who had vehicles or animals or baggage to transport across said bay neither had the right to demand ferriage nor to have access to said vessels. As above stated, said company carried passengers for its interurban service only. It bases no claim to operate upon any franchise conferred by statute, but bases its claim to operate solely upon its charter rights as a railway corporation and such rights as it may have from usage or prescription.

On July 15, 1926, said Southern Pacific Company proceeded to file an amendment to its commodity tariffs theretofore applicable only to the said Oakland creek ferry so as to include vehicular service to Alameda mole and thereafter and on or about August 15, 1926, prepared to operate a motor vehicular ferry line from San Francisco across said bay to Alameda mole. Such action on its part was stayed by injunction proceedings until on or about September 3, 1926, when it began to operate said ferry service and presumably now continues to operate it. Immediately thereafter the Railroad Commission of the state of California on its own initiative began an investigation pursuant to said section 50 of the Public Utilities Act, supra. Petitioner, the Golden Gate Ferry Company, a corporation, was allowed to intervene in said action. The basis of the investigation was the failure of the Southern Pacific Company to seek or to obtain from the Railroad Commission of the state of California a certificate declaring that present or future public convenience required such vehicular service to be inaugurated and this failure furnishes the immediate grounds for the controversy before us.

The Railroad Commission, however, after investigation, decided that the action of the Southern Pacific Company in establishing this service between San Francisco and Alameda mole was legal and regular and within the said exemption and gave and made its order dispensing with the requirement that such company should obtain said certificate by dismissing the proceeding. The intervener, having secured a franchise from the city and county of San Francisco for a similar service, instituted this proceeding by a petition for certiorari and thereby attacks the validity of said order of the Railroad Commission and seeks to have the said order annulled as being in excess of the jurisdiction of the commission, and to that end to have this court declare that under the undisputed facts shown by the record the Southern Pacific Company is required by law to obtain such certificate before it can validly exercise the right to conduct such vehicular ferry service.

The task is not free from difficulty. The proviso in question is far from being clear and definite because of the general terms employed. At the outset it must be observed that no good reason appears for concluding that the Legislature intended to unduly expand the scope of said exemption. The evident purpose was to place within the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission complete supervision over this type of public utility without disturbing privileges in the nature of vested rights theretofore held by others.

This court in Motor Transit Co. v. Railroad Commission, 189 Cal. 573, 580 and 585, 209 P. 586, 589, had before it the construction of legislation enacted in 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 330), as amended in 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 457), regulating transportation by automobile or auto stage and, in speaking of the purpose of it, said:

> "It is in the interest of the public that the service rendered by public utilities be adequate and of good quality and the rates as low as possible commensurate with good service and a reasonable return to the owner. The certificate of public convenience and necessity is the means whereby protection is given to the utility rendering adequate service at a reasonable rate against ruinous competition. The person or corporation obtaining a certificate must operate at the times and in the manner prescribed by such certificate, thus furnishing uniform and efficient service to the public. If any one else would be at liberty to operate without such a certificate he might operate at his own pleasure and only under favorable conditions, thus making it impossible for the holder of a certificate to successfully carry on his business. It is the public interest in efficient service which is being safeguarded by the requirement of a certificate. Oro Electric Corp. v. Railroad Commission, 169 Cal. 466, 475, 147 P. 118; Public Utilities v. Garviloch, 54 Utah, 406, 181 P. 272, P. U. R. 1919E, p. 182. Such requirement is part of the regulation of transportation companies in the interest of the public. * * *
> "The primary purpose of the Legislature in enacting this statute was not to confer a franchise upon the operating companies but to give into the power of the commission for regulation and control in the interest of the public the operation of auto stages for transportation. It did this by requiring every auto transportation company to secure from the commission a certificate of public convenience and necessity. It relieved from the necessity of obtaining such certificate the companies actually operating in good faith at that time. The purpose in so exempting such companies was to refrain from interfering with the operations as then carried on—in other words, to confirm in these operators the rights they were at that time exercising. But such exemption was, obviously, only to the extent of the operations then conducted. To hold that by the operation of a through line on that date petitioners were given a franchise to operate to any extent that they, in their judgment, might see fit, limited solely by the restriction that the operations must be between the same termini and over the same route, would be to materially decrease the power of the commission over these lines and thus overlook the primary purpose of the enactment which was to give to the commission, in the interest of the public, the fullest power possible to regulate the operation of auto stage companies."

Passing now to a consideration of the language of the exemption before us, it is to be noted that the legislation concerning automobile transportation exemption above noted was provided by language as follows, to wit:

> "* * * But no such certificate shall be required of any transportation company as to the fixed termini between which or the route over which it is actually operating in good faith at the time this act becomes effective." Stats. 1919, p. 457.

In the year 1927 (Stats. 1927, p. 240) the entire section (section 50) here under consideration was amended, subdivision (d) thereof being changed to read in part as follows:

> "No corporation or person, their lessees, trustees, receivers or trustees appointed by any court whatsoever, shall hereafter begin to operate or cause to be operated any vessel for the transportation of persons or property, for compensation, between points exclusively on the inland waters of this state, without first having obtained from the Railroad Commission a certificate declaring that public convenience and necessity require such operation, but no such certificate shall be required as to termini between which any such corporation or person is actually operating vessels in good faith at the time this act becomes effective, under tariffs and schedules of such corporations or persons, lawfully on file with the Railroad Commission. * * *" (Italics ours.)

A careful consideration of these three enactments of the Legislature convinces us that in principle they are the same. Indeed, we are unable to discover any difference whatever in meaning between the provision of section 50 as enacted in 1923 and the paragraph as re-enacted in 1927. To our mind both said provisions should receive a construction analogous to that received by the automobile transportation section construed in Motor Transit Co. v. Railroad Commission, supra, for it is evident from the context of the proviso that the exemption granted is not personal.

It is equally clear that the word "vessel" confers no special right on any particular craft as such, but that said word is to receive the same construction found in the introductory provision of the Public Utilities Act which is as follows (Deering's Gen. Laws, pt. 2, p. 2688, subd. (y) of section 2, Act 6386):

> "The term 'vessel,' when used in this act, includes every species of water craft, by whatsoever power operated, which is owned, controlled, operated or managed for public use in the transportation of persons or property. * * *"

The manifest meaning, then, of said proviso, as compelled by the context of the enactment, is that the Legislature intended to exempt from the requirement of said certificate the service or operation evidenced by water craft engaged in the independent public use of transporting persons or property; in other words, commerce upon the inland waters as an independent enterprise. The words "between points exclusively on the inland waters of this state" mean definite fixed points at which vessels in service actually call.

Petitioner contends, as we understand it, that the word "vessel" used in said proviso is equivalent to the use of the word "ferry." We think the word has a broader significance, and although it includes a ferry, it also includes water craft service not properly covered by the word "ferry." For taxation purposes a ferryboat has been defined as follows:

> "A ferryboat is a vessel traversing across any of the waters of the state, between two constant points, regularly employed for the transfer of passengers and freight, authorized by law so to do. * * *" Pol. Code, § 3643.

It has been held in other jurisdictions, however, that intermediate points may be visited by the vessel and it will still retain its characteristics as a ferryboat. Mayor of N. Y. v. N. J., etc., Co., 106 N. Y. 28, 31, 12 N. E. 435.

In Vallejo Ferry Co. v. Solano Aquatic Club, 165 Cal. 255, 271, 131 P. 864, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 1917, a ferry has been defined and, citing said definition, the characteristics are again set forth as follows in Menzel Estate Co. v. City of Redding, 178 Cal. 475, 479, 174 P. 48, 49:

> "Undoubtedly a ferry franchise has been so called, as for example, in the opinion of this court, prepared by Mr. Justice Henshaw, in Vallejo Ferry Co. v. Solano Aquatic Club, 165 Cal. 255, where, at page 271 (Ann. Cas. 1914C, 1197, 131 P. 864 [871]), the following language is used: 'A ferry franchise emanating from the supreme power of the state or its authorized mandatories, is a grant to a named person empowering him to continue an interrupted land highway over the interrupting waters.' In 19 Cyc. 493, cited by appellants, a ferry is called 'a public highway,' but with an important limitation. The definition there given (beginning on page 492), so far as of value to this discussion, is as follows: 'A ferry is a liberty to have a boat upon a river for the transportation of men, horses, and carriages with their contents, for a reasonable toll. The term is also used to designate the place where such liberty is exercised. In the latter sense a ferry is a public highway, being a continuation of the highway with which it connects.'" See 25 C. J. 1048.

An early definition of ferriage was given in People v. S. F. & A. R. R. Co., 35 Cal. 606, 619, as follows:

> "A ferry, in its ordinary sense, is but a substitute for a bridge where a bridge is impracticable, and its end and use is the same. Like a tollbridge, it is a franchise created for the use and convenience of the traveling public, as a link in the highway system of the country, and by no means includes the transportation of goods, wares, and merchandise by themselves, or, in other words, the carrying trade of modern commerce."

From these definitions of the words "ferry," "ferryboat," and "ferriage," it is evident that the word "vessel" covers a much broader field and should be held to include commerce on the inland waters of the state.

We are also convinced that the intention of this proviso was to exempt commerce upon the inland waters of the state which was being carried on between fixed points and which commerce was such as could be made the subject of franchises granted by a county or municipality within the state. In granting franchises, for example (Pol. Code, § 2892), the applicant is required to show "the landings of the proposed ferry," and "if the applicant is not the owner of the land, that notice of the application has been served on the owner thereof at least ten days prior to the application." Indeed, other provisions of said section 50 indicate this fact by the use of the following words of subdivision (e):

> "The Legislature hereby declares that the provisions of this section are being enacted under the state's reserved power over public utilities or corporations, or both, as the case may be, for the purpose of acting on the right of the grantee of a public utility franchise granted by a county, city and county or incorporated city or town, to exercise rights thereunder, and not for the purpose of acting on the right of any city and county or incorporated city or town to grant any such franchise. The Legislature hereby declares that the provisions of this section shall be and remain in full force and effect concurrently with the right of any city and county or incorporated city or town to grant franchises for public utilities upon the terms and conditions and in the manner prescribed by law."

That fixed points are contemplated is also evidenced by use of these words in subdivision (d):

> "Every applicant for such a certificate shall file in the office of the commission, application and evidence in such form as shall be required by the commission, and the commission shall have power, after hearing, to issue said certificate as prayed for, or to refuse to issue the same, * * * or to issue it for operation between certain points only."

Of course, this does not mean that minor changes may not take place in the location of the termini.

These deductions make it evident that the Southern Pacific Company may not by filing an amendment to its Oakland creek route tariffs be authorized to conduct a vehicular ferry to Alameda mole. Especially is this true as the company does not propose to discontinue the Oakland creek service. The manifest intention of the Legislature was to keep the control in the Railroad Commission over this class of public service and to allow such a use as is here proposed without a certificate of public convenience and necessity would be to materially impair the very object of the legislation.

The above observation also answers the contention that prior to the year 1894 the Southern Pacific Company did in fact operate a vehicular ferry between San Francisco and Alameda mole and for that reason it should now be allowed to resume such operation without a certificate. In that year the company abandoned the road leading to said mole and from that date until this controversy arose no means existed whereby vehicles could reach or leave said mole.

> "The idea of a ferry presupposes a road traveled by the public which is bisected by the water course, the ferry serving in a different way the same purpose that is served by a bridge. As the bridge is made for the road, not the road for the bridge, so is the ferry made for the road, not the road for the ferry; the ferry is the incident, the road is the principal." State ex rel. v. Wiethaupt, 231 Mo. 449, 465, 133 S. W. 329, 333.

Thirty-two years of disuse under these facts must be held to be an abandonment of any such prior right. Atchison, T. & Santa Fé v. Railroad Commission, 173 Cal. 577, 160 P. 828.

For the same reason the claim of the Southern Pacific Company is untenable that, by consolidation during the period between 1885 and 1887 of three groups of railroad companies operating in the east bay region it gained the right to segregate and co-ordinate its passenger, vehicular, freight, and other service by transferring the one from one ferry point to another ad libitum. To hold that the taking from the Alameda mole in 1894 of the vehicular service then existing and handling it through the creek route ferry was merely an act of efficiency and that such service may at any time be restored when in the judgment of the company it would be expedient to do so would be in a great measure to consent to a monopoly of San Francisco Bay. Bearing in mind that the Southern Pacific Company claims only to be acting under railroad franchises and such other rights as may belong to it by reason of usage or prescription, it is evident that it may not change a local ferry service at will, for such service is a proper subject for regulation and control and such a concession to the Southern Pacific Company would be in a large measure to abdicate in its favor the franchise granting power as well as the right of the Railroad Commission to exercise control over utilities of this type.

This leaves to be answered but one other query: May the Southern Pacific Company ingraft upon the Alameda local passenger train service this vehicular ferry operation? The question is far deeper than the mere right to add a commodity to an existing tariff. For the purposes of this case, this right as a general rule may be conceded. In fairness to the Southern Pacific Company it has but faintly asserted this claim, but respondent Railroad Commission places great stress upon it. The Southern Pacific Company did not attempt to amend the Alameda mole passenger tariffs. It attempted to amend the creek route vehicular tariff and attempted to split the vehicular service between the creek route and the Alameda mole route. It even contends that it owes no duty to submit to the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission as to the pre-existing Alameda boat service, claiming to do so would be the impairment of a contract evidenced by its railroad charter rights and cites in support of this contention the recent case of Postal Tel., etc., Co. v.

The company also has in mind, no doubt, the holding of this court in the case of Lake Tahoe, etc., Co. v. Roberts, 168 Cal. 551, 143 P. 786, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 1196, that a steamboat in partial use of a railroad company for railroad purposes is not "any part thereof" for taxation purposes. In other words, if vehicular service should be confined in the same vessel with the Alameda passenger service, the boat might lose its status as a part of the operative property of the railroad company. This furnishes a reason for the act of the company in putting in a new line of boats to Alameda mole and not mixing its railroad and vehicular services.

If it be borne in mind that the Southern Pacific Company is seeking to ingraft upon its railroad service, controlled by a foreign charter and over which the Railroad Commission has but limited control, a service that can be lawfully exercised only under local franchise grants, the intention of the Legislature is easily discerned. The general terms employed in the statute must give way for the operation of the legislative intent. People v. Ventura Refining Co. (Cal. Sup.) 268 P. 347. A local ferry operation is in no proper sense a railway operation as it may and usually does exist independent of it. The carriage by water to bridge the gap between the interrupted termini is but an incident to the railway transportation, a projection of its road over intervening waters. Such ferriage is merged into the railway transportation and is in no proper sense an entity or process resting upon its own independent foundation as is the case in commerce upon the inland waters, whether by ferry or other craft. This was the holding of this court in the case of S. P. v. Richardson, 181 Cal. 280, 184 P. 3, respecting the creek route ferry itself.

Indeed, in Wheeler v. S. F. & A. R. Co., 31 Cal. 46, 64, 89 Am. Dec. 147, speaking of this identical subject, Justice Sawyer said:

> "It is one thing to build and own a line of steamers to some foreign country, or some distant port, carrying on a wholly distinct and independent business entirely foreign to the objects of a railroad corporation, which might just as well, and a great deal better, be transacted by some other company organized for the purpose, and quite another to own and control a steamboat for crossing rivers and bays which lay in the line of the road, and the use of which is convenient, proper, and necessary to a successful accomplishment of the objects for which the road is built and operated."

This statement would be equally true if it had inserted therein the words "port" or "or between local ports or points." See, also, People v. S. F. & A. R. Co., supra. This distinction between these two classes of service has been recognized many times in other jurisdictions. The Maverick, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,316, 1186, 1 Sp. 23; Fitch v. New Haven, etc., R. R. Co., 30 Conn. 38; St. Clair Co. v. Interstate Transfer Co., 192 U. S. 454, 467, 24 S. Ct. 300, 48 L. Ed. 518.

It should be noted in passing that the Legislature in 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 429) struck from section 3643 of the Political Code the following words: "* * * And also any boat employed as a part of the system of a railroad for the transfer of passengers and freight, plying at regular and stated periods between two points" (Stats. 1885, p. 93)—thus showing that for purposes of taxation at least the statute has made the very distinction suggested in the cause before us.

We are thus irresistibly led to the conclusion that the boat service existing between San Francisco and Alameda in the year 1923 was not a service by "vessels" operating between points exclusively on the inland waters of this state within the meaning of said proviso.

This conclusion, of course, does not impair the authority of the Railroad Commission over railways and boats that are a part of them derived from other sources. The said amendment of 1923 is simply inapplicable to railway service and thereby inapplicable to boats or vessels used exclusively therein. We are thus resting our conclusion upon uncontestable grounds and are not required to declare a distinction between passenger and commodity transportation when admittedly carried by vessels subject to the act.

The order of the Railroad Commission dismissing the proceeding instituted to determine the status of said operation is in excess of the jurisdiction of said commission and should be annulled.

BLOOMQUIST et ux. v. HALEY et ux.

Supreme Court of California. May 28, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1176(2)—District Court of Appeals, after reversing order vacating order for new trial, had no authority to direct entry of judgment (Const. art. 6, § 4¾; Code Civ. Proc. § 956a).

District Court of Appeals, on reversing order vacating order for new trial and directing entry of judgment, was without authority under Const. art. 6, § 4¾ (Code Civ. Proc. § 956a), to direct judgment in favor of either party, since on granting of motion for new trial the action stood in exact condition in which it was before any trial thereof, except an appeal from such order might have been taken, and any action thereafter without formality of trial constituted proceeding without due or any process of law.

2. Chattel mortgages 🔑162—Mortgagees held to have right to possession of mortgaged chattels on default in payments, under express term of mortgage.

Chattel mortgagees held to have right to take possession of mortgaged chattels on failure of mortgagors to make stipulated payments, by the express terms of the mortgage.

3. Pleading 🔑129(1)—Answer admitted allegation of complaint by failing to deny it.

Answer admitted truth of allegation of complaint that lease was assigned to both of certain persons by failing to deny truth of allegation.

4. Pleading 🔑129(1)—Assertion in complaint, undenied in answer, and hence admitted, held sufficient to warrant finding of fact asserted.

Where complaint alleged that lease was assigned to both of certain persons and answer failed to deny it, and hence admitted allegation, there was sufficient basis for finding that lease was so assigned.

5. New trial 🔑165—Order attempting to vacate order granting new trial in general terms held void.

Where order granting new trial was general in terms, it exhausted court's jurisdiction, and subsequent order attempting to vacate order granting new trial was void.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action in claim and delivery brought by A. Bloomquist and wife against I. M. Haley and wife. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

For opinion of the District Court of Appeals, see 260 P. 572.

Morris Abraham and Charles I. Rosin, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

D. K. Gault and Schweitzer & Hutton, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. [1] A hearing was granted by this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal in and for the Second Appellate District, Second Division, reversing the judgment in favor of respondents, and directing the entry of the following order:

> "It is directed that the order of the trial court granting a new trial be vacated, that said court enter a new judgment for the plaintiffs that they have possession of all of the furniture, fixtures, and furnishings described in the complaint, and in the event that said property cannot be restored to plaintiffs upon the return of the writ of the sheriff so stating, then that plaintiffs have judgment against the defendants in the sum of $8,999.80, with interest from September 20, 1926, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, the amount due and unpaid upon the note and chattel mortgage covering said property, and interest, and for their costs."

We are in accord with the action of the District Court of Appeal in reversing said judgment, but are of the opinion that said appellate court was without the power or authority to make the order directing a judgment in favor of respondents as set forth above. The following portion of the opinion of said District Court of Appeal, written by Mr. Justice Craig, correctly expresses our views upon the questions therein considered, and we adopt the same as the opinion of this court:

[2] This appeal is from a judgment against the appellants giving the respondents possession of certain personal property, which is the subject of the suit, and damages for the value of said property. The action is one in claim and delivery in the usual form. It is a companion case to Haley v. Bloomquist (No. 5519) 260 P. 569, and Bloomquist et al. v. Haley (No. 5518) 260 P. 571. The opinion in the first of the two companion cases just named relates the principal facts referred to in the instant appeal.

It appears that by the terms of the chattel mortgage mentioned in that opinion, on the 1st day of May, 1926, there became due the sum of $500. The defendants and appellants as assignees of the personal property were obligated to make this payment, but refused to do so. The chattel mortgage expressly provides that, if the mortgagor shall fail to make any payment agreed to be made, the mortgagees have the right to take possession of the mortgaged property. Therefore appellants' default gave the respondents the right to claim possession.

Since the auction sale was void as against public policy (Haley v. Bloomquist, supra) we need not consider appellants' contentions in reliance upon that transaction.

[3, 4] As in Bloomquist v. Haley, supra, the failure of the answer to deny the allegations of the complaint that the lease was assigned to T. E. Haley, as well as I. M. Haley, was an admission of the truth of that statement. With the pleadings in this condition, the finding that Zeller assigned to both appellants was warranted.

[5] At the close of the trial judgment was rendered for plaintiffs and respondents for $25,000, in the event that the property covered by the chattel mortgage should not be restorable to them. There was no justification or basis for a judgment naming this sum. Later, on September 17, 1926, the court granted appellants' motion herein for a new trial; then on September 20, 1926, the respondents having consented to a judgment for $8,999.80, the order granting a new trial was vacated and set aside and the judgment modified in accordance with the stipulation. Respondents insist that the order made on September 17th was based upon an understanding that it should not take effect in the event that respondents consented to a modification of the amount of the judgment. The order is general in its terms and the record contains nothing in support of this assertion. Without doubt, the trial court exhausted its jurisdiction by granting the new trial, and the order made in attempting to vacate that order was void. Holtum v. Greif, 144 Cal. 521, 524, 78 P. 11, and cases there cited; Dorland v. Cunningham, 66 Cal. 484, 6 P. 135. No attempt was made to set the order aside upon a proper showing that it had been entered prematurely, or by inadvertence, as was done in Odd Fellows' Savings Bank v. Deuprey, 66 Cal. 168, 4 P. 1173, or to correct it, as in Garoutte v. Haley, 104 Cal. 497, 38 P. 194.

The trial court having exhausted its jurisdiction by granting a new trial, its subsequent order in vacating its order granting a new trial and in modifying the judgment previously rendered was without authority and was for that reason void. Nor has an appellate court under section 4¾ of article 6 of the Constitution, nor under section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure, any power or authority either to enter a judgment, or to direct the trial court to enter a judgment, in favor of either party to said action under the circumstances shown above. Upon the granting of the motion for a new trial the action stood in the exact condition in which it was before any trial thereof had been had, except that an appeal from said order might have been taken by the plaintiffs. For either the trial court or the appellate court thereafter and without the formality of a trial to enter a judgment therein would be to proceed without due or any process of law. There is nothing in the section of the Constitution or the section of the Code of Civil Procedure above referred to which purports to give to an appellate court any such power or authority. While the purpose of section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure is to enable the appellate courts to act so that "wherever possible causes may be finally disposed of by a single appeal and without further proceedings in the trial court," we are unable to construe this language as a grant of power to appellate courts either to enter or to direct the entry by a trial court of a judgment before the trial of the issues therein has been had or to deprive a party to an action of his right to a trial thereof before a judgment is entered against him. As the record stands in this case, all orders of the trial court made after the granting of the new trial are void, and the same, together with the judgment herein as modified, are hereby reversed, and the action is remanded for a new trial.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; PRESTON, J.; LANGDON, J.; RICHARDS, J.; SHENK, J.

HALEY et ux. v. BLOOMQUIST et ux.

Supreme Court of California. May 28, 1928.

1. Auctions and auctioneers 🔑7—Party to faked auction sale on sham bid will be given no relief.

Public policy forbids making of faked auction sale on sham bid, and the courts will give no relief to a party to such a sale.

2. Auctions and auctioneers 🔑7—Finding that chattel mortgagors were parties to agreement that auction sale to mortgagee should be faked held sustained by evidence.

In action for amount of bid made by mortgagee of chattels at auction sale thereof, evidence held to sustain finding that mortgagors were parties to agreement suggested by auctioneer that mortgagee make a sham bid and become party to a faked sale.

3. Auctions and auctioneers 🔑7—Finding that bid of chattel mortgagee at auction sale was sham held sustained by evidence.

In action for amount of bid made by chattel mortgagee at auction sale of mortgaged chattels, evidence held to sustain finding that bid was sham and made solely for the purpose of protecting the interest of the mortgagors and to prevent sale at inadequate price.

4. Auctions and auctioneers 🔑7—Finding that pretended purchase by chattel mortgagee at auction of chattels was without consideration held sustained by evidence.

In action for amount of bid made by chattel mortgagee at auction sale of chattels, evidence held to sustain finding that sales agreement was signed by mortgagee without consideration.

5. Auctions and auctioneers 🔑7—Buyer at sham auction sale held not estopped to assert fraud.

In action to recover amount of sham bid at faked auction sale bidder might not be held to pretended sale on the ground that he was estopped to assert the fraud, on the ground that the written sales agreement could not be varied by parol, or on the ground that pretended sellers had not relied on fraudulent character of sale, but only buyer, and that he could not profit by his turpitude, since courts will not enforce a contract contrary to public policy.

Action for money by I. M. Haley and wife against A. Bloomquist and wife. From judgments in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Morris Abraham and Charles I. Rosin, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

D. K. Gault and Schweitzer & Hutton, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. As stated by us in the memorandum of opinion in action L. A. No. 10253, Bloomquist v. Haley, 268 P. 367, this day filed, we are in full accord with the opinion of the District Court of Appeal in and for the Second Appellate District, Second Division, written by Mr. Justice Craig, in this action, and we adopt the same as the opinion of this court, which said opinion reads as follows:

Pursuant to stipulation three appeals in suits between the same parties and involving interrelated matters have been herein briefed together. The one which will be the subject of this decision is designated in the complaint as an action for money, in which I. M. Haley and T. E. Haley, husband and wife, are plaintiffs, and A. Bloomquist and his wife, Hattie Bloomquist, are defendants.

The following statement of facts is intended to suffice in that regard for the decision of all three appeals: On January 31, 1923, A. Bloomquist and Hattie Bloomquist owned a certain hotel in the city of Los Angeles, known as the St. George. On that day they leased it to Jack Zeller for the period of 10 years, at a rental of $1,150 per month. As a part of the transaction Zeller executed his promissory note for a total rental amounting to $138,000, and as security therefor gave a chattel mortgage on the furniture and lease; he also purchased from the Bloomquists the furniture and furnishings of the hotel and gave his promissory note for $24,500, payable in installments of $500 per month. This note was also secured by a chattel mortgage on the furniture and furnishings. Later, Zeller assigned both his interest in the furniture and in the lease to I. M. Haley, the appellant in these cases, who assumed the obligations of his assignor to make the payments above mentioned. Haley paid installments on the furniture only until January, and the rent until May, 1926. On February 11, 1926, appellant held a public auction to sell the furniture and furnishings and lease of the hotel.

At this point the parties disagree as to what took place. Appellants' contention is that Bloomquist bid $19,000 at the sale and became the purchaser. Respondent A. Bloomquist insists that he permitted the auctioneer to announce him as bidder and purchaser merely to prevent the property being sold too cheaply, and that it was understood between the parties that he was not required to take the property, and was not in fact to be regarded as buying it, and claims that he had no intention of doing so. There is evidence that respondent A. Bloomquist first authorized a bid of $17,000; some one else bid $18,000; the auctioneer then importuned Bloomquist to bid $19,000, which he refused to do; after that the auctioneer announced that Bloomquist had offered $19,000, at the same time stating privately that he need not take the property. However, Bloomquist signed the customary certificate of sale. Thereafter, on a number of occasions, Haley demanded of Bloomquist and of Hattie Bloomquist the payment of the $19,000, after deducting therefrom the amounts then due on the furniture. The Bloomquists at all these times refused to comply with the demands. After May, 1926, Haley refused to pay further rent, but continued to occupy the premises. As before stated, the Bloomquists did not pay as demanded, nor did they take possession of the hotel. Haley then instituted suit for $19,000, with interest thereon from February 11, 1925, less $8,500, the amount still due on the $24,500 note. This is the purpose of action Civil No. 5519. A judgment of nonsuit was entered as to Hattie Bloomquist, and at the end of the trial judgment was rendered for the defendant A. Bloomquist.

[1, 2] If the respondents' version of the conversation at the auction is taken to be true, there can be no doubt that fraud was perpetrated in the purported sale to Bloomquist. According to the testimony of several witnesses, the auctioneer, Byrens, induced Bloomquist to make a sham bid and to become a party to a fake sale. Such a transaction is against public policy, and courts will refuse to give relief to any party thereto. Dealey v. East San Mateo Land Co., 21 Cal. App. 39, 130 P. 1066. But respondents insist that they were not parties to whatever may have been said and agreed between Byrens and Bloomquist. Upon this question there is a direct conflict of the evidence. Certain witnesses stated that neither T. E. Haley nor I. M. Haley was present when the matter of Bloomquist's bidding was discussed, but Bloomquist testified that at the time "two feet away was standing Mr. Haley." In answer to a question by the court, Mrs. Bloomquist testified that Haley was present when the conversation in question took place. Another witness, Mrs. Margaret Hutton, also corroborated the Bloomquists both as to the arrangement between Byrens and Bloomquist and the fact that T. E. Haley was present. Appellants point out that no witness testified that Haley took part in the conversation, and that certain of these witnesses gave other evidence contradictory to that to which reference has been made. These are considerations which might affect the credibility of witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony, but which, of course, the trial court alone had a right to take into account.

[3, 4] It is next contended that there is no evidence to support the finding that Bloomquist had no intention of buying the property; no evidence to support the finding that Bloomquist bid solely for the purpose of protecting the interest of Haley and preventing a sale at an adequate price; and no evidence to uphold the finding that the agreement was signed by Bloomquist without consideration. Bloomquist himself testified that he had no intention of purchasing the property. The testimony of witnesses that Byrens, in the presence of Haley, urged Bloomquist to bid because Haley "is your tenant; you ought to help him out," to which Bloomquist replied, "All right," and that later Byrens stated that Bloomquist did not "have to take it; just bid it"; following which Byrens announced that Bloomquist had bid $19,000, and the latter finally signed the certificate of sale. This evidence, and more of a similar character, is amply sufficient to justify the second finding to which reference is above made. The same evidence warrants the finding that the agreement was signed by Bloomquist without consideration, since the evidence permits the conclusion that the entire transaction was fraudulent.

[5] It is said by appellants that respondents (1) were estopped to assert facts constituting the fraud in this case; (2) that the oral agreement was superseded by the writing which cannot be varied by parol; (3) that appellants have not alleged the fraudulent part of the agreement, and it is only respondents who have sought to rely upon it, and, therefore, that the latter will not be permitted to profit by their own turpitude. Each of these considerations is a false quantity in a case of this character. We are here concerned with a fraud, not against any individual, but against the public. The rule is well stated in Dealey v. East San Mateo Land Co., supra: "It makes no difference how or when the fact was brought to the attention of the court that the contract sued upon is against public policy. Neither does it matter whether or not one of the parties raises the question of its illegality upon that account, but courts of law and of equity, as the true character of such a contract is disclosed, refuse to permit themselves to be used in settling a controversy arising out of such a contract."

This decision cites many authorities to the effect that the court must sua sponte refuse relief to either party to an agreement which contemplates a fraud upon the public, or which is void as against public policy.

Certain rulings of the trial court upon the introduction of evidence are mentioned by appellants, but no attempt is made to point out any prejudice which may have resulted therefrom. The rulings in question under this head, if considered to be error, become unimportant in view of our decision upon the principal legal issue presented. We find no other points requiring decision, and no error of a substantial character.

BLOOMQUIST et ux. v. HALEY et ux.

Supreme Court of California. May 28, 1928.

1. Pleading 🔑129(2)—Answer admitted allegation of complaint as to assignment of lease by failing to deny it.

Answer admitted truth of allegation of complaint that lease was assigned to both of certain persons by failing to deny truth of allegation.

2. Pleading 🔑129(1)—Assertion in complaint, undenied in answer, and hence admitted, held sufficient to warrant finding of fact asserted.

Where complaint alleged that lease was assigned to both of certain persons and answer failed to deny it, and hence admitted allegation, there was sufficient basis for finding that the lease was so assigned.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1047(3)—Striking out testimony respecting auction sale, if error, held harmless, where sale was void.

Court's order striking out testimony concerning an auction sale of mortgaged chattels to the mortgagee, if error, held harmless, where the auction sale was void as sham.

4. Landlord and tenant 🔑291(17)—Judgment in unlawful detainer, based on failure to pay rent under unexpired lease, need not provide that execution shall not issue for 5 days (Code Civ. Proc. § 1174).

Judgment for plaintiffs in action of unlawful detainer, based on failure to pay rent under unexpired lease, held not erroneous because it contained no provision that execution should not issue for 5 days after entry of judgment, since Code Civ. Proc. § 1174, providing that execution shall not issue for 5 days in such a case, merely regulates time of issuance of execution and not contents of judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action for unlawful detainer brought by A. Bloomquist and wife against I. M. Haley and wife. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

For opinion of District Court of Appeal, see 260 P. 571. See, also, 260 P. 569, 260 P. 572.

Morris Abraham and Charles I. Rosin, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

D. K. Gault and Schweitzer & Hutton, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. Hearings in this action and the two companion actions of Haley v. Bloomquist, L. A. No. 9584, 268 Pac. 365, and Bloomquist v. Haley, L. A. No. 9585, 268 P. 364, were granted by this court after decision thereof by the District Court of Appeal, in and for the Second Appellate District, Second Division. The hearings were granted mainly for the reason that we were in doubt as to the correctness of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal in said action of Haley v. Bloomquist, L. A. No. 9584. But, desiring to have all three related cases before us upon our final consideration of the action of Bloomquist v. Haley, L. A. No. 9585, we granted hearings in all of them. After considering the opinions rendered by said District Court of Appeal in this action and in that of Haley v. Bloomquist, L. A. 9584, we are satisfied with the correctness of said opinions, and we hereby adopt the same as the opinions of this court. The opinion in this action, as written by Mr. Justice Craig, is as follows:

This action is one of unlawful detainer. It concerns the property and one phase of the transaction mentioned in Haley v. Bloomquist (Civil No. 5519) reported in 260 P. 569. The opinion in that case states the principal facts involved in this appeal. The appellants make no denial of respondents' assertion that in the instant case the former failed to make certain payment required by the lease. The principal defense on the merits is that Bloomquist purchased the lease, furniture, and furnishings of the hotel in question, and that not having paid Haley the purchase price the latter had a lien, under section 3046 of the Civil Code, for the sale price and had a right to hold the property until the purchase price was paid. In view of our decision in Haley v. Bloomquist, supra, this defense is not available.

[1, 2] It is contended that there is no evidence to support the finding that Zeller assigned the lease to the appellants, and that they promised to carry out its terms. The point in this connection is that the written transfer between Zeller and Haley shows that the assignment was made to I. M. Haley, and that T. E. Haley does not appear as a party to it. An inspection of the instrument shows this to be true. However, the complaint contains the allegation that the assignment was made to I. M. Haley and T. E. Haley. The answer fails to deny this assertion, and therefore admits it to be true. This is sufficient basis for the finding that the transfer was so made. 24 Cal. Jur. 952. Any finding otherwise would be outside the issues and erroneous. Welch v. Alcott, 185 Cal. 731, 198 P. 626.

[3] Certain testimony concerning the auction sale was admitted and later was ordered stricken out. The making of this order is assigned as error, but in view of the holding in Haley v. Bloomquist, supra, that the sale was void and against public policy, the ruling becomes immaterial.

[4] It appears that the judgment contained no provision that execution should not issue until 5 days after the entry thereof. It is contended that the failure of the court to include such a provision in the judgment was prejudicial error. In that behalf reliance is placed upon section 1174 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under the subdivision entitled "Execution." This provision does not affect the contents of the judgment. It merely regulates the time of issuance of execution after judgment, and the Code provision is sufficient to protect the appellants' rights, regardless of the judgment.

We find no other points requiring our consideration.

RENWICK v. PHILLIPS et al. (L. A. 9389.)

Supreme Court of California. June 12, 1928.

1. Physicians and surgeons 🔑11(3)—Evidence held insufficient to sustain board of medical examiners' order revoking petitioner's medical license for unprofessional conduct (Medical Practice Act, § 14, subd. 7a).

Evidence held insufficient to sustain order of board of medical examiners revoking license to practice medicine and surgery under Medical Practice Act, § 14, subd. 7a (St. 1925, p. 281), for alleged unprofessional conduct in aiding and abetting another in practicing system of treatment without a license.

2. Physicians and surgeons 🔑11(3)—In absence of evidence to sustain orders on part of medical examiners revoking licenses, there exists lack of jurisdiction justifying annulment of orders on review.

In absence of proper and sufficient evidence to sustain orders on part of board of medical examiners revoking licenses, there exists such lack of jurisdiction as justifies annulment of such orders upon writ of review.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Petition by Robert W. Renwick against P. T. Phillips and others, members of the Board of Medical Examiners of the State of California, to annul an order of the board revoking petitioner's license to practice medicine and surgery. From a judgment annulling the order, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. B. Bianchi, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Wilbert C. Hamilton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment of the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles, setting aside and annulling an order of the board of medical examiners of the state of California revoking the license of one Robert W. Renwick, the petitioner and respondent herein, which license entitled him to practice medicine and surgery in this state. The order of said board was made after a hearing before it, conducted under the provisions of section 14 of the Medical Practice Act, the specific charge made against the petitioner and respondent being that of having been guilty of unprofessional conduct as the same is defined under the terms and provisions of subdivision 7(a) of section 14 of said act (St. 1925, p. 281) and which alleged unprofessional conduct consisted in the aiding and abetting of one Roy Finney in practicing a system and mode of treatment of the sick and afflicted, said Finney being then and there without and not having a valid unrevoked certificate of license from the state board of medical examiners which would have permitted him to do the act or acts in the doing of which the petitioner and respondent herein was charged with having aided and abetted him.

[1, 2] The petitioner was a licensed chiropodist. The said Roy Finney conducted a chiropodist parlor, equipped with a variety of foot remedies and appliances which he prepared and sold there. He employed the petitioner and respondent herein to act as a chiropodist in connection with his said establishment and to give such treatment and perform such operations as only could be done by the holder of a regular chiropodist's license so to do. In so far there was nothing illegal or unprofessional in the relations or conduct of Dr. Renwick in his connection with said Finney at the latter's place of business; nor was there any evidence presented before the medical board, with the exception of the single episode upon which the charge against the petitioner and respondent herein was founded, which showed or sufficiently tended to show that Finney had ever, previous to said occurrence, performed or attempted to perform any act or operation which could only be performed by a licensed chiropodist. The single episode testified to before the board of medical examiners occurred, admittedly, during the absence of Dr. Renwick and without any knowledge, concurrence, or consent on his part. Upon the hearing before the trial court the evidence was fully presented and carefully considered and reviewed by Judge Hartley Shaw, who, after such consideration and review, reached the conclusion that the evidence was wholly insufficient to justify or sustain the order of the board of medical examiners revoking the petitioner's license, and he accordingly annulled said order. Without again essaying a review herein of such evidence, we deem it sufficient to say that after a full consideration thereof we are in accord with the views expressed in the judgment of the trial court.

It has been uniformly held, both by the appellate tribunals and by this court, that in the absence of proper and sufficient evidence to sustain similar orders on the part of the board of medical examiners there exists such a lack of jurisdiction as would justify the annulment of such orders upon a writ of review. Thrasher v. Board of Medical Examiners, 44 Cal. App. 26, 185 P. 1006; Lanterman v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 472, 172 P. 625; Suckow v. Alderson, 182 Cal. 247, 187 P. 965.

In action for damages as a result of injuries sustained in collision between plaintiff's motorcycle and defendant's automobile, refusal of instruction that defendant had right to assume that any vehicle, including motorcycle of plaintiff, would be brought to a full stop before entering on arterial street, held not prejudicial, in view of other instructions thereon.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Action by Raymond Flores, a minor, by his guardian ad litem, Irene Flores, against Philip Fitzgerald. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harry I. Stafford and Dean Cunha, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Action to recover damages as a result of injuries sustained in a collision between plaintiff's motorcycle and defendant's automobile. The plaintiff being a minor, the action was instituted and is being prosecuted by his guardian ad litem. The jury before whom the action was tried rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and from a judgment entered thereon the defendant has appealed.

The first contention of appellant is that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and therefore that the trial court erred in denying appellant's motion for a nonsuit, made at the close of respondent's evidence, and also in denying appellant's motion for an instructed verdict in his favor, made at the conclusion of all of the evidence. The collision occurred at the intersection of Fulton and Buchanan streets in the city of San Francisco. The respondent, on a motorcycle, was traveling in a southerly direction on Buchanan street, at its intersection with Fulton street. He did not stop before entering this intersection, but was traveling at a speed of about 8 miles per hour, with his foot dragging, and, as he testified, could have stopped his machine at any time within one foot; that just before he entered the intersection he noticed appellant's machine, about 150 feet westerly on Fulton street, approaching the intersection at a rapid rate of speed between 35 and 40 miles per hour. He proceeded to cross the intersection, but did not again look toward appellant's machine until he was about 10 feet beyond the center of the intersection, when he looked to his right and appellant's automobile was "right on" him.

Appellant gave no warning, by sounding his horn or otherwise, of his approach. He was traveling at a rate of speed between 20 and 22 miles per hour when he entered the intersection. After striking respondent the machine of appellant dragged him and his motorcycle across the intersection and easterly on Fulton street a distance of about 55 feet, and stopped with one wheel on the sidewalk. There was evidence that a car of the type owned by appellant and driven at a speed of 15 miles per hour, upon the full pressure of the brakes being applied, could be stopped within 5 or 6 feet upon a street under the conditions existing at the time and place of the accident. Appellant admitted that he applied his brakes immediately on seeing respondent with such force as to leave black skid marks on the pavement for a distance of 10 feet.

[1, 2] "Contributory negligence is a question of law only when the court is impelled to say that from the facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his injury." Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 336, 208 P. 125, 128; Smith v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. Sup.) 255 P. 500. In all other cases the question of contributory negligence is a question of fact for the jury. Wahlgren v. Market St. Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 656, 663, 62 P. 308, 64 P. 993; Jansson v. National Steamship Co., 189 Cal. 192, 208 P. 90; Smith v. Southern Pacific Co., supra. Appellant has suggested two circumstances as shown by the evidence in this case, which, he claims, support his contention that the respondent was guilty of contributory negligence which was the proximate cause of his injury. These two circumstances are that the respondent, after he saw the appellant 150 feet west of the intersection, proceeded to cross Fulton street without further observing appellant's automobile, and that respondent failed to stop before entering said intersection.

As to the contention that respondent failed to properly observe the movements of appellant's machine, after first seeing it 150 feet west of the intersection, appellant has cited Donat v. Dillon, 192 Cal. 426, 221 P. 193, where this court, on page 429 of the opinion (221 P. 194) said:

"The defendant seeks to take the case out of the operation of this rule, and would, in effect, have us decide as a matter of law that one having reached the intersection and having given the signal indicating his intention to turn has then relieved himself of all further care in the matter. But it is obvious that such is not the law. A motorist must at all times use due care to avoid colliding with another; he must be ever alert and watchful, so as not to place himself in danger, and, while he may assume that others will exercise due care, he cannot for that reason omit any of the care which the law demands of him. Assuming, therefore, that the defendant had the right of way, he was required to proceed across the intersection in a careful and prudent manner, ever watchful of the direction in which danger was most likely to be apprehended. He could not close his eyes so far as southbound traffic on Chester avenue was concerned. To the contrary, having observed Riddle's car approaching at an exceedingly fast rate of speed for that vicinity, the defendant was no longer entitled to rely upon the presumption that the driver of this machine would comply with the rules of the road, and he was bound to take such reasonable measures as he could, under the circumstances, to prevent the injury."

This decision, therefore, instead of being in favor of appellant's contention that the contributory negligence of respondent was a matter of law, plainly and in unequivocal language states that it is a matter of fact to be determined by the trial court, and that the finding of the ultimate fact by the trial court was binding upon this court.

The point is made by respondent that under the authority of Ex parte Daniels, 183 Cal. 636, 639, 192 P. 442 (21 A. L. R. 1172), the board of supervisors was without authority to pass said ordinance at the time of its enactment, and that it was not until the amendment of the Motor Vehicle Act, in 1925 (Stats. 1925, p. 414), that boards of supervisors were authorized to legislate upon the subject. It is not necessary to pass upon the validity of said ordinance, for the reason that we are of the opinion, that, conceding said ordinance was valid and in full force and effect at the date of the collision, and that the respondent violated it by failing to stop before entering upon the intersection of said streets, we are not satisfied that such failure on his part in any way contributed to his injury. The evidence shows that upon entering the intersection he brought the speed of his motorcycle down to about 6 or 7 miles per hour, and while traveling at this low rate of speed he had his machine under complete control. It does not appear that his failure to stop his machine momentarily before entering the intersection had any direct connection with, or was in any manner responsible for, the collision with appellant's automobile. Although the violation of the ordinance may have been negligence per se, yet, as it was not shown that such negligence was the direct or proximate cause of his injury, it will not defeat his right of recovery for damages sustained by reason of said injury. Lawrence v. Southern Pacific Co., 189 Cal. 434, 442, 208 P. 966.

Had appellant been traveling at a lawful rate of speed just prior to, and at the time of, his entry upon the intersection of the two streets, respondent, even traveling at the low rate of speed at which the evidence shows he was traveling across the intersection, would have passed beyond the intersection before the appellant would have had time to enter thereon. These two streets are each 40 feet wide. The collision occurred 6 feet north of the southerly curb of Fulton street and 3 feet east of the westerly curb of Buchanan street. Therefore, if appellant was 150 feet west of Buchanan street at the time respondent started to cross the intersection, he traveled 153 feet, while respondent was traveling 34 feet, over 4½ times as fast as respondent. Respondent, as we have seen, was traveling between 6 and 7 miles per hour, which would make appellant's rate of speed from 27 to 31 miles per hour. It is evident from this showing that it was appellant's act of traveling at this excessive rate of speed, at or just prior to the collision, which was the cause of the collision. As already noted, appellant was not able to stop his machine until it had traveled about 55 feet after the collision, although he applied his brakes at full pressure and at such force as to leave skid marks on the street for a distance of 10 feet. Had respondent stopped before entering the intersection, and then proceeded to cross the street at from 10 to 15 miles per hour, which was within the legal limit, the collision would, no doubt, have happened in much the same manner as described above. If such is the case, then we think the conclusion is irresistible that the proximate cause of respondent's injury was not his failure to come to a full stop before attempting to cross the street intersection, but was due directly to the excessive and unlawful rate of speed at which the appellant was traveling just before and while crossing said intersection. There was no error, therefore, in the court's denial either of appellant's motion for a nonsuit or his motion for an instructed verdict.

[5] Appellant complains of the refusal of the court to give two instructions prepared by him. Each of these proposed instructions was refused, for the reason that they were covered by other instructions given by the court. Appellant claims that the refusal of the first of these two rejected instructions deprived him of his defense of contributory negligence. Upon an examination of the instructions given by the court, we think it clearly appears that the court fully and fairly instructed the jury upon the question of contributory negligence, and that appellant's rights in this regard were amply safeguarded by the instructions given. The other of said rejected instructions referred to and defined the right of appellant in case the jury believed he was himself in the exercise of ordinary care, to assume and act upon the assumption that any vehicle, including the motorcycle of respondent, traveling upon Buchanan street, should be brought to a full stop before entering upon the intersection of that street with Fulton street. While the trial court gave no instruction expressly defining this right of appellant, it did fully instruct the jury as to the force, effect, and meaning of said ordinance of the board of supervisors declaring Fulton street an arterial street, and that one of the requirements of said ordinance was that any vehicle before entering an intersection of such arterial street should be brought to a full stop. While the proposed instruction might well have been given, as it correctly stated the law governing the rights of parties using an arterial street as defined by said ordinance, we are not prepared to say that its refusal worked any serious prejudice to the rights of appellant, at least not sufficient to justify a reversal of the judgment.

The jury, by the instructions given, were explicitly told that by the terms of said ordinance it was the duty of respondent before entering the intersection to bring his motorcycle to a full stop; that a violation of said ordinance was negligence in itself; that negligence on the part of plaintiff was called contributory negligence, and that plaintiff could not recover, if guilty of contributory negligence proximately contributing to his injury. As the jury found in favor of the plaintiff, it must have believed that, notwithstanding his failure to comply with said ordinance by bringing his motorcycle to a full stop before entering upon the street intersection, such failure on his part was not the proximate cause of his injury. If respondent's failure to comply with the terms of the ordinance was not the proximate cause of the collision, then appellant's right to assume that the respondent would comply with said ordinance becomes a matter of no moment.

PEOPLE v. CAMPRIDON. (Cr. 3100.)

Supreme Court of California. June 13, 1928.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Appeal by Albert Campridon from a judgment of conviction of violating section 141 of the Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 562) and from an order denying motion for new trial. Reversed.

Superseding opinion in District Court of Appeal, 262 P. 428.

John V. Copren, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The appellant's petition for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal for the First Appellate District, Division 1, was granted chiefly for the reason that one of the main questions presented upon this appeal was under submission before this court in the case of People v. Scofield, 265 P. 914. The judgment and order in that case were reversed for the reason, among others, that prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in the giving of substantially the same instruction to the jury which is the subject of appellant's criticism in the instant case. This being so, it follows that the judgment and order herein must be reversed upon the authority of People v. Scofield, supra, and for the reasons set forth therein.

It is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. JORDAN. (Cr. 1647.) ★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 13, 1928.

Constitutional law ⚷199—Conviction for taking money by false pretenses under subsequent statutory amendment charging designation of offenses held not invalid; amendment not aggravating punishment (Pen. Code, § 484, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1046, § 1).

Conviction under information charging offenses of grand theft under Pen. Code, § 484, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1046, § 1, to include larceny, grand larceny, false pretenses, and embezzlement, was not invalid because offenses charged were committed before such amendment, where offenses proved against defendant were the taking of money, previously known as obtaining property by false pretenses, since statute did not in any way aggravate offenses charged nor make punishment therefor greater than when committed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William T. Aggeler, Judge.

Irvin Jordan was convicted of grand theft, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John A. De Weese and Josiah Coombs, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

YORK, J. The principal question raised on this appeal by the defendant is similar to the written objection to the information and the demurrer filed in the trial court on behalf of the defendant. The objection made is that counts 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of an information charged the defendant with the offenses of grand theft; objection being made that on the dates when the various offenses were alleged to have been committed section 484 of the Penal Code of California defined larceny as the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the personal property of another. A few hours before the time of the last offense charged, section 484 of the Penal Code was amended (St. 1927, p. 1046, § 1) so that it described as grand theft the offense charged, and included larceny, grand larceny and false pretenses, as well as embezzlement; that defendant objecting on the ground that at the dates when the crimes were alleged to have been committed the defendant would have had to have been tried only on an information limiting the offense to the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the personal property of another instead of having to stand trial on an indictment under which the people could have proven the additional offenses hereinbefore set forth.

If under the facts alleged the defendant could have been found guilty of a crime which would have carried a greater or different penalty, there might be something in the contention of counsel for the appellant, but apparently the only difference in penalty would be if the object stolen were an automobile valued at less than $200. In the given case the law as amended and under which the indictments were drawn does not alter the legal rules of evidence in the case at bar, and the portion of the section providing for a determination of the value of the property obtained would be inapplicable to the given case, as the taking of money only is charged in the various counts of the information. There is nothing in the law as amended and objected to under which the present proceeding is had that in any way aggravates the particular crime or crimes herein charged, or in any way makes it any greater crime than it was under the law as it stood at the time when it was committed. This is so because of the fact that the defendant is charged only with taking money, which offense the amendment to the act does not in any way aggravate or in any way make any greater. The evidence shows that the facts proved against appellant were those establishing the commission of the crime heretofore known as the crime of obtaining property by false pretenses. Furthermore, the law as amended does not change the punishment for the particular crime herein charged, and does not in any way provide for the infliction of any greater punishment than was annexed to the particular crime charged when the crime was committed.

In this instant case we are passing only upon the facts and circumstances of the case itself, the nature of the crime charged, and the evidence introduced to support it, and we are not intending that this rule should be extended to other crimes or facts other than the particular crime charged and the proof introduced to support the charge. For instance, if the charge were the taking of an automobile valued at less than $200, there would be an entirely different proposition for the court to pass upon, as the amendment aggravates such crime only and makes only that crime greater than it was before such amendment to the law was passed, and such amendment provides that same punishment for the crimes herein charged and only prescribes a greater punishment for the theft of an automobile less than $200 in value.

In People v. Campbell, 59 Cal. 243, at page 246, 43 Am. Rep. 257, the court quotes from Mr. Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations the following:

> "'The defendant in any case must be proceeded against and prosecuted under the law in force when the proceeding is had.' 'A law is not unconstitutional which precludes a defendant in a criminal case from taking advantage of remedies which do not prejudice him:'

Also quoting from that case at page 246, a quotation from the case of Springfield v. Hampden Commissioners of Highways, 6 Pick. (Mass.) 508:

> "But there is no such thing as a vested right to a particular remedy. The Legislature may always alter the form of administering right and justice, and may transfer jurisdiction from one tribunal to another."

Again, the rule has been summarized as follows:

> "Amendatory Statutes.—If an act is criminal and punishable when committed, and a statute is subsequently enacted also making it criminal and punishable, but giving the crime a designation not before given to it, the situation of the accused is not altered to his disadvantage, and hence it cannot be said that there has been any ex post facto legislation, nor does the new or amendatory statute obliterate the preexisting law so that a conviction and punishment after its enactment and the consequent repeal of the former statute can be regarded as a conviction and punishment of an act not criminal when committed." 37 Am. St. Rep. 582, at page 585.

Also see 6 R. C. L. 301, § 288.

The information, although drawn in conformity with the law as amended, did not in any way hinder defendant in the preparation of his defense as long as the facts constituting the substance of the offense charged were fully given therein.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

BRAY v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SISKIYOU COUNTY et al. (Civ. 3609.)★

Rehearing Denied July 6, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 2, 1928.

1. Waters and water courses 🔑128—Law authorizing exceptions to determination of state water commission with hearing thereon held not unconstitutional, as authorizing review of administrative officer (Water Commission Act, § 36b, as added by St. 1917, p. 236, § 15; Const. art. 4, § 25, subds. 3, 33).

Water Commission Act (St. 1913, p. 1012) § 36b, as added by St. 1917, p. 236, § 15, authorizing filing of exceptions to determination of state water commission and a hearing thereon by court, and providing for proceedings as nearly as may be in accordance with rules governing civil actions, held not in violation of Const. art. 4, § 25, subds. 3, 33, as providing method for review of proceedings of administrative officers.

2. Waters and water courses 🔑128—Law authorizing exceptions to determination of state water commission held not unconstitutional because providing for bringing parties into court other than by issuance of summons (Water Commission Act, § 36b, as added by St. 1917, p. 236, § 15).

The fact that Water Commission Act (St. 1913, p. 1012) § 36b, as added by St. 1917, p. 236, § 15, authorizing exceptions to determination of state water commission and hearing thereon, provides for bringing parties into court other than by means of issuance of a summons, held not to render it unconstitutional.

3. Prohibition 🔑3(3)—Parties to proceedings on exceptions to determination of state water commission have adequate remedy at law other than writ of prohibition (Water Commission Act, § 36b, as added by St. 1917, p. 236, § 15).

Since an appeal lies from judgment of court decreeing rights of respective appropriators on exceptions to determination of state water commission, pursuant to Water Commission Act (St. 1913, p. 1012) § 36b, as added by St. 1917, p. 236, § 15, all parties have a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law other than by writ of prohibition to prevent hearing of such exceptions.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑133—Proceeding involving determination of water rights of river and its tributaries held properly entitled.

Proceeding involving determination of water rights of river and its tributaries, entitled "In the Matter of the Determination of the Relative Rights Based upon Prior Appropriation of the Various Claimants to the Waters of Shasta River and Its Tributaries in Siskiyou County, California," held properly entitled.

5. Waters and water courses 🔑133—State water commission has authority to deal only with appropriated waters and to grant permits to appropriate unappropriated waters of state (Water Commission Act).

The Water Commission Act (St. 1913, p. 1012, as amended) deals only with appropriated waters of the state and the ascertainment and determination of waters that have been appropriated, giving to state water commission power to grant permits to appropriate unappropriated waters therein.

6. Waters and water courses 🔑133—Constitutionality of law bearing on unused rights of riparian landowner held immaterial, as relating to decisions as to rights of appropriators (Water Commission Act, § 11).

Constitutionality of Water Commission Act (St. 1913, p. 1018) § 11, purporting to bar or terminate unused rights of riparian landowner after expiration of ten years, as taking property without due process, is immaterial, as bearing on decision of courts as to rights of appropriators.

Original application by George K. Bray for a writ of prohibition, prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of the State in and for the County of Siskiyou and Hon.

Charles J. Luttrell, as Judge thereof. Writ denied.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court: SEAWELL, RICHARDS, and CURTIS, JJ., voting for a hearing.

Horace V. Ley, of Yreka, and Wm. V. Cowan, of Oakland, for petitioner.

PLUMMER, J. This cause is before us upon the application of the petitioner praying that an order be issued by this court directed to the superior court of the county of Siskiyou and Hon. Charles J. Luttrell, as judge thereof, requiring him to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not be granted prohibiting said court and the judge thereof from proceeding with the hearing of a certain matter or action now pending in said court wherein the department of public works of the state of California, through the division of water rights thereof, has filed in said court its determination of the water rights of the Shasta river and its tributaries in the county of Siskiyou.

While the petition filed herein sets forth at great length a number of specifications why said order should be issued and said writ granted, only four of said specifications are set forth and urged upon our attention by the petitioner in his points and authorities accompanying the petition. These specifications are as follows: (1) That section 32 and sections 36a to 36f of the Water Commission Act, approved June 16, 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 1012), and as amended by subsequent acts (see St. 1917, pp. 234, 236–238, §§ 9, 14–19), are unconstitutional, and particularly section 36b thereof; (2) that no issues are raised in the complaint, and the court has no jurisdiction to proceed with the hearing; (3) that the only proper order that can be made by the court below is one of dismissal; (4) that the petitioner has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law.

As the petitioner's argument is directed particularly to the provisions of section 36b, we will in the consideration of his application proceed in the same line of thought. In his attack on said action reliance is based upon the recent case of Mojave River Irrigation District v. Superior Court of the State of California, in and for San Bernardino County, 262 P. 724, in which case the Supreme Court held that the provisions of section 1b of the Water Commission Act, added by act of the Legislature approved May 2, 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 162), is unconstitutional. Following the reasoning of the court in that case it is contended that section 36b is likewise unconstitutional. This necessitates an analysis of the decision of the Supreme Court just referred to for the reason that, unless the provisions of the two sections are distinguishable, section 36b must, under the authority of the foregoing case, be likewise held inoperative and void.

In the Mojave Case it appears from the facts set forth in the opinion that a proceeding was instituted in the superior court to review the action of the water commission in granting a permit to the Mojave River irrigation district to appropriate water flowing in the Mojave river, and that the cause before the Supreme Court was based upon an application to prohibit the superior court from hearing and determining the proceeding pending therein, to review the action of the commission, on the ground that a writ of certiorari or writ of review so to do does not lie and that the provisions of section 1b of the Water Commission Act, as amended in 1923, purporting so to do, was unconstitutional. The court then takes up and reviews many of the recent cases wherein it is held that a writ of certiorari will not lie to review the action of an administrative officer, citing, among others, the case of Tulare Water Co. v. State Water Co., 187 Cal. 533, 202 P. 874, wherein it was held that the water commission, in granting a permit to appropriate water from the Kern river, was acting in an administrative, and not in a judicial, capacity, and for that reason the writ of review applied for was denied and the writ of mandate granted. Other cases are cited in the opinion which we need not set forth herein, but a consideration of the various cases all show that they are based upon the rule that certiorari will not lie to review the action of an administrative officer, but only lies to review the action of a judicial officer, and only then to determine whether the officer whose action is sought to be reviewed has or has not acted within the scope of his authority. Section 1b, as shown by the decision in the Mojave Case, is very similar to the section of the Irrigation District Act (Laws 1897, p. 254), purporting to give a right of appeal, held unconstitutional in the case of Chinn v. Superior Court, 156 Cal. 480, 105 P. 580, and also in the case of Inglin v. Hoppin, 156 Cal. 483, 105 P. 582, in that, while it does not specifically purport to grant an appeal from the action of an administrative body, it does specify that, by way of the writ of certiorari, the court shall review all the evidence, correspondence, data, etc., upon which the commission acted, and then base its judgment thereon. That this is the vulnerable portion of section 1b appears from the following excerpt, which we take from the opinion in the Mojave Case:

> "In providing that said courts shall 'review' all such matters as may have been considered by the division of water rights in its determination to grant or deny the application for the permit in question, the amendment assuredly contemplates that all of such matters shall be received in evidence before such court in such action or proceeding, whether receivable in evidence in an ordinary action or proceeding or not. In the foregoing respect it would seem to be obvious that said amendment provides for the particular action or proceeding which it purports to create a practice and procedure radically at variance with that which the general laws provide for the practice and procedure of the superior courts in actions or proceedings of which such courts are given jurisdiction, and that in so doing said amendment runs counter to the provisions of section 25, art. 4, of the state Constitution which inhibits the Legislature from passing 'local or special laws' regulating the practice of courts of justice."

That section 1b purports specially to provide for a writ of review of the proceedings of an administrative officer which does not exist in any other case is clearly apparent from a reading of the section. Section 1b is different from any other of the sections of the act, in that it does not purport to lay the foundation for the institution of a trial, the introduction of evidence, and the determination of rights of parties as may be made to appear after the due and regular trial of a cause, but expressly limits the court to a determination of whether administrative officers have acted correctly or erred in judgment in granting a permit to appropriate water. In this particular the provisions of section 1b are distinguishable from the powers granted and the proceeding contemplated by section 36b. The Mojave Case had to do with a special proceeding providing for the review of an administrative officer. There is nothing in the opinion, as we read it, which in any way trenches upon the power of the Legislature to provide for the determination of the water rights of those taking water from the same stream as set forth in section 36b. The first section, though nominally providing for a writ of review, gives what in fact amounts to an appeal from the actions of an administrative officer, while the latter section simply provides that the proceedings of an administrative officer may be taken as the preliminary basis upon which an action may be had in the superior court to determine the respective rights of claimants to appropriate water from any certain stream and its tributaries. That section 1b is unconstitutional for the reasons stated in the opinion in the Mojave Case does not necessitate a holding that section 36b, which is wholly dissimilar in all its intendments, is likewise unconstitutional.

[1] We may now consider section 36b and the various cases from different states passing upon water laws containing identical provisions. After providing for an investigation of the water rights of various claimants appropriating water from any certain stream and its tributaries, the hearing of the various claimants, taking of proofs, examination of streams, their tributaries, dams, ditches, etc., the act provides that the commission shall come to a determination as to the respective quantities of water the different claimants are entitled to divert and the lands upon which the waters may be used, setting forth in minute detail so that the quantity of water to which each claimant may be entitled, and the lands upon which it is entitled to be used may be readily ascertained, etc., the water commission is directed to file the same in a county through which the stream runs, together with the transcript of all the testimony taken by the commission, and then obtaining from the court of said county an order for a hearing upon such determination, which order must be published for a specified length of time and a certified copy of the notice of the time and place of the hearing served upon all the parties. Section 36b of the act then provides as follows:

> "At least ten days prior to the day set for hearing, all parties in interest who are aggrieved or dissatisfied with the order of determination of the state water commission shall file with the clerk of said court notice of exceptions to the order of determination of the state water commission, which notice shall state briefly the exceptions taken, the reasons therefor, and the prayer for relief and a copy thereof shall be transmitted by registered mail at least ten (10) days prior to such hearing, to the state water commission and to each claimant who was an adverse party to any contest wherein such exceptor was a party in the proceedings. The order of determination by the state water commission and the statements or claims of claimants and exceptions made to the order of determination shall constitute the pleadings, but the court may allow such additional or amended pleadings as may be necessary to a final determination of the proceeding. If no exceptions shall have been filed with the clerk of the court as aforesaid then on the day set for the hearing, on motion of the state water commission, or its attorney the court shall enter a decree affirming said order of determination. On the day set for hearing all parties in interest who have filed notices of exceptions as aforesaid shall appear in person or by counsel, and it shall be the duty of the court to hear the same or set the time for hearing until such exceptions are disposed of, and all proceedings thereunder shall be as nearly as may be in accordance with the rules governing civil actions."

It requires but a cursory reading of this section to show that the court is empowered to permit the filing of additional or amended pleadings as may be desired by the parties to set forth fully and completely, all and singular, their rights, or to whatever rights the parties may deem themselves entitled, as fully and completely as is provided for in any of the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure. The specific language of the section also is to the effect that the proceedings shall be as nearly as possible in accordance with the rules governing civil action. This means that the testimony upon which the court finally acts must be such as would entitle the court to act in any civil proceeding. The section does not provide simply for a review of the testimony taken by the commission, nor of the correspondence or data which may have been deemed sufficient by the commission. The essential requirement of the language of the section, taken as a whole, is that the court, in the light of the findings of the commission before it, shall proceed as nearly as possible as would be the case in an ordinary civil action to hear whatever the parties in interest may have to present in the way of proper testimony, and after such hearing enter a decree determining the quantity of water that each claimant is entitled to appropriate from the stream in question, and also fixing and determining the place of use thereof. The subsequent sections provide for the taking of additional testimony by way of reference to the commission, but that is no different in effect than where a court issues a commission to take testimony. This brief summary shows the distinction between section 1b and section 36b of the Water Commission Act.

[2] That the parties were brought into court other than by means of the issuance of a summons does not appear to us to affect the constitutionality of the act. The question really is, in every case, whether the court has jurisdiction of the parties and of the cause. In this particular there is no essential difference in obtaining jurisdiction of the parties, than when the court issues its order to show cause why a certain action should not be taken. It is not in all cases absolutely necessary that a summons may be issued in order to give the court jurisdiction of the parties. For instance, in the present application this court is asked to acquire jurisdiction over the superior court of the county of Siskiyou and Hon. Charles J. Luttrell by issuing and having served upon him an order to show cause. That, after having acquired jurisdiction of the parties, the subsequent proceedings may not be in all particulars identical with the trial of some other civil action, such as a damage suit, does not affect the constitutionality of the section in question. If void because in detail it differs slightly from the procedure in other cases, then, and in that case, the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure having to do with eminent domain actions would likewise be vulnerable. It only requires a reading of the various sections of the Code of Civil Procedure to show the dissimilarity between the summons in an ordinary action and the summons provided for in eminent domain proceedings. Again, if exactly the same procedure must be followed in all cases, the section of the Code setting forth that in the first instance only an interlocutory judgment may be entered in a divorce action, and then a final judgment a number of months later, would likewise be unconstitutional.

In the present case the petition sets forth that there are 131 claimants asserting rights to the waters of the Shasta river and its tributaries, based upon appropriation. These rights are not absolutely independent and unrelated, but they are all dependent and correlated, each depending upon the lawful exercise of the right claimed by the others. There is only so much water in a stream and its tributaries to be used, and each claimant owns really the use and not the water itself, which, from the very nature of the case, demands an enactment suitable to the conditions presented. In this regard we read the Water Commission Act as a general law applicable to a particular subject, to wit, the use of the waters of the various streams of the state. Other states having constitutional limitations similar to subdivisions 3 and 33 of section 25 of article 4 of our Constitution, relating to legislative acts regulating the practice of courts of justice have upheld identical statutes with the one now under consideration. In the case of Eden Irrigation Co. v. District Court, 61 Utah, 103, 211 P. 957, the Supreme Court of Utah had under consideration a water act containing the provisions which are similar in substance to the Water Commission Act of this state. So far as pertinent here, the Utah act reads:

> "After full consideration of the statements of claims the surveys, records and files and after a personal examination of the river system or water source involved if such examination is deemed necessary, the state engineer shall formulate a proposed determination of all rights to the use of the water of such river system or water source, and a copy of such proposed determination shall be mailed by regular mail to each claimant with notice that any claimant dissatisfied with such determination may within ninety days from such date of mailing, file with the clerk of the district court a written objection thereto duly verified on oath." Laws 1919, c. 67, § 32.

The act then goes on to provide for hearing, contests, and entry of final decree. It was there objected that such a proceeding was inhibited by the Constitution, in that the Legislature was prevented from passing any local or special laws regulating the practice of courts of justice, just as it is insisted here. The court, in passing upon this contention, expressed its views in these words:

> "Finally it is insisted that the act in question offends against that provision of our Constitution (Const. art. 6, § 26), which prohibits the Legislature from enacting a special law 'regulating the practice of courts of justice.' This contention, it seems to us, is somewhat far-fetched. In the first place we cannot conceive how the law in question is special nor how it regulates the practice of courts of justice. Nothing of that character is attempted. Neither is that the effect of anything that is contained in the act. The question respecting the regulation of the waters of this state is a very comprehensive one and in some respects, for the purpose of simplifying and expediting the administration of the law with respect to that matter and the protection of water rights, the Legislature no doubt would have the right to direct the courts how to proceed in certain matters and, so long as the law applied to all courts and governed all persons claiming water rights there is nothing special about such a law."

Arizona had before it a water law containing an identical procedure for obtaining jurisdiction both of the cause and of the parties. In considering the objections urged by counsel to the validity of the various provisions leading up to the final hearing by the trial court, the opinion uses language which is applicable to this cause, to wit:

> "This summary of the provisions of the statute suffices to show that the water commissioner is not invested with judicial power. Judicial power is the power of a court to decide and pronounce a judgment and carry it into effect between persons and parties who bring a case before it for decision. The power to decide and pronounce the judgment affecting the rights of the parties to the use of the water of the stream and to carry the judgment into effect between the persons and parties is, by the act of the Legislature in question, reposed in the superior court and not in the commissioner. In the initiating of the proceedings by the commissioner, in the giving of notice to the claimants, in the taking of the statements of claims, in receiving evidence and in making "findings" the duties of the commissioner are not unlike those of a referee. * * * The commissioner, upon his own initiative or upon the petition of the water users upon the stream, merely brings the matter to the court for its adjudication, for its determination, for its decree establishing the rights of the several claimants. This adjudication, this determination, this decree, is the adjudication, determination, and decree of the court and not of the commissioner"—citing Pacific Live Stock Co. v. Lewis, 241 U. S. 441, 36 S. Ct. 637, 60 L. Ed. 1084; Vineyard L. & S. Co. v. District Court, 42 Nev. 1, 171 P. 166; Pitt v. Scrugham, 44 Nev. 418, 195 P. 1101; In re Willow Creek, 74 Or. 592, 144 P. 505, 146 P. 475; Enterprise Irr. Dist. v. Tri-State L. Co., 92 Neb. 121, 138 N. W. 171; Farm Inv. Co. v. Carpenter, 9 Wyo. 110, 61 P. 258, 50 L. R. A. 747, 87 Am. St. Rep. 918.

This case likewise holds that it is evident that all the proceedings provided for in the water act are in accordance with the rule requiring due process of law.

In Pacific Live Stock Co. v. Oregon, 241 U. S. 440, 36 S. Ct. 637, 60 L. Ed. 1084, the Supreme Court, passing upon an act of the Legislature of the state of Oregon, similar to ours, affirmed the decision of the Oregon Supreme Court holding that the bringing of interested parties into court, just as it is sought to bring parties into court in this action, constituted due process of law.

In the case of In re Willow Creek, 74 Or. 592, 144 P. 505, appears an elaborate opinion from the Supreme Court of Oregon in which every phase of the water act of that state is taken up and thoroughly considered and every question raised by the petitioner in this cause completely answered. From that opinion we will, however, take only the following excerpt:

> "It is within the province of the Legislature to say that registered mail may be used as a means of conveying a notice, when publication is also required, and especially where in case of dispute a notice of contest is required to be served and returned the same as a summons in an action in the courts"—citing a number of cases.

In the case of Humboldt Land & Cattle Co. v. District Court, 47 Nev. 396, 224 P. 612, the Supreme Court of Nevada, in considering an act similar in its provisions to ours, says:

> "The section discloses a fixed purpose to secure timely notice to all claimants of the hearing, and of the time and place for the hearing of all parties in interest dissatisfied or aggrieved with the order of determination of the engineer. It requires all those aggrieved or dissatisfied to file notice of their exceptions with the clerk setting forth the grounds and prayer for relief, thus affording all parties in interest who are [not] satisfied with the order of determination an opportunity to appear before the court and oppose any alteration or modification of the order as proposed by those excepting. The statute is always presumed to be known, and, in view of the character of the proceeding, hedged about, as it is, with notices of every material step taken in the one comprehensive proceeding, the law presumes that each water claimant will keep in touch with his water right defined by the order of determination of the engineer and straightway inform himself if any peril threatens it by those excepting. No further notice is required, and since each claimant is a party to the proceeding, and has notice, and a reasonable opportunity is afforded him to defend his claim, the procedure satisfies the requirement of due process of law."

The same court, in the case of Vineyard L. & S. Co. v. District Court, 42 Nev. 1, 171 P. 166, really says everything that can be said in support of the act of the Legislature in providing for determining water rights, just as has been provided by the Legislature in this state, and conclusively refutes every objection which has been brought to our attention and urged against our Water Commission Act.

In a proceeding to determine the water rights in the Humboldt river (246 P. 692), the Supreme Court of Nevada took occasion again to uphold provisions of the water law of that state which contained in substance the same provisions as we find in section 36b of the Water Commission Act of this state.

In addition to the cases which we have reviewed, the following may also be cited supporting the decisions from which we have quoted: Farm Inv. Co. v. Carpenter, 9 Wyo. 110, 61 P. 258, 50 L. R. A. 747, 87 Am. St. Rep. 918; Crawford Co. v. Hathaway, 67 Neb. 325, 93 N. W. 781, 60 L. R. A. 889, 108 Am. St. Rep. 647; Enterprise Irr. Dist. v. Tri-State Land Co., 92 Neb. 121, 138 N. W. 171; In re Silvies River (D. C.) 199 F. 495; Ormsby Co. v. Kearney, 37 Nev. 314, 142 P. 803; Bergman v. Kearney (D. C.) 241 F. 884; Humboldt L. & C. Co. v. Allen (D. C.) 14 F.(2d) 650; Caldwell v. Erickson, 61 Utah, 265, 213 P. 182. Practically all of these cases consider the objection urged, that the act is not in accordance with the rule requiring due process of law, and hold such objection untenable. The cases also take up and show that the determination of the water commission (in some of the states called water commission and in some of the states called water engineer) is only a proposed finding and is not a judicial decision fixing and decreeing the rights of the respective claimants, but is only in fact a preliminary investigation which brings to the attention of the court the various matters, rights and interests to be considered in order that a full and final hearing may be had and the rights of the respective claimants to appropriate water from the stream and its tributaries under consideration, ascertained, and determined in a proceeding where all can be heard, and to the intent and purpose that the otherwise almost interminable dispute as to the use of water from any particular source may be once and for all equitably, justly, and finally decreed, established, guaranteed, and placed of record where all the users of water may readily ascertain and forever know his own rights and the rights of all other appropriators.

[3-6] An appeal lies from the judgment of the trial court in decreeing the rights of the respective appropriators, and thus all parties are given a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law, and is a sufficient answer to the petitioner's objection that no adequate remedy exists other than that prayed for herein. Nor do we find any merit in the contention that the proceeding is not properly entitled. Excluding the cover pages of the report of the commission, we find the following:

> "In the Matter of the Determination of the Relative Rights Based upon Prior Appropriation of the Various Claimants to the Waters of Shasta River and Its Tributaries in Siskiyou County, California," —which is as full and complete a title as we find in many proceedings, as, for example, in probate matters where the cause is entitled "In the Matter of the Estate [giving the name of the person], Deceased."

Nor is there any merit in the petitioner's contention that the Water Commission Act does not purport to determine the rights of riparian owners. The petitioner does not base his rights upon riparian ownership, as it is expressly stated that he is an appropriator of the waters of one of the tributaries of the Shasta river. The Water Commission Act under consideration does not purport to deal with other than the appropriated waters of the state and the ascertainment and determination of the waters that have been appropriated, and then giving to the commission power to grant permits to appropriate the unappropriated waters of the state. That the third subdivision of section 11 of the act purporting to bar or terminate the unused rights of a riparian landowner after the expiration of ten years may or may not be unconstitutional, as the taking of property without due process of law, is wholly immaterial, as any holding relative to that section would not have any bearing whatever upon the decision of the courts as to the rights of appropriators. The whole tenor of the act deals only with appropriators. Section 29 (St. 1917, p. 232, § 6) sets forth the form by which an appropriator shall set forth all the facts upon which his right to the use of the waters is predicated, and includes only such rights as have their origin in appropriation, and following all these various proceedings, the judgment of the court finally to be entered deals only with the rights of appropriators.

That the various sections of the Water Commission Act are new to the legal profession does not affect their validity, for, as said by the Supreme Court of Nevada in one of the cases to which we have referred, every forward looking piece of legislation meets the old and time-honored objection—unconstitutional.

The petition for an order to show cause is denied.

for compensation, evidence that many omissions and additions were made without orders or any attempt at agreement as to value by architect and contractor warranted instruction as to waiver of guaranty provisions.

4. Contracts 🔑322(4)—Evidence held to sustain judgment for contractor's compensation as against claim for deductions under cost guaranty clause.

Evidence held to sustain judgment for contractor in action for compensation as against claim for deductions under cost guaranty clause.

5. Work and labor 🔑27(3)—Where action on principal contract contained common count for value of work, admission of testimony that work was worth in excess of contract price was not error.

In contractor's action for compensation under written contract fully performed, providing for compensation of $24,000, admission of plaintiff's testimony in support of a common count, that value of his services was approximately $47,000, held not error.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1050(2)—In contractor's action for compensation, alleged error in admitting testimony material only to clause of contract which had been waived held immaterial.

In construction contractor's action for compensation, where waiver of cost guaranty clause was shown, alleged error in admission of testimony regarding cost of certain heating apparatus other than that called for in contract was immaterial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Gutleben Bros. against Gilbert F. Stevenson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robert Young, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Paul Barksdale D'Orr, of Los Angeles, and A. G. Kazebeer, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The defendant is the owner of the Hotel Miramar Annex at Santa Monica, Cal. Before building the hotel he employed an architect to draw plans and prepare specifications. Afterwards he engaged the plaintiff as manager and superintendent to build the building. A written contract was drawn up, executed and recorded. By the terms of the written contract the plaintiff undertook to superintend all of the building, etc., to make bimonthly statements of his transactions, to pay the bills, and thereafter to submit the vouchers to the owner. All of these things were done, and the record presents no question on the subject. The plaintiff agreed that the building would not cost in excess of $428,686. It was also agreed that changes might be made when "authorized by a written order from said architect." It was further agreed that the compensation of the plaintiff would be $24,000; "that, should the architect at any time during the progress of the work require and order any alterations, deviations from, additions to, or omissions from the work shown in said plans and specifications, the same shall in no way injuriously affect or make void this contract, but the difference in value for work or materials omitted shall be deducted from the aggregate total of said contractor's estimate by a fair and reasonable valuation, and said estimate shall be deemed to be modified accordingly; and the value of any additional work or materials required shall be agreed upon between the contractor and the architect before such additional work or material is furnished, and the agreed value thereof shall be added to the aggregate total of said contractor's estimate by a fair and reasonable valuation, and said estimate shall be deemed to be modified accordingly. Such agreement for omissions from or additions to the work shall state also any change in the time of completion as herein set forth which is to be granted by reason thereof. The contractor further agrees that any excess of said cost over the contractor's estimate up to the amount of half of the total compensation to be paid the contractor shall be charged to and be borne by the contractor and offset against the final payment of the contractor's compensation hereinabove referred to." Numerous changes were made. Some of the changes constituted omissions and some were additions. At no time did the architect issue a written order, but the orders were all oral, and at no time did the architect and the contractor agree on the valuation of an item to be omitted or the valuation of an addition to be made. At no time did they agree on the allowance to be made for the performance of the change so ordered. The contract contained a provision that the building should be completed by May 15, 1924, and for certain penalties if the building was not completed within that time. It also provided for a bonus in favor of the contractor for each day if the building was completed before May 15, 1924. All payments were made by the owner down to the date that the last payment fell due. At that time a dispute arose as to what was the liability of the owner. As the parties failed to agree, the plaintiff commenced this action a short time after the owner had recorded the notice of completion.

The plaintiff pleaded his case in three different counts: (1) On the contract for the balance of the agreed price stated in the contract; (2) for moneys laid out and expended; and (3) for the reasonable value of services performed and material furnished. The defendant answered, and a trial was had in the trial court before the court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $27,103.60.

That amount included $16,000 of the $24,000 alleged to be unpaid, and $9,040.22 for moneys laid out and expended, together with interest on those two items. The defendant paid to the plaintiff $14,168.01 under a stipulation protecting the rights of both parties. From a judgment entered on the verdict, the defendant has appealed. The appeal presents the question what sum, if any, should have been charged against the plaintiff by reason of an alleged excess of the total cost of construction. That question is presented under six different attacks.

> "III. By the contract there was an estimate made by the plaintiff that the entire cost of labor and material necessary for constructing the Miramar Hotel Annex in the manner contemplated by the plans and specifications attached to said contract would not exceed the sum of $428,686.00. In said contract is a provision that, if the said cost exceeds the amount of said estimate, then the plaintiff must forfeit the amount of the excess up to the amount of one-half of the contract compensation, that is, to the amount of $12,000. Changes in the manner of doing the work were made after the contract was signed and recorded by the omission of some work and by the addition of other work. The contract provides for such changes. You are to decide whether the cost of doing the work of constructing the Miramar Hotel Annex was increased or diminished by these changes for the purpose of deciding whether or not the defendant should be released from paying any part of the compensation provided for in the contract. To determine this, the difference in value for work or materials omitted shall be deducted from the aggregate total of the contractor's estimate by a fair and reasonable valuation and the value of any additional work or materials shall be added to the aggregate total of the contractor's estimate by a fair and reasonable valuation to determine the modified estimate under change made. The difference between the modified estimate and the entire cost of the work will determine whether or not and to what extent the cost of the work has exceeded the estimate. If you find after deducting omissions from the contract estimate and adding additions to it the cost of the entire work does not exceed the amount of the estimate so modified, then there will be no deduction made from the said unpaid portion of the contract compensation.
> "IV. If you find after deducting from the estimate the value of omissions and adding to the estimate the value of the additions that the cost of the work exceeds the amount of the estimate so modified, then there is to be deducted from the $16,000 remaining unpaid as part of the contract compensation the amount of the excess of the cost over and above such modified estimate to an amount not exceeding $12,000."

[1] The trial court did not err in refusing either instruction. The third instruction told the jury to subtract from the contractor's original estimate, $428,686, the "fair and reasonable valuation" of the things omitted. The instruction then told the jury to add to the remainder the "fair and reasonable valuation" of the additions that were made. The contract provided what should constitute the evidence; namely, the contractor and the architect should first agree on the amount of an addition and the amount so agreed upon should be inserted in a written order before any change was made. It is an admitted fact that such agreements and such orders were never made.

[2] Instruction IV was properly refused because there was no evidence before the jury which would enable the jury to apply the instruction as worded. If it be said that the record shows some evidence of the actual cost of the additions and that the actual cost is some evidence of the "fair and reasonable value," the answer is that the contract ex industria appointed the contractor and the architect as the valuers and under the undisputed record they never made the valuation. It follows that the trial court did not err in refusing to instruct the jury to apply the rule stated in the contract when the parties by their actions had precluded either party from producing the data which constituted the evidence specified in the contract.

[3] The defendant then complains because the trial court did instruct the jury as follows:

> "If you find that the total cost of the work provided for by the contract was increased—that is, the work originally provided for by the contract—if you can separate that and find that the cost of that work was increased, then you should deduct that increase but not exceeding $12,000, from plaintiff's compensation, unless you find that the guaranty clause of the contract has been waived by agreement or dealings of the parties." (Italics defendant's.)

The defendant's principal objection to the instruction is addressed to the part which he has placed in italics. He earnestly contends there is "absolutely no evidence anywhere in the case of a waiver by the defendant of the guaranty clause of the contract." In this he is certainly mistaken. He admits that his architect and the contractor from the very beginning failed to make "fair and reasonable valuations" before changes were ordered; that numerous changes were ordered; that some changes were of omissions and some changes were for additions; and that no written orders were made. He admits, as, indeed, he must, that these acts excused the plaintiff, at the time of the trial, from producing the written orders. But those written orders were the evidence designated in the contract by the use of which the parties were thereafter to determine what, if any, liability had arisen on the guaranty. The question of waiver or nonwaiver was the principal question litigated in the trial court. The trial court instructed thereon. Unquestionably the jury, at least in part, rested its verdict thereon. This court may not disturb the judgment under such circumstances. Cavanagh v. Keplinger (Cal. Sup.) 266 P. 287, is directly in point and involved a similar set of facts.

[4] In his third point the defendant contends that the evidence is insufficient to show that the plaintiff was entitled to any greater compensation than $12,000. He states that the point involves a reference to his contentions under points 1 and 2. Without repeating, we think we have made it clear that the evidence did not show that the plaintiff had constructed the building at an increased cost in such a manner as to authorize any deduction whatever from $24,000, the compensation provided in the written contract. Nevertheless we will state our views in a slightly different manner. The contract provided that the compensation of the plaintiff would be $24,000. It further provided how, under certain circumstances, that compensation should be diminished. Turning to defendant's proposed instructions III and IV, it is clear that it was and is the contention of the defendant that the contract provided in effect that at the final settlement the compensation of the plaintiff would be ascertained as follows: From the total cost of the building deduct the original estimate as modified by the changes made in the manner stated in the contract and thus ascertain the excess, if any, over such estimate; from $12,000 deduct of the excess not more than $12,000; and, if there is a remainder, the plaintiff is entitled to it. The contract, when introduced, made a prima facie showing as to the amount claimed by the plaintiff, $24,000. But there was no evidence from which we can obtain the data to deduct any sum, or sums, therefrom except $8,000, which it is admitted had been paid. The defendant contends that the trial court erred in denying his motion for a new trial. In presenting that point we undertand that he but emphasizes the foregoing points. For the reasons already stated, this point is without merit.

[5] Over the objection of the defendants, the plaintiff testified that the reasonable value of his services was $47,561.96. As there was a written contract fixing an agreed value, the defendant asserts that this ruling was error. The point is not well taken. As the contract had been fully performed, the plaintiff was within his rights when he inserted as the third cause of action a common count. Castagnino v. Balletta, 82 Cal. 250, 258, 23 P. 127. The evidence objected to was directly and clearly responsive to the allegations contained in that cause of action. As we have shown above, the parties had made many changes in their contract, but nevertheless they had proceeded to execute it. Under well-established rules the contractor was entitled to the reasonable value of his services and not the value stated in the contract, from which the parties had departed. Naylor v. Adams, 15 Cal. App. 548, 556, 115 P. 335. Furthermore, the verdict of the jury showed on its face that the jury did not award the plaintiff any sum not authorized by the express terms of the contract.

[6] The last point made is that the trial court erred in allowing the plaintiff to give testimony regarding the cost of apparatus for supplying steam heating as distinguished from gas heating, because, as the defendant contends, the contract covered the subject. If we had been in a position to uphold the defendant in his contentions regarding the guaranty, the point now under consideration would be material. However, in view of what is said above regarding the acts of the parties in waiving certain provisions of the contract, this point is wholly immaterial. It is admitted that gas heating was provided for in the contract, that the apparatus has been installed, and that the defendant is liable for the cost. It is not disputed but what steam-heating apparatus was also installed, and the sole question regarding that matter is as to whether the cost of the steam-heating apparatus increased or decreased the cost over the sum as estimated.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. RAY. (Cr. 1614.) ★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 2, 1928.

1. Automobiles ⚷355(6)—Evidence held to sustain conviction for operating automobile on public highway while under influence of liquor (Motor Vehicle Act, § 112).

Evidence in prosecution for operating an automobile upon a public highway while under the influence of intoxicating liquor in violation of Motor Vehicle Act, § 112 (St. 1927, p. 1436 [Deering's Consol. Supp. 1925–1927, Act 5128]) held sufficient to sustain conviction.

2. Criminal law ⚷1175—Verdict finding defendant guilty of violation of Vehicle Act "a felony," but recommending imprisonment in county jail, held not cause for complaint by defendant (Motor Vehicle Act, § 112).

Verdict, in prosecution for operating an automobile on a public highway while under the influence of liquor, finding defendant guilty of violation of Motor Vehicle Act, § 112 (St. 1927, p. 1436 [Deering's Consol. Supp. 1925–1927, Act 5128]), a felony as charged in count 2 of the information and recommending imprisonment in county jail, held not ground for complaint by defendant, in view of Pen. Code, § 17, on ground that verdict was defective as not complying with provision of act requiring that jury shall recommend punishment and limiting sentence to such recommendation.

3. Criminal law ⚷992—Crime designated as felony in verdict shall be deemed "misdemeanor" after judgment imposing punishment other than imprisonment in state prison.

In any case where term "felony" is written into a verdict through inadvertence or otherwise, it shall be deemed a misedmeanor for all purposes after judgment imposing a punishment other than imprisonment in state prison.

4. Criminal law ⚷992—Sentence of one year in county jail pursuant to recommendation of jury finding defendant guilty of violating vehicle act held proper; "recommend"; "assess"; "declare" (Motor Vehicle Act, § 112).

Sentence of one year in the county jail pursuant to verdict finding defendant guilty of violation of section 112, Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1927, p. 1436 [Deering's Consol. Supp. 1925–1927, Act 5128]), a felony, and recommending imprisonment in county jail, held fully within recommendation of the jury and the court's discretion, since provision of the act limiting sentence to recommendation of jury only requires that judge may not impose a greater sentence than that recommended by jury; the word "recommend" meaning to advise or counsel and not expressing finality such as words "assess" or "declare."

Works, P. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Douglas L. Edmonds, Judge.

Stanford Ray was convicted for operating an automobile upon a public highway while under the influence of intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. B. Conlin and E. R. Simon, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The appellant was charged by information, filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county, consisting of two counts, with having violated the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517), in that while driving an automobile in said county he collided with another vehicle, causing personal injury to the driver thereof, and did then and there fail, neglect, and refuse to stop and render aid; and also that he drove and operated said automobile upon a public highway while under the influence of intoxicating liquor. Appellant was convicted of the latter charge, and appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for new trial.

It is strenuously urged that "there was no evidence of any kind or description that the defendant was operating the motor vehicle, to wit, the Cadillac roadster, at the time of the accident while in an intoxicated condition, or while under the influence of intoxicating liquor," as defined by section 112 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1927, p. 1436; Deering's Consol Supp. 1925–1927, Act 5128). The portions of said section here applicable read as follows:

> "It shall be unlawful for any person * * * who is under the influence of intoxicating liquor * * * to drive a vehicle on any public highway within this state.
> "Any person violating the provisions of this section shall upon conviction be punished by imprisonment in the county jail for not less than ninety days nor more than one year or by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than one nor more than three years, or by a fine of not less than two hundred dollars, * * * nor more than five thousand dollars * * *, and upon every verdict of guilty under this section, the jury shall recommend the punishment and the court in imposing sentence shall have no authority to impose a sentence greater than that recommended by the jury."

It is conceded that on September 25, 1927, at about 4 o'clock a. m., Melvin W. Metcalf, with three companions, was driving a Ford coupé in a southerly direction on Lincoln boulevard, in the city of Santa Monica, and that appellant was at the same time driving a Cadillac car in a northerly direction upon said boulevard, he also having three passengers; that when Metcalf reached a point south of the intersection of Lincoln and Pico boulevards, the two machines collided, appellant's car running into the left side of the Ford; that because of the crowded condition of the latter machine, Metcalf permitted his left foot to hang outside the door, which was partly open, and at the impact of the automobiles his foot was severed from the leg.

[1] It appears from the testimony of various witnesses called by the people that immediately after the accident Ray alighted, stating that he could not drive his machine further because it was damaged, and that he assisted in summoning an ambulance; that during his conversations with the witnesses they smelled wine or liquor on his breath. Metcalf, and others who were riding with him, swore that they noticed the headlights of a machine approaching, and that almost instantly it swerved to the left and sideswiped the Ford, turning it completely around. Appellant and one of his witnesses testified that Ray had previously taken two or three drinks of wine only, but a detective who removed appellant from the Georgia street police station, at about 10:30 a. m. of the same day, stated that he asked Ray how he was feeling, to which the latter replied that he was not feeling well, and that he talked and staggered "like a drunken man," and plainly smelled of liquor, and admitted that although informed that Metcalf had been killed, he did not remember very much about the accident. A Santa Monica police officer searched the Cadillac while Metcalf lay on the ground awaiting an ambulance, and testified that he found a bottle of gin and a pint bottle containing "bootleg corn liquor" in appellant's machine. It was testified that Ray talked as though he had been drinking some kind of intoxicating liquor; that "he was thick-tongued like he had a mouthful of mush; * * * he could not bring his speech out clear." It may well be that the jury concluded from the defendant's inability to control his automobile, and from his breath, speech, and unsteady walk, as well as his lapse of memory as to the most important event of the day, that he was under the influence of liquor while driving, and was intoxicated at the time of the accident. We cannot say as a matter of law that the jury were not warranted in so finding, and it appears from the record that there is ample evidence to support the verdict and judgment.

The verdict returned by the jury reads as follows:

> "We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find the defendant guilty of violation of section 112, California Vehicle Act, a felony, as charged in count II of the information, and recommend imprisonment in the county jail."

[2, 3] It is contended that this verdict is defective for the reason that it does not comply with the provision of said act requiring that "the jury shall recommend the punishment," and limiting the sentence to such recommendation. Section 17 of the Penal Code provides that a felony is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, and that every other crime is a misdemeanor. The jury in the instant case recommended imprisonment in the county jail, and the court pronounced sentence in accordance therewith, and fixed the period of imprisonment at one year. We think appellant cannot complain of the fact that while the jury may have deemed his offense of such a serious nature as to be classed as a felony, they recommended, and the court administered, the lesser degree of punishment. It is not impossible that the term "felony" was written into the verdict through inadvertence, but, however that may be, it is the established rule in this state that in any such case "it shall be deemed a misdemeanor for all purposes after a judgment imposing a punishment other than imprisonment in the state prison." People v. War, 20 Cal. 117; Doble v. Superior Court, 197 Cal. 556, 241 P. 852.

[4] It is clearly the intent of the statute that the judge shall have some discretion, for in pronouncing sentence the only curtailment of his authority is that he may not impose a greater sentence than that recommended by the jury. In this instance, had the jury specifically recommended a term of one year, of course the situation here presented would not have arisen. But its members must be presumed to have known both their own authority and the punishment which might be imposed, and the effect of this verdict is to recommend imprisonment in a county jail for a term not more than the maximum provided by the statute, to wit, for a period of one year. The sentence pronounced was, therefore, fully within the recommendation of the jury and the court's jurisdiction. But appellant insists that the language "shall recommend the punishment," coupled with the provision of the same section that a jail sentence shall be from 90 days to one year, requires that the jury fix the length of term, and that, having failed to do so in this case, the trial court had no authority to pronounce sentence, that the jury may have intended that the minimum penalty be inflicted, whereas the court was left with a discretion to direct that appellant be confined for any length of time from 90 days to one year, and did in fact pronounce sentence of imprisonment in the county jail for one year. No authorities are cited, and we have been unable to find any passing upon the exact question here presented, which is: Was it the legislative intent in imposing upon juries the power to "recommend the punishment" that they merely determine the maximum by stating whether time be served in the county jail or in the penitentiary or the punishment shall be payment of a fine, or, that they must exercise the discretion usually vested in the court and decide what sentence shall be imposed by specifying the length of the term? We think that this language of section 112 of the Motor Vehicle Act is meant to be used in the sense of character of punishment. It states that: "Any person violating the provisions of this section shall upon conviction be punished by imprisonment in the county jail," or by fine, "or by imprisonment in the state prison," or fine, "and upon every verdict of guilty under this section, the jury shall recommend the punishment and the court in imposing sentence shall have no authority to impose a sentence greater than that recommended by the jury." Had it been intended that the jury should fix the exact term of imprisonment, it seems clear that the provision would have so stated by depriving the court of "authority to impose a sentence other than that recommended," whereas a discretion now remains with the trial judge to pronounce a sentence within that recommended by the jury. Had the intent been as contended by appellant, it would seem, too, that other and more appropriate terms would have been employed to indicate it. For example, it might have provided that the jury "fix," or "declare," or "assess" the punishment; or the language used in section 190 of the Penal Code might well have been employed to the effect that the punishment be "at the discretion of the jury." The word "recommend" is certainly not apt if it was the intention of the Legislature to commit to the jury the duty and authority of fixing the exact punishment. It means to advise or counsel, and is not a word expressing finality such as the words

"assess" or "declare," used in the statutes of a number of other states where the right to fix the exact punishment upon conviction of crime has been given to the jury. Discretion of this nature is vested in the trial court in all cases except when otherwise expressly provided by the Legislature. To construe this provision otherwise would be strained and, we think, contrary to the legislative intent.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

I concur: THOMPSON, J.

WORKS, P. J. I dissent. Section 112 of the Motor Vehicle Act declares that the jury shall recommend the punishment, and under its provisions punishment may take on any one of three forms: (1) Confinement in the county jail for a fixed period; (2) confinement in the state prison for a fixed period; (3) fine in a fixed amount. The punishment, therefore, in my opinion, is not recommended if the verdict contemplates only a confinement in either of the two places, without specifying a period of time, or a fine without specifying an amount.

It is provided in the section that the court "shall have no authority to impose a sentence greater than that recommended by the jury." It is obvious that in imposing "sentence" the court must either order imprisonment for a stated term, either in the county jail or in the state prison, or must order a fine in a stated amount. The statute provides a range within which imprisonment may be ordered, or a fine imposed. Imprisonment in the county jail is to be "not less than ninety days nor more than one year"; in the state prison "not less than one nor more than three years". A fine may be "not less than $200 nor more than $5,000." It will be observed how wide a discretion is left to the court, under the construction placed upon the statute by the majority opinion, after the jury has recommended the punishment. This is particularly to be noted in case a fine is recommended. The court may then impose a fine as low as $200, practically a nominal sum when placed beside the comparatively enormous amount of $5,000, an amount 25 times as great as the minimum which may be named. Under such circumstances it seems to me obvious that the jury does not recommend the punishment when it prescribes merely an imprisonment, either in the county jail or in the state prison, or prescribes merely a fine.

I think the Legislature intended the words, "a sentence greater," in that part of the section limiting the power of the court, to connect with and to relate principally to the words "less" and "more" where they appear three times in the statute. I think, finally, under the entire language of the enactment, that a jury fails to recommend the punishment unless it prescribes a maximum period of confinement in the county jail or in the state prison, or a maximum fine. If section 112 were intended to operate as declared in the majority opinion, it seems that the Legislature would have provided that the jury should recommend whether the punishment be by confinement in the county jail, or in the state prison, or by fine. The jury is, instead, required to recommend the punishment.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 28, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑979(2)—Granting of new trial for insufficiency of evidence is conclusive, on appeal, in absence of abuse of discretion.

On appeal from order granting motion for new trial on ground of insufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict, trial judge's action is conclusive on appellate court, in absence of abuse of discretion.

2. New trial 🔑65—Trial judge must weigh both parties' evidence and grant new trial, if not legally satisfied with decision.

On motion for new trial, the trial judge must weigh and consider the evidence of both parties and grant a new trial, if not legally satisfied with the decision.

3. Appeal and error 🔑948—On appeal from order granting new trial for insufficiency of evidence, appellant must show abuse of discretion.

On appeal from order granting new trial on ground of insufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict, it is incumbent on appellant to show that trial judge abused his discretion, which can rarely be done except by showing that there is no evidence to support verdict for respondent.

4. Appeal and error 🔑757(3)—Appellant railway company, not printing in brief evidence explaining unreasonable delay in moving train from street crossing, showed no error in granting plaintiffs' motion for new trial of action for resulting loss by fire (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c).

Railway company, not printing in its brief or appended supplement evidence explaining its unreasonable delay in removing train from street crossing, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, on appeal taken on typewritten transcript from order granting plaintiffs' motion for new trial of action for damages because of fire department's inability to reach fire, showed no error in such respect.

5. Railroads 🔑222(3)—Unexplained blockading of street crossing by railroad train is negligence.

The unexplained blockading of a street crossing by a railroad train is negligence on the part of the railroad company.

6. Railroads 🔑222(5)—Evidence held to make out prima facie case of negligence in leaving train across street, preventing fire department from reaching fire.

Plaintiff's evidence, in action against railway company for loss by fire because of fire department's inability to reach it, due to blockading of street crossing by train, held sufficient to make out prima facie case of negligence.

7. Railroads 🔑222(5)—Evidence held to show that unexplained blockading of street crossing by train was proximate cause of loss by fire.

Evidence held to show that defendant railway company's unexplained blockading of street crossing by train was proximate cause of loss by fire, which firemen were unable to reach promptly with their apparatus.

8. Railroads 🔑222(3)—Plaintiff's failure to provide better fire-fighting apparatus and employees and dumping of rubbish where fire started held not contributory negligence barring recovery of damages from railroad blocking street crossing with train.

Plaintiff corporation's failure to provide better fire-fighting equipment and employees experienced in fighting fires and its dumping of rubbish in yard at point where fire started held not, as matter of law, contributory negligence barring recovery of damages from railway company negligently blockading street crossing with train, thereby preventing firemen from reaching fire.

9. Negligence 🔑136(9)—Contributory negligence is fact question, when reasonable minds might differ.

When the question of contributory negligence is one upon which reasonable minds might differ, it is a question of fact and not one of law.

10. Damages 🔑6—That extent of damage, proximately caused by acts complained of, cannot be accurately measured does not relieve guilty party.

When acts complained of are proximate cause of damage suffered, the guilty party is not to be relieved merely because the extent of the damage cannot be accurately measured.

11. Railroads 🔑222(5)—Damages by fire, which had not reached property lost when firemen tried to cross railroad tracks blocked by defendant's train, held recoverable as against contention that they were speculative, contingent, and remote.

Evidence that fire was confined to rubbish pile in yard and had not reached building in which property lost was stored, when firemen endeavored to cross railroad tracks blocked by defendant's train, held to warrant recovery of damages sustained, as against contention that they were speculative, contingent, and remote, on theory that entire loss could have been prevented and damages easily ascertained had street not been blocked.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Action by the Hanlon Drydock & Shipbuilding Company and others against the Southern Pacific Company. Verdict for defendant, and, from an order granting plaintiffs' motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs sued for damages alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence in permitting one of its freight trains to remain standing an unreasonable length of time across the public streets leading into the plant of the Hanlon Drydock & Shipbuilding Company located on the water front in East Oakland. The damage to plaintiffs is alleged to have resulted from a fire which broke out in this plant and which could not be reached by the fire department because the only means of ingress were obstructed by defendant's train. The cause was tried before a jury, which returned a verdict for the defendant. The trial judge granted plaintiff's motion for a new trial upon the grounds of insufficiency of the evidence and that the verdict was against law. Defendant has appealed from this order upon a typewritten transcript. As the Hanlon Drydock & Shipbuilding Company is the real party in interest, we will hereafter refer to it as the plaintiff and respondent.

[1-3] In appeals of this nature, where a new trial has been granted on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, the action of the trial judge "is conclusive in the appellate court, unless there has been an abuse of discretion" (Daniels v. McGuire, 52 Cal. App. 188, 189, 198 P. 421), because the trial judge "must weigh and consider the evidence of both parties and determine for itself the just conclusion to be drawn from it; and it is the duty of such court to grant a new trial if not legally satisfied with the decision" (20 Cal. Jur. 111). When, therefore, an appeal is taken from an order granting a new trial on this ground, it is incumbent upon the appellant to show that the trial judge abused the discretion lodged with him, and this can rarely be done except by showing that there is no evidence which would have supported a verdict for the respondent.

say that when an appeal is taken upon a typewritten transcript the appellant is required to print in its brief, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as it desires to call to the attention of the appellate court. Section 953c, Code Civ. Proc. The appellant here has made no pretense of meeting the demands of the statute, but merely states that there is no evidence to show negligence on the part of the engineer, or conductor of the train, or of any other employee of the company. The respondent points out that the undisputed evidence is that at about 8:40 p. m. of September 6, 1923, the freight train, containing 44 cars and measuring about 1,800 feet in length, left the yards of the appellant in West Oakland, being pulled by a regular passenger engine; that, before it had proceeded a mile from the starting point, the engineer discovered that the steam pressure was dropping and that fire was flashing "from the firebox into the cab"; that though he knew that "something was wrong" he continued on his way for more than a mile to Ninth avenue at a continually decreasing speed until the train stopped because the steam pressure was so low that the brakes were applied automatically and the engine could not move the cars; that the engineer thereupon detached the engine from the train, ran the engine into the roundhouse, and left the cars standing without an engine for a period of an hour and three-quarters; that these public thoroughfares—Fifth avenue and Ninth avenue—were thus obstructed, shutting off all means of ingress and egress from the plant of respondent and of other industrial concerns in the vicinity; that, though the engineer, conductor, and brakeman all telephoned to the offices of appellant, no attempt was made to move the train, or to "break" it at either street crossing, until after the company was notified that a fire had broken out in respondent's plant. In addition to this undisputed evidence, the respondent argues that the court and jury should take judicial notice that for a distance of about half a mile the right of way of appellant was not intersected by any public street crossing, and from this it is said that negligence might be inferred from the failure of the engineer to stop in this space when he knew that his engine was out of order and that it was gradually failing to pull the train. Attention is also directed to the rules of the appellant company which prohibit leaving trains standing upon a street crossing, and from this it is argued that appellant was negligent both in not stopping before reaching Ninth avenue, and in not breaking the train at these crossings until the lapse of an hour and three-quarters.

There is ample authority for the rule that the unexplained blockading of a street crossing by a railroad train is negligence on the part of the railroad company. So. Ry. Co. v. Floyd, 99 Miss. 519, 55 So. 287, 288; Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Chambers, 183 Ala. 155, 62 So. 724, 727; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Roberts, 3 Neb. (Unoff.) 425, 91 N. W. 707, 709; Matoza v. S. P. Co., 59 Cal. App. 636, 640, 211 P. 252; Houren v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 236 Ill. 620, 86 N. E. 611, 613, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1110, 127 Am. St. Rep. 309. The respondent may safely rely on this rule, having shown sufficient evidence to make out a prima facie case of negligence. The appellant, not having printed the evidence in explanation of its unreasonable delay in removing the obstruction, has failed to show error in this respect.

[7] The appellant argues that the acts complained of were not the proximate cause of any of the damage to the respondent. Here again the appellant has failed to print the evidence upon which it relies. The respondent directs our attention to the evidence showing that two companies of firemen responded to the alarm, that they were unable to cross the railroad tracks with their apparatus, and that, after some delay, they climbed through the train and went on foot to respondent's plant, where they endeavored to control the fire with the inadequate hose on the premises. It also appears that after a half hour's delay the fire apparatus was brought up and the fire was then quickly extinguished. Expert witnesses testified that but for this delay the fire could have been extinguished sooner and the greater part of respondent's property could have been saved. These facts bring the issue within the rule of Houren v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 236 Ill. 620, 86 N. E. 611, 614, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1110, 127 Am. St. Rep. 309.

[8, 9] The issue of contributory negligence is argued on the theory that respondent should have provided better fire-fighting equipment and employees experienced in fighting fires. The suggestion is also made that respondent was negligent in dumping rubbish in the yard at the point where the fire started. The appellant does not cite any authorities to support its argument that such acts constitute contributory negligence as a matter of law. The rule is settled that, when the question of contributory negligence is one upon which reasonable minds might differ, it is a question of fact and not one of law. Erdevig v. Market St. Ry. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 264 P. 252.

[10, 11] Finally, it is argued that respondent could not recover in any event because the damages it suffered were speculative, contingent, and remote. When the acts complained of are the proximate cause of the damage suffered, the guilty party is not to be relieved merely because the extent of the damage cannot be accurately measured. 17 Cor. Jur. 756, 759; Learned v. Castle, 78 Cal. 454, 461, 18 P. 872, 21 P. 11. It has been said that, where the circumstances are such that an exact computation of the damages cannot be made:

> "The approved practice is to leave it to the good sense of the jury, as reasonable men, to form from the evidence the best estimate that can be made under the circumstances, as a basis of compensatory damages for the actionable injury." Jenkins v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 67 N. J. Law, 331, 334, 51 A. 704, 705, 57 L. R. A. 309.

Here the evidence tended to prove that when the firemen endeavored to cross the railroad tracks the fire was confined to a rubbish pile in the yard and had not reached the building in which the property lost was stored. It is respondent's contention that if the street had not been blocked by appellant the firemen would have been able to prevent all this loss, and hence that the damages could have been easily ascertained.

The order is affirmed.

We concur: KOFORD, P. J.; STURTEVANT, J.

HUMPHREYS et al. v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 21, 1928.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑721(1)—Where board of supervisors transferred land previously held as hospital land to park commissioners for park, park could be used generally for "park" purposes.

Where lands embraced within boundaries of Duboce park were originally part of pueblo lands of city of San Francisco, and such lands, by ordinances ratified by St. 1858, p. 52, and confirmed by Act Cong. July 1, 1864 (12 Stat. 333), were dedicated to public use for uses of hospital, but lands were not used for hospital purposes, and board of supervisors, under power conferred by city charter confirmed by Legislature by St. 1899, p. 241, transferred such land to board of park commissioners to be set aside as a park, such park is not limited to any particularly specified use, but to use generally for park purposes; a "park" being a pleasure ground, a place of enjoyment and recreation, and for public generally.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑513(7)—Evidence supported finding that tunnel opening in park did not obstruct free use of park.

In action to enjoin collection of assessments for construction of tunnel through, over, and on portion of park, evidence held to support finding that area to be occupied by portal and approach to tunnel was generally unfrequented by visitors to park, and that construction and operation of such portal would not obstruct free and comfortable use and enjoyment in customary manner of park or any portion thereof.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑721(1)—Public use of small area of park for tunnel opening held not an unlawful use.

Public use of small area of park, which part was used infrequently by public, for opening of tunnel, to provide way of rapid transit between residential part of city and down town section, held not to be so inconsistent with purposes for which park was dedicated as to constitute an unlawful use thereof.

4. Constitutional law 🔑251—"Due process of law" requires orderly proceeding adapted to nature of case in which citizen has opportunity to be heard and protect rights (Const. U. S. Amend. 14).

"Due process of law" under Const. U. S. Amend. 14, requires an orderly proceeding adapted to nature of case in which citizen has had an opportunity to be heard and to defend, enforce, and protect his rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Due Process of Law.]

5. Municipal corporations 🔑513(7)—Objectors had burden of showing errors in decision of board of supervisors assessing property for tunnel, except as shown on face of record.

In action to enjoin collection of assessments for construction of tunnel, burden of proof rested on objectors to show errors in decision of board of supervisors assessing lands, except in so far as they were shown on face of record.

6. Municipal corporations 🔑493(6)—Board of supervisors' conclusions regarding assessments for tunnel were conclusive, except as against attack for fraud or mistake.

No appeal lying from finding of board of supervisors regarding assessment of lands for construction of tunnel in city, their conclusion was final and conclusive, except as against attack on ground of fraud or mistake.

7. Municipal corporations 🔑513(7)—Finding that lots excluded from assessment for tunnel would not be benefited held warranted.

Trial court's finding that there would be no benefits to lots excluded from assessments for construction of tunnel held warranted from examination of face of record showing that such conclusion was reached by board of supervisors after due notice of protest and hearing and from expert testimony admitted at trial; court being at liberty to adopt views of either of two experts.

8. Constitutional law 🔑290(1)—Assessments for tunnel held not levied on fundamentally incorrect basis or in disregard of actual benefits so as to constitute taking of property without due process (Const. U. S. Amend. 14).

Assessments for construction of tunnel through city held not to be levied on fundamentally incorrect basis or to be arbitrary and in disregard of actual benefits so as to constitute taking of property without due process of law, in violation of state Constitution and Const. U. S. Amend. 14.

9. Municipal corporations 🔑449(2)—Assessment for tunnel held not invalidated by participation of new members of board of supervisors acting in judicial or quasi judicial capacity, where more than necessary majority of old board voted for resolution.

Assessment for construction of tunnel held not invalidated by participation of new members of board of supervisors acting in judicial or quasi judicial capacity, where three more than necessary majority of old board voted for resolution levying assessment, and at least one hearing was had before new board prior to its final action, and new members of board had more than year for investigation and consideration before final vote was cast.

10. Municipal corporations 🔑513(7)—In action to enjoin collection of assessments for tunnel, evidence regarding assessment of property in other tunnel proceedings and proposed assessment, if tunnel had gone through to other lands, held properly excluded.

In action to enjoin collection of assessments for construction of tunnel through parks, evidence that in other tunnel proceedings down town property was assessed, and that report regarding tunnel connecting approximately same sections of city by different route and location recommended that certain lands should be assessed held properly excluded, since each project presents different set of facts.

11. Appeal and error 🔑1051(1)—If questions called for conclusions of law, error in permitting testimony was harmless, where facts were before court.

In action to enjoin collection of assessments for construction of tunnel for railroad purposes permitting witnesses to testify that portion of parks to be used for railroad purposes would in no way interfere with use of parks for purposes for which they were dedicated, if error, because questions called for conclusions of law, held harmless, where facts were before court.

12. Appeal and error 🔑1058(2)—Excluding plaintiff's witness's testimony on question on which defendant's witness testified held harmless where plaintiff's witness subsequently testified regarding matter.

In action to enjoin collection of assessments for construction of tunnel, where defendant's witness was permitted to testify that exempted lands would not be benefited to same extent as lands on which assessments were levied, denying plaintiff's witness privilege of testifying on question held harmless, where he subsequently testified that lands excluded would be benefited in same way as adjoining property.

13. Witnesses 🔑280—Sustaining objection to cross-question which was argumentative and called for speculation held not error.

In action to enjoin collection of assessments for construction of tunnel, sustaining objection to question asked defendant's witness on cross-examination, "If this property had been owned by private individual which is now owned by city you would have assessed it, wouldn't you?" held proper, since question was argumentative, and called for speculation, and answer would have no material bearing on case.

14. Municipal corporations 🔑513(7)—In action to enjoin collection of assessments for tunnel, excluding testimony regarding sale of church lands and city school lands outside assessment district held not error.

In action to enjoin collection of assessments for construction of tunnel, evidence with reference to sale of church lands and city school lands outside assessment district held properly excluded.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action to enjoin collection of assessments for construction of Duboce tunnel by J. H. Humphreys and others against the City and County of San Francisco and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Treadwell, Van Fleet & Laughlin, of San Francisco, for appellants.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., and Dion R. Holm, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

LUCAS, Justice pro tem. By this action the ten parties plaintiff (appellants herein), residents and taxpayers of, and property owners in, the city and county of San Francisco, seek, on behalf of themselves and 1,700 other property owners, to enjoin the mayor and board of supervisors of said city and county from collecting assessments levied for the construction of a tunnel through Buena Vista Park, and through, over, and upon a portion of Duboce Park. Buena Vista Park lies on a high ridge of land separating that part of San Francisco lying easterly of the eastern portal of the proposed tunnel and generally known as the "down town section," and a residential part of said city lying west of the western portal of said tunnel and known as the "Sunset district." The purpose of the tunnel is to provide a way of rapid transit between these two sections of the city.

Proceedings were taken by the board of supervisors under the provisions of the so-called "Tunnel Procedure Ordinance," resulting in the assessments complained of. Authority for the enactment of this ordinance is found in certain charter amendments adopted by the electors of the city and county of San Francisco in December, 1912, and ratified by the state Legislature in 1913. Stats. 1913, at p. 1621. These amendments contain the following provisions relating to the construction of tunnels:

"Section 1. The board of supervisors are hereby empowered to order the construction of and construct any tunnel, subway or viaduct in, on, under or over any accepted or unaccepted open public street, avenue, lane, alley, place or court within the city and county, or any other land of the city and county. * * * The board of supervisors may, by an affirmative vote of at least twelve of its members, adopt an ordinance which may from time to time be revised or amended, providing a method of procedure for such improvement, work and assessment and for the ascertainment and payment of damages and for the manner in which protests against such assessments and damages awarded may be heard and determined, and for the manner in which such assessment may be collected, and paid and property delinquent thereunder may be sold, and for the procedure for fully and completely exercising the powers conferred in this section."

On the trial of the cause the court gave judgment against plaintiffs, and upheld the validity of the proceedings. From this judgment the appeal herein was taken.

Appellants raise four points on appeal, contending respectively that:

I. The tunnel, if constructed, will necessitate the unlawful use of lands now used by the people as public parks, and held by the city in trust for such purpose.

II. The assessments are either levied on a fundamentally incorrect basis or are arbitrary and in disregard of actual benefits, and in either case constitute the taking of property in violation of the state and federal Constitutions.

III. The assessments were not made by the same body which heard the protests, and the assessed landowners have never had a hearing before the board of supervisors which made the levy.

IV. The trial court, in excluding evidence offered by the plaintiffs, committed prejudicial error.

These questions will be discussed in the order stated.

In considering the question as to whether the construction of the proposed tunnel and its subsequent use as a street railway right of way would result in an unlawful use of a portion of the parks in, on, under, or over which the street cars would run, the following facts established by the evidence are important:

It is proposed that a street car line be constructed so as to enter Duboce Park on its easterly side, run a distance of 145 feet over the surface of the park to the commencement of a cut 16 feet wide and 220 feet long, varying in height from a fraction of an inch to 21 feet, where the tracks will then enter the tunnel proper through its eastern portal. Preparation for laying the tracks would necessitate the removal of a 16-foot strip of the 19-foot sidewalk and curb on the eastern boundary of the park, the removal of all lawn, shrubs and trees growing on a strip of land 16 feet wide by 365 feet in length, the obliteration of a portion of a 10-foot path across the proposed cut, the removal of the earth within the boundary of said cut, and the abandoning of at least that portion of the park occupied by the cut to exclusively railway uses. The tunnel proper would also be used exclusively as a street railway right of way. The portion of the park to be thus used is in the form of a narrow strip of land running along its southern boundary, constituting but a small fraction of the entire park area.

But little consideration need be given the situation which would exist in Buena Vista Park after the construction of the tunnel. At all points this tunnel will be entirely beneath the surface of the park at a depth ranging from 200 to 340 feet. The construction and use of this tunnel could not possibly interfere with the free or customary use of the park for any or all park purposes.

As to Duboce Park, however, conditions are, as pointed out above, different. An inquiry into the exact legal status of this park is therefore pertinent.

The lands embraced within its boundaries were originally part of the pueblo lands of the city of San Francisco. By virtue of certain ordinances passed by the common council of said city in 1885, ratified by the state Legislature on March 11, 1858 (St. 1858, p. 52) and confirmed by Act of Congress on July 1, 1864 (12 Stat. 333), these lands were dedicated to public use for the purposes of a hospital. City and County of San Francisco v. Sharp, 125 Cal. 535, 58 P. 173. That is to say, the lands were owned by the city and county of San Francisco "in trust for the use and benefit of the people of the state of California, and the inhabitants of the city and county of San Francisco, for the purposes of a public hospital." The lands, however, were never put to use for hospital purposes.

In 1897 a board of freeholders of San Francisco, elected pursuant to the provisions of section 8, article 11, of the state Constitution, prepared a charter for the city and county of San Francisco, which was ratified by the people in 1898 and confirmed by the Legislature in 1899 (Stats. 1899, p. 241). By this charter it was provided (article 2, chap. 2, § 1, subd. 31) that the board of supervisors shall have power "to transfer from one department of the city government vacant and unused lots of lands to another department." Acting under this authority, the board of supervisors, in the same year that the charter became effective, transferred the land previously held as hospital land, but thereafter known as Duboce Park, to the board of park commissioners.

On the subject of dedication the record is silent, except for a stipulation to the effect that on April 2, 1900, the board of supervisors passed an ordinance by which they named the lands in question Duboce Park, purported to set it apart as a park, and placed it under the jurisdiction of the park commissioners.

Article 14, § 1, of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco, provides that all the "parks and squares in the city and county, * * * shall be under the exclusive control and management of a board of commissioners, who shall be known and designated as park commissioners." Under the provisions of section 6 of said article the commission is given complete and exclusive control, management, and direction of the park, and exclusive right to erect structures thereon, but it is expressly provided therein that no part of said park may be leased to any person, company or corporation, nor shall any structures be erected thereon, by any one except the commissioners, and, further, that no structures shall be erected by the commissioners, "except it be within the objects and purposes for which said parks, squares, avenues and grounds were dedicated to the public." The park commissioners have continuously since April 2, 1900, exercised exclusive management and control over Duboce Park, and have expended money from park commission funds for its improvement and maintenance as a park. Since its improvement and maintenance as a park it has been used as such by the public.

[1] The terms of dedication of lands for park purposes and the manner of acquisition have an important bearing upon the uses to which such lands may be put. The rule, amply supported by cited authorities, is fairly expressed in 20 California Jurisprudence, p. 466:

> "A distinction is to be observed between cases where land for a public park or square was dedicated without special restriction and cases where the dedication was restricted to a particular purpose. Where the dedication was without restriction any usual proper and reasonable public use may be made of the park; but where a particular purpose was expressed the land must be used accordingly. This distinction is clearly apparent where, on the one hand, land has been dedicated for park purposes by a private individual, and where, on the other hand, the municipal corporation holds the full title to the land for public uses without restriction. Where title is in an individual the land must be used as directed by him. But when the municipality holds the title for public uses, without restriction, the legislative power may regulate the purposes for which the public may use the land, so long as such use is consistent with park purposes."

From the foregoing, it is apparent that the use to which Duboce Park, or any part thereof, may be put is not limited to any particularly specified use, but to use generally for park purposes. The language of the decisions seems to indicate that a park is a pleasure ground—a place of enjoyment and recreation, and for the public generally. Hall v. Fairchild-Gilmore-Wilton Co., 66 Cal. App. 615, 227 P. 649. It eliminates all idea of business or administrative uses, or enjoyment by a limited number of people.

Chief Justice Searls, in the case of People ex rel. Britton v. Park & Ocean R. R. Co., 76 Cal. at page 160, 18 P. 141, 143, ably discusses a situation existing in Golden Gate Park, probably one of the greatest places for recreation and enjoyment in any city, when, in 1888, it was sought to abate as a nuisance the steam railroad running across a portion of the park, and to enjoin its use and operation. He said:

> "A purpresture exists where one incloses or makes several to himself that which ought to be common to many.
> "The title to the Golden Gate Park under the several acts cited is in the city and county of San Francisco. But it is dedicated to the use of the public. The city holds it in trust for the public use. The right of the public is to have the free use and enjoyment of the park as such.
> "Whatever materially interferes with and unlawfully abridges this right of the public it is their right to have corrected.
> "The unlawful construction of a railroad, a statute, or any building upon the park is a purpresture. But every purpresture is not a nuisance. It may or may not be a nuisance.
> "In the case of a park, if it unlawfully obstructs the free passage or use in the customary manner of such park by the public, it is a nuisance, and may be abated as such by a court of equity.
> "If it falls short of this, the remedy is not by the people, who are not injured, but by the holder of the legal title."

The question to be decided in that case was whether or not the railroad unlawfully obstructed the free passage over or use of the park in the customary manner by the public. The court found that the roadbed of the defendant railroad company passed through a portion of the park that had always been, and then was, unused, with the exception of about half an acre, which, until the construction of the road, had been used for the purposes of a temporary nursery; that all of the lands within the park occupied by said defendant had always been, and then were, generally unfrequented by visitors to the park, and that the construction, maintenance, and operation of the railroad in no way affected or obstructed the free and comfortable use and enjoyment of said park, or any portion thereof, in the customary manner by persons frequenting the same, and that the people of the state of California had not been prevented from going with safety and comfort from one part of the park to another. Following these findings the court held that:

> "A railroad in a public park, constructed and managed as in the case at bar, may be a nuisance, calling for the intervention of the supreme power of the state to conserve the rights of the general public; or it may be a medium of ingress, egress, and transportation essential to the full enjoyment by the people of the privileges and blessings accorded them in the creation and dedication of such park. We deem the findings conclusive of the case, and are of opinion they are supported by the evidence. * * * For any and all intrusions upon the park which work no injury to the public, the city and county of San Francisco, as the trustee holding the legal title, can alone maintain an action."

[2, 3] In the case under consideration, the witness M. M. O'Shaughnessy, city engineer of the city and county of San Francisco, testified that the space to be used by the proposed tunnel and railway in Duboce Park is now mostly occupied by brush and shrub, and would not, in his judgment, impair the usefulness of the park in any way; that he had been in the park probably 20 times in the last three years, and had never seen anybody in that portion of the park, and that it was unfrequented.

B. P. Lamb, the secretary of the board of park commissioners, called as a witness by the plaintiffs, testified on cross-examination that he was familiar with Duboce Park, had been there frequently, and that the portion in question was not a frequented part of the park.

M. J. Callahan, another witness, testified that he made a preliminary study of the park, visited it about 20 times—for a while nearly every day, and then every other day for about a month, and thereafter not less than once a week and sometimes twice a week—that the major portion of the surface of the ground within the area in question was occupied by high shrubs and trees growing densely together, and that in his opinion its use for tunnel purposes would not interfere with the use and enjoyment of the park.

Based on this evidence, the court found:

> "* * * That the area so to be occupied by said portal and approach consists of a strip about 16 feet wide measured at right angles to Duboce avenue and about 220 feet long measured along the northerly line of Duboce avenue; that said strip of land is along the southerly line of said so-called Duboce Park consisting of a lawn and a small amount of shrubbery; that all of said strip of land has always been, and now is generally, unfrequented by visitors to said so-called park, and that the construction, maintenance, and operation of said easterly portal, as aforesaid, as the same is by said plan to be constructed, operated, and maintained, in nowise affects, or will in nowise obstruct, a free and comfortable use and enjoyment in the customary manner of the said so-called park or any portion thereof by all or any persons frequenting the same, nor will any person be prevented from going in safety and comfort from one part of said so-called park to another part thereof, or from using and enjoying the same by reason thereof."

While the expressed purpose for the construction of the Duboce tunnel was to facilitate transportation between two distant parts of the city, the construction of the tunnel and the street railroad leading thereto and therein would incidentally, and to some extent at least, be a medium of ingress, egress, and transportation, adding to the full enjoyment by the public of the privileges of the park.

In the light of the foregoing legal principles, the evidence, and the findings of the court, we are of the opinion that the court was justified in making the finding above quoted, that the finding is supported by the evidence, and that the public use to which the small area of the park in question will be put when the proposed improvements are completed would not be so inconsistent with the purposes for which the park was dedicated as to constitute an unlawful use thereof.

In connection with the second point raised by appellants, namely, that the assessments complained of were so levied as to amount to the taking of property without due process, the following facts are to be considered:

While, as above stated, the object of the proposed tunnel is to provide a way of rapid transit between two sections of the city and county of San Francisco ,one lying to the east and one to the west of said tunnel, the assessment district includes only lands west of the tunnel.

Within the boundaries of the assessment district itself are several parcels of land owned by various churches and religious bodies, upon which are constructed houses of worship used for religious purposes; also within said assessment district are several parcels of vacant land owned by the city and county of San Francisco. These are either school lands or lands reserved for fire department purposes. No assessment was levied against such church property or city lands, although church lands devoted to purposes other than religious purposes were assessed.

In following the procedure provided for under the terms of the tunnel procedure ordinance, opportunity was afforded by the board of supervisors for the filing and hearing of protests as to the extent of the proposed assessment district, the exclusion of lands therefrom, and any and all other matters in connection with the proposed tunnel construction to which interested parties might legally object.

Protests were filed by appellants herein and at a hearing thereon before the board, the points raised above as to the exclusion from assessment of church and city properties and lands lying east of the tunnel were fully presented. Witnesses were sworn and oral and documentary evidence introduced in support thereof, and thereafter the board of supervisors, in denying said protests, found and determined that the excluded lands would receive no benefit from the tunnel construction, and that they should not be assessed for said work. Appellants contend that, while the church lands and the city lands may not be subject to general taxation, they are nevertheless subject to assessment for specific benefits conferred by particular improvements. Respondents have no quarrel with this, and, indeed, when the distinction between general taxes and special assessments is considered in the light of legal authority, the correctness of such contention appears to be well established.

As to the exclusion of land east of the tunnel, appellants have this to say:

> "It is beyond the realm of reason to say that a tunnel such as this, which is constructed between two points to provide rapid transit between such points, benefits only the land which is situate at one end."

As to the exclusion of church and city lands, they contend that, since such lands are subject to assessment, failure to assess them invalidates the other assessments for the reason that, if the adjoining assessed lands within the district are benefited, the church and school lands must of necessity be also benefited, a finding to the contrary is unwarranted and untruthful, and the placing of the burden of the assessment from which such lands are freed upon the other lands in the district amounts to confiscation and to the taking of property without due process.

"Nor shall any state," reads the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

A similar provision is contained in the Constitution of California (article 1, § 13).

[4] "Due process of law" has been variously defined. As was said in the case of Jones v. Franklin County Commissioners, 130 N. C. 465, 42 S. E. at p. 149:

> "It is difficult to define with precision the exact meaning and scope of the phrase 'due process of law.' Any definition which could be given would probably fail to comprehend all the cases to which it would apply. It is probably wiser, as recently stated by Mr. Justice Miller, of the United States supreme court, to leave the meaning to be evolved 'by the gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion, as the cases presented for decision shall require, with the reasoning on which such decisions may be founded.' It may, however, be stated generally that due process of law requires an orderly proceeding, adapted to the nature of the case in which the citizen has an opportunity to be heard, and to defend, enforce, and protect his rights. A hearing, or an opportunity to be heard is absolutely essential. We cannot conceive of due process of law without this. In his argument in the Dartmouth College Case, 4 Wheat. 519, 4 L. Ed. 629, Webster defined 'due process of law,' as a proceeding 'which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial.'"

It cannot be said that the Legislature of California, in approving the charter amendments of 1912, violated the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment, for the charter amendments direct that the tunnel procedure ordinance provide a method for the ascertainment and payment of damages and for the manner in which protests may be heard and determined. Neither did the board of supervisors violate the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment when the ordinance was enacted, for it followed the directions of the charter, and made provision for such hearing and determination. The only question, therefore, is whether or not the board of supervisors in following the proceedings outlined by the tunnel procedure ordinance did something, or failed to do something, which resulted in the taking of property without due process.

[5, 6] A case similar in many respects to the one under consideration is the case of Larsen v. City and County of San Francisco, 182 Cal. p. 1, 186 P. 757, wherein the validity of the assessment levied for the construction of Twin Peaks tunnel under the provisions of the tunnel procedure ordinance was attacked on several grounds. One of the grounds was that the assessment district as laid out included lands lying east of the tunnel, and that such lands were not benefited. Another ground was that certain lands lying within the boundaries of the assessment district as finally fixed were excluded from assessment. The character of these lands does not appear from a reading of the printed decision, but respondents' counsel herein call attention to the fact that in the briefs of appellants filed with the Supreme Court in that case it is made to appear that the properties omitted from the assessment are, as in the case at bar, church properties. Be that as it may, the Larsen Case is authority for the rule that, under the language of the tunnel procedure ordinance, wherein the board of public works is directed to assess the total sum required for the improvements "upon the several lots of land benefited within the district or districts of assessment, so that each of the lots shall be assessed in accordance with its benefits caused by such tunnel construction," the necessary implication arises that no benefits shall be assessed against any parcel which the said board may find is not benefited. The case further holds that where as in the case at bar, the procedure outlined by the tunnel procedure ordinance has been strictly complied with, an opportunity for protests accorded, and a hearing had, and thereafter a final determination made by the board of supervisors as to the lands benefited or to be benefited by the proposed improvement, such determination is presumed to be correct. The burden of proof rests upon the objectors to show errors in the decision, except in so far as they are shown upon the face of the record. No appeal lying from the findings of the board of supervisors, their conclusion is final and conclusive, except as against attack on the ground of fraud or mistake.

In the Larsen Case the court said:

> "The board of supervisors is the ultimate authority which is empowered to finally determine what lands are benefited and what amount of benefits shall be assessed against the several parcels benefited by the construction of the tunnel. This determination is made after a full hearing accorded to all persons interested to make such objection as they see fit. In such a case the court will not declare the assessment void unless it can plainly see from the face of the record, or from facts judicially known, that the assessment so finally confirmed is not proportional to the benefits, or that no benefits could accrue to the property assessed. * * * It must * * * be conceded that the determination of the supervisors is at least prima facie correct, and that it could not be set aside except upon evidence showing that the decision was not sustained by the facts existing. No evidence was offered or given to show that the particular lots not assessed for the improvement were in fact benefited thereby. In the absence of such evidence it is obvious that the decision of the supervisors could not be declared invalid."

In the instant case, plaintiffs' complaint as amended contains no allegations of fraud or mistake; the allegations challenging the board's failure to assess upon all benefited lands in accordance with benefits conferred being to the effect the board's action was arbitrary rather than fraudulent. We take it that, in the absence of a contest on the grounds of fraud or mistake, it might properly be held that no extrinsic evidence was admissible for the purpose of showing the assessment invalid and that the trial court was limited to an examination of the face of the record itself in order to determine whether or not the lands excluded from assessment were in fact benefited.

"By the face of the record" is meant the face of the record of the proceedings of the board of supervisors. This record, so far as it appears, shows a strict compliance with the terms of the ordinance, a full hearing had upon the grounds of contest set forth herein, and a final judicial determination by the board after full consideration and hearing had that certain lands would not be benefited, and that they should be excluded from assessment.

However, the trial court did admit extrinsic expert testimony as to whether or not the excluded lots would be benefited. City Engineer O'Shaughnessy, who prepared the report of the board of public works, testified that in his opinion the lots would not be benefited. James H. Humphreys, a consulting engineer, one of the plaintiffs herein, testified that in his opinion they would be benefited.

[7] The trial court found there would be no benefits. We believe this finding warranted from an examination of the face of the record showing that such conclusion was reached by the board of supervisors after due notice of protest and hearing, and, if competent and material, from the expert testimony admitted at the trial, the court being at liberty to adopt the views of either of the two experts.

[8] The conclusion is therefore reached that the board, in acting under the provisions of the ordinance, neither failed to follow its provisions regarding due process nor did violence to the rule by acting in a purely arbitrary manner, as contended by appellants.

[9] The facts pertinent to a discussion of appellants' third point, namely, that the assessments were not made by the same body which heard the protests, are these:

The board of supervisors consists of eighteen members; no ordinance or resolution can be lawfully adopted, unless finally passed by a majority of all the members; ten constitutes a majority.

The hearing of protests before the board of supervisors was held October 31, 1922, and on April 6, 1925, "at which time said hearing was resumed, finished and concluded." The resolution modifying and confirming the report of the board of public works was passed by the board of supervisors on April 13, 1925. Four of the members of the board which heard the protests on October 31, 1922, went out of office on January 7, 1924, and three of their successors, along with 13 members of the old board, participated in a confirmation of the report and the fixing of the assessments.

Appellants contend that, at the time the assessment was levied, the board was acting judicially; that the members who had not heard the evidence were disqualified from acting; and that the mere fact of their disqualification invalidated the proceeding. As authority, several English and sister state decisions are cited to the effect that a judgment participated in by one or more disqualified judges is without jurisdiction, and therefore void. It must be conceded that the board was acting, not in an administrative, executive, or legislative capacity, but judicially or quasi judicially. It is true, however, that the authorities of other states are more or less divided on the subject of the invalidity or voidability of a decision where one who has not participated in the hearing joins in the rendition of such decision. So far as we have been able to determine, there is no California decision on the subject.

The situation is clearly expressed in 33 Corpus Juris, at page 1023:

"Generally, the disqualification of a judge of a court composed of several judges renders him incapable of acting on the premises. It has been held that if a disqualified member of a court composed of several judges participates in the hearing and determination, it invalidates the decision, even though his presence was not required to constitute a quorum, and even though the ballot was such that the decision would have been the same had he not voted. However, there are cases holding that the mere presence of, and participation by, a judge disqualified to act in a particular case does not necessarily invalidate the proceeding, especially if his presence is not necessary to constitute a quorum, or his vote would not determine the result. Some cases have held that, where a disqualified member may sit with the court to make a quorum, if he does not participate in the decision it is valid."

Considering the fact that the resolution levying the assessment was passed by a board of supervisors (a continuing body) acting in a judicial or quasi judicial capacity, and not by a court clothed with full judicial powers, and considering further that three more than the necessary majority of the old board voted for the resolution levying the assessment, and that at least one hearing was had before the new board prior to its final action, and that the new members of the new board had more than a year for investigation and consideration before the final vote was cast, we believe the rule in this case should be that the assessment was not invalidated by the participation of the new members.

[10] The remaining point raised by appellants that the trial court erred in excluding certain evidence we believe is not well taken. Appellants offered to prove that, at the time the board was considering the proposition of constructing the tunnel in question, it also had under consideration the construction of another tunnel known as the Eureka Valley tunnel, the purpose of which was to connect approximately the same two sections of the city referred to herein by a different route and location. In that report, it was recommended that the lands east of the downtown section should meet a proportionate share of the expense. This project was not put through. Appellants also offered to prove that in the Twin Peaks tunnel proceedings down town property was assessed. The court refused to permit proof of these facts, and we believe properly so, as it must be clear that each project presents such a different set of facts that the recommendations or conclusions of one proceeding as to benefits are not conclusive or even persuasive in showing benefits or lack of benefits in another proceeding.

[11] Error is also assigned in the ruling of the court permitting two witnesses to testify over appellants' objection that the portions of Buena Vista Park and Duboce Park to be used for railroad purposes would in no way interfere with the use of these parks for the purposes for which they were dedicated. It may be that the questions call for conclusions of law, but the facts were before the court, and, if error at all, we can see no harm in the court having allowed these expressions of opinion.

[12] Appellants contend that, although the witness O'Shaughnessy was permitted to give his opinion as to whether the exempted lands would or would not be benefited to the same extent as lands upon which assessments had been levied, the same privilege was denied plaintiff's witness James H. Humphreys. It is true that the court made the ruling complained of, but it is also true that subsequently during the examination of the same witness the court allowed the following question and answer:

> "Q. Now, are the properties that were owned by the city and by the religious bodies—would they be benefited in the same way that the adjoining property would be benefited by this tunnel? * * * A. It would."

[13] Further error is assigned by reason of the court sustaining an objection to the following question asked the witness O'Shaughnessy on cross-examination:

> "If this property had been owned by a private individual which is now owned by the city, you would have assessed it, wouldn't you?"

The question is argumentative, and calls for speculation, and its answer either one way or the other would have no material bearing on the case, particularly in the absence of the full record as to what the board of supervisors actually took into consideration when they determined the property in question was not benefited.

[14] Neither do we believe the point well taken that the court erred in refusing to permit certain testimony in reference to the sale of church lands and city school lands. The fact that school lands were sold without the assessment district, if it be a fact, would have but a remote bearing upon the status of the school lands within the district, and as to the school lands within the district the record shows that a part thereof had been advertised for sale, although the witness testifying to this did not know whether or not sales had actually been consummated.

So far as the sale of church property is concerned, a similar situation exists. The court sustained an objection to testimony concerning the sale of church property in other parts of San Francisco, but allowed the question to be asked as to the sale of church properties within the district. It so happened, however, that the witness from whom it was sought to elicit such information was not advised as to whether or not any such sales had been made.

Judgment affirmed.

RUBIN v. PLATT MUSIC CO. (Civ. 5378.)★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 23, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑852—Appellate court must treat apparent receipt, reciting terms of agreement, as written contract, where complaint alleges, and answer admits, such fact.

Where complaint alleges, and answer admits, that instrument reciting terms of agreement is written contract, the appellate court is bound to treat it as contract, though it appears to be no more than receipt, and evidence seems to establish oral contract.

2. Evidence 🔑413—Agent's contract being that of principal, evidence that agent acted for unnamed principal is admissible without contradicting written contract.

Agent's contract being that of principal, latter may sue or be sued thereon, though not named therein, and it may be shown that agent acted for principal, without thereby contradicting or varying written agreement by parol; such proof merely explaining transaction.

3. Evidence 🔑413—Evidence that buyer assumed he was dealing with corporation and paid it for piano, mentioned in instrument signed by corporation's branch manager only, held not inadmissible as varying written contract.

In buyer's action for breach of contract by failure to deliver piano bargained for, evidence that plaintiff assumed at all times that he was dealing with defendant corporation, and paid money and assigned his rights in contract to purchase realty to such company for piano mentioned in written instrument signed by defendant's branch manager only, held not inadmissible as tending to vary terms of written contract.

4. Trial 🔑395(6)—Finding that allegations of answer are false, so far as inconsistent with matters found true, is not good finding.

Finding that allegations of answer are false, in so far as they are inconsistent with matters found to be true, is not a good finding.

5. Appeal and error 🔑880(2)—Finding that allegations of corporation branch manager's answer were false, so far as inconsistent with matters found true, held not prejudicial to codefendant corporation.

Finding, in buyer's action against corporation and its branch manager for breach of contract by failure to deliver piano bargained for, that allegations of manager's answer are false so far as inconsistent with matters found to be true, held not prejudicial to corporation.

6. Judgment 🔑233—Trial 🔑388(1)—Court should have made findings and entered judgment as to both defendants, where case went to trial without dismissal of one.

Where complaint was laid against two defendants, and case went to trial without dismissal of one of them, court should have made findings and entered a judgment as to latter as well as his codefendant.

7. Appeal and error 🔑880(3)—Failure to enter judgment against agent held not prejudicial to codefendant principal.

Failure to enter judgment against agent, in action against both principal and agent, held not prejudicial to principal, with whom jury found that plaintiff contracted through agent.

8. Evidence 🔑42—It is common knowledge that strictness of pleading has been materially lessened.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the strictness of pleading has been lessened materially.

9. Trial 🔑396(3)—Finding that contract, alleged to be with corporation and its branch manager, was with corporation only, held not wholly different from cause of action averred.

Finding that contract, alleged to have been entered into by plaintiff with defendant corporation and its branch manager, who alone signed contract, was by and between plaintiff and defendant corporation as principal, held not wholly different from cause of action averred in complaint, nor foreign to any issue raised by pleadings.

10. Appeal and error 🔑880(2)—Variance between complaint, alleging contract with corporation and its branch manager, and finding of contract with corporation only, held not prejudicial to corporation.

Variance between complaint, alleging that contract signed by corporation's branch manager only was entered into by plaintiff with such corporation and manager, and finding that contract was between plaintiff and corporation alone as principal, held not prejudicial to corporation's rights, nor so material as to affect judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Henry Rubin against the Platt Music Company and another. From a judgment against named defendant, it appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 79 Cal. App. 756, 251 P. 243.

Peyton H. Moore and Glen E. Huntsberger, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Harry Sherr, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. This case arose out of a contract to purchase a piano. The action was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment went for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

The facts present little conflict. The plaintiff, respondent here, after seeing an advertisement of defendant announcing "Platt's 19th Anniversary Sale," went to the latter's branch store, and engaged in conversation one B. Goodman, manager of the branch, relative to the purchase of a piano. An agreement was arrived at, whereupon cash in the sum of $150 was paid over, and an instrument on a blank piece of paper was written by Goodman and handed to respondent. The instrument read as follows:

> "October 16, 1924.
> "Mrs. H. Rubin, 2756 Fairmont St.—Los Angeles, Calif. Acknowledge receipt of a check amount one hundred fifty dollars as initial payment on piano, small grand, Emerson; new, purchased from me.
> "Balance of payment should be upon delivery of the instrument, one hundred dollars cash and two lots which are located in Sunny Slope Acres near Alhambra, Calif., on Ivan St. No. 46 dimension of lots 100x190 on which you owe 937.50 payable monthly payment of 12.50 month on which I will assume payment if legally correct. B. Goodman."

Respondent and his wife held a contract to buy the real property described in the above instrument, and shortly after the writing passed both assigned their rights in such contract and delivered the instrument to Goodman. There is evidence to the effect that this assignment was in blank. The money paid was not turned in to the appellant corporation, and the blank for the name of the assignee of the lot contract was filled in with the name "B. Goodman" after the delivery of the contract. The piano was never delivered, although another was sent to respondent's house and left there for a time, when some one took it away. On numerous occasions over a period of several months respondent called at the branch store about getting the piano for which he bargained, but was only put off by Goodman with some story calculated to excuse the default.

[1] At the trial plaintiff offered testimony which strongly supported the idea that he at all times assumed he was dealing with Platt Music Company, and that he paid his money and assigned his lot contract rights to that company for the piano mentioned in the written instrument. To all of this defendant objected on the ground that it tended to vary the terms of a written contract. The instrument on its face does not appear to be more than a receipt, and the evidence adduced seems to compel the conclusion that the contract was oral. However that may be, the complaint alleges the instrument to be a written contract, and the answer admits it to be such.

The receipt recites the terms of the agreement, and, under the circumstances, we are bound to treat it as a contract.

[2, 3] Appellant cites the case of Bloom v. Coates, 190 Cal. 458, 213 P. 260, and argues that that case supports two points of law, viz.:

> "(1) That an undisclosed principal may sue or be sued, but not a disclosed principal, especially when he is present at the making of the contract; and (2) where a writing purports to be solely the agreement of the agent, and does not purport to bind the principal, or to be made in his behalf, and was not executed by him, he would not be liable."

In the proper consideration of the problems presented it will be useful to analyze a number of California cases.

Curran v. Holland, 141 Cal. 437, 75 P. 46. This action was based on a written agreement to recover a real estate loan commission. The agreement was signed by an agent of a principal undisclosed in the negotiations and in the written agreement, except that the latter signed as a witness. The action was against the principal, and oral evidence was received tending to prove that the witness to the agreement was the real principal. It is stated in the opinion that "* * * the evidence was clearly admissible." We quote further from the same case:

> "It is said in Reinhard an Agency (section 223): 'While extrinsic evidence, except in the instances heretofore pointed out, will not generally be received to vary or contradict the contents of a written instrument, such evidence is always admissible to charge with liability an undisclosed principal, or one who though disclosed is not named in the instrument.' [Italics in the text.] See, also, Reinhard on Agency, §§ 303, 328, and cases cited; Story on Agency, § 466a. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Ford v. Williams, 21 How. 289 [16 L. Ed. 36], said: 'The contract of the agent is the contract of the principal, and he may sue or be sued thereon, though not named therein; and notwithstanding the rule of law that an agreement reduced to writing may not be contradicted or varied by parol, it is well settled that the principal may show that the agent who made the contract in his own name was acting for him. This proof does not contradict the writing; it only explains the transaction.'"

Other authorities are there cited to the same intent. It does not appear that the particular point italicized in the foregoing quotation, and which is the exact point in the instant case, was before the court, but it is pertinent as an expression from a foremost text-writer, and follows as logically from the reason presented as does the precise point decided. The case Estrella Vineyard Co. v. Butler, 125 Cal. 232, 237, 238, 57 P. 980, is to the same effect.

In Ferguson v. McBean, 91 Cal. 63, 27 P. 518, 14 L. R. A. 65, Mr. Justice Beatty says:

> "It is undoubtedly true that when the principal is undisclosed he may sue or be sued, but not when he is known, and especially not when he is present at the making of the contract."

He then proceeds to say that there is much authority both ways as to whether the principal can be sued where he is disclosed, and thinks the sound policy is that he cannot be, as this would violate "the general rule that a writing cannot be varied by parol." As to the invocation of this rule, it may be said in passing that there seems to be no better reason for varying the rule where the principal is unknown or undisclosed than where he is disclosed; further, that it would seem to require oral evidence in most cases to ascertain whether he was disclosed or undisclosed. The reason given in Ford v. Williams, supra, that it is not a case of varying a written contract, because of the rule of agency that the contract of the agent is the contract of the principal, would appear to be the sound one.

Mr. Justice Shaw, in Geary Street, etc., R. R. Co. v. Rolph, 189 Cal. 59, 207 P. 539, says:

> "We are also of the opinion that the better reason, as well as the weight of authority, is against the proposition that the mere fact that the principal is known to the third person at the time he contracts with the agent prevents such third person from holding the principal liable on the contract made in the name of the agent. We treat this point because upon a new trial it may appear that the agency was fully known to plaintiff. That the principal is not liable in such a case if the circumstances, or the terms of the contract, or the two combined, show an intent by the other party to take the agent as his debtor or obligor, in preference to the principal, is, as we have said, well established, and it is manifestly in accordance with reason and justice. In such a case the election takes place at the time of the making of the contract. But where no such election or intent appears, and there is nothing more than a contract made in the name of the agent, knowing him to be such and with knowledge of the identity of his principal, the case is, and should be, governed by the well-known principle that he who acts by another acts by himself, that the contract of the agent, within the scope of his authority, is in legal effect the contract of the principal. The Civil Code states that 'an agent represents his principal for all purposes within the scope of his actual or ostensible authority, and all the rights and liabilities which would accrue to the agent within such limit, if they had been entered on his own account, accrue to the principal.' Section 2330."

Further along in the case he quotes from Story on Agency to a like effect, and adds: "* * * And he extends this doctrine to written contracts." In the same case this eminent jurist, in referring to the quoted section from Ferguson v. McBean, supra, says that "the * * * statement was not necessary to the decision, nor was the decision based on it."

The next case to consider—and we are treating these cases chronologically—is Bloom v. Coates, 190 Cal. 458, 213 P. 260. The opinion in that case quotes extensively from Ferguson v. McBean on the point that "a writing cannot be varied by parol," and, basing the ruling explicitly upon this quotation, finds a certain instruction legally bad. The court says:

> "The effect of this instruction was to inform the jury that if they should find from the evidence that appellant had knowledge of said agreement prior to the exchange, and acquiesced therein, and received the benefits thereof, she would be liable upon the agreement made by Arnold in his own name, notwithstanding that she was the sole owner of the land and that the written agreement did not purport to refer to her as a party to be bound thereby, or at all."

But it is crystal clear that any instruction with this effect would be bad without any reference to the doctrine of parol evidence. All of these conditions would be evidence proper for the jury to weigh in deciding the point, but they would not be conclusive, as the instruction seems to have intended.

We come now to the late case of Marshall v. Bernheim, 64 Cal. App. 283, 221 P. 401. The facts of that case are very similar to the instant one. The owner, the owner's agent, and the purchaser of an automobile met, and the deal resulting was a written contract whereby, upon the face of the instrument, the purchaser agreed to buy the automobile from the agent. The owner was not mentioned. When difficulties arose, the purchaser was allowed to prove by oral evidence that the real principal in the contract was the owner though not mentioned in the writing. To quote from the opinion:

> "The theory of the Ferguson Case [Ferguson v. McBean, supra] was that to permit a party to change his written contract in order to hold a known but unnamed principal would violate the parol evidence rule. Though the rule is not accepted generally in other jurisdictions, it has been followed in this state until the recent case of Geary Street, etc., R. R. Co. v. Rolph, 189 Cal. 59 [207 P. 539], where the Supreme Court implied that it should be qualified to the extent that it must appear that the contracting party elected to hold the agent instead of the principal. The Geary Street Case involved an oral contract and the Supreme Court has left uncertain the application of the rule in a case involving a written contract. Unless the execution of the contract with the agent when the principal is known and present is in itself evidence of an election to hold the agent, we cannot imagine a case in which the election could be proved by other than parol evidence. * * * In the Geary Street Case the Supreme Court say: * * * 'That the principal is not liable in such a case if the circumstances, or the terms of the contract, or the two combined, show an intent by the other party to take the agent as his debtor or obligor, in preference to the principal, is, as we have said, well established, and it is manifestly in accordance with reason and justice. In such a case the election takes place at the time of the making of the contract.' From this we assume that if the trial court should find, upon substantial evidence, that the obligee, at the time the contract was made, elected to hold the agent rather than the principal, the appellate court would be bound by the finding, but where, as here, the trial court found that the obligee took both the agent and the principal, there was no election at the time the contract was made, and, of course, we are bound by that finding."

A hearing in the Supreme Court was denied December 27, 1923.

It seems to us that the basis of the doctrine hereinabove referred to from the Ferguson v. McBean Case, supra, was erroneous; that its doctrine was not necessary to the opinion; and that its doctrine was not necessary to the decision in Bloom v. Coates, supra. We think the doctrine in Ford v. Williams, supra, is sound; that the case of Marshall v. Bernheim, supra, is in accord therewith, and that the reason for the rule of the Geary v. Rolph Case, supra, supports the Marshall v. Bernheim Case, and should be applied in the instant case.

The foregoing covers assignments of error numbered I, II, III, and VI, leaving numbers IV, V, and VII undisposed of.

[4, 5] We are in agreement with appellant (assignment No. IV) that the finding to the effect that the allegations of the answer of B. Goodman are false, in so far as they are inconsistent with the matters found to be true, is not a good finding. Krug v. Lux Brewing Co., 129 Cal. 322, 61 P. 1125. We do not see where this has prejudiced any right of appellant.

[6, 7] We are also in agreement with appellant as to his assignment No. V. The case having been brought against appellant and B. Goodman, and having gone to trial without the dismissal of B. Goodman as a defendant, the court should have made findings and entered a judgment as to him. The complaint is laid against both defendants. The findings, however, are that appellant was the principal with whom respondent contracted. We do not see where the neglect or failure to enter a judgment against the agent is prejudicial to any rights of appellant. The case of McDevitt v. Corriea, 70 Cal. App. 245, 233 P. 381, is authority only for the point that, where suit is begun against the agent after discovery that he is the agent and not the principal, and not at all against the principal—that this constitutes an election as to the party sought to be held liable. That is not the point here.

[8-10] Assignment of error No. VII:

> "That there is a substantial and material variance between the findings of the court and the pleadings of the plaintiff, in that the complaint alleges a joint contract between the plaintiff and both defendants."

We have carefully read all of the cases cited by appellant in support of his contention under this assignment. They are all very early California cases, and it is, of course, common knowledge that the strictness of pleading has been lessened materially. However, we do not think even these early cases justify the strictness demanded by appellant. The latest case cited, Mondran v. Goux, 51 Cal. 151, contains the following, which appellant quotes with approval:

> "In other words, the cause of action, if any, established by the findings, is wholly different from that averred in the complaint, and is foreign to any issue raised by the pleadings. The rule is well settled that a plaintiff must recover, if at all, upon the cause of action set out in his complaint, and not upon some other which may be developed by the proofs."

Herein plaintiff (respondent) alleges that the contract was entered into by and between him and Platt Music Company and B. Goodman. A writing is set up as the contract, signed by B. Goodman alone. The court finds the contract was by and between plaintiff and Platt Music Company, and not B. Goodman—that Goodman was but an agent. Can it be said that these circumstances constitute a case where the finding "is wholly different from that averred in the complaint, and is foreign to any issue raised by the pleadings?" Because plaintiff alleges that both defendants are parties to this contract, and the proof shows that only one thereof is in truth and in fact a party, is it a finding upon another cause of action? It seems to us that both of these questions must be answered in the negative. The variation complained of did not prejudice the rights of appellant, and is not of such materiality as to affect the judgment. McNeil v. Kredo, 31 Cal. App. 76, 159 P. 818; Brooke v. Glide, 39 Cal. App. 534, 179 P. 546.

Judgment affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 31, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court July 26, 1928.

1. Mandamus 🔑3(8)—Former city employee, not filing application with civil service commission for investigation of grounds of discharge, held not entitled to mandamus for reinstatement (Los Angeles City Charter).

Municipal civil service employee, not filing with civil service commission a written application for investigation of grounds of his discharge, as authorized by Los Angeles City Charter, held not entitled to writ of mandamus to compel city and officer discharging him to restore him to position.

2. Mandamus 🔑154(2)—Petition for writ of mandamus must show want of plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in ordinary course of law.

Plaintiff cannot succeed in action for writ of mandamus without showing by petition that he has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in ordinary course of law.

★Hearing granted by Supreme Court.

Jess E. Stephens and Herman Mohr, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff filed a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel defendants to permit him to resume his position as a civil service employee in the department of building and safety of the city of Los Angeles and to enter upon the discharge of his duties, to replace his name upon the pay roll of the city, and to allow and pay his salary during the period he was prevented from discharging his duties. Demurrers were filed by defendants and sustained by the court. Plaintiff declined to amend, and a judgment was entered against him, from which he prosecutes this appeal.

In the petition it is set forth that plaintiff was employed in the classified civil service of the city of Los Angeles as a general clerk in the electrical division of the department of building and safety, at a salary of $140 per month; that on February 8, 1926, he appeared for duty, but was prevented by defendant Backus, the head of the department, from performing his duties and was orally informed that he was discharged; that his name was removed from the pay roll of the city and his salary since that date has not been paid; that on February 13, 1926, defendant Backus presented to the board of civil service commissioners a notice to the effect that plaintiff was discharged for cause. Below the signature of Mr. Backus on the notice appears the following:

> "I hereby certify that a copy of the foregoing statement was mailed to last known address of W. A. Shannon on 13th day of February, 1926, at 11 o'clock a. m. [Signature] C. E. Gartman."

It is further alleged in the petition that the only place of residence of plaintiff was at a certain address on South Hill street, and that this address was shown on the records of the department where plaintiff was employed; that plaintiff was at this address daily and could have been found by the exercise of reasonable diligence on the part of any one seeking to serve a notice upon him; that no copy of the statement was served upon plaintiff personally or by leaving it at his said residence; that a copy of the statement referred to in the certificate was mailed by defendant Backus, "addressed to plaintiff at 307½ West Second street, Los Angeles, Cal."

[1] The charter of the city of Los Angeles contains the following provisions:

> "Any board or officer having the power of appointment of officers, members and employees in any department of the government of the city, shall have the power to remove, discharge or suspend any officer, member or employee of such department; but no person in the classified civil service of the city, other than an unskilled laborer employed by the day, shall be removed, discharged or suspended except for cause, which shall be stated in writing by the board or officer having the power to make such removal, discharge or suspension, and filed with the board of civil service commissioners, with certification that a copy of such statement has been served upon the person so removed, discharged or suspended, personally, or by leaving a copy thereof at his last known place of residence if he cannot be found. Upon such filing, such removal, discharge or suspension shall take effect. Within fifteen days after such statement shall have been filed the said board, upon its own motion, may, or upon written application of the person so removed, discharged or suspended, filed with said board within five days after service upon him of such statement, shall proceed to investigate the grounds for such removal, discharge or suspension. If after such investigation said board finds, in writing, that the grounds stated for such removal, discharge or suspension were insufficient or were not sustained, and also finds in writing that the person removed, discharged or suspended is a fit and suitable person to fill the position from which he was removed, discharged or suspended, said board shall order said person so removed, discharged or suspended to be reinstated or restored to duty."

[2] Plaintiff contends that he was not legally discharged from his position for the reason that he was not served with a copy of the statement filed with the civil service commission as provided by the city charter. Defendants contend that plaintiff had actual notice of the discharge and of the filing of the statement, and argue that actual notice is equivalent to the notice specifically required by the charter. There is much discussion in the briefs filed by counsel concerning these contentions. Under the view we take of the case, however, the judgment must be affirmed for the reason that the charter gave to plaintiff a remedy of which he had not availed himself. Although the charter provisions above quoted are not so worded as to bring about entire clarity, it is nevertheless apparent that it was the intention of the authors of the charter to provide a method whereby a discharged employee in the classified service could obtain a hearing before the commissioners upon his demand after notice to him of his discharge. The commissioners are given the right, at their option, to conduct an investigation concerning the discharge, but it becomes their duty to conduct such examination if a demand therefor be made by the employee. A period of five days is allowed the employee within which to make the demand, but this period does not begin to run until he has notice of the filing of the statement by the head of the department. No time limit is specified for the completion of the investigation. When he learned of the filing of the statement by Mr. Backus, plaintiff should have filed with the commission, if he so desired, a written application for an investigation of the grounds of his discharge. The date on which he received information concerning the filing of the statement does not appear from the allegations contained in the petition. Manifestly he must have had this information at some time prior to the commencement of the action. It is well established that plaintiff cannot succeed in an action in which he seeks a writ of mandamus unless he can show by his petition that he has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. The course was open to plaintiff to obtain any redress to which he may have been entitled by application to the civil service commissioners within five days from the day on which he had actual knowledge of the filing of the statement.

BROWN v. BROWN. (Civ. 3507.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 29, 1928.

1. Divorce 🔑37(19)—Wife, leaving home with understanding with husband that she would be gone two weeks or two months, who stayed away over two years, "deserted" husband (Civ. Code §§ 95, 100).

Wife, who left home with understanding with husband that she would be gone some two weeks or two months, and who did not return for over two years, "deserted" husband within meaning of Civ. Code, § 95, by reason of section 100, providing that absence or separation, proper itself, becomes desertion whenever intent to desert is fixed during absence.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Desert.]

2. Divorce 🔑37(8)—Husband held not obliged to request wife's return to procure divorce for desertion (Civ. Code, § 95).

Husband, whose wife left home with understanding that she would be gone for two weeks or two months, was under no legal obligation to request wife to return or to intimate to her that her absence was objectionable to him, where she continued to remain away for over two years, in order to procure divorce for desertion, as defined by Civ. Code, § 95.

3. Divorce 🔑184(10)—Court's finding as to physical condition of wife, supported by substantial evidence, held conclusive on appeal.

Finding as to physical condition of wife made by trial court, and supported by substantial evidence, held conclusive on appellate court in action for divorce.

4. Divorce 🔑150(2)—Finding of trial court that mother was improper person to have custody of minor children held ultimate finding of fact.

Finding that mother was not fit and proper person to have custody of minor children held ultimate finding of fact in which it was not necessary for trial court to have expressly found all probative facts, since, on appeal, finding must be construed liberally and given construction which will uphold judgment rather than defeat it.

5. Divorce 🔑150(2)—That court expressly found certain probative facts does not thereby operate to exclude all other probative facts in record supporting general finding.

Mere fact that court expressly found certain probative facts does not thereby operate to exclude all other probative facts appearing in record and tending to support general finding.

6. Divorce 🔑312—Court's finding that mother was improper person to have custody of minor children supported by substantial evidence, held conclusive on appeal.

Finding of trial court that mother was improper person to have custody of minor children, supported by substantial evidence, held conclusive on appellate court.

7. Divorce 🔑312—Court's determination, in divorce proceedings, of parent entitled to custody of children, will not be disturbed on appeal, in absence of abuse of discretion (Civ. Code, § 138).

Under Civ. Code, § 138, trial courts have very high discretion with respect to custody of children in divorce proceedings, and its determination will not be disturbed on appeal, unless record discloses clear abuse of that discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; George R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by Minnie C. Brown against Rudolph J. Brown for divorce. Cross-complaint by the defendant. From an interlocutory decree granted the defendant on charge of desertion, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Loyal C. Kelley, of Riverside, Marshall Stimson, of Los Angeles, and W. G. Irving, of Riverside, for appellant.

Dryer, Castle & Hartke, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem. The complaint in this action is based upon a charge of cruelty. The cross-complaint consists of two causes of action; the first being desertion, the second cruelty. The court found against the plaintiff and appellant as to all of her allegations of cruelty, and in favor of the defendant and respondent as to all of his allegations of cruelty, and in his favor on his charge of desertion against the plaintiff and appellant. The interlocutory decree of divorce was granted to the defendant and respondent specifically on the charge of desertion against the plaintiff and appellant.

The appeal is based entirely upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence: First, on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings of the trial court as specified in paragraph 14 of the findings of fact that on or about February 2, 1922, the plaintiff and appellant, without cause, willfully deserted the defendant and respondent; and, secondly, that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the court, that the plaintiff and appellant is not a fit and proper person to have the custody of the minor children of plaintiff and defendant, as specified in appellant's opening brief.

The appellant and respondent were married on August 29, 1914. At the time of their marriage, and prior thereto, it was understood that they would live upon a ranch near Wildomar, in Riverside county, Cal. Appellant knew during the period of their courtship that the respondent was a rancher, and it was planned that they would live on the ranch above mentioned. Soon after their marriage the appellant became discontented and dissatisfied with her situation and life on the ranch, and began complaining about the conditions there, and her own condition, which dissatisfaction and complaints continued through the entire time that the parties resided together on the ranch at Wildomar, Cal.

Four children were born to the parties during their life together: Wilfred Brown, a son, born December 9, 1915; David Brown, a son, and Catherine Brown, a daughter, twins, born September 15, 1918; and Gerald Brown, a son, born October 6, 1921.

It is undisputed that the appellant left the home of the parties at Wildomar, Cal., on February 2, 1922, at a time when the youngest child was between three and four months old, and there is evidence to show that the appellant was not ill at the time she left, but, on the contrary, that there was nothing wrong with her at that time, and that she was perfectly normal; that, according to her own statement she had wired to her mother a few days previous thereto to come and get her, and that, after her mother arrived, they hurriedly decided to leave at once; that the appellant left early in the morning, at approximately 6 o'clock, and in inclement weather; and that at the time she left she or her mother had represented and stated to the respondent that she would return in two months, and, according to her own statements, that it was definitely understood that she was to be absent only for a period of two months with her mother, after which time she would return to the ranch.

On the morning of her departure, she made no effort to take the baby with her, which astounded and surprised the respondent and a Mrs. Soules, who had been brought in by appellant's mother to, as she thought, help get the children ready to go with their mother, the appellant, and the appellant at this time flatly refused to take the baby with her, even though the baby had not yet been weaned, and had up to that time been nourished by receiving milk from its mother's breast.

Appellant made no provisions for the care of the baby, which she had nursed up to that time, and left no instructions in reference to its care or comfort.

The appellant left the home of respondent on February 2, 1922, leaving the three youngest children in his care and custody, without any previous arrangement for their care, without any instructions as to their food or comfort, and without any questions as to how they would be taken care of.

According to her own testimony, she did not return to the ranch to see the children from February 2, 1922, until June, 1924, at which time she returned with her mother and her attorney without any intention of remaining at the ranch or taking up her duties as a mother of the children and wife of the respondent. She made no offer to return and stay on the ranch, or do anything that showed any intention to terminate the period of separation.

It is undisputed that she did not return to the ranch or make any effort on her own part to see the children during this entire period of more than two years and four months, after having left an unweaned baby in sole care of the respondent.

Various physicans testified as to their opinion to the effect that she was a hypochondriac or a psycho-neurotic of the sexually perverted type, inclined to dwell upon sex matters, and become centered upon matters having to do with various phases of sex questions, the result of which was to blunt the maternal instinct, and that such condition affected the care of the children. This conclusion, expressed in different forms by the various physicians, was arrived at as a result of their own personal experience in treating her, and also as a result of the other testimony and evidence presented during the trial and embodied in a hypothetical question to them. Some of them said that the influence of such a person over children was detrimental, and that the condition was progressive, and would continue to get worse instead of better; that such a person became self-centered and egotistical, and dealt upon sex questions, and often made a very scientific study and research of sex conditions and matters, as was evidenced by the letters written by the appellant. These letters, as stated before, contradict all of the accusations made by the appellant against the respondent in reference to his treatment of her, and which indulge in a detailed discourse and discussion of sex matters.

The appellant was examined at various times by physicians after her emphatic contentions that she was suffering to a great extent from the results of improper treatment by physicians, and upon each of such examinations the physicians found that she was normal.

During the period of her absence, although, according to respondent's testimony, she stated that she only intended to go to Los Angeles for a period of two weeks or two months, at which time she expected to return to the ranch, she nevertheless not only went to Los Angeles for a period of two weeks, but proceeded with her mother to Berkeley, San Francisco, Oakland, San Jose, and several other places, during part of which time she, according to her own testimony, walked about, did housework, and even engaged in certain occupations, such as canvassing and soliciting orders from university students at Berkeley for a period of time.

The trial of the action consumed some three weeks. Fifty witnesses were examined, and the record of the testimony is spread over some 2,000 pages.

[1, 2] As to the first point raised by appellant—the insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding on the ground of desertion—it is earnestly contended the judgment must be reversed because there is no testimony to the effect that appellant ever intended to desert respondent. Desertion is defined by section 95 of the Civil Code as follows:

> "Willful desertion is the voluntary separation of one of the married parties from the other with intent to desert."

Both parties admit that the original separation was by mutual consent. Respondent and appellant talked over her proposed visit to her mother in Los Angeles some time before appellant left the ranch. Appellant then stated that she intended to take Christian Science treatments while away, and it was understood that she would be gone some two weeks or two months. She left on February 2, 1922, and did not return to the ranch until June, 1924, at which time she did not indicate any intention of remaining, but simply made a brief visit of a few hours, in company with her attorney. Respondent contends that the evidence establishes a separation by mutual consent, and relies upon the case of Borden v. Borden, 166 Cal. 469, 137 P. 27, where it is held that, where separation is had by mutual consent of the parties, there can be no desertion, unless something thereafter transpired. In the instant case it will be observed that there is evidence that the separation agreed upon was not absolute, but was limited to a definite period of time. The remarks of the court in the Borden Case are predicated upon a state of facts which showed an absolute and unqualified understanding to separate without any limitation as to time. The cases of Keesey v. Keesey, 160 Cal. 727, 117 P. 1054, and Sargent v. Sargent, 106 Cal. 544 39 P. 931, are to the same effect as the Borden Case, and are not applicable to the instant case for the same reasons.

Section 100 of the Civil Code provides:

> "Absence or separation, proper in itself, becomes desertion whenever the intent to desert is fixed during such absence or separation."

[3] It follows therefrom that a separation, proper in itself, may become and constitute desertion as a ground for divorce, where the intent to desert thereafter becomes fixed. The question as to whether or not the intent thereafter became fixed depended upon all the facts and circumstances which transpired subsequently, and the statements, admissions, acts, and conduct of the party charged with such desertion. "It is for the court trying the case to determine from all the facts and circumstances appearing in the case whether or not there was an absence of that consent to living separate and apart which is essential to constitute a desertion." McMullin v. McMullin, 140 Cal. 112, 73 P. 808. There is also evidence of the persistent refusal of appellant to dwell in the same house with respondent, with no just cause for such refusal. This constitutes desertion. Civ. Code. § 96. Respondent was under no legal obligation to request his wife to return or intimate to her that her absence from home was objectionable to him. Morrison v. Morrison, 20 Cal. 431. The evidence, as we have stated, was to the effect that her absence was to continue for a definite period of time; the longest period testified to being two months. She remained absent for two years and four months, and this, with the other facts and circumstances in evidence, justified the court in finding that she deserted respondent. A very large portion of appellant's argument is taken up and consumed in an effort to persuade the court to interfere with findings of fact which are supported by substantial evidence. A fair illustration of such an instance is with reference to the physical condition of appellant. To excuse the said desertion of appellant, it is urged that she left her said home and remained absent because she was ill and in very poor health. There is considerable testimony to that effect. However, her husband, several neighbors, and a doctor testified that she was in normal health when she left the home, and that there was nothing wrong with her physically. In commenting upon a similar condition of the record, in the case of Baker v. Baker, 9 Cal. App. 746, 100 P. 897, this court said:

> "It * * * involves only a waste of time, to undertake to demonstrate to an appellate court in a case in which there exists at least a substantial conflict in the evidence that the testimony offered by the party against whom the findings have been made by the court below should be accepted in preference to that from which such findings have been deduced."

It would serve no useful purpose for us to further elaborate upon the testimony. We are satisfied, from a careful examination of the record, that the said finding of the trial court is based and founded upon substantial evidence, and under such circumstances we are powerless to disturb the same. 2 Cal. Jur. p. 921, § 543.

[4, 5] An attack is made upon the finding of the court that appellant is not a fit and proper person to have the custody of the minor children of the parties. This finding is as follows:

> "That it is true that, by reason of the character and disposition of plaintiff, and evidenced by her actions and conduct as herein set forth, plaintiff is not a fit and proper person to have the custody of the minor children of plaintiff and defendant, or any of them."

It is contended by appellant that this finding is not one of ultimate facts, and that it can only receive support from the particular probative facts found by the court. In effect, she argues that, though there may be abundant proof in the record showing the mother to be an unfit and improper person to have the custody of said minors, nevertheless, unless the court included all these evidentiary facts in its findings, they cannot be considered in support thereof. This rule of construction is contrary to the well-established principle frequently announced by the appellate courts of this state that on appeal the findings must be construed liberally, and that uncertainties therein are to be given such a construction as will uphold, rather than defeat, the judgment. 2 Cal. Juris. p. 871, § 511. According to this finding, a liberal construction, it must be viewed in the light of one of ultimate facts, and it was not necessary for the trial court to have expressly found all the probative facts, as such finding includes a finding upon all probative facts necessary to sustain it. The mere fact that the court expressly found certain probative facts does not thereby operate to exclude all other probative facts appearing in the record and tending to support the general finding. The court found that appellant was not a fit and proper person to have the custody of said minors. This was a finding of the ultimate fact. The Supreme Court has held that in a guardianship proceeding, where the question of the competency of a person was in issue, a finding that said person was incompetent was one of the ultimate facts, and no further findings were required. Estate of Espinosa, 179 Cal. 189, 175 P. 896.

[6, 7] The evidence shows that appellant abandoned her four minor children suddenly and without making any provisions whatever for their care during her absence. Her baby, but three months of age, who was receiving nourishment from her mother's breast, was deserted with apparently no indications of those maternal instincts which are the normal and natural traits and characteristics of every mother. As one of the medical experts testified: "In my opinion, a normal mother would come back to her baby if she had to walk backwards, and on her hands and knees." She did not come back until over two years had elapsed. Aside from this evidence of abandonment, there is the testimony of numerous medical experts to the effect that appellant was selfish and self-centered; that she dwelt insistently upon imaginary ailments connected with her reproductive organs; that she was in such a psycho-neurotic condition that sex perversion resulted. We do not feel called upon to go into the evidence upon these questions in any further detail. Letters written by appellant were introduced in evidence. These, alone, in our opinion, would justify the conclusions of the trial court upon this issue. As we stated with reference to the question of desertion, it is idle to attempt to impose upon an appellate court the duties, prerogatives, and exclusive functions of the trial court in the matter of findings of fact. It must be patent and apparent that there is substantial evidence to support this finding. But, in addition to this, the matter under consideration was one in which the law commits to the trial court a very large measure of power. Bancroft v. Bancroft, 178 Cal. 352, 173 P. 582. With respect to the custody of children in divorce proceedings, it is manifest that the Legislature, by section 138 of the Civil Code, intended to confide to the trial courts a very extensive discretion, with a view to the conservation of the highest and best interests of such minors, and the conclusion arrived at by such court in such cases will not be disturbed, unless the record discloses a clear abuse of that discretion. Nave v. Nave, 35 Cal. App. 27, 169 P. 253. No serious contention is made here that the trial court abused its discretion in making the order complained of, nor do any grounds for such contention appear.

We can see no merit in the questions raised, and, accordingly, the judgment is affirmed.

designation as to who the purchaser might be, broker's purchase of property as agent or trustee for undisclosed principals did not constitute violation of any trust relationship with vendor.

3. Brokers 🔑99—Broker employed to sell property for fixed price net, who consummated transaction in his own name without disclosing identity of purchasers, was entitled to maintain specific performance suit against vendor (Code Civ. Proc. § 369).

Broker, authorized to sell property for fixed sum net to vendor, retaining any excess as commissions, after consummation of transaction in his own name without disclosing identity of parties for whom he was acting, was entitled to maintain action in his own name against vendor to require specific performance, under Code Civ. Proc. § 369, permitting suit by trustee of an express trust or person expressly authorized by statute, though broker was not the real party in interest.

Agent contracting in his own name for an undisclosed principal or contracting with another as principal may sue in his own name on the contract, under Code Civ. Proc. § 369, whether fact of agency was or was not known to the other contracting party.

5. Specific performance 🔑32(1)—Filing of suit for specific performance against vendor by broker as agent for undisclosed principals removed vendor's objection that contract lacked mutuality.

Broker authorized to sell property at fixed price net to vendor, who negotiated sale to undisclosed principals, was not precluded from maintaining specific performance suit on ground that the contract was lacking in mutuality, since contract, though unilateral at acceptance of offer, became mutual as far as remedies were concerned by filing of suit for specific performance.

6. Specific performance 🔑130—Imposition of liability for purchase price on broker was not error in broker's specific performance suit as agent of undisclosed purchasers.

Where broker authorized to sell property for fixed price net to vendor arranged purchase in behalf of persons whose identity was not disclosed, decree allowing broker specific performance of contract as against vendor, which imposed liability for purchase price on the broker and not on his principal, was not erroneous since the original contract did not limit purchasers, and it is a matter of general knowledge that the mortgage covering the land sold is the main thing relied on and the financial responsibility of the purchaser is of slight importance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Suit by James H. Allen against Anna S. Dailey, as special administratrix of the estate of James S. Dailey, deceased. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Haas & Dunnigan, R. A. Dunnigan, and H. L. Dunnigan, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George P. Adams, Turnbull, Heffron & Kelley, and Samuel H. French, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. Plaintiff brought this suit to obtain and was granted a decree requiring specific performance of an alleged contract for the sale of real property situate on Western avenue, Los Angeles, from which decree defendant appeals.

The suit was instituted against James S. Dailey, the owner of the property, who was a resident of Chicago, but his death occurred prior to trial and thereupon his wife, having been appointed special administratrix, was substituted as party defendant. Plaintiff was a licensed realtor residing in Los Angeles, and maintained an office near the property in question. The negotiations for the sale of the property were carried on by means of telegrams and letters, and the trial court found therefrom that on or about February 17, 1923, Dailey agreed, in writing, to sell and Allen agreed to buy said property for the sum of $40,000 net to Dailey, and further found in effect, contrary to the claim of appellant, that said correspondence did not create an agency between the parties mentioned out of which fiduciary relations arose precluding Allen from purchasing the property on his account or as the agent of others. Appellant assails the foregoing findings upon the ground that the same are not supported by the evidence. The first question presented therefore relates to the legal construction which shall be placed upon said telegrams and letters.

The series of correspondence began on January 8, 1923, when Allen telegraphed Dailey, at Chicago, as follows:

> "Have customer for your lot North Western Avenue near Santa Monica Blvd. All cash. What will you take for it net, I must know by wire party is looking at other property. Answer my expense, 5502 Santa Monica Blvd."

Dailey replied by wire that the price was $40,000. Within a week thereafter Allen wrote Dailey, acknowledging receipt of the latter's telegram and stated:

> "We have a party who is figuring on this lot, and as you know deals of this kind take time to round up as they move slowly, we would like to have you give us an exclusive sale right on this lot for 60 days which will give us time to close our party up on this. We have priced the lot at $42,000 and are hoping to turn it at that figure within the 60 days."

Under date of January 18, 1923, Dailey replied as follows:

> "Your letter received with reference to giving option on my property for 60 days. I have never done this and do not care to do it now. If this property is not sold within the next 30 days, the price will increase to $500 per front foot for the 85 feet on Western avenue. I have one or two other men who are communicating with me about the sale of this property and it does not make any difference with me who buys this property, but 30 days from date the price will increase."

On January 31st Allen again wrote Dailey and, after referring to Dailey's letter of the 18th instant and making certain inquiries as to the dimensions of the property, stated:

> "We did not ask if you would be willing to give any terms—now, if we can get a man who will pay down part, and 7 per cent. on the balance, would you consider such a proposition? If so, and you will write us at once and give us the best terms that you are willing to make under these conditions, it will aid us materially. I do not think our party would want to carry it very long. We would also be glad if you could give us a little more time on this, as you will realize that by the time your letter reaches us the time of your terms in the former letter will have almost expired."

There were no further negotiations until February 15, 1923, when Allen wired Dailey as follows:

> "Your letter January 18th. Have sold eighty-five by two hundred Western Avenue frontage for forty thousand eight hundred dollars less eight hundred dollars commission and title expenses. Five thousand dollars have been deposited in escrow today. Purchaser agrees to pay fifty-eight hundred dollars at close of escrow. Balance mortgage thirty thousand dollars payable ten thousand on or before one year twenty thousand on or before three years interest seven per cent. quarterly. Wire confirmation at once my expense."

The next day Dailey replied thereto by telegram as follows:

> "I explained in my letter that Western Ave property was Eighty five by one hundred fifty that Sierra Vista was fifty by one hundred eighty five. That price of Western Ave was forty thousand net to me. Purchaser to assume ten thousand mortgage will take ten thousand cash and mortgage for twenty thousand payable in three years seven per cent. cannot accept present offer."

On the day following, February 17th, Allen again wired:

> "Your wire sixteenth is accepted. Will send papers through escrow department for your signature."

And on February 19th Dailey wired:

> "Sorry to say that I sold property before receiving your message."

Supplementing the foregoing documentary evidence Allen testified that he was not acquiring the property on his own account, but that he had secured two purchasers named Kerr and Martz, who had agreed to pay $40,000 net to Dailey for the property and an additional $800 to him as a commission, and that no arrangement had been made for a subsequent transfer of the property to him by the purchasers. The evidence further shows that on February 15, 1923, in furtherance of such agreement, Kerr, as the agent of Dorothy Sadler, deposited $5,000 in escrow under instructions providing, among other things, that on or before 30 days thereafter in consummation of the conveyance of said property, she would deposit an additional $5,800, and in payment of the balance of the purchase price would execute and deliver to the owner a note secured by a mortgage on the property for $30,000, at 7 per cent., $10,000 of which would be made payable in 1 year and $20,000 in 3 years; that if she failed to pay the additional $5,800 as agreed Allen should be paid a commission of $800 out of the $5,000 then on deposit; but that she reserved the right to withdraw the deposit of $5,000 after noon of February 18, 1923, if the sale of the property was not confirmed by the owner, in which event no commission was to be paid. After the receipt of Dailey's telegram of February 16th, to wit, on February 20th, new escrow instructions were signed which were substantially the same as the first in providing for an additional payment of $5,800, but unlike the first instructions provided for the execution and delivery of a first mortgage of $10,000 to one Hancock and a second mortgage to Dailey of $20,000 in payment of the balance of the purchase price, instead of one note and mortgage to the owner for $30,000. This latter change in the escrow, providing for the execution of a mortgage to Hancock, was apparently made to conform to the terms of Dailey's telegram of February 16, 1923, to the effect that the purchaser should assume the existing $10,000 mortgage on the property. With reference to Dailey's final telegram of February 19, 1923, the record discloses that counsel for appellant admitted at the trial that contrary to the assertion made in said telegram Dailey had not sold the property prior to the receipt of Allen's telegram of acceptance.

Appellant endeavors to bring the case within the scope of an agency which prevents the agent, by reason of fiduciary relations arising out of the employment, from dealing with the property of his principal in his own right or as the agent of others. In this regard appellant claims:

> "That all the correspondence, acts, and circumstances surrounding this transaction upon which the action is founded conclusively establish that plaintiff was actually representing the defendant in procuring a purchaser or else the plaintiff falsely and deliberately created the impression by his correspondence that he was representing appellant, which constituted fraud of such a character as will defeat plaintiff's right to successfully maintain this action."

[1] It is doubtless true that if the agency be the ordinary one wherein the agent is employed to obtain for his principal the highest possible price for the property beyond a fixed minimum, for which service the agent is to be paid a commission on a percentage basis, fiduciary relations arise out of such employment which preclude the agent from becoming the purchaser of the property or acting for others and thus unduly profiting to the injury of his employer. But it appears to be well settled also that where, as here, an owner authorizes the sale of his property by an agent for a fixed price net to him, with the understanding that the agent selling the same shall be entitled to any excess thereover as a commission or shall look to the purchaser for the payment of the same, the agent may, without violating any trust relationship, purchase the property on his own account or act as the agent of others in acquiring the same. Hutton v. Sherrard, 183 Mich. 356, 150 N. W. 135, L. R. A. 1915E, 976; Synnott v. Shaughnessy, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 122, 7 P. 82; Synnott v. Shaughnessy, 130 U. S. 572, 9 S. Ct. 609, 32 L. Ed. 1038; Wolverton v. Tuttle, 51 Or. 501, 94 P. 961; Beatty v. Russell, 41 Neb. 321, 59 N. W. 919; Warvelle on Vendors, p. 274. The two agencies mentioned differ widely from each other because in the former the contract fixes the minimum price and a percentage basis of compensation for the agent, as a result of which the principal profits by any price received for the property in excess of the minimum; whereas under the latter agency the principal profits nothing beyond the net price fixed, and consequently it becomes immaterial so far as the principal is concerned to whom the property is sold or for what price it is sold above the minimum. As stated in Warvelle on Vendors, at page 275:

> The agent will not "be allowed to purchase where he has a duty to perform which is inconsistent with the character of the purchaser, nor to speculate for his private gain with the subject matter committed to his care. This may be regarded as the true extent of the rule; and an agent placing himself beyond it may lawfully contract with his principal with relation to the property."

[2-4] The correspondence above set forth shows beyond question, we think, that the agency created thereby falls within the rule of the case above cited which allows the agent to deal with the property on his own account or as the agent or trustee for others, because Dailey's telegrams and letters expressly stated that all he wanted for the property was $40,000 net to himself and that it did not make any difference to him who the purchaser might be; and therefore, Allen having consummated the transaction in his own name without disclosing the identity of the parties for whom he was acting, it would seem clear that he was entitled to maintain an action in his own name to require specific performance by the vendor even though he was not the real party in interest. In this regard section 369 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an executor or administrator, or trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue without joining with him the persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted; and that a person with whom, or in whose name, a contract is made for the benefit of another, is a trustee of an express trust, within the meaning of this section. And as held in the case of Allen v. Chatfield, 34 Cal. App. 785, 168 P. 1149, the reason for the exception established by said section readily reaches the case of an agent contracting in his own name for an undisclosed principal or group of principals, and that when an agent contracts with another as principal the law allows the agent treated as principal to sue in his own name on the contract, whether the fact of the agency was or was not known to the other contracting party. The decision in the case cited further declares that manifestly the Code section was intended to embrace not only formal trusts declared by deed, inter partes, but all cases in which a person, acting in behalf of a third party, enters into a written express contract with another, either in his individual name without description, or in his own name expressly in trust for or on behalf of or for the benefit of another, by whatever form or expression such trust may be declared; and it includes not only a person with whom, but one in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another. Considerant v. Brisbane, 22 N. Y. 389. It furthermore holds that a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another is a trustee of an express trust and is authorized to sue without joining with him the persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted (Walker v. McCusker, 71 Cal. 594, 12 P. 723), and that while the real beneficiaries of the contract might in due time and in their names have proceeded to secure its benefits, the rights of the trustee remain unaffected (Horseshoe Pier Co., etc., v. Sibley, 157 Cal. 442, 108 P. 308).

In the present case, therefore, although as between the real purchasers and Allen the latter was acting merely as a trustee, such fact did not concern Dailey because he knew no one in the transaction but Allen, and consequently so far as Dailey was concerned Allen was the real party in interest and accordingly was entitled to enforce the contract in his own name. Walker v. McCusker, supra; Allen v. Chatfield, supra.

[5] Appellant further contends that even upon the assumption that Allen is the real party in interest the alleged contract sued upon is lacking in mutuality and therefore is unenforceable. In the case of Harper v. Goldschmidt, 156 Cal. 245, 104 P. 451, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 689, 134 Am. St. Rep. 124, it is held that:

> "In equitable theory the requirement of mutuality of remedy is satisfied when the nonsigning plaintiff enters suit, since by the very bringing of his action he binds himself to abide by the decree of the court in chancery and so empowers that court to decree specific performance against him."

Mr. Pomeroy in his work on Equity Jurisprudence (2d Ed.) vol. 5, § 2191, states the same rule more elaborately as follows:

> "So far as there is a principle of mutuality, it is a mutuality of remedy in equity at the time of filing the bill that is required, and not a mutuality in the terms of the contract when the contract is made. * * * Where a contract for the sale of lands is signed only by the defendant, it is clear that the plaintiff need never have performed his agreement. There was a clear lack of mutuality in the terms. Yet it was early held that the contract could be enforced against the party who had signed. The modern cases all agree upon the point. * * * The filing of the bill makes the remedy mutual. * * *"

And in the early case of Vassault v. Edwards, 43 Cal. 458, the same rule is adhered to, the court there saying:

> "The courts, however, in view of the uniform construction of the statute of frauds, that the agreement was valid and binding upon the party by whom it was signed, and in order to work out the requisite mutuality, held that in such cases it was sufficient if the remedy was mutual. It was accordingly held from an early day that when the action for a specific performance was instituted by the party who had not signed the agreement, the act of filing the bill made the remedy mutual" (citing numerous cases).

[6] It would seem clear, therefore, that under the authorities above quoted there is no merit in appellant's contention that the contract in question is fatally lacking in mutuality, for even though said contract was unilateral at the time Allen accepted Dailey's offer, Allen afterwards made the remedy mutual by filing suit for specific performance. True, the decree rendered requires as a condition precedent to the delivery of the vendor's deed that Allen, and not the real purchasers, pay the sum of $10,000 in cash, assume the existing mortgage of $10,000, and execute and deliver to appellant a promissory note and mortgage in the sum of $20,000 secured by the property conveyed. But the imposition of such requirements on Allen instead of the real purchasers is immaterial because as said in Montgomery v. De Picot, 153 Cal. 509, 96 P. 305, 126 Am. St. Rep. 84, which was an action for specific performance, it is a matter of general knowledge that upon sales of real estate a mortgage back for a portion of the purchase price is one of the most common methods of dealing in such transactions, and under such circumstances the mortgage covering the land sold is the main thing relied upon, and the financial responsibility of the vendee is a matter of very little importance to the vendor; and therefore, as in that case held, where, as here, the contract calls merely for a mortgage to secure a promissory note, without specifying a personal obligation, such provision will be construed as making the giving of the mortgage, and not the giving of the note, the material inducement to the contract. In the case before us Dailey declared, as already pointed out, that he did not care who the purchaser was, and it would follow therefrom that he neither required nor expected the personal obligation of any particular person to insure the payment of the balance of the purchase price, but was satisfied to accept a mortgage on the land.

The additional points made by appellant, including the alleged variance between the contract pleaded and the one proved and the asserted insufficiency of the escrow, do not in our opinion possess sufficient merit to require special notice.

After giving full consideration to all of appellant's contentions, it is our conclusion that the evidence is legally sufficient to sustain the findings and the judgment, and therefore the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; PARKER, Justice pro tem.

WILSON v. COFFEY et al. (Civ. 6279.)

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑130(8)—Incumbrance which cannot be removed prevents delivery of good title.

Existence of incumbrance which cannot be removed prevents delivery of good title.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑133—Where vendor asserted reservations in patent were not incumbrances, title was determinable by escrow instructions which constituted contract.

Where vendor claimed that reservations in patent under which he held title were not incumbrances, in action for specific performance of contract embodied in escrow agreements, held, that character of title was determinable from escrow instructions which constituted contract of parties.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑133—Where escrow agreements provided that guaranty of title by insurer did not include action by governmental agency, "incumbrances" did not include government's right of way contained in vendor's patent (Civ. Code, § 1641).

In action for specific performance of contract to purchase land, where escrow instructions of parties contained provision that guaranty of title by insurer did not include action by governmental agency in restricting or controlling occupancy or use of land described, held that, under Civ. Code, § 1641, providing whole contract is to be taken together, "incumbrances" as used in agreements did not include government's right of way for water, ditches, and canals contained in patents of vendor.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Incumber—Incumbrance.]

4. Contracts 🔑147(1)—Purpose of construction of contract is to ascertain intent of parties, and, when this is ascertained, it must take precedence over literal sense.

Purpose of construction of contract is to ascertain intent of parties, and, when this intent is ascertained, it must take precedence over literal sense of terms.

5. Contracts 🔑162—Conflicting parts of contract should be reconciled to ascertain intent of parties at time agreement was entered (Civ. Code, § 1643).

Conflicting parts of contract should be reconciled, if possible, to ascertain what parties intended at time agreement was entered into, making it capable of being carried into effect, if it can be done without violation of intention of parties under Civ. Code, § 1643.

6. Vendor and purchaser 🔑133—Vendee, signing escrow instructions, which provided that title insurer did not guarantee against action by governmental agency, had at least constructive notice that incumbrances did not include rights of government.

In action for specific performance contract to purchase land, where escrow agreements providing that title insurer did not guarantee against action by governmental agency in restricting or controlling occupancy, were signed by parties, held that vendee had actual or at least constructive notice that incumbrances meant to exclude rights of government, since person was presumed to have knowledge of contents of instrument executed by him or in his possession, and with facts concerning which recitals in instrument would put prudent man on inquiry.

7. Specific performance 🔑131—Failure to mention specific performance in judgment was immaterial, where only issue was disposition of deposit which had been made with escrow holder, to which vendor was entitled on vendee's default.

In action for specific performance of contract to purchase land, where vendor and vendee had given written instructions to escrow holder concerning transfer of certain realty, and vendee defaulted after having made deposit with escrow holder, held, that mention of specific performance in judgment was irrelevant, since point in issue was disposition of sum deposited, to which vendor was entitled on vendee's default.

8. Escrows 🔑8(1)—Escrow holder held agent for each party, where escrow agreement between vendor and purchaser was completed.

In action for specific performance of contract to purchase realty, where deposit had been made with escrow holder, and vendor offered to deliver certificate or guarantee of title containing reservations mentioned in escrow instructions, escrow holder became agent for each party with respect to those things placed in escrow to which each thus became entitled, and not agent for both.

9. Specific performance 🔑121(11)—Objection to finding that vendor was ready and able to perform contract as not being sustained by evidence held not well taken under facts.

In action for specific performance of contract to purchase realty, where vendee contended that evidence was insufficient to support finding that vendor was ready and able to comply with terms of contract, held that objection was not well taken, since vendee had conceded that conclusion was correct, if on legal interpretation put on escrow instructions it was determined that reservation by government in patents was not incumbrance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Action by Alden C. Wilson against Charles H. Coffey and another for specific performance of contract to purchase land. From a judgment rendered following an order granting a motion made by plaintiff under Code Civ. Proc. § 633, whereby original judgment was vacated and different judgment entered, named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Page, Nolan, Rohe & Freston and Ralph E. Lewis, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Newby & Palmer and Nathan Newby, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. The appellant has appealed from a judgment rendered following an order granting a motion made by respondent under section 633 of the Code of Civil Procedure, whereby the original judgment was vacated and a different judgment entered. The action is for specific performance of a contract to purchase land; the appellant being the vendee, and the respondent the vendor, thereof. In the original judgment specific performance of the contract was denied; the respondent was denied damages; and a fund of $5,000, which had been deposited with the clerk of the court, was ordered to be handed back to appellant. The latter judgment entered does not mention specific performance or damages, but awards to plaintiff judgment, and directs the clerk of the court, into whose hands the $5,000 had been paid, to deliver the same to plaintiff (respondent herein). It is this latter judgment from which the appeal is taken, and it is the deposition of this $5,000 which is mainly involved in the question before the court.

Appellant's grounds of appeal are:

"(1) That the evidence is insufficient, and in fact there is no evidence to support the finding of the court designated as conclusion of law No. 1 as amended to the effect that plaintiff was at all times ready and able to comply with the terms of the contract, but that, on the contrary, the evidence and the findings of fact show that said conclusion of law is erroneous, and that the proper conclusion should be that plaintiff was not able and ready to comply with the terms of his contract, but that he was at all times unable to deliver good title to the land in question and that his title was incurably defective. (2) That the evidence and findings of fact do not support the conclusions of law designated I, III, V, and VI, under which the court finds that the plaintiff was ready and willing to perform his part of the contract, and directs that plaintiff have judgment for the sum of $5,000, but that, on the contrary, said findings and evidence justify only the conclusion that plaintiff was not entitled to any judgment whatsoever, and that said $5,000 should have been refunded to the appellant herein."

The case resolves itself into an interpretation of the escrow instructions—the contract of the parties. On October 5, 1923, the vendor and vendee in the contemplated sale and purchase of the property in question delivered to Title Insurance & Trust Company separate escrow instructions. The escrow instructions of the vendor, in so far as they affect the question here presented, are:

> "I will hand you a deed executed by Alden C. Wilson and Florence A. Wilson, husband and wife, to Charles H. Coffey and Dorathea F. Coffey, husband and wife (description of land), which you are authorized to deliver to grantees, or their representatives upon payment to you by 11/5/23 days from date hereof for account of the parties executing said interest the sum of ——— dollars 15,000.00 payable by check of the Title Insurance & Trust Company, from which you may deduct your escrow charges, 30.00, and your 2 New or Cont. Guarantee with your liability thereunder not to exceed W. ½ of sec. 25000.00, S. E. ¼ of section 10000.00 as charged and from which you may also pay all incumbrances on said property except all taxes for 1923–24. * * * As a part of the consideration for said deed, you will also procure note executed by Charles H. Coffey and Dorathea F. Coffey, husband and wife, in favor of Alden C. Wilson and Florence A. Wilson, husband and wife, as J. T. for $20,000.00 due on or before 3 yrs. after 11/1/23 with int. at 7% per annum payable semiannually at Los Angeles, Cal., secured by mortgage your form on said premises which by your guarantee shall show subject only to taxes for the fiscal year 1923-1924. * * * (Please take note that the guarantee issued in connection herewith will contain the following provision: 'This guarantee does not include examination of, or report on, action by any governmental or public agency for the purpose of regulating, restricting or controlling the occupancy or use of the land herein described, or any building thereon.')"

The escrow instructions of the vendee to the title company, in so far as they affect the question presented, are:

> "I hand you herewith a check for $5,000.00 and will hand you 10,000.00 additional together with funds sufficient to cover my portion of your charges. I will also hand you a note and mortgage for 20,000.00 as set out below, all of which you are authorized to use in connection with your order No. 705303 when you can issue in your usual form, your 2 new or cont. guarantee T. G. & T. Co. of L. A. with your liability thereunder not to exceed W. ½ $25,000.00 S. E. ¼ 10,000.00 (description of land) which will show record title to said property vested in Charles H. Coffey and Dorathea F. Coffey, husband and wife as joint tenants free from incumbrances except all taxes for the fiscal year 1923 and 1924. (Please take notice that the guarantee issued in connection herewith will contain the following provision: 'This guarantee does not include examination of, or report on, action by any governmental or public agency for the purpose of regulating, restricting or controlling the occupancy or use of the land herein described or any building thereon.')"

[1-6] Appellant contends that the existence of an incumbrance which cannot be removed is a default by the vendor under a contract to deliver a good title; that, if the contract fails through default of the vendor, the vendee is entitled to recover back any deposit made upon the purchase price, and that a reservation to the United States government of a right to construct canals and ditches upon the land is such an incumbrance as constitutes a default by the vendor under a contract to deliver a good title. The reservation in the patents which plaintiff claims is such an incumbrance as to prevent the vendor from transferring a good title is the following, which appears in each patent:

> "And there is reserved from the lands hereby granted a right of way thereon for ditches or canals constructed by the authority of the United States."

We do not question the principle announced in the authorities cited that the existence of an incumbrance which cannot be removed would prevent the delivery of a good title, but here a different aspect is presented. It is apparent from a reading of the escrow instructions that the title the vendor contracted to deliver, and which the vendee contracted to receive, was an insurance by the Title Insurance & Trust Company, insuring one of the tracts described for $25,000 and the other for $10,000, and showing the record title vested in Charles H. Coffey and Dorathea F. Coffey as joint tenants free from incumbrances, excepting taxes for the fiscal year 1923 and 1924, and qualified further by the following paragraph which appears in the escrow instructions signed by the vendor and the vendee:

> "That the guarantee does not include examination of, report on, action by, any governmental or public agency for the purpose of regulating, restricting, or controlling the occupancy or use of the land herein described or any building thereon. It is understood that the guarantee to be issued will be in your usual form, containing in addition to the above the printed exceptions usual in such guarantees."

Appellant contends that respondent must prove that the reservations in the patent under which respondent holds title are not incumbrances, and assumes the very fact in issue, i. e., the nature of the title contracted by the parties to be bought and sold, whereas the type and character of the title is determined by the escrow instructions which under the law constitute the contract of the parties. Tuso v. Green, 194 Cal. 574, 229 P. 327; Frost v. Alward, 176 Cal. 691, 169 P. 379; Flinn & Treacy v. Mowry, 131 Cal. 481, 63 P. 724, 1006.

It is clear that appellant contracted to purchase the land of respondent, if the Title Insurance & Trust Company would issue an insurance certificate insuring the title to be in the names of the grantees of the deed upon its being recorded, subject only to the incumbrance of the lien for taxes for the fiscal year of 1923–1924, as shown by the records of Los Angeles county, which respondent could produce, and that he waived as to good title any reservation by the government of regulating or controlling the occupancy or use of the land or any building thereon. To hold otherwise, a construction would have to be placed upon the contract without reference to what the parties intended, and would entail a forfeiture of the contract, and, besides, would be giving effect to only a part of the agreement. "The whole of a contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other." Civ. Code, § 1641. The purpose of construction is to ascertain the intent of the parties, and, when this intent is ascertained, it must take precedence over the literal sense of terms. Conflicting parts should be reconciled, if possible, to ascertain what the parties intended at the time the agreement was entered into (Retsloff v. Smith, 79 Cal. App. 443, 249 P. 886), and make it capable of being carried into effect, if it can be done without violating the intention of the parties (Civ. Code, § 1643). Appellant had actual notice of the contents of the contract he signed, but, even if he did not, in any event he had constructive notice when he signed the escrow instructions, which provided that the guaranty of title by the title company, upon which guaranty the transfer of title entirely depended, expressly excepted from the title it was to guarantee exceptions and rights reserved by the government. A person is presumed to have knowledge of the contents of an instrument executed by him or in his possession (McCreery v. Charlton, 185 Cal. 37, 195 P. 670), and of the facts concerning which the recitals in the instrument would put a prudent man upon inquiry (Union Trust, etc., Bank v. Ishkanian, 45 Cal. App. 347, 187 P. 757). The word "incumbrances" appearing in the contract must be taken to mean those incumbrances which, as the parties specified, they had in mind. It must be taken that, when the parties said in their contract that the title was to be free of incumbrances, they meant to exclude as an incumbrance the right of way for water, ditches, and canals contained in the patents. Retsloff v. Smith, supra.

[7] As to appellant's complaint that in the present judgment there is no mention of specific performance of the contract while in the former judgment there was, it may be said that the prayer for specific performance is irrelevant to the point at issue—the deposition of the $5,000. In Tuso v. Green, 194 Cal. 574, 229 P. 327, the vendor and vendee of realty had given written instructions to an escrow holder concerning the transfer of certain realty. These instructions matched one another as to subject-matter of the sale, parties, and terms. Each one was signed only by the party making it, as in the present case. The buyer defaulted, having previously made a deposit of $1,000. The court held that the separately executed writings formed a contract for the transfer of the land, and that therefore, on the default of the buyer, the seller was entitled to the amount deposited by the buyer. See, also, Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 P. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17.

It is true that Cosby v. Danziger, 38 Cal. App. 204, 175 P. 809, cited by appellant, holds that, where the vendor agreed to give the vendee an abstract of title showing the title to the premises free and clear of any and all incumbrances, he would not be fulfilling his contract, in the absence of information charging the vendee with notice, in tendering a title in which the patent from the government contained the reservation:

Here, however, the vendee not only had notice, but the escrow instructions, signed by him, in his contract specially provided that the guaranty of good title to be issued by the Title Insurance & Trust Company, and upon the issuance of which the transfer was to be completed, would not include "examination of, or report on, action by any governmental or public agency for the purpose of regulating, restricting or controlling the occupancy or use of the land herein described or any building thereon."

[8] Appellant contends that the money was held by the escrow holder either as the agent of both parties or as the agent of, or trustee for, appellant, and that in either event the fund is not such a fund as is contemplated under the general rule holding that the vendor is entitled to retain money paid upon the purchase price, and cites us to Shreeves v. Pearson, 194 Cal. 699, 230 P. 448, in which the court says:

> "It is conceded to be the correct rule of law that when papers, moneys, or other articles are by the agreement of parties to a transaction delivered to an escrow holder to be held by him in that capacity and to be distributed by him to the respective parties or to other persons upon the performance of the terms of the escrow he is, prior to the performance of the conditions of the escrow, the agent of both parties thereto (Cannon v. Handley, 72 Cal. 133, 13 P. 315; McDonald v. Huff, 77 Cal. 279, 19 P. 499), and that it is equally sound law that whenever the conditions attending the escrow have been so far performed that the transaction which has called the escrow into being becomes complete the nature of this dual agency changes to an agency not for both, but for each of the parties to said transaction in respect to those things placed in escrow to which each has thus become completely entitled."

If the transaction had not been completed as contended for by appellant, the case cited would be authority that the Title Insurance & Trust Company was the agent of both parties, but, under the view we have taken that the offer to deliver the certificate or guaranty of title containing the reservations mentioned completed the escrow, the title company then became the agent of each party.

[9] Appellant's objections that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding to the effect that plaintiff was ready and able to comply with the terms of the contract, and that the evidence and findings of fact show that such conclusion of law is erroneous in our opinion, are not well taken. Appellant quotes from the record the following finding, which he urges is supported by the evidence, and which he contends renders the judgment erroneous:

> "The plaintiff was, at said time and on said date, willing to furnish the certificate of title showing good title, as required by the provisions of said escrow instructions, and at said time, and ever since said time, has been, and now is, willing to perform all of the terms of the contract on his part to be performed, but he was not, either on the 5th day of October, 1923, or at any time since then, nor is he now, ready or able to furnish said certificate of title, or ready or able to perform all of the terms of said contract on his part to be performed, in this—that there existed on the 5th day of October, 1923, and at all times since that date, and do now exist, certain incumbrances against said land, which said incumbrances consist in reservations from the said land in favor of the United States of America, and reserved by the terms of the patents by which said land was conveyed to plaintiff's predecessors in interest, of rights of way thereon for all ditches or canals constructed by the authority of the United States, and which said reservations were not, and could not by the plaintiff have been, removed."

Appellant in his brief submits the following as the controlling issue on this appeal:

> "The evidence at the trial is all in support of this finding of fact. The original patents issued to plaintiff's predecessors in interest were introduced in evidence and appear in the transcript (pages and folios). These two patents both contain the following reservations: 'And there is reserved from the lands hereby granted a right of way thereon for ditches or canals constructed by the authority of the United States.' There is in the evidence or findings not a particle of proof, nor was it even contended, that the above-mentioned reservations have been removed by the plaintiff. In the nature of things, such a reservation could not be removed, and it is so stated by the court in its findings of fact hereinbefore mentioned. In its essence the determination of this question rests upon the legal interpretation put upon this evidence. If that reservation of the United States government constitutes an incumbrance, then conclusion of law No. 1 is erroneous. If said reservation is not such an incumbrance, the appellant herein is wrong, and the conclusion of law and the judgment rendered are correct."

Conclusion of law No. 1, which appellant concedes to be correct, if upon the legal interpretation put upon the escrow instructions or contract it be determined that the reservation by the government in the patents is not an incumbrance such as the terms of the contract required to be removed, is:

> "That the plaintiff was, on October 5, 1923, and at all times thereafter, until the filing of complaint herein, ready, able, and willing to comply with the terms of the contract hereinbefore set forth."

As we have said, the escrow instructions signed by appellant specifically excepted from the title to be guaranteed reservations by the government, and therefore such reservation was not, at the time of entering into the contract by the parties, contemplated to be an incumbrance of such a character as would void the contract.

The judgment is affirmed.

NATIONAL BRASS WORKS v. WEEKS et al. (Civ. 6271.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 31, 1928.

1. Reference ⇨99(2)—Under reference to ascertain fact necessary to enable court to determine action, referee's report is not binding on court as under reference to try all issues (Code Civ. Proc. § 638, subds. 1, 2, and § 644).

If order of reference be made pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 638, subd. 1, to try all issues and report finding and judgment thereon, referee's findings are controlling on the court under section 644, but, if made pursuant to section 638, subd. 2, to ascertain fact necessary to enable court to determine action, referee's report has no binding effect on court, whose findings and conclusions in such case serve as basis for judgment.

2. Reference 🔑48—Reference held merely to ascertain certain disputed facts to aid court in rendering decision on merits (Code Civ. Proc. § 638, subds. 1, 2).

Order of reference including clause, "to ascertain the facts necessary to enable the court to determine this cause," and omitting authorization to try all issues, "whether of fact or of law," held intended merely to authorize referee to ascertain certain disputed facts to aid court in rendering decision on merits, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 638, subd. 2, rather than subdivision 1, especially in view of referee's report and defendants' motion before entry of judgment to set aside referee's findings.

3. Judgment 🔑279—Court's order confirming or modifying findings of referee to ascertain fact necessary to enable court to determine action need not be made part of judgment roll (Code Civ. Proc. § 638, subds. 1, 2, and §§ 644, 670).

Where order of reference is made, and referee's finding filed, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 638, subd. 2, authorizing reference to ascertain fact necessary to enable court to determine action, court's order confirming or modifying referee's findings need not be made part of judgment roll, as required by section 670, where judgment is entered under section 644 on referee's findings, filed pursuant to order of reference under section 638, subd. 1, to try all issues.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry A. Hollzer, Judge.

Action by the National Brass Works against W. S. Weeks, W. E. Stradley, and another, in which defendants Stradley and another filed cross-complaints. Judgment for plaintiff, and cross-complainants appeal. Affirmed.

Edgar L. Martin and James MacIntosh, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Fred E. Peterson and H. E. Gleason, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. Defendants and cross-complainants appeal from a judgment rendered against them as sureties, in an action to recover on a bond given to secure the faithful performance of a building contract entered into between plaintiff as owner and the defendant Weeks as contractor.

The complaint alleged, in substance, that plaintiff complied with all the terms of said contract, but that Weeks failed to construct or complete the building as agreed in that he used materials different from and of a grade inferior to those called for by the contract, plans, and specifications, and that he omitted to perform the work and labor according to the terms of the contract or in a good and workmanlike manner; that on account of the alleged breach plaintiff sustained damages for which judgment was prayed in the sum of $7,750.

Answering, the defendant Weeks denied the allegations of plaintiff's complaint and alleged that the changes and alterations in the construction of the building of which plaintiff complained were made at plaintiff's request. Appellants Stradley and Newton filed a joint answer wherein, besides denying the allegations of the complaint as to nonperformance by Weeks, it was alleged that at the time said contract was entered into Weeks assigned to Stradley all moneys agreed to be paid to Weeks thereunder and that plaintiff assented to the assignment; that during the progress of the work plaintiff requested Weeks to furnish certain materials and perform certain labor in the construction of said building not called for by the terms of the contract, for which plaintiff agreed to pay the reasonable value in addition to the contract price; and that the reasonable value thereof was $3,236.71. Appellants further alleged that the changes above mentioned were made without a written agreement or memorandum to that effect having been entered into and signed by the owner and the contractor as required by the terms of said contract, and were made without the knowledge, consent, or approval of appellants, and therefore constituted material modifications of the contract and of the bond herein sued upon, amounting to a breach thereof. It was further alleged that a balance of $8,394.38 was still due under the original contract and also $3,236.75 for the extra work and materials. Appellant Stradley, separately, filed a cross-complaint containing two causes of action, to recover upon the two items of indebtedness set forth in the joint answer, and prayed for judgment in the total sum of $11,631.11. Plaintiff answered the cross-complaint by denying substantially all of the allegations thereof.

When the cause came on for trial, the court, upon stipulation of all parties, made an order of reference and appointed a referee "to try any and all of the issues of fact and to report a finding thereon and to ascertain the facts necessary to enable the court to determine this action"; and pursuant thereto the referee heard the evidence and made and filed his report thereon, to which written objections were filed by defendants. In April, 1925, plaintiff served notice that at the time and place specified in said notice it would move the court for an order confirming, ratifying, and adopting said report as filed. Subsequently, and on October 5, 1925, the court rendered and filed its decision in said cause containing full and complete findings of fact and conclusions of law, and judgment was on the same date entered thereon, adjudging that plaintiff do have and recover from the defendants the sum of $6,487.64 and costs.

This appeal is taken upon the judgment roll alone, and appellants contend as grounds for reversal that, under the order of reference, the findings of the referee constituted the only findings in the cause which the court was bound to either confirm or reject without modification, and was without legal authority to make findings of its own; and that since the judgment roll contains no order showing that the referee's findings were approved by the court, the judgment is not supported by any findings whatever. It is further contended that if it be assumed that the referee's findings were approved by the court said findings were insufficient to sustain the judgment in plaintiff's favor.

Section 638 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under the authority of which the order of reference herein was made, reads as follows:

> "A reference may be ordered upon the agreement of the parties filed with the clerk, or entered in the minutes: 1. To try any or all of the issues in an action or proceeding, whether of fact or of law, and to report a finding and judgment thereon; 2. To ascertain a fact necessary to enable the court to determine an action or proceeding."

[1] If an order of reference be made pursuant to subdivision 1 of said section, the referee's findings are doubtless controlling upon the court because section 644 of the same Code provides that:

> "The finding of the referee or commissioner upon the whole issue must stand as the finding of the court, and upon filing of the finding with the clerk of the court, judgment may be entered thereon in the same manner as if the action had been tried by the court."

And in construing said subdivision 1 it has been held that an order of reference made pursuant thereto operates as a submission of the controversy to a tribunal of the parties' own selection to make a definitive disposition of the issue and the action (Fredendall v. Shrader, 45 Cal. App. 719; 188 P. 580); and that the findings of the referee upon the whole issue must stand as the finding of the court, and judgment follows immediately, entry being made by the clerk as a matter of course (Faulkner v. Hendy, 103 Cal. 15, 36 P. 1021; Thompson v. Patterson, 54 Cal. 542; Weavering v, Schneider, 52 Cal. App. 181, 198 P. 418; Bowie v. Borland, 68 Cal. 233, 9 P. 79).

But if the order of reference be made pursuant to and is based upon subdivision 2 of said section 638, then the report of the referee has no such binding effect upon the court, further proceedings by the court being essential to a complete determination of the cause. Clark v. Millsap, 197 Cal. 765, 242 P. 918. In such case the court ultimately determines the facts and the law by rendering its decision containing its findings of fact and conclusion of law which serves as the basis for the judgment which shall be entered; and the judgment thus entered is in no wise dependent upon the report of the referee for support, but is grounded on the decision of the court. Clark v. Millsap, supra.

[2] The order of reference in the present case, by the inclusion therein of the additional clause, "And to ascertain the facts necessary to enable the court to determine this cause," and by the omission to declare therein that the referee was authorized to try all issues "whether of fact or of law," clearly shows that it was intended that the cause should not be taken from the court and committed to the referee for decision, but that in the interest of time the referee was appointed merely to ascertain certain disputed facts relating to the details of the actual work done and materials furnished in the performance of the contract, and thus aid the court in the rendition of its decision upon the merits of the entire controversy. That being so, the trial court's decision containing its findings of fact and conclusions of law, and not the referee's report, is determinative of the action; and therefore we are not here concerned with the sufficiency or the effect of the report of the referee.

Furthermore, the contents of the referee's report sustains this view because it purports to be merely an ascertainment of certain facts relating to the construction of the building, particularly as to the alleged departure by the contractor from the plans and specifications, and it contains no conclusions of law, as would have been the case if the reference had been made pursuant to the first subdivision of said section 638. 13 Cal. Jur. 696. Moreover, the attitude of appellants in moving the trial court, after the report had been filed and before the entry of judgment, "that the findings of the referee on file herein be set aside and vacated," strongly indicates that they considered that the court at all times retained the power to determine the case upon the merits.

[3] Appellants further contend that the judgment is fatally defective in that the judgment roll does not contain an order confirming or modifying the referee's findings. There is no merit in the point. Where the order of reference is made and the referee's findings are filed pursuant to the first subdivision of section 638, and judgment is entered thereon in accordance with section 644 of said Code, then, under the express provisions of section 670 of said Code, the findings of the referee constitute part of the judgment roll, because in that state of the record the judgment in the action is based entirely upon the referee's findings; but where, as here, the order of reference is made and the referee's findings are reported pursuant to the second subdivision of said section 638 there is no legal requirement that the order of the court confirming or modifying such findings be made part of the judgment roll. It would appear from the trial court's decision herein that the report of the referee was in fact confirmed and approved, but since as stated there is no provision of law requiring such order to be made part of the judgment roll, its absence therefrom does not affect the validity of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA EDISON CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 5934.)

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 30, 1928.

1. Parent and child 🔑3(1)—Minor child has absolute right to support by parents, who cannot shift responsibility by any act, conduct, contract, or alteration of domestic status.

Minor child has absolute, inalienable right to be supported by parents, who cannot shift responsibility by any act, conduct, contract, or alteration of their domestic status.

2. Master and servant 🔑388—That minor child was living with and largely supported by, stepfather, did not defeat his right to compensation for father's death (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, § 14[a]).

That minor child was member of household of his stepfather, who was liable for his support and was actually supporting him in large part at time of his father's death, did not deprive him of right to compensation as dependent of father, in view of conclusive presumption of total dependency for support on deceased employee, under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831) § 14(a).

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Daniel McKendrick, a minor, by F. R. Grother, his guardian ad litem, for compensation for the death of Claude S. McKendrick, employee, opposed by the Southern California Edison Company, employer. To review an award of compensation by the Industrial Accident Commission, the employer brings certiorari. Award affirmed.

Roy V. Reppy, E. W. Cunningham and Maurice Jones, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

Myrick & Deering and Scott, of San Francisco, for respondent Grother.

HOUSER, J. It appears that some time during the year 1917, in the state of Idaho, one Claude S. McKendrick, who at that time was a resident of this state, was divorced by his wife. By the decree of divorce the custody of Daniel McKendrick, a minor son of the parties, was awarded to the mother, although no provision for alimony to her, nor support by the father for the son, was contained in the decree. A few months after the decree of divorce was granted, the mother of the boy was married to a man named Rodgers. On June 23, 1923, in the course of his industrial employment, the father of the boy met with an accident which resulted in his death; and thereafter, in pursuance of an application to the respondent commission for adjustment of compensation, an order of award was made in favor of the minor son as a dependent of the deceased. Upon such basic facts petitioner seeks a review of the proceedings had before the respondent commission.

An examination of the record herein develops further material facts as follows: At the time when the divorce was granted, the son, Daniel, was a small boy. Thereafter, up to about a year preceding the death of his father, he lived with his grandparents in a small town in the state of Idaho and there attended school, following which, for a period of about one year, he lived in said state with his mother and his stepfather on a ranch—during all of which time the father sent to his son various amounts of cash, aggregating approximately $50 per year, besides miscellaneous items of clothing. However, the boy was not wholly dependent upon his father for support. When money was received by him, if not immediately needed for the purpose of purchasing necessary clothing, etc., it was placed in a savings bank account which, at the time of the hearing before the commission, showed a credit of approximately $185, which included $100 received from the sale of two Liberty bonds of the face value of $50 each, one of which had been given to the boy by his father and the other by his mother. While it appeared that, with the exception of an interest in an unsettled estate of the value of $1,000 owned by the stepfather, neither he nor the mother of the boy was possessed of any means or property of any sort, nevertheless they were willing to provide for the boy's support and give him such care and maintenance as lay within their power; but that "at the present time" they were financially unable to provide for his education. "His father said he would look out for his education, and for that he was dependent upon his father—for an education." The stepfather was "just working" on his father's ranch, had no charge "of the selling or income of the ranch," and received no salary. As testified by him, "Dad does all that. * * * I get all I want to eat, clothing and a home—ought to be satisfied these days with that much." On the other hand, at the time the decree of divorce was granted to the mother of the boy, the father agreed to help take care of his son. Regarding that matter, in part the mother testified:

> "A. He (the father) asked that Dan—he always wanted to do something to help Dan—and when Mr. Rodgers and I were married he asked his mother not to have Dan adopted, that he wanted to be able to provide and help to educate Dan, and he thought that if he were not adopted that he would have a better opportunity. He asked for him not to be adopted, and he never has been. * * * He (the father) was willing to help take care of Dan—that is, to help when he could— * * * because he said he would rather leave the alimony out and rather help, to do things to help and not have it in the decree; * * * that he would help to take care of him (the son), but he didn't want the alimony part put in the decree."

As stated by the petitioner:

> "The ultimate question of law is whether a father, a resident of this state, is under a legal obligation to support his minor child, residing at all times in another state, and in the legal custody of its mother by virtue of a decree of divorce given to the mother by the courts of the state in which she and the child reside, which decree makes no provision whatsoever for alimony, or for support of the minor by the father, the minor having been supported almost entirely by his stepfather, of whose family he is a member."

[1] Whatever may be said of earlier decisions, it now seems to be the settled rule of law in this state that by no act, conduct, or arrangement of whatever sort may a parent shift from his shoulders the legal responsibility and moral duty to support his minor child. It is an absolute, inalienable right enjoyed by the child, which no form of contract between the parents, nor alteration of the domestic status of either of them, may affect. Were the rule to the contrary, it is readily conceivable how a minor child of a rich father (by reason of the divorce of its parents and the subsequent marriage of the mother to a possibly shiftless and impecunious man, who, under the law, on taking the child into his household, might become legally liable for the maintenance of the child) might be deprived of an education and the bare necessities of life, or even reach such a state of destitution as to become a public charge. Substantially the authorities dealing with such a situation are reviewed in the case of Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 195 Cal. 283, 233 P. 335. It is there held that a father, from whom his wife has secured a decree of divorce, may not, by reason of any contractual arrangement between the parties, escape his legal, bounden duty to support the minor child of the marriage. Although authorities other than those there considered might be cited, at most it would be but a work of supererogation to herein set forth the facts and the law pertaining to each of such cases. It may suffice to attract attention to some of them by citation only. See Continental Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 181 Cal. 389, 184 P. 658, 8 A. L. R. 1110; Sherer & Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 182 Cal. 488, 188 P. 798; Pacific Gold Dredging Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 184 Cal. 462, 194 P. 1, 13 A. L. R. 725; Svoboda v. Superior Court, 190 Cal. 727, 214 P. 440; Llewellyn Iron Works v. Industrial Acc. Com., 191 Cal. 28, 214 P. 846.

[2] Specifically, the point is advanced by petitioner that, because in the instant case the child was a member of the household of his stepfather, who, under the law, was liable for the support, and who in fact at the time of the death of the father of the child in large part was supporting the child, a case of dependency for support on the father of the child was not presented; and in connection therewith it is contended that at the same instant of time the child could not be legally dependent upon each of two (quasi) fathers for support.

Section 14(a) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (Stats. 1917, p. 831) provides in part that it shall be conclusively presumed that a child under the age of 18 years is "wholly dependent for support upon a deceased employee." In principle, the point to which attention has been directed is ruled in Federal Mutual Liability Ins. Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 187 Cal. 469, 202 P. 664. The case is elaborately considered, and it is there held that a minor child was entitled to compensation as a dependent of a man with whom her mother was living as his wife without ever having been married to him, notwithstanding the fact that the father of the child was living, but who contributed nothing to the support of the child. A part of the syllabus of the case is to the effect that "the right of a minor to compensation as a dependent member of the family of an employee is not affected by the fact that the father of the minor is legally liable for its support. * * *"

The facts in the case of Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 195 Cal. 283, 233 P. 335, resemble those in the instant case. Therein it appeared that the father and the mother of the minor child were divorced and the custody of the child was awarded to the mother. The mother remarried and removed to Mexico, where she thereafter resided—the child being left in this state with its uncle and aunt. It appeared that the cost of providing necessaries for the child was approximately $75 per month, of which amount the father contributed $35 or $40 per month. Relying upon the conclusive presumption of total dependency under the terms of section 14(a) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (Stats. 1917, p. 831), it was ruled that the Industrial Accident Commission was justified in making an award to the child on account of the accidental death of the father.

In accord with the principle of law as announced in the foregoing authorities, it is ordered that the award be and it is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PALMER. (Cr. 1465.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 31, 1928.

1. Larceny ⟹27—State held required to prove, not that defendant co-operated with codefendant snatching purse, but that act was probable result of agreed wrongful act (Pen. Code, §§ 484, 487, subd. 1, as amended by St. 1927, pp. 1046, 1047, §§ 1, 4).

In prosecution for grand theft, in violation of Pen. Code, §§ 484, 487, subd. 1, as amended by St. 1927, pp. 1046, 1047, §§ 1, 4, in which case presented by state was one in which the two defendants were concerned in common design to commit crime of theft it was necessary for state to prove, not that defendant actually co-operated with codefendant in snatching of purse, but that his act was probable result of wrongful act agreed upon by them, and was not fresh and independent product of mind of one of confederates outside of or foreign to common design.

2. Criminal law ⟹1188—Order granting accused new trial, based on misconception of law, will be reversed, with directions to enter judgment on verdict.

Order granting accused new trial will be reversed, with directions to enter judgment on the verdict, where it is based on a misconception of the rules of law applicable to the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Harold Louderback, Judge.

Bert Palmer was convicted of grand theft, and, from an order granting a motion for a new trial, the State appeals. Reversed, with directions.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

Frank J. Egan, Public Defender, and Charles R. Boden, Asst. Public Defender, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. The defendant and Robert Arter were jointly charged with the crime of grand theft. They were tried before a jury, and a verdict against both defendants was returned, but the trial court, on motion, granted this defendant a new trial. From this order the state has appealed on a typewritten transcript.

We take the facts of the case substantially as stated in appellant's brief, as they are not controverted by respondent. These facts stand in the record undisputed, inasmuch as neither the defendant nor his associate took the stand at the trial, and no evidence was offered on behalf of either of them except an ineffectual attempt to prove an alibi in behalf of Arter. This evidence shows that Arter approached the complaining witness on the deck of the steamer on which the latter had just arrived in San Francisco and engaged him in conversation about the weather and the trip upon the boat, giving to the complaining witness the impression that he also had arrived on the same steamer. Arter then suggested that he was not acquainted with San Francisco, and would like to see some of the places of interest, particularly Chinatown. As the conversation proceeded, it was agreed that the two parties would go ashore, and that the complaining witness would direct Arter to places of interest in and about that portion of San Francisco. These two accordingly walked from the dock up California street until they had passed Kearny street, where respondent Palmer approached them and inquired as to the location of a certain hotel, the name of which was unknown to both of them. Palmer then related an experience of the night before with a girl whom he claimed had taken $20 from him and had given this hotel as her address. Arter then suggested to Palmer that he should match the girl for the $20, and Palmer immediately expressed complete ignorance of the meaning of the expression "match," and thereupon pulled out a large roll of greenbacks which he showed to Arter and the complaining witness. The latter advised him to put the money in a bank, as it was unsafe to carry it on his person, but Palmer replied that he had ten thousand more on his belt. He then stated that both Arter and the complaining witness seemed to be such good fellows that he would like to show his appreciation of their company and buy them a drink or a cigar. The complaining witness stated that he did not drink, and the conversation then returned to the mysteries of the game of matching, and Palmer again asked Arter to explain how it was played. Arter then took two coins from his pocket and handed one to the complaining witness and showed Palmer how to match. Palmer and Arter then matched for cigars and continued in the game until they were matching for ten or twenty dollars at a time, continually urging the complaining witness to join with them. While this game was going on, all three parties walked down Washington street until they reached a point about the corner of Washington and Sansome streets, where Arter explained that he had lost all his money in matching with Palmer and owed the latter $10. Palmer insisted that Arter was shy $10 and he must pay him, to which Arter replied that he had no more money. Palmer then said, "That makes no difference; you know I have been paying all my bets; you must pay your bets." Arter then asked the complaining witness to lend him $10 until they returned to the boat. As the complaining witness took his wallet from his pocket and opened it to procure the $10, Arter shoved him from the sidewalk, seized his wallet, and ran away with it. The complaining witness followed Arter, but was unable to overtake him, and in the excitement lost sight of Palmer. A short time thereafter the complaining witness identified both Palmer and Arter at the city prison by placing his hand upon the shoulder of each. On this occasion, however, neither of the two made any response to the implied accusation of the complaining witness. They stood mute then, and have sustained that position ever since.

[1, 2] Upon this appeal, the appellant insists that there was an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial judge in granting a new trial to Palmer, as there is no question of a conflict of the evidence and no question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict. The respondent relies upon the rule of People v. Canfield, 173 Cal. 309, 159 P. 1046, that an order granting a new trial to the defendant in a criminal case should not be disturbed on appeal except in a case of a clear and unmistakable abuse of discretion. The appellant does not question the rule as thus stated, but insists that in this case the order should be reversed because it was based upon a misconception of the rules of law applicable to the evidence and not upon the legal sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict. The case differs from People v. Canfield and other cases cited by respondent of similar import, in that here the whole evidence stands without conflict by either testimony or inference, and that evidence unmistakably shows that the respondent joined with Arter in an unlawful common purpose to obtain the property of the complaining witness, and that, from the time Arter and the complaining witness met Palmer down to the time Arter escaped with the purse, Arter and Palmer were acting in concert to effect this purpose. This view was entertained by the trial court when the motion for a new trial was heard. In explaining the order about to be made the trial judge said:

> "And I have a conviction myself—here is a case where I have an absolute conviction. I am satisfied * * * that this man is a bunco man. I feel satisfied he co-operated with Arter. * * *"

And again:

> "Of course the charge is grand theft, and the evidence went a great way to show a co-operation or co-ordination between the two defendants. Apparently they were endeavoring to obtain money by either trick or device or false pretenses; but, when the final act came, the act was the snatching of a purse."

The amendment to section 484 of the Penal Code in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1046, § 1), defining the crime of theft, was designed to eliminate the distinctions between the crimes of obtaining the property of another by false pretenses and by trick and device. The amendment includes in the definition of theft the taking of the property of another or appropriating it by any false or fraudulent pretense. It is also provided that—

> "For the purposes of this section, any false and fraudulent representation or pretense made shall be treated as continuing, so as to cover any money, property or service received as result thereof."

It is apparent that the trial court treated the case as one of robbery from the person of the complaining witness, which is one of the circumstances constituting grand theft as included in section 487 of the Penal Code as amended in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1047, § 4). However, the offense became one of grand theft because of the first subdivision of section 487; the proof being that $500 in currency was taken from the complaining witness. The case presented by the state was therefore one in which the two defendants were concerned in a common design to commit the crime of theft, and it was necessary for the state to prove, not that Palmer actually cooperated with his codefendant in the snatching of the purse, but that this act was the probable result of the wrongful act agreed upon by them, and was not "a fresh and independent product of the mind of one of the confederates outside of, or foreign to, the common design." People v. Kauffman, 152 Cal. 331, 334, 92 P. 861. Thus on a trial of five persons charged with murder committed by one of them while the parties were attempting to commit a burglary pursuant to a common design for that purpose, it was said:

> "All who participated in any such understanding or conspiracy are equally guilty of any crime which is the natural and probable consequence of such an enterprise whether he personally commits the act or whether its commission is done by any one of his associates in carrying out the common purpose." People v. Wheaton, 64 Cal. App. 58, 68, 220 P. 451, 455, citing cases.

On the part of respondent, it is argued that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in his attempt to introduce evidence of other offenses on the part of Palmer. The purpose of the evidence was to show the combination between Arter and Palmer in the commission of other offenses and thus permit the jury to draw the inference from the facts proved in this case that the crime here was a part of their common design. We need not determine whether the evidence was admissible, because the trial court refused to permit the district attorney to bring it before the jury, and fully instructed the jury that they were to disregard the statements made by the district attorney in support of the admissibility of the testimony. There is no error in the record in this respect, but to our minds the trial court misconstrued the rules of law applicable to the case in granting the defendant Palmer a new trial. See People v. Tomsky, 20 Cal. App. 672, 686, 130 P. 184; People v. Cavala, 35 Cal. App. 154, 162, 169 P. 420.

The order is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment upon the verdict.

PEOPLE v. LARSON. (Cr. 1611.) ★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 30, 1928.

1. Embezzlement 🔑11(1)—Embezzlement of money is not completed until checks are converted into cash or have been deposited and cleared.

Act of embezzlement of money is not completed until checks given are converted into cash, or deposited and cleared, so as to enable defendant to obtain the money in person or by check.

2. Embezzlement 🔑5, 47—Time of completion of alleged embezzlement depends on intent of person charged, and question of fraudulent intent is for jury (Pen. Code, § 508).

Intent of person charged is important factor in determining when the act of embezzlement under Pen. Code, § 508, is completed, and question of existence of defendant's fraudulent intent is one for determination by jury under all facts and circumstances in the case.

3. Criminal law 🔑678(1)—State, charging embezzlement of money in bank, was not required to elect between transactions by which money was withdrawn by checks given defendant, where evidence showed appropriation after entire amount had been received.

Where indictment charged embezzlement of a sum of money in bank, which was withdrawn by several checks made payable to defendant, state was not required to elect as to one of the several transactions represented by the separate checks, where there was evidence that the defendant appropriated the money after having received and banked all of the checks.

4. Criminal law 🔑1168(2)—Failure to require election between separate transactions, in prosecution for embezzlement of money in bank, held not prejudicial, where manner of obtaining and depositing checks was identical.

In prosecution for embezzlement of specified sum of money on deposit in bank, refusal of trial court to grant motion to require prosecution to elect between various transactions involving separate checks made payable to defendant was not prejudicial, where it appeared without contradiction that each of the checks was obtained in the same way and that all were deposited in defendant's account.

5. Embezzlement 🔑44(1)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for embezzlement (Pen. Code, § 508).

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 508, for embezzlement of funds which defendant placed to her own account through checks obtained from prosecuting witness and subsequently appropriated by checking them out, evidence held to sustain conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Henry M. Willis, Judge.

Hattie V. Larson was convicted of embezzlement, and she appeals. Affirmed.

E. R. Simon, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. The defendant was charged by an indictment filed by the grand jury of Los Angeles county, in one count with the crime of grand larceny, specifying the theft of $35,000; in count 2 with the crime of obtaining property under false pretenses, relating to the conveyance of real property of the alleged value of $100,000; in count 3 with the crime of embezzlement; and in count 4 with the crime of grand larceny. Counts 3 and 4 relate to the sum of $3,100 belonging to the complaining witness, which was on deposit in the Western Savings Bank of Long Beach.

The jury returned a verdict of not guilty as to counts 2 and 4, and guilty as to counts 1 and 3. The court granted defendant's motion for a new trial as to count 1, but denied her motion for a new trial as to count 3. From the judgment and order denying a new trial as to count 3 charging embezzlement this appeal is prosecuted.

The four grounds urged by appellant for a reversal of the judgment are stated as follows: (1) The court erred in denying defendant's motion to elect; (2) the court erred in refusing to give an instruction advising the jury to acquit the defendant under count 3 of the indictment as requested by defendant; (3) the testimony is insufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury; (4) the court erred in denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The record fairly supports the following recital as constituting the circumstances and events bearing upon the charge now under review:

The complaining witness was a Swedish woman, 87 years of age, afflicted with deafness, and unable to either speak, write, understand, or read the English language. Estranged from her children, she lived alone in a frugal manner in her home on Pine street in the city of Long Beach, which property, by reason of the business character of its location, had attained a value of about $100,000. She also had on deposit in the Western Savings Bank of Long Beach in excess of $3,100.

Early in 1924 the complaining witness became involved in a lawsuit, and requested of the defendant, who spoke and understood the Swedish as well as the English language, her advice and aid in securing the services of an attorney. Apparently the complaining witness was not very well acquainted with defendant, but had known her mother for some time. Shortly after her appeal to the defendant for this advice and aid, it appears that the defendant was given a general power of attorney by the complaining witness. In September of the same year the defendant secured from the old lady a deed of conveyance for her property on Pine street. This deed contained a provision which obligated the defendant as grantee to support the grantor during her lifetime. Two months later the complaining witness executed a grant deed for the same property to the defendant, evidently for the purpose of removing the condition providing for support as contained in the first deed. In January, one month after the second deed was executed, the defendant mortgaged the property for $35,000, of which sum $10,000 was used to pay an incumbrance on the property, while the remaining $25,000 was retained by defendant. Within two or three months afterward $12,000 in addition was obtained by the defendant on this property by the execution of two trust deeds. During the latter part of 1925 the indebtedness on the property was refunded by the defendant with a new trust deed for the principal sum of $45,000. This last trust deed was, early in 1926, foreclosed, by reason of default in the payment of interest on the mortgage indebtedness, and also by reason of the fact that the taxes were allowed to become delinquent.

Between the 8th of August and September 20, 1924, defendant secured all of the money the complaining witness had on deposit in the Western Savings Bank, amounting to the sum of $3,138.40. This was obtained upon five checks, two for $1,000 each, two for $500 each, and one for $138.40, being the balance of the account. Three of the checks were signed "Magdalena Nelson," one signed "Magdalena Nelson, per H. V. L.," and one signed "Magdalena Nelson, per Hattie V. Larson." All five checks were made payable to Hattie V. Larson, and were indorsed by her, and, upon presentation by defendant at the Western Savings Bank, all except the last one for $138.40 were paid by the bank with cashier's checks. These cashier's checks were in turn deposited by the defendant in her own personal account in another bank, which account the evidence shows was some months later closed out.

It clearly appears that, in connection with the execution of the various documents affecting the Pine street property, as also the execution of the old lady's will, the defendant was active in procuring the services of attorneys and of notaries. Hers was the directing mind in the drafting and execution of the various documents. While the testimony relating to the execution of the checks is rather meager, the inference might fairly be drawn that the defendant was equally as active in directing the drafting and signing of the checks which depleted the old lady's deposit in the Western Savings Bank.

The complaining witness' testimony, due to her deafness, her lack of knowledge of the English language, and other infirmities of old age, presents a more or less erratic and disconnected story of her relations with the defendant, and her knowledge and understanding of the various documents and events which affected her property. She testified that she had a recollection of signing one paper at home at the request of the defendant, but denied any recollection of having signed any deeds, and denied she signed any of the checks in question. She repeatedly insisted that she had no intention either to convey her Pine street property to the defendant, or to give the defendant possession of all of her money on deposit in the Western Savings Bank. The only thing, according to her testimony, that she authorized the defendant to do affecting her money was to pay the taxes upon her Pine street property and pay her attorneys for services rendered. She further testified that she did not know that the defendant had obtained title to her real estate on Pine street, or had obtained possession of all of her money in the bank until some months after the deeds had been recorded and the checks cashed.

The evidence would readily support the conclusion that the complaining witness never received $1 from the defendant for the deed of conveyance to her Pine street property, or from the proceeds of the money secured by the defendant from the loans placed on the property, or from the money on deposit in the Western Savings Bank.

There is in addition testimony of other witnesses as to statements made by the defendant at different times concerning the fact that she had obtained property and money from the complaining witness and what she had done with it, or intended to do with it. There is also testimony as to the defendant's demeanor and conduct when she was interrogated by those investigating the old lady's affairs. All of this testimony presented pertinent matters which might well have formed a basis from which the jury would have been justified in drawing inferences that served to corroborate the testimony of the complaining witness.

The first point urged by appellant arises from the court's denial of defendant's motion "to require the prosecution to elect upon what particular transaction, in the embezzlement of which particular sum of money the prosecution will ask for a conviction under count 3 in the indictment."

Count 3 charged the embezzlement of $3,100, which was in rouna numbers the total amount which the complaining witness had on deposit in the Western Savings Bank. This money was obtained at different times during a period of five weeks. It is appellant's theory that, if she was at all guilty of embezzlement by reason of the misuse of any of the money secured from the complaining witness' savings bank account, each time she obtained money on a check a separate offense of embezzlement was committed. Upon this theory appellant contends that she was entitled to have the district attorney select one of the checks as constituting the offense for which she was to answer, and that the court committed prejudicial error in refusing to grant her motion to require the district attorney to so elect.

In the case of People v. Bartnett, 15 Cal. App. 89, 113 P. 879, cited by appellant in support of her contention, the defendant was charged by indictment with the offense of embezzling a long list of securities. It appeared from the indictment that these securities were misappropriated on different dates, covering a period of about two years. It was there held that the taking of each parcel of securities constituted a separate offense, and that the district attorney should have elected one of the specified acts of misappropriation of securities upon which to base the charge.

[1-3] This case is not in point, for the reason that in the instant case the defendant is not charged with embezzling the checks, but with embezzling a sum of money which constituted the entire sum on deposit in the complaining witness' account. People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 472, 98 P. 194. The act of embezzling the money was not completed until the checks were converted into cash, or so deposited and cleared as to enable the defendant to obtain the money in person or by check. People v. Whalen, supra; People v. Crane, 34 Cal. App. 599, 168 P. 377.

There is no evidence in the record to show at what particular time the money as represented by the checks was actually obtained by the defendant or when it was available for payment upon her check. It does appear, however, that the money on deposit in defendant's personal account in which the cashier's checks were deposited was all drawn out and the account closed.

Another factor important in determining when the act of embezzlement is completed is the intent of the person charged. It may well be in the instant case that the defendant did not intend to misappropriate these funds until she had obtained possession of the entire amount of the complaining witness' money on deposit. There is evidence that the defendant made investments after she had received and banked all of the checks, which, in addition to evidence of her admissions, would justify the inference that the misappropriation of the money was accomplished after she had acquired the entire bank deposit of the complaining witness. The question of intent was one for the jury to decide from all the facts and circumstances shown by the evidence.

In the case of People v. Ledbetter (Cal. App.) 259 P. 982, defendant obtained an automobile from the complaining witness upon the promise that he would sell it for $1,050 and invest for her the proceeds. Instead he sold the car for $300 cash and a Ford coupé. Some time later he sold the Ford coupé for $350. He retained the money he received from the sale of both cars. The information charged him with embezzling $1,050. Upon appeal the several legal objections made to the variance between the information and the evidence were swept aside and the judgment of conviction affirmed.

[4] But conceding for the sake of argument that the defendant was entitled to have the district attorney elect which one of the checks was to be relied upon as furnishing the foundation for the charge of embezzlement, we cannot see how the defendant was prejudiced by the court's ruling in refusing to grant her motion. It appears without contradiction that each of the checks was obtained by the defendant in apparently the same way; that each was presented to the Western Savings Bank by the defendant, and a cashier's check was delivered to the defendant payable to her for all but the last check. These cashier's checks were all in like manner deposited by the defendant in her own personal account. If, then, the evidence relating to one check was sufficient to justify the jury's verdict, the same would have been true of the evidence as to all of the four checks; the net result of charging the defendant with the embezzlement of $3,100 instead of the embezzlement of money obtained upon each separate check, is that she stands convicted of but one count of embezzlement, while under her theory, if guilty at all, she would be guilty of four offenses of embezzlement.

[5] In urging her second point, that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict, appellant asserts that there is no evidence to show that the checks were received by her upon any trust relation, and, further, that there is no testimony to show what was the purpose for which the checks were signed and delivered by Magdalena Nelson to the defendant. Section 508 of the Penal Code of California reads as follows:

> "Every clerk, agent, or servant of any person who fraudulently appropriates to his own use, or secretes with a fraudulent intent to appropriate to his own use, any property of another which has come into his control or care by virtue of his employment as such clerk, agent, or servant, is guilty of embezzlement."

It will be noted that under this section of the Code three requisites are essential to support the charge of embezzlement: First, that there existed between the complaining witness and the defendant the relation of clerk, agent, or servant; second, that while such relation existed there came into the possession of the defendant property belonging to the complaining witness; and, third, that, while such property was in the possession or under the control of the defendant, the defendant fraudulently appropriated it to her own use, or secreted it with a fraudulent intent to so appropriate it to her own use.

As to the first requisite, the evidence here clearly shows that, during the period that the checks were issued, the defendant was acting as the agent and employee of Magdalena Nelson. The defendant had a general power of attorney from the complaining witness, and during a period of several months apparently was attending to her business affairs. It further appears that in the case of two of the five checks the signatures of Magdalena Nelson were written by the defendant herself.

As to the second, that the defendant came into the possession of all the money which the complaining witness had on deposit in the bank, is not disputed.

The only conflict in the evidence is as to the third element; namely, the fraudulent appropriation of the money by the defendant. It must be conceded that the testimony of Magdalena Nelson, the complaining witness, is conflicting and far from satisfactory. If the verdict was dependent alone upon the old lady's testimony, appellant's contention would have to be sustained. There is the complaining witness' testimony that she told the defendant to pay her taxes and her attorney's fees; also that she had not authorized the defendant to use her funds for any other purpose. The inference may fairly be drawn from the old lady's testimony that she had no intention of giving the defendant any of this money. In addition, there is testimony of statements and admissions made by the defendant prior to her arrest that she had the money of the complaining witness and had invested the same in stocks and other securities. Without conflict it appears that when she obtained the checks in question the defendant immediately secured cashier's checks for the same and deposited these in her own personal account in another bank, and that subsequently this money was checked out by the defendant and her account closed.

Appellant cites the case of People v. Wyman, 102 Cal. 552, 36 P. 932, and People v. Royce, 106 Cal. 173, 37 P. 630, 39 P. 524, and People v. Page, 116 Cal. 386, 48 P. 326, in support of her contention that the mere deposit of the funds in her personal account and withdrawing them afterward is not sufficient to show a conversion of the funds. These cases, in our opinion, do not conflict in the views there expressed with the jury's verdict here. The fraudulent intent is always an important element in cases of this character, and it is for the jury to determine from all of the evidence whether or not the defendant acted with fraudulent intent in depositing the money of the complaining witness in her own personal bank account.

In the light of all of the circumstances as shown by the evidence, we are of the opinion that there was sufficient evidence to justify the jury in concluding that the defendant was actuated by a fraudulent intent when she deposited the funds in her own account and afterwards checked them out. Commonwealth v. Smith, 129 Mass. 104; People v. Schroeder, 43 Cal. App. 623, 185 P. 507; People v. McLean, 135 Cal. 306, 67 P. 770.

As we find no reversible errors in the record, the judgment and order denying motion for a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: HOUSER, Acting P. J.; YORK, J.

Ex parte CHAUS. (Cr. 1646.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 2, 1928.

1. Habeas corpus ⚷94—Court may, in certain cases, look beyond judgment in habeas corpus proceedings to determine jurisdictional questions (Pen. Code, § 1207).

Generally, habeas corpus proceedings do not permit inquiry beyond the face of the judgment under Pen. Code, § 1207, but in certain cases, especially with regard to judgments of police and justices' courts in which appeals have been taken and new trials denied, review of entire record will be made, where judgment is founded upon extraneous facts and proceedings which alone demonstrate want of jurisdiction.

2. Habeas corpus ⚷94—Where municipal court judgments, affirmed on appeal, merely adjudged petitioner's violations of Wright Act on same date, court on habeas corpus could examine record to determine trial court's jurisdiction (Wright Act; Pen. Code, § 1207).

Where two judgments entered in municipal court and affirmed on appeal in superior court merely adjudicated that petitioner was guilty of violations of Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79) on same date, court in habeas corpus proceedings could look beyond the judgments and view the entire record as in case of certiorari, in order to determine whether one or more offenses were in fact committed and whether municipal court exceeded its jurisdiction in attempting to enforce second judgment; consideration not being limited to judgment roll under Pen. Code, § 1207.

3. Criminal law ⟹979(2)—Where defendant's confederate, after transporting liquor, placed it in trunk, jurisdiction to sentence defendant for possession was not exhausted by sentence for transporting (Wright Act).

Where evidence in prosecutions under Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79) for transporting liquor and for possession of liquor showed that defendant and confederate had driven automobile in which liquor was loaded and that confederate had unloaded the liquor and placed it in a trunk, court was not without jurisdiction to sentence defendant for possession on ground that possession involved same offense as transportation, for which defendant had previously been convicted and sentenced.

Application by Louis Chaus for writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Chief of Police of the City of Los Angeles to secure petitioner's release from custody after conviction in the municipal court for violation of the Wright Act. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Le Roy Reames and James R. Jaffray, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

E. J. Lickley, City Pros., and Joe W. Matherly and F. W. Fellows, Deputy City Prosecutors, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The petitioner herein asks by habeas corpus to obtain his release from confinement in the city jail of the city of Los Angeles after sentence by the municipal court upon conviction of a violation of the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79).

It appears from the record before us that on or about May 23, 1927, petitioner drove an automobile to a point in the vicinity of Tenth street and Western avenue, in the city of Los Angeles, where he received and placed in the machine five gallons of grain alcohol; that he then drove to a café or lunch wagon on Tenth street, where one Carl W. Bell, alias Jack Moore, joined him, and the two men drove around for a short time, finally proceeding to a residence on Fountain avenue, where Chaus alighted, entering the house, and Bell drove into the garage. Two police officers, who had received advance information of the men's intentions, immediately proceeded to the premises, one of whom entered the house, and the other the garage, and placed Chaus and Bell under arrest. Before his arrest, Bell removed the alcohol from the car and placed it in a trunk, but apparently it was removed therefrom and set on the trunk; Chaus was led to the garage and questioned about it, whereupon he denied that the can contained alcohol, but later admitted that it did, and stated that he owned it.

Petitioner and Bell were each charged with unlawful transportation and unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, to both of which charges Bell pleaded guilty. Chaus pleaded guilty to having transported the liquor, and was sentenced to a term of three months in the city jail. To the charge of illegal possession he pleaded not guilty, was tried and convicted, and received for this latter offense a sentence of one year in the city jail. Upon appeals to the superior court by Chaus both judgments were affirmed.

It is contended by the petitioner that he was twice sentenced for the same offense, in that the possession and transportation consisted of but one act, and that, having already served three months for transporting the liquor, it is now attempted by the municipal court to confine him for a period of one year for having had possession of the same liquor at the same time. It is insisted by the respondent (1) that this proceeding is in the nature of a collateral attack upon the judgment, and that we should not go behind the judgment to ascertain whether or not the petitioner is entitled to relief; (2) that unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, and unlawful transportation of the same are separate and distinct offenses, for each of which a penalty may be assessed; and (3) that, if resort be had to the facts, the record below will show the commission of separate and distinct offenses, although perpetrated on the same date.

Each of the judgments upon which petitioner was sentenced merely recites that the defendant be imprisoned in the city jail for a violation of the Wright Act, and are based upon complaints which allege, respectively, that Louis Chaus unlawfully transported over and upon Fountain avenue and St. Andrews street, and that he unlawfully had in possession at Fountain avenue and St. Andrews street, in said city of Los Angeles, certain alcoholic intoxicating liquors.

In Re Todd, 44 Cal. App. 496, 186 P. 790, the rules both in the state and federal courts are discussed, and the point first urged by respondent apparently finds support. The court there said:

> "A proceeding in habeas corpus involves a collateral attack upon the judgment in a criminal case, where the prisoner thus seeks his release from personal restraint after judgment of conviction and sentence, and the single question reviewable and determinable therein is one of jurisdiction. Therefore, in the determination in such case of the question whether a judicial tribunal was without jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the proceeding thus sought to be reviewed or of the person of the party whose liberty is under restraint by virtue of such proceeding, or whether such tribunal, once having it, had for any legal reason lost jurisdiction to hear the proceeding or to pass judgment therein, the court to which the application is addressed is, generally speaking, limited solely to the consideration of the judgment roll, or, as our Code defines it (Pen. Code, § 1207), 'the record of the action.'"

[1] Other cases holding it to be the uniform rule that, generally speaking, proceedings in habeas corpus do not permit of inquiry beyond the face of the judgment, are In re Gutierrez, 46 Cal. App. 94, 188 P. 1004; In re Drew, 188 Cal. 717, 207 P. 249, and authorities therein cited. It is also true, however, that there are exceptions to this rule, and that in such cases, if a judgment, although formal and apparently valid, is nevertheless founded upon facts and proceedings from which alone it may be made to appear that the court was without, or exceeded its jurisdiction, a review of the entire record will be made, as in certiorari. And this is particularly true as to judgments of the police and justices' courts from which appeals have been taken and new trials denied. In re Gottschalk, 47 Cal. App. 260, 190 P. 649; In re Drew, supra; In re Lake, 65 Cal. App. 420, 224 P. 126. In the case last cited it was said:

> "The scope of the inquiry which the court can make upon either habeas corpus or certiorari is precisely the same. Ex parte Drew, 188 Cal. 717, 207 P. 249, 250; Commercial Bank, etc., v. Superior Court, 192 Cal. 395, 220 P. 422, 423. While neither writ is one of error, both extend to the entire record of the court below and to the evidence itself when necessary to determine jurisdiction. Hotaling v. Superior Court, 191 Cal. 501, 217 P. 73, 75, 29 A. L. R. 127. This inquiry, of course, cannot go beyond the question of jurisdiction, and the review of the evidence is limited to the sole purpose of determining, first, whether jurisdiction existed; and, second, whether jurisdiction was exceeded."

[2] We think the instant proceeding is one falling within the exception rather than the general rule. As we have observed, both judgments here involved merely adjudge the petitioner guilty of having violated the Wright Act on the same date. Hence it obviously is necessary that we look beyond the judgments and view the entire record in order that we may ascertain whether one or more offenses were in fact committed, and, as a result of such inquiry, determine whether or not the municipal court exceeded its jurisdiction in attempting to enforce the second judgment.

The penal provisions of the Volstead Act (27 USCA) were incorporated into the law of this state, and it is expressly made an offense by said act either to "transport * * * or possess any intoxicating liquor except as authorized by this act." Both state and federal tribunals have repeatedly held that the several inhibitions of the Volstead Act are separate and distinct. To manufacture, to own, possess, transport, barter, or sell intoxicating liquor, while separate and distinct as a violation of the act of Congress, and hence an infraction of the Wright Act, and punishable as such, may, nevertheless, before it can be proven, require evidence tending to establish one or more of the other forbidden acts mentioned. In People v. Mehra, 73 Cal. App. 162, 238 P. 802, after an exhaustive review of many state and federal cases, it was held that unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor in a building was not sufficient evidence with which to convict the occupant of the offense of maintaining such establishment as a public nuisance for the sale and dispensing of intoxicants, although proof of the latter would warrant a conviction upon both charges of maintaining a public nuisance and unlawful possession. It is therein further held that each act forbidden by the Wright Act, through adoption of the Volstead Act, constitutes a separate, distinct, and punishable offense, and the court in its opinion, which our Supreme Court declined to review, quotes with approval from Page v. United States (C. C. A. 9th Circuit) 278 F. 41 as follows: "The offense of unlawfully possessing liquor is a distinct offense from that of unlawful transportation of liquor." Evidence merely of unlawful possession is not proof of transportation. A person, once having taken possession of liquor unlawfully, completes a distinct offense forbidden by the statute. We are not unmindful of those decisions upon the principle of which petitioner seeks to rely, holding that the bare apprehension of one driving a vehicle containing alcoholic liquor may not be punished both for possession and transportation, since the former is then a part of, and necessary to, the latter. Brown v. United States (C. C. A.) 16 F.(2d) 682. Also, a person whose only possession consists of loading the liquor into a vehicle with which he thereafter tranports it, is not legally punishable for such possession, as it "was necessary and incidental to the act of transportation." Schroeder v. United States, 7 F.(2d) 60, 65, citing Miller v. United States (C. C. A.) 300 F. 529, 534; Morgan v. United States (C. C. A.) 294 F. 82; Rossman v. United States (C. C. A.) 280 F. 950; and Reynolds v. United States (C. C. A.) 280 F. 1. Yet, in Schroeder v. United States, supra, it was said that possession and transportation may be, and commonly are, distinct offenses; that "possession for a substantial time, and followed by transportation, might constitute two distinct offenses, just as possession for a substantial time, followed by a sale, might amount to two distinct offenses." As stated in Bell v. United States (C. C. A.) 285 F. 145:

> "A person may be in unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes, and never transport or sell it, as where he has it in possession in an unlawful place. That, having it in possession unlawfully, he should afterwards transport it, unlawfully, involves the commission of two unlawful acts, each violative of the National Prohibition Act, and the court on an accusation, both for unlawful possession and unlawful transportation, in separate counts, could properly impose punishment on each count on a verdict finding the defendant guilty upon each. Massey v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 281 F. 295."

Again, in Hadley v. United States (C. C. A.) 18 F.(2d) 507, 509, quoting from Albrecht v. United States, 273 U. S. 1, 47 S. Ct. 250, 71 L. Ed. 505, it was said:

> "There is nothing in the Constitution which prevents Congress from punishing separately each step leading to the consummation of a transaction which it has power to prohibit and punishing also the completed transaction."

And the Supreme Court of the United States there specifically applied the rule to violations of the Volstead Act in the following language:

> "The precise question does not appear to have been discussed in either this or a lower federal court in connection with the National Prohibition Act; but the general principle is well established. Compare Burton v. United States, 202 U. S. 344, 377, 26 S. Ct. 688, 50 L. Ed. 1057, 1069, 6 Ann. Cas. 362; Gavieres v. United States, 220 U. S. 338, 31 S. Ct. 421, 55 L. Ed. 489; Morgan v. Devine, 237 U. S. 632, 35 S. Ct. 712, 59 L. Ed. 1153."

[3] The meager portion presented of the record below does not disclose that Chaus or Bell resided in the vicinity of Tenth street and Western avenue, nor that either of them had had possession of the liquor in question prior to the time that petitioner loaded it into the automobile at that point. It does appear, however, that the evidence before the trial court tended to show that Chaus first obtained the alcohol, drove to the café for Bell, both then proceeding to the Fountain avenue house, which Chaus entered and was telephoning while Bell drove to the garage, unloaded the liquor, which he placed in a trunk; that Bell pleaded guilty to both possession and transportation of the contraband which admittedly was the property of the petitioner. It is apparent, therefore, that both defendants were guilty of having transported the liquor, and each pleaded guilty to that offense. What disposition they intended to make of it we are not informed. However, since it lies within the legislative powers of Congress to denounce as a separate and distinct offense any substantial possession prior to transportation, which is not incidental to and a necessary part of that offense, and it has so ordained by valid enactment, we see no difference in principle between such a case and one wherein it is shown that the defendants first transported the liquor to some secret cache, and there stored it for future disposition. It further appears from the record that the petitioner was engaged in the illicit sale of intoxicating liquor, and that he contemplated the selling his "route" to Bell. The logical assumption follows that they did not transport the liquor to the Fountain avenue address for their own personal consumption, and as to how long they intended that it should remain in the trunk we are not advised, nor do we deem it material. That they had it in their joint possession, and that such possession of the alcohol after being supposedly hidden away for their undisclosed purposes was not necessary nor incidental to the transportation, is self-evident.

Voluminous briefs and a great many authorities have been presented by each of the parties, but we think those to which we have made reference in this opinion announce the established rules in such cases. A careful perusal of the briefs and of other decisions than those to which our attention is called fails to disclose any which are distinguishable in principle when applied to similar conditions to those before us.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner is remanded.

GRISINGER v. GOLDEN STATE BANK OF LONG BEACH. (Civ. 5136.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 7, 1928.

Banks and banking 🔑139—Bank paying check on which payment was stopped held liable to drawer.

Where bank, after payment was stopped on check, indorsed check "Payment stopped," but, notwithstanding such indorsement, paid check from funds in its possession belonging to drawer, it cannot escape liability to drawer for such payment on the ground that stopping payment of check was merely an act of courtesy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action by E. A. Grisinger against the Golden State Bank of Long Beach. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Roscoe S. Wilkey and Nowland M. Reid, both of Long Beach, for appellant.

Underwood, Burke & Cree, of Long Beach, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. The question involved in this appeal relates to the liability of a bank to one of its depositors who, by a "stop-payment notice" to the bank, ordered the nonpayment of a check theretofore drawn on his funds deposited in said bank—notwithstanding the fact that, by a statement contained in such "stop-payment notice," the bank purportedly was relieved "from any liability in case of payment" of such check.

The facts appear to be that plaintiff had entered into an agreement with a finance company to the effect that, if within a fixed time it should secure a loan of $50,000 for him, he would pay to such finance company the sum of $1,500 as commission in compensation of its services in that regard. It was also agreed between such parties that plaintiff would deposit with the finance company his post-dated check in the sum of $1,500—apparently to be cashed on the consummation of the loan. However, before agreeing to deposit his check, plaintiff had a conversation with certain of the officers of the defendant bank, who assured plaintiff that, if for any reason he should desire to stop payment on his $1,500 check, he might do so by giving to the bank a notice to that effect. Several days before the time limit had expired, within which (according to the agreement) the finance company was to secure the loan of $50,000 for plaintiff, it became evident to plaintiff that the loan would not be consummated. Thereupon he went to the representative officers of the bank upon which his $1,500 check had been drawn, and told them that, in accordance with previous conversations between them and him, he wished to stop payment on his $1,500 check, "and then and there directed said defendant bank not to pay said check, and that said defendant bank then and there presented to plaintiff for his signature the following order in words and figures as follows, to wit:

> "Golden State Bank of Long Beach, Long Beach, Calif.: Stop payment of check drawn by E. A. Grisinger, No. ——— dated September 8th for $1,500.00. Favor of ———. Date stopped 9/8/23. Time 10 a. m. I ask this as an act of courtesy only and hereby release you from any liability in case of payment or nonpayment."

Plaintiff signed said notice. Thereafter, on presentation for payment of said check to said defendant bank, it caused to be stamped upon the face of said check the indorsement "Payment stopped, Sep. 11, 1923,"—notwithstanding which, on the same day, the defendant bank paid said check from funds in its possession belonging to plaintiff.

In the premises, a judgment for defendant was the result of an action brought by plaintiff against the defendant, and plaintiff appeals therefrom.

The case of Hiroshima v. Bank of Italy, 78 Cal. App. 362, 248 P. 947, is directly in point. In principle, it is there held that, in circumstances such as are herein stated, the bank should not be permitted to pay the check and thereafter escape liability to its drawer on the ground that stopping payment of the check was merely "an act of courtesy." In the Hiroshima Case the statutes and authorities are reviewed, and the reasons for the conclusion by the court are exhaustively stated. To here repeat the able argument there presented would serve no useful purpose. Suffice it to say that this court is in harmony with the conclusion there reached.

The judgment is reversed.

In re TROY'S ESTATE.

HANKS v. DORN et al.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 1, 1928.

1. Executors and administrators 🔑400—Order requiring attorney of executrix to pay proceeds of sale of realty into court held proper, notwithstanding attachment against executrix personally (Code Civ. Proc. § 1461).

In proceeding, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1461, for an accounting, where attorneys for executrix refused to pay proceeds of sale of realty belonging to estate because of attachments levied in actions pending against executrix personally, order directing attorneys to pay proceeds to court held proper, since, none of proceeds having been distributed to executrix, it was still property of estate, subject to inquiry provided by statute.

2. Executors and administrators 🔑315(4)—Attorneys ordered to pay estate moneys into court could not assert right of creditors of executrix to object to vacation of decree of distribution (Code Civ. Proc. § 1461).

In proceeding pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1461, where attorneys, ordered to pay moneys belonging to estate into court, asserted that order setting aside decree of distribution prejudiced creditors of executrix, held, that fact that attaching creditors may have had right to object to vacation of decree was not matter which attorneys could raise, as they were not representatives of such creditors.

3. Executors and administrators 🔑315(4)—Where decree of distribution was set aside before distribution, court could order payment of moneys constituting part of estate into court (Code Civ. Proc. § 1461).

In proceeding pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1461, where attorneys ordered to pay moneys belonging to estate into court, contended that accounting involved determination of title claimed by third parties, matter over which probate court had no jurisdiction, held that, since decree of distribution was set aside before any of moneys were distributed to legatees, there was no dispute of title between creditors and legatees, but moneys were clearly property of estate, for which attorneys were bound to account to estate.

4. Executors and administrators 🔑315(4)—Ordering attorneys to pay moneys belonging to estate into court after decree of distribution was vacated held proper as against contention that accounting had been made (Code Civ. Proc. § 1461).

In proceeding pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1461, order requiring attorneys holding moneys belonging to estate to pay same into court held proper, where decree of distribution was vacated as against contention that an accounting had been made, and that court was without authority to do anything further under statute, since party obtaining property of estate by virtue of decree which has been set aside holds under court's error, and is not third party claiming title personally to estate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

Proceeding in the matter of the estate of John H. Troy, also known as J. H. Troy, J. H. Troy, Jr., and John H. Troy, Jr., deceased, by Beatrice H. Hanks, against Walter E. Dorn and another. From an order directing payment into court of money found belonging to the estate, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Walter H. Robinson, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Booth B. Goodman, of Oakland, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. The appellants have appealed from an order of the probate court directing them to pay into court moneys found to belong to the estate of Troy, deceased, of which respondent Hanks is the executrix. The moneys are proceeds of the sale of real property belonging to the estate which came into the possession of the appellants in their capacity as attorneys for the executrix. They make no claim of title, but insist that they are excused from complying with the order because of certain attachments which have been levied in actions pending against the executrix personally. Of the sums ordered to be paid, $8,000 is on deposit in a local bank to the joint account of Palmer and Dorn, while the remaining $779.58 is held by Dorn alone. Palmer has endeavored to meet the terms of the order, and does not join in the appeal.

[1] The order was made pursuant to a citation and hearing under section 1461 of the Code of Civil Procedure, wherein it appeared that certain real property belonging to the estate had been sold under order of court; that the entire proceeds had been received by appellant Dorn; that he paid from these moneys claims against the estate and legacies included in the decree of distribution; that he paid nothing to the executrix, who was one of the legatees, but deposited the sums in suit to meet the claims of her creditors. None of the money having been distributed to the respondent, it was still the property of the estate subject to the inquiry provided for in the section cited.

[2] It is argued that the court was without power to set aside the decree of distribution to the prejudice of the attaching creditors of the distributee. The point does not arise. No appeal was taken from the order setting aside the decree of distribution. There are many cases under which such a decree may be set aside, and, when this is done, it is not subject to collateral attack. The fact that attaching creditors may have had the right to object to the vacation of the decree is not a matter which the appellants can raise here, as they are not representatives of those creditors.

[3] It is argued that the accounting involved the determination of title claimed by third parties—a matter over which the probate court had no jurisdiction. The decree of distribution having been set aside before any of these moneys were distributed to the legatee, there was no dispute of title between the creditors and the legatee. The moneys were clearly the property of the estate for which the attorneys were bound to account to the estate.

[4] Finally it is argued that the order requiring the payment of the moneys into court is a nullity because section 1461 of the Code of Civil Procedure merely provides for an accounting, and that, "an accounting having been made, the court was without authority to do anything further thereunder." The point is merely stated without argument and without citation of authority. Heydenfeldt v. Superior Court of City & County of San Francisco, 117 Cal. 348, 49 P. 210, is authority adverse to appellants' contention. There an order was made, after hearing upon a citation issued under section 1461 of the Code of Civil Procedure, requiring a legatee to restore to the executors property which she had received by virtue of a decree of distribution which was later reversed on appeal. The Supreme Court affirmed the order upon the ground that, the property having been acquired through the error of the probate court, that court had the inherent power to right the injury caused by its own error. There is no essential difference between the reversal of a decree of distribution on appeal and a vacation of the decree by the court which entered it. Where a party has obtained property of an estate by virtue of a decree which has been set aside, he holds under the court's error, and is not a third party claiming title adversely to the estate, as was the case in Ex parte Casey, 71 Cal. 269, 12 P. 118.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 31, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 30, 1928.

1. Homestead ⟹57(1)—Plaintiff suing for unlawful attachment of crop upon homestead was required to show valid homestead existed (Civ. Code, § 1265).

In action based on unlawful attachment of crop of potatoes on homestead claimed to be exempt from levy, under Civ. Code, § 1265, plaintiff was required to show that a valid homestead existed.

2. Attachment ⟹373—Complaint for damages for wrongful attachment of crop, alleging that lands constituted homestead and setting forth declaration of homestead, and alleging that homestead had not been abandoned, held sufficient (Civ. Code, §§ 1262–1265, especially § 1265).

In action for damages for unlawful attachment of crop of potatoes on plaintiff's homestead, under Civ. Code, § 1265, complaint alleging that the lands constituted homestead and setting out declaration of homestead containing all statements required under sections 1262–1265, together with allegation that homestead had not been abandoned, held sufficient as against general demurrer.

3. Homestead ⟹5, 30—Provisions of homestead law are liberally construed except provision as to residence at time of filing declaration (Civ. Code, §§ 1262–1265).

Laws creating homestead, Civ. Code, §§ 1262–1265, are liberally construed except as to provision relating to residence at time declaration is filed, which is strictly construed.

4. Pleading ⟹67—Existence of prior homestead held matter of defense not required to be anticipated or negatived in complaint for unlawful attachment of crop upon property claimed as homestead (Civ. Code, §§ 1262–1265, especially § 1265).

In action for unlawful attachment of crop of potatoes upon homestead claimed to be exempt from levy, under Civ. Code, § 1265, in which complaint set forth declaration of homestead under sections 1262–1265, existence of prior homestead was matter of defense which plaintiffs were not required to anticipate or negative in their complaint.

5. Homestead ⟹30—Amendment relative to declaration of homestead held not to affect declaration made and recorded before amendment was passed (Civ. Code, § 1263, as amended by St. 1927, p. 828, by adding subdivision 5).

Civ. Code, § 1263, as amended by St. 1927, p. 828, by adding subdivision 5, relative to additional statements in declaration of homestead, which was claimed to require allegation in complaint for unlawful attachment of crops on homestead that no former declaration had been made, held not retroactive so as to affect declaration of homestead made and recorded before amendment was enacted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by John D. McNabb and wife against R. R. Byrnes, as Sheriff of Mendocino County, and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed with direction.

L. D. Mooney, of Ft. Bragg, and A. L. Wessels, of Ukiah, for appellants.

Peirsol & Stone, of Ft. Bragg, and Chas. Kasch and Hale McCowen, Jr., both of Ukiah, for respondents.

HUGHES, Justice pro tem. This is an action brought by plaintiffs and appellants herein, who are husband and wife, against R. R. Byrnes, as sheriff of Mendocino county, and W. F. Kemppe, to recover $2,275 as actual damages and $2,500 exemplary damages, alleged to have been sustained by appellants by reason of the alleged wrongful and illegal levy of a certain writ of attachment issued out of the superior court of Mendocino county on October 24, 1924, in an action entitled W. F. Kemppe v. J. D. McNabb and J. C. McNabb, and the seizure and detention under said writ of a certain growing crop of potatoes in and upon the land claimed as a homestead by appellants. By reason of such alleged homestead, it is asserted that the said crop was and is exempt from such levy, seizure, and detention. A second amended complaint was filed on October 3, 1925. The defendant Kemppe interposed a general and special demurrer thereto, while the defendant Brynes filed only a general demurrer. Each of the demurrers was sustained by the court by its order of October 30, 1925, and notice thereof waived in open court, plaintiffs being granted ten days in which to amend, if so advised. Plaintiffs, failing to file an amended complaint within the time allotted, counsel for each defendant on November 13, 1925, made written demand on the clerk that he enter judgment in favor of defendants. Immediately thereafter the clerk signed and on November 17, 1925, entered judgment, ordering and adjudging that plaintiffs recover nothing from said defendants, or either of them.

The action of the court in sustaining the demurrers is questioned, and for that reason it is necessary to state somewhat fully the allegations of the second amended complaint. There is set forth therein the official character of the defendant Byrnes; that the plaintiffs are husband and wife and the owners and in possession of certain lands therein described, situated in Mendocino county; that plaintiffs, with intent to acquiring a home and claiming a homestead, and while they were actually residing thereon, did, by John D. McNabb, on July 11, 1922, make, execute, and acknowledge, and on July 15, 1922, record a declaration of homestead covering the lands described in the complaint. It is further alleged: That said homestead has not been abandoned. That in 1924 plaintiffs planted 15 acres of said land to potatoes. That on October 24, 1924, W. F. Kemppe commenced an action in the superior court of Mendocino county wherein the defendants were the said J. D. McNabb and J. C. McNabb, and that in said action a writ of attachment was issued, directed to the sheriff, R. R. Byrnes, defendant herein, to levy upon and seize such crop of potatoes then growing upon said alleged homestead lands. Thereafter Byrnes, at the direction of Kemppe, served said writ on plaintiffs, and caused the same to be recorded in Book 4 of Attachments, p. 15, of Mendocino County Records. That immediately after the levy of said attachment, plaintiffs notified said Kemppe and Byrnes that the lands constituted a homestead and that the crop of potatoes was exempt, and on November 25, 1924, served written notice on them to the same effect, and that, nevertheless, with malice, they refused to release said crop or said attachment or to permit plaintiffs to dig said potatoes. That at the time of said levy said potatoes were good and merchantable and about ready to be harvested. That on November 15 the winter rains set in and plaintiffs notified the defendants to dig and save said crop, and that on November 27, 1924, plaintiffs were advised by their attorneys that they had a right to dig said crop and to save as much thereof as possible. That thereafter they did dig 9 tons of said crop. That thereafter on May 25, 1925, plaintiffs made a motion, which was served and filed, wherein they sought an order of said superior court to discharge said attachment, which motion was subsequently denied. That the acts of the defendants, and each of them, were malicious and without probable cause, and were done in reckless disregard of the rights of plaintiffs and each of them, injuring plaintiffs in the respects above set forth.

Plaintiffs prepared and served and on November 17, 1925, filed with the clerk of said superior court a notice of motion for an order of said court to set aside and vacate the order theretofore made and entered on October 30, 1925, sustaining defendants' demurrers to plaintiffs' second amended complaint and to grant a rehearing on defendants' said demurrers, which motion was made on November 27, 1925, and was by the court denied. On November 28, 1925, plaintiffs prepared, served and filed a notice of motion for an order to cancel, set aside, and vacate the judgment heretofore mentioned, made, and entered by the clerk, and to vacate and set aside the order of court made on October 30, 1925, sustaining defendants' said demurrers, and to grant a rehearing on said demurrers. Said motions were argued and submitted on December 3, 1925, and on December 5, 1925, the court denied the same. Thereafter, on December 5, 1925, the court vacated its previous orders and ordered the matter to be further heard. On December 11, 1925, the court ordered that its previous orders of December 5, 1925, denying plaintiffs' motions, be restored, and its subsequent order made on the same day be vacated and set aside. The plaintiffs have appealed from the judgment made on November 13, and entered on November 17, 1925, by the clerk and from the several orders of the court as above narrated.

We shall first consider the correctness of the court's order sustaining the general and special demurrers of the defendants. The facts as alleged in the complaint have been fully recited, so as to illustrate the points involved in the demurrers.

[1-3] This action is based on the unlawful attachment of the crop of potatoes upon the homestead, which crop is claimed to be exempt from levy. Section 1265, Civ. Code. It is necessary, therefore, to show that a valid homestead existed on the land. The complaint alleged that the lands constitute the homestead of plaintiffs, and plead in extenso the declaration of homestead made by plaintiff John D. McNabb. Said declaration contains all the statements required for such an instrument by the provisions of title 5, part 4, division 2, of the Civil Code, which furnish the law governing homesteads, and was in all respects sufficient in form and substance. It was, of itself, a sufficient statement of facts, showing that a homestead existed in favor of plaintiffs. In addition thereto, paragraph V of the complaint contains the following allegations:

> "That the said plaintiffs, or either of them, have not abandoned said homestead, or any part thereof, by a declaration of abandonment, or by grant thereof, or in any other manner or at all; that said homestead claim, ever since the said 15th day of July, 1922, has been and now is in full force, effect, and virtue."

While these allegations consisted partly of conclusions of law, they nevertheless are sufficient to withstand the attack of a general demurrer. The special demurrer was directed entirely to other points. City of Santa Barbara v. Eldred, 108 Cal. 294, 41 P. 410; San Christina Investment Co. v. City and County of San Francisco, 167 Cal. 762, 141 P. 384, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 676; Thompson v. Hamilton Motor Co., 170 Cal. 737, 151 P. 122, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 677.

The laws creating a homestead are generally to be liberally construed, except that provision as to residence at the time the declaration is filed, and, as to that, it is strictly construed. Bullis v. Staniford, 178 Cal. 40, 171 P. 1064; Johnston v. De Bock, 198 Cal. 177, 244 P. 330.

[4] The allegation as to residence is direct, positive, and sufficient. Since nothing ap pears in said declaration or anywhere in said complaint that plaintiffs have not previously selected a homestead, or that they did not have a valid, subsisting homestead at the time of making such declaration, it is asserted by respondents that for these reasons the complaint is insufficient. It is contended that if such prior homestead existed, the declaration set forth in the complaint would not impress the lands embraced therein with homestead rights; in other words, a party cannot have two homesteads, and, if he attempts to acquire a second while the first is in force, the second is void. In support of this contention, respondents rely upon the case of Waggle v. Worthy, 74 Cal. 266, 15 P. 831, 5 Am. St. Rep. 440. This case unquestionably holds that a person cannot have two homesteads; that if one exists, the attempt to acquire a second is void. But the existence of a prior homestead is a matter of defense, and it has often been held that it is not necessary for the plaintiff to anticipate the defense, or to negative the same. Nickel v. State, 179 Cal. 126, 175 P. 641; Neeley v. Neeley, 179 Cal. 232, 176 P. 163; Jacobson v. Oakland Meat Co., 161 Cal. 425, 119 P. 653, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1194.

[5] Respondents cite section 1263 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 828), as affecting the necessity of an allegation in the complaint that no former declaration has been made, or if made, that it has been abandoned. Subdivision 5 of said section is permissive as to what a declaration of homestead may contain, and the effect to be given such statement made in accordance with its provisions. That it is not mandatory to make such further statement is plainly evidenced by the language thereof, wherein it provides that, "* * * If it contains such further statement," etc., it shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated. It is sufficient to say that subdivision 5 was added in 1927, after the declaration homestead in question was made and recorded, and that it is not retroactive in its effect.

The special demurrer of the defendant Kemppe is predicated on the contention that the complaint is uncertain, ambiguous, and unintelligible in certain particulars. Without discussing in detail the several assignments, it is sufficient to say that we have examined the complaint in the light of these objections, and are convinced that it is sufficient, and not amenable to the same.

For the reasons above stated, we therefore conclude that the demurrers were improperly sustained.

In view of the conclusions we have reached, it is unnecessary to consider the other points raised on this appeal.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the trial court to overrule the demurrers and to permit the defendants to answer if so advised.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

SWARTZ v. FEDDERSHON.

SWARTZ et al. v. SAME.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 29, 1928.

1. Automobiles 🔑171(4)—Automobilist must yield right of way to automobilist who would first enter highway intersection from right if respective rates of speed are maintained.

It is duty of automobilist approaching highway intersection, which automobilist approaching from right would enter first if their respective rates of speed are maintained, to yield right of way and veer to right side of highway.

2. Automobiles 🔑245(80)—Automobilist held not contributorily negligent, as matter of law, as having proceeded heedlessly into known danger of collision with automobile approaching highway intersection from left.

Plaintiff who was between 29 and 50 feet from edge of highway intersection when he first saw automobile approaching from left over 200 feet away at such speed that plaintiff would enter intersection first if their respective rates of speed were maintained held not contributorily negligent, as matter of law, as having proceeded blindly and heedlessly into known danger of collision due to other driver's failure to yield right of way and veer to right side of highway, though he failed to look further to left after seeing such automobile.

3. Automobiles 🔑206—Assumption that one is not exposed to danger from another's violation of law or duty is not negligence, in absence of reasonable ground to think otherwise.

The general rule is that every person has a right to presume that every other person will perform his duty and obey the law, and, in absence of reasonable ground to think otherwise, it is not negligence to assume that one is not exposed to danger arising only from violation of law or duty by another.

4. Automobiles 🔑245(80)—Automobilist held not contributorily negligent, as matter of law, in not again looking to left after seeing automobile which would have entered highway intersection after him had respective rates of speed been maintained.

Automobilist slowing down to 15 miles an hour before reaching highway crossing and looking out for vehicles approaching from opposite direction and from his right, in which latter direction only fleeting view of highway could be had before reaching it, held not contributorily negligent, as matter of law, in failing to look again to left after seeing another automobile at such distance away that he would enter intersection first if their respective rates of speed were maintained.

5. Appeal and error 🔑996—Jury's finding that plaintiff was not contributorily negligent cannot be disturbed on appeal, where reasonable minds could not differ.

Where reasonable minds could not differ on question of plaintiff's contributory negligence, jury's finding for plaintiff thereon cannot be set aside on appeal.

6. Automobiles 🔑245(88)—Whether automobile driver's wife, not warning him of approach of automobile from left, used ordinary care, held for jury.

Whether wife, riding in automobile driven by husband, whom she failed to warn of approach of automobile from left at such distance that husband's car would enter intersection first if respective rates of speed were maintained, used ordinary care under circumstances, held for jury in action for injuries to her in collision with such car.

7. Appeal and error 🔑757(4)—Refusal of correct instruction cannot be considered, where record is typewritten, and instructions given are not printed in appellant's brief.

Where record is in typewritten form, and appellant has not printed in his brief any of instructions given, refusal of correct instruction requested by him cannot be considered by appellate court, which is unable to determine whether such instruction was included in those given.

8. Evidence 🔑254—Foundation of time, place, and persons present held unnecessary before introducing evidence of defendant's admissions immediately after automobile collision.

No foundation as to time, place, and persons present was necessary before evidence of defendant's admissions, immediately after collision between his automobile and that in which plaintiffs were riding, could be introduced in action for injuries sustained by latter.

9. Appeal and error 🔑237(2)—Defendant, not moving to strike testimony, cannot complain thereof on appeal.

Defendant, not moving to strike out plaintiff's testimony on cross-examination, indicating that she did not know that admission was made by defendant as she testified on direct examination, cannot avail himself of such objection on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Actions, tried together, by Guy O. Swartz and by Jennie J. Swartz and husband, against Phillip Feddershon. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hardy, Elliott & Eberle, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ida May Adams, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. These cases were tried together in the superior court, and in each case judgment was rendered against the defendant, from which he appeals. Both appeals are submitted to us on the same record and the same briefs. The cases arose out of a collision between two automobiles, one driven by the defendant, and the other driven by the plaintiff Guy O. Swartz, in which his wife, the plaintiff Jennie J. Swartz, was riding. In one of the cases Guy O. Swartz sued alone as plaintiff for damages caused by personal injuries suffered by him in this collision, for damages caused to him by injuries to his wife, and for damages to his automobile. In the other case both plaintiffs sued for personal injuries received by the plaintiff Jennie J. Swartz.

The points made in support of both appeals are the same. The defendant contends that the evidence established contributory negligence of both plaintiffs as a matter of law, and hence that his motion for a nonsuit should have been granted or the verdict should have been in his favor; that the evidence does not support the verdict; and that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions requested by him and in overruling his objection to certain evidence offered by the plaintiff. All of these points, except those relating to instructions and rulings on evidence, may be considered together.

The evidence herein was conflicting in many respects. From the verdict we must conclude that the jury took the view of it most favorable to the plaintiffs. Taking such a view and resolving all doubts and inconsistencies for the plaintiffs, they were warranted in finding the following facts. In discussing these facts we shall, except as otherwise indicated, refer to the plaintiff Guy O. Swartz, who was driving his automobile, simply as "plaintiff":

The collision occurred in the forenoon at the intersection of Sunset boulevard, on which the plaintiff was driving in a northerly direction, and Temple avenue, on which defendant was driving in an easterly direction. Both of these highways were in a rural community; Sunset boulevard was paved and Temple avenue was unpaved, but was graded and graveled. Each of them was 60 feet wide between property lines. In the angle at the southwest corner of the two highways, across which the plaintiff and defendant must have looked to see each other as they approached the intersection, and within 100 feet of each highway, were some trees which partly obstructed the view of one highway from the other, but did not entirely obscure. West of the trees was a house, the nearest side of which was 105 feet west of the west line of Sunset boulevard. As the plaintiff, driving north along Sunset boulevard, neared Temple avenue, his view to the east was cut off by structures situated at the southeast corner. Plaintiff was driving at a speed of about 25 miles an hour, but as he reached a point 135 to 140 feet from the intersection he slowed down to 20 miles an hour. When he was 100 feet from the intersection he slowed down to 15 miles an hour and as he entered and traversed the intersection he was going between 10 and 12 miles an hour. Plaintiff was at all times traveling on the right side of Sunset boulevard. When the defendant reached a point a little over 200 feet west of the intersection he was going 40 or 45 miles an hour and traveling on the left side of Temple avenue, and he continued at that rate of speed and on the left side of the highway until he entered the intersection. Upon entering the intersection he did not look in either direction and he did not see the plaintiff's automobile until just before the collision. The plaintiff entered the intersection first and his front wheels had just crossed the center line of Temple avenue when defendant entered the intersection. Plaintiff's automobile was struck on the left front corner by the right front corner of defendant's machine, turned completely over, and was practically demolished. Defendant's machine remained upright. When the plaintiff reached a point variously stated as 59 or 80 feet from the center line of Temple avenue, he heard a loud noise as of an approaching machine, looked to the west, saw the defendant approaching and observed that he was then a little over 200 feet west of the intersection, going 40 to 45 miles an hour and traveling on the left side of the road. Plaintiff did not at that time anticipate a collision and he then looked to the right or east on Temple avenue to see if any one was coming that way, and continued to do so until he could see along Temple avenue. He testified that he did not again look to the left because he believed defendant would stop before he reached the intersection. Plaintiff did not look a second time toward defendant until plaintiff's machine was crossing the center line of Temple avenue and defendant's machine was entering the intersection. Seeing the defendant, the plaintiff then put on his brakes and locked his wheels in an attempt to stop, causing them to slide 2 or 3 feet before the collision occurred.

From the facts above stated on which the jury may have based their verdict, it appears that the defendant was guilty of two violations of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517), each of which constituted negligence and proximately contributed to the accident: (1) He failed to yield to plaintiff the right of way to which the latter was entitled under section 131 of the Motor Vehicle Act as it stood at the time of the accident by virtue of having first entered the intersection at a lawful rate of speed; (2) he was traveling on the left side of the highway although the other side was passable.

[1-3] The defendant contends, however, that conceding that he was negligent, the evidence shows without conflict that the plaintiffs were both guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, in that they proceeded blindly and heedlessly into a known danger. We do not think the facts fully warrant this argument. When the plaintiff first saw the defendant's automobile, plaintiff was somewhere between 29 and 50 feet from the nearest edge of the intersection, while the defendant was over 200 feet therefrom, and their respective rates of speed were such that, if they were maintained, the plaintiff would enter the intersection first and for that reason have the right of way. It would therefore become the defendant's legal duty to yield the right of way. He was also legally required to veer to the right side of the highway. If he had done either of these things, the collision would probably not have occurred, and both of them could easily have been done in the 200 feet available to the defendant when the plaintiff first saw him. The plaintiff upon his first view of the situation may have come to such a conclusion and failed to look further to the left because of his belief that no danger was to be expected from that direction. Under these circumstances it may not be said as a matter of law that the plaintiff was bound to expect that the defendant would fail in the due performance of either of the duties above mentioned.

> "The general rule is that every person has a right to presume that every other person will perform his duty and obey the law, and in the absence of reasonable ground to think otherwise it is not negligence to assume that he is not exposed to danger which comes to him only from violation of law or duty by such other person." Harris v. Johnson, 174 Cal. 55, 161 P. 1155, L. R. A. 1917C, 477, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 560.

To the plaintiff, therefore, the defendant's visible approach more than 200 feet away did not necessarily constitute a known danger, nor do we think the plaintiff was bound to watch the defendant continuously to discover the first sign of any intention on his part to violate the law. If at any time it had become apparent to the plaintiff from his observation that the defendant could not or would not conform to the law, then the plaintiff would perhaps have been required to regard defendant's approach as a known danger and take steps to guard against it.

The plaintiff was required to slow down to 15 miles an hour before reaching the crossing, to look out for possible vehicles approaching from the north, and especially to look to the east, from which direction danger was to be expected because a vehicle coming from that direction at a lawful speed, and entering the intersection before plaintiff, would have the right of way. The evidence shows that as the plaintiff approached the intersection a fleeting view of the highway to the east could be had between two of the obstructions, through which he looked for that purpose, and that the next view to the east was possible only on coming to Temple avenue. It may be that, if the jury had found the plaintiff negligent in failing to look again to the west before entering the intersection, their conclusion would find support in the evidence; but we do not think that such a conclusion is necessarily required by the evidence or that reasonable minds could not differ on the subject, and hence we hold that their finding in favor of plaintiff on this issue cannot be set aside on appeal.

[6] The situation as to the plaintiff Jennie J. Swartz is not materially different. She was not driving the machine in which she was riding and the only negligence charged against her is her failure to warn her husband of the defendant's approach. She made substantially the same observations as did her husband and there is no reason to hold her to the exercise of any greater diligence as a result thereof than is imposed on him. As to her, also, the question whether she used ordinary care under the circumstances was one of fact for the jury. Our conclusion as to both plaintiffs is fully supported by the following decisions: Oberholzer v. Hubbell, 36 Cal. App. 16, 171 P. 436; Carbaugh v. White Bus Line, 51 Cal. App. 1, 195 P. 1066; Commonwealth Ins. Co. v. Cement Co., 69 Cal. App. 165, 230 P. 995; Bauman v. Edgar, 72 Cal. App. 448, 236 P. 943; Simonsen v. Christopher Co., 186 Cal. 786, 200 P. 615.

[7] The defendant further complains of the action of the trial court in refusing certain instructions requested by him, which he says are not fully covered by the instructions given. One of these instructions appears to be a correct statement of the law. The record in this case is in typewritten form, having been prepared under the so-called alternative method, and the defendant has not printed in his brief any of the instructions which were given. We are therefore unable to determine therefrom whether or not the one correct instruction which was requested was included in those which were given.

> "It is not a sufficient predicate for a claim of error that instructions which properly state the law have been rejected. The assignment must go further and point out wherein the subject of the instruction was not in fact covered by those actually given." Estate of McDonald, 191 Cal. 161, 171, 215 P. 545.

[8, 9] Defendant complains of the following ruling made while the plaintiff Jennie J. Swartz was on the stand:

> "Q. By Miss. Adams: Did you hear anything said by—did you hear anything said by Mr. Feddershon?
> "Mr. Aberle: Just a minute, if the court please, I would like to have the foundation laid, if Mr. Feddershon was there.
> "The Court: Overruled. Answer the question. A. Yes; I did.
> "Q. By Miss Adams: What did you hear him say? A. I heard him say, 'Oh, my God! my God! are they all killed and it was all my fault!' Just yelling at the top of his voice."

The only ground of objection stated was the want of a foundation for the question. Under the circumstances here appearing no further foundation was necessary. Feddersohn was the defendant and no foundation as to time, place, and persons present was necessary before evidence of his admissions could be introduced. Diller v. Northern Cal. Power Co., 162 Cal. 531, 123 P. 359, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 908. After this testimony was given the witness gave some further testimony on cross-examination which possibly indicated that the witness did not know that the statement above quoted was made by Feddersohn, but defendant then made no motion to strike out the testimony complained of, and, since this objection was not presented by him to the lower court, he cannot now avail himself of it.

The judgments appealed from are affirmed.

FETTERLEY v. RANDALL et al.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 4, 1928.

1. Insane persons 🔑26—Summary proceeding before judge with advisory assistance of two physicians to determine mental condition is not conclusive judicial determination of sanity or insanity (Pol. Code, § 2168 et seq.).

Proceeding before judge with advisory assistance of two physicians, under provisions of Pol. Code, § 2168 et seq., is a summary proceeding for purpose of determining mental condition of person charged with being insane, and does not constitute a conclusive judicial determination of sanity or insanity.

2. Bills and notes 🔑516—Finding as to drawer's insanity at time of execution held unsupported by evidence (Pol. Code, §§ 2168–2170).

Finding that draft was void because at time of execution drawer was insane with no legal capacity to make contracts of any kind held unsupported by evidence consisting only of showing commitment to state hospital for insane pursuant to proceeding before a superior judge with two physicians present, in accordance with Pol. Code, §§ 2168–2170.

3. Bills and notes 🔑101—To recover sum collected on draft on ground of insanity when executing it, drawer must have lacked understanding and failed to comprehend meaning of act.

Drawer suing to recover sum collected on draft on ground that at time of execution he was without mental capacity to make a contract had burden of alleging and proving at time of execution and delivery he was lacking in understanding and did not comprehend meaning of his acts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by Oliver Fetterley against Helen M. Randall and the First Savings Bank of Vallejo, wherein defendant last named filed a cross-action. Judgment for plaintiff against defendant first named, and such defendant appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 264 P. 1117.

Walter J. Little, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. The parties to this cause are Oliver Fetterley, plaintiff, cross defendant, and respondent; Helen M. Randall, defendant, cross defendant, and appellant; and First Savings Bank of Vallejo, Cal., defendant and cross-complainant. On the 13th of March, 1922, and after a proceeding authorized by sections 2168, 2169, and 2170 of the Political Code, viz. a hearing before a superior judge with two physicians present, sometimes referred to as the "lunacy commission," respondent was ordered committed to the state hospital for the insane. Before his trial thereon before a court and jury, which he had demanded, respondent made and delivered to appellant a bank draft upon the First Savings Bank of Vallejo, Cal., for the sum of $500, payment as attorney's fee to appellant. Respondent had contracted for the services of appellant long before the institution of the proceedings above mentioned. This draft appellant cashed. Respondent demands the return of this sum, on the ground that he was legally incapacitated to enter into a contract at the time he employed appellant. Appellant contends that respondent was legally competent to make the contract and to draw the check or draft, and also that even if he were not competent the services were for necessities, and appellant is entitled to the sum mentioned in the draft on the quantum meruit. It was stipulated below that such sum is a reasonable payment for the services. The trial judge gave judgment that appellant, in effect, return the $500, on the ground that respondent had been adjudged insane and was insane when he delivered the check to appellant. This appeal is from that judgment.

As to appellant's contention that attorney's fees are necessaries of life, we shall express no opinion, as we shall decide the case upon the other point.

A careful perusal of the complaint fails to reveal any allegation that respondent was insane when he made and delivered the bank draft. The bill of exceptions shows that no evidence whatever was received by the court that respondent was insane. In fact, all such evidence offered, except evidence of the referred to proceeding, was rejected by the court. Notwithstanding this, the court found:

> "That said draft was void for the reason that at the time said draft was executed plaintiff was insane and had no capacity to make contracts of any kind or character."

The court also found:

> "That * * * it is true that said plaintiff was adjudged insane at a regular hearing of said [superior] court on the 13th day of March, 1922."

It is apparent that the trial court viewed the proceedings of March 13, 1922, as legally determinative of the fact that respondent was insane, and that he was incapable of entering into a contract. Upon this point we are unable to agree with the learned trial judge.

[1] The proceedings before the judge, with the advisory assistance of two physicians, under the provisions of section 2168 et seq. of the Political Code, is a summary proceeding for the purpose of determining whether or not the person charged with being insane is in fact in such a mental condition as to justify the state in depriving him of his personal liberty and affording to him, if it is found needed, the benefit of proper care and remedial aid. It is not a conclusive judicial determination of sanity or insanity. In the case of People v. Willard, 150 Cal. 543, 89 P. 124, the defendant was being tried for murder. There was an objection to the introduction of certain documents used in a proceeding similar to the proceeding in the instant case, in which the defendant had been committed to the state hospital for the insane. The court said:

> "As to the other documents which appellant insists should have been admitted—the affidavit, report of examining physicians, their certificates, etc.—the court was clearly right in rejecting them. The certificates were purely hearsay evidence and were not admissible for any purpose. It is contended by appellant that all these proceedings constituted a judgment roll. There is nothing in this contention. In a proceeding such as is in question here, there is no judgment roll, in the sense that it determines conclusively anything. The statute provides for a commission in each county in the state, consisting of at least two physicians and a judge of the superior court of the county, whose duties in the examination of one alleged to be insane are limited and confined to the specific purpose, viz., to ascertain whether such alleged insane person is a proper subject to be admitted for care and treatment to the insane asylums of the state. This commission is purely a creature of the statute. It is not intended as, and is not, a tribunal in which the status of the alleged insane person is fixed, but simply a commission which determines whether the mental condition of the person it has examined is such as warrants his detention in the asylum for treatment. From these considerations we are satisfied that the ruling of the court, as far as it went, was correct."

In the case of Kellogg v. Cochran, 87 Cal. 192, at p. 198, 25 P. 677, 679, the plaintiff had been committed to the state hospital for insane under a like proceeding. He claimed fraud, and sued for damages for malicious prosecution. Defendant demurred to the complaint, claiming plaintiff had been declared insane and, therefore, was without legal capacity to sue. The demurrer was sustained, but the Supreme Court ordered the demurrer overruled. We quote from the opinion:

> "It would seem, therefore, not only that the power to discharge an inmate of the asylum is vested solely in the officers of the asylum, but that such power is to be exercised upon one of only two grounds: 1. That the insane inmate has recovered; and 2. that he had been improperly committed. I think the effect of a discharge on either ground, if no guardian had been appointed, under the Act of March 9, 1885 (Pol. Code, p. 342), would be to restore the person discharged to legal capacity to sue. A discharge on the first ground is an adjudication, by competent authority, that the person had recovered from insanity; and a discharge on the second ground, by like authority, overrules or nullifies the order of commitment, and leaves the person committed in the same status, as to capacity to sue, that he was in before he was committed. Civ. Code, § 40. Besides, I think the order of commitment is not conclusive evidence against the plaintiff in this action of his insanity at any time, or of probable cause for the prosecution of which he complains."

And, again, in People v. Prosser, 56 Cal. App. 454, at pp. 458, 459, 205 P. 869, 871, the court says:

> "The court committed no error in refusing to give the following instruction: 'You are instructed that if you find that defendant was committed to a state hospital in California as insane by the superior court of any county of California that the law presumes that defendant continues insane until such time as he was lawfully discharged from the state hospital or was legally adjudicated sane.' This instruction proceeds upon the mistaken assumption that such adjudication is conclusive evidence that the party was insane; whereas, it was only evidence to be weighed by the jury, and the effect of which was to be determined by them, but they were not in anywise concluded by the opinion of the medical examiners or by the judgment which declared appellant insane. People v. Willard, supra. In the Willard Case the defendant, just a few minutes after he had been examined and found insane and ordered committed to the asylum, killed the sheriff of Mendocino county, before he had left the judge's chambers where the examination was held, but his conviction for murder of the first degree was sustained by the Supreme Court, said commitment being regarded as merely evidence of insanity to be overcome by other evidence that he was sane."

We think the above quotations demonstrate the incorrectness of the court's finding in the instant case "that said plaintiff [respondent here] was adjudged insane at a regular hearing of said court on the 13th day of March, 1922," and that it does not follow as a matter of law that after such proceeding the respondent was incapable of contracting.

[2] We now take up for consideration finding No. IV, above referred to, which is as follows:

> "That said draft was void for the reason that at the time said draft was executed plaintiff was insane and had no legal capacity to make contracts of any kind."

As heretofore stated, the complaint does not specifically allege that the plaintiff named therein was ever insane. It appears to premise the right to relief upon the commitment heretofore referred to, and we are of the opinion that, under the authorities above quoted from, this finding also stands unsupported by the evidence. For a pertinent discussion of variance between allegation and proof on the exact point here under discussion, see Maionchi v. Nicholini, 1 Cal. App. 690, 82 P. 1052. For the sake of argument and for clarity, however, we shall assume that the question of sanity at the time the draft was executed was properly raised by the pleadings. This brings us to the question of void and voidable contracts.

Section 38 of the Civil Code reads as follows:

> "A person entirely without understanding has no power to make a contract of any kind, but he is liable for the reasonable value of things furnished to him necessary for his support or the support of his family."

Section 39 of the Civil Code is as follows:

> "A conveyance or other contract of a person of unsound mind, but not entirely without understanding, made before his incapacity has been judicially determined, is subject to rescission, as provided in the chapter on rescission of this Code."

Section 40 of the same Code reads, in part:

> "After his incapacity has been judicially determined, a person of unsound mind can make no conveyance or other contract, nor delegate any power or waive any right until his restoration to capacity."

The court below treated the proceedings of March 13, 1922, as though they had established respondent's status as defined by sections 38 and 40 of the Civil Code. See People v. Willard and Maionchi v. Nicholini, supra.

[3] In order for respondent to recover the sum collected on the draft, it would be necessary for him to allege and prove that, when he executed and delivered the draft, he was lacking in understanding and that he did not comprehend the meaning of his acts. Ripperdan v. Weldy, 149 Cal. 667, 87 P. 276. "It would seem, therefore, that a person may be insane in the general acceptation of the term, and yet his insanity may be of such a character as not to deprive him entirely of the power of knowing and understanding the nature of ordinary business transactions, and that such form of insanity, or rather unsoundness of mind, will not render a person legally incapable of entering into a valid contract. Motley v. Head, 43 Vt. 631 [633]; Dennett v. Dennett, 44 N. H. 531, 84 Am. Dec. 97; S. F. C. Clearing House v. MacDonald, 18 Cal. App. 212, 218 [122 P. 964]." The only evidence introduced was the fact of the proceeding before the judge and the two physicians and the judgment therein. It is plain that this evidence did not support the finding under consideration. For an interesting discussion upon the subject-matter here being considered, see 14 Cal. Jur. 341, where many authorities are also cited.

The only other evidence offered was not allowed, and, we may say, was properly disallowed, under the view taken by the court, but improperly disallowed if the pleadings had been broad enough to take in evidence of respondent's capacity of understanding. People v. Harris, 169 Cal. 63, 145 P. 520, and Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 P. 252. No evidence at all was introduced to sustain the allegation that there was fraud or duress. It should also be kept in mind that here there were no proceedings under the guardianship laws under which the ward would be legally incapacitated to contract.

A general demurrer to the complaint was interposed and overruled. It should have been sustained.

The judgment is reversed.

BURT v. HELLMAN. (Civ. 5805.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division One, California. June 7, 1928.

Covenants ⚷79(3)—Landowner held not entitled to enforce restrictions in deeds of other land in same tract.

In absence of anything in deeds to defendant or her predecessors in title indicating that restrictions therein were intended for benefit of whole tract, owner of other land therein could not maintain action to enjoin maintenance and require removal of building erected on defendant's property, in violation of such restrictions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Action by Grace K. Burt against Florence M. Hellman. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Page, Nolan, Rohe & Hurt, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. This is an action brought by the owner of land in the immediate vicinity of the defendant's property whereon, it is claimed, certain "violations of the restrictions as to use had occurred." The trial court by its judgment declared certain building restrictions upon the property of the appellant to be covenants running with the land for the benefit of respondent's property, and imposed thereby a permanent injunction against the appellant from maintaining a "certain second residence or dwelling house," and ordered the immediate removal of such building from such property.

The property in question is situated in Beverly Hills, an exclusive residential district west of the city of Los Angeles. Appellant and respondent both own homesites along one of the streets of the tract, known as Hartford way. Appellant's property lies upon one side of this street, and respondent's is approximately opposite on the other side of the street. There is no dispute in the evidence as to the form of the deeds under which the predecessors in interest of both appellant and respondent derived their title.

As we view the dispute between the parties, it is almost identical with the dispute in the case of Werner v. Graham, 181 Cal. 174, 183 P. 945, relied upon by both parties herein, as the same was later explained and defined in the case of McBride v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 152, 215 P. 678.

There is nothing in any of the deeds that directly provides that the restrictions as to use are for the benefit of any of the adjoining or other property owners in the tract. There is, as there was in the case of McBride v. Freeman, reference to other lots in the tract and as to how they might be used. As a matter of fact, appellant obtained permission from the Rodeo Company, the original parties who platted the land and made the conveyances to the predecessors of both respondent and appellant, to build the identical building which was objected to by the respondent herein, before the building of the same was started.

As to whether or not the particular building erected (to wit, a living quarters for a watchman, placed adjacent to the main gateway of the appellant's property, which property was surrounded by a strong and substantial wall, and which building is called by the appellant a gatelodge and by the respondent a second residence or dwelling house other than a first-class residence), would be an actual violation of the restriction as between the appellant and the original owners of the land of appellant, the finding thereon by the trial court, answering this question in the affirmative, is supported by the evidence.

Therefore, in reaching a determination of the controversy, this court will determine it only upon the question as to whether or not the plaintiff was entitled to maintain her action against the defendant. It is the opinion of this court that, under the evidence introduced, and under the pleadings, there was nothing in the deeds themselves to the defendant or any of her grantors that provided or contained language indicating that the restrictions contained therein were intended to be for the benefit of the whole tract. It is said by the Supreme Court in the case of McBride v. Freeman, 191 Cal., at page 154, 215 P. 678, 679, as follows:

> "The question thus presented is stated by appellants as follows: 'Does one grantee who buys his property with the understanding that it is restricted, and in reliance upon the existence of a general plan of improvement for the whole tract of which his lot forms a part, have a right in equity to enforce the restriction against another grantee who takes with full knowledge and notice of the restriction, the covenants being a part of each and every deed to lots in the tract and the deeds showing that a uniform plan must have been in existence?' This precise question was answered adversely to appellants' contentions in the case of Werner v. Graham, 181 Cal. 174, 183 P. 945. Appellants contend that what was there said upon this subject was dictum, for the reason that the restrictions there under consideration were cast in the form of a condition, and that what was there decided should be held inapplicable to restrictions, as in the instant case, which are cast in the form of covenants. This contention cannot be sustained. Viewing the restrictions under consideration in the Werner Case as conditions, no substantial question was presented by that appeal. The court disposed of that question in the following words: 'If the provisions are in fact conditions and not covenants, the defendants are not entitled to enforce them against the plaintiff, for the reversion clause runs in favor of Marshall (the common grantor), his heirs and assigns and does not include the defendants, since by "assigns" must be meant in this state assignees of the reversion or right of re-entry.' It is well settled that 'in the construction of a conveyance, ordinarily, to avoid forfeiture, conditions will be construed as covenants, when this can reasonably be done.' 9 Cal. Jur. p. 336, and cases cited. In recognition of this rule the court then proceeded to consider and decide that case upon the assumption that the restrictions therein, though in form of conditions, were, in fact, covenants, and what was there decided, in that view of the case, can in no sense be regarded as dictum.
> "Appellants suggest, in effect, that Werner v. Graham should be overruled, and assert that it is contrary to the great weight of authority from other states. The latter may be conceded, but presents in itself no sufficient reason for a departure at this time from the rules there enunciated. After a careful reconsideration of the questions there involved, we are satisfied with the validity of the conclusions there stated, and with the soundness of the reasoning by which they were reached. The rules there enunciated are rules of property and have stood unchallenged and unquestioned for more than three years. That case has since been cited as authority by this court in Los Angeles, etc., Co. v. Marr, 187 Cal. 126, 200 P. 1051, and Mapel v. Canady, 189 Cal. 373, 208 P. 280, and the conclusions there reached were clearly forecasted by previous decisions of this court over a long period of years. In Los Angeles, etc., Co. v. Muir, 136 Cal. 36, 50, 68 P. 308, 313, the court said: 'In the absence of any words in the deed to this effect, or any reference to a plan showing a general scheme of improvement, the grantees took their estate without any notice, express or constructive, that the restriction was intended for the benefit of the adjoining estate.'"

In the instant case the only parties who could enforce the restriction as to use have acquiesced in the construction of the building complained of. They may or may not have considered the same as one of the outbuildings referred to in the deed to the appellant, but it does not concern this court. The only question we can determine is whether or not the respondent was entitled under the evidence to the judgment referred to herein, and, under the authority of the cases herein cited, we are of the opinion that the respondent was not entitled to such judgment, or to maintain this action.

The judgment is therefore reversed.

CHAIN v. EHRMAN et al. (Civ. 5479.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 31, 1928.

Rehearing Denied June 26, 1928.

1. Principal and agent ⟹173(3)—Finding that tenants accepted new lease, thereby ratifying their agent's execution thereof, held justified.

Defendants' knowledge of date of expiration of their lease and option to renew it and their general manager's payment of three months rent in advance on new lease held to justify trial court's implied finding, in action for rent under new lease, that defendants accepted it, occupied premises thereunder, and thereby ratified their agent's action in executing it, though their direct knowledge of all facts concerning lease was not proved; circumstances being such as to put them on inquiry as reasonable men.

2. Estoppel ⟹107—Allegation that defendants took possession in accordance with terms of lease sufficiently pleaded estoppel to deny validity thereof.

Allegation of complaint, in action for rent, that "thereupon, and in accordance with the terms of said lease, said defendants entered into possession of said premises," sufficiently pleaded estoppel to deny validity of lease.

3. Pleading ⟹428(3)—Judgment will not be reversed for failure to plead estoppel, in absence of objection to evidence thereof on ground of defect in pleadings.

Judgment for plaintiff, in action for rent, will not be reversed for failure to plead estoppel to deny validity of lease, where defendants made no objection to evidence of estoppel on ground of defect in pleadings, and case was tried on theory that such question was at issue and sufficiently pleaded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Resul Chain against Alexis Ehrman and another, copartners doing business under the name and style of Bakersfield Tobacco Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Joseph C. Meyerstein, of San Francisco, and W. B. Beaizley, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Wiley & Harvey, of Bakersfield, and John W. Heard, Jr., of Berkeley, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff recovered a judgment in the sum of $710.50, which he alleged was due as rent for certain premises in the city of Bakersfield. From this judgment defendants appeal. The Bakersfield Tobacco Company occupied the premises in question in the first instance under a lease executed on January 22, 1922, for a period of two years from February 15, 1922. This lease, which was signed by Gustave J. McGregor, then a partner of the Ehrmans in the company, contained a provision giving the lessee an option of renewal. The defendants Ehrman became successors to the interest of McGregor in the affairs of the Bakersfield Tobacco Company, which was a copartnership having its principal place of business in the city of San Francisco. On January 9, 1924, a new lease was executed by plaintiff's assignor as lessor and the Bakersfield Tobacco Company as lessee, for a period of two years from February 15, 1924, at a monthly rental of $100 per month, with option of renewal on the part of the lessees. This lease provided that $300 should be paid at once for the first three months, and receipt of this sum was acknowledged in the lease. The instrument was signed "Bakersfield Tobacco Co. by H. J. Freyschlag." It was established that Freyschlag was general manager of the company at Bakersfield, and that he reported to defendants the payment of the advance rent of $300 by a monthly trial balance. Defendants continued in the occupation of the premises after the expiration of the term fixed in the lease executed January 22, 1922, and until about November 15, 1924, at which time they removed therefrom. The judgment recovered by plaintiff is for rent due after November 15, 1924, under the lease dated January 9, 1924.

[1] Defendants denied that they had executed the lease, claiming that Freyschlag was not authorized to sign for the company. They relied upon subdivision 5 of section 1624 of the Civil Code, which provides that an agreement for the leasing of real estate for a period longer than one year must be in writing, and, if a written agreement be signed by an agent, the authority of the agent must be in writing. Since it was not established that Freyschlag was authorized in writing, defendants contend that they were tenants at sufferance. Plaintiff claims that defendants occupied the premises under the new lease, and made payments in accordance with its terms and with knowledge thereof. It is contended that defendants thereby ratified the lease, and are estopped from denying liability thereunder. The implied finding of the trial court is in conformity with plaintiff's contention, and is supported by the evidence. Defendants knew the date of the expiration of the first lease; that they had an option to renew it; and that, in February, 1924, their general manager paid three months' rent in advance on the new lease. Under these circumstances the trial court was justified in holding that defendants accepted the lease, occupied the premises thereunder, and thereby ratified the action of their agent. In Castro v. Gaffey, 96 Cal. 421, the court said:

> "A lease signed by the lessor and accepted by the lessee has the same force and effect as it would have if signed by the lessee. * * * We do not doubt that if they had accepted the lease as it is, and had occupied the premises under it, the law would imply a promise to pay the rent reserved, although neither of the lessees had signed the lease."

In Heffernan v. Davis, 24 Cal. App. 295, 140 P. 716, it is said:

> "It seems to us, however, that if, as was sought to be shown, defendant entered into possession of the land and held that possession under the lease, he is estopped to aver its invalidity and that, as he cannot be heard to challenge its validity, the action may be maintained upon it." Crescent City Wharf and Lighter Co. v. Simpson, 77 Cal. 286, 19 P. 426; Dodd v. Pasch, 5 Cal. App. 686, 91 P. 166.

Defendants cannot escape liability under the claim that plaintiffs did not prove direct knowledge on their part of all the facts concerning the lease. The circumstances were such as to put them on inquiry as reasonable men. In Ballard v. Nye, 138 Cal. 588, 72 P. 156, the court used this language:

> "Where the situation naturally and reasonably suggests that some inquiry or investigation should be made, and none is made, the person failing to make it will be deemed in law possessed of such facts as the inquiry would have disclosed." Mechem on Agency, § 148; Phillips v. Phillips, 163 Cal. 530, 127 P. 346; Hutchinson v. Gould, 180 Cal. 356, 181 P. 651; Ford v. Lou Kum Shu, 26 Cal. App. 204, 146 P. 199.

[2, 3] It is further contended by defendants that, if plaintiff intended to claim that they were estopped from denying the invalidity of the lease, allegations to that effect should have been made in the pleadings. Plaintiff answers this contention by pointing out that it is alleged in the complaint that "thereupon and in accordance with the terms of said lease, said defendants entered into possession of said premises." A further answer to the contention of the defendants is found in their failure to make objection at the trial on the ground of defect in the pleadings to evidence tending to show estoppel. The case was tried on the theory that the question of estoppel was at issue and sufficiently pleaded. In Carpy v. Dowdell, 115 Cal. 677, 47 P. 695, the court said:

> "Respondent makes some contention * * * that estoppel cannot be relied on by appellants because it was not pleaded in the answer. * * * Moreover, there was no objection at the trial to evidence of the facts on the score of defective pleading; and the rule is well established that such a course is a waiver of a defect in pleading." Beardsley v. Clem, 137 Cal. 328, 70 P. 175.

PEOPLE v. LANDO. (Cr. 1600.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 4, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 2, 1928.

1. Homicide 🔑250—Evidence held sufficient to support conviction for murder.

In prosecution for murder, in which defense was that killing was done in self-defense, evidence held sufficient to support conviction.

2. Witnesses 🔑350—Where record regarding witness' conviction of offense is easily obtainable, court should insist on inspection of record, and, if it shows conviction was for misdemeanor, further inquiry should be peremptorily shut off (Code Civ. Proc. § 2051).

Where ground of objection to question whether witness was convicted of felony is that record would show that witness was not convicted of a felony, and record is easily obtainable without delaying trial, court should insist on an inspection of such record, and, if it shows that conviction was in law only a conviction of misdemeanor, further inquiry along that line should be peremptorily shut off, since, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, witness may not be impeached by evidence of particular wrongful acts, except that it may be shown he has been convicted of felony.

3. Witnesses 🔑350—Permitting question whether accused had pleaded guilty to felony where offense, in view of punishment, was misdemeanor, held, subject to limitation that in such cases record should be inspected and further inquiry shut off, not error (Pen. Code, § 17).

In murder prosecution, overruling defendant's objection to question to accused inquiring whether he had pleaded guilty to receiving stolen property, a felony, where it appeared in testimony that punishment was only six months' imprisonment in county jail, making offense misdemeanor for all purposes, under Pen. Code, § 17, held, subject to limitation that in such cases record should be inspected and further inquiry peremptorily shut off, not error.

dence held not to reduce offense to manslaughter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

John Lando was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. T. Kendrick, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CONREY, P. J. Count 1 of the information charged that on the 11th day of June, 1922, in the county of Los Angeles, defendant did willfully, etc., kill and murder one Edward Mejia. Count 2 charges that at the same time and place the defendant did willfully, etc., kill and murder one Jesus Mejia. On the first count the jury found the defendant guilty of murder of the second degree. On the second count the jury found the defendant guilty of murder of the first degree and fixed the penalty at imprisonment in the state prison for life.

[1] It is an admitted fact that defendant Lando (at that time known as Tony Tuzzolino) killed the Mejia brothers. At the trial his only defense was that the killing was done in self-defense. The circumstances of the killing, as shown by the prosecution, are clearly described in the testimony of Juan Saragosa, an eyewitness. The two Mejia brothers were sitting together next to the wall in a pool hall, where games were being played. The defendant came in through the front door and made a movement with the head, indicating or pointing toward the back yard. "He did like this to the boys making a movement with his head." The defendant walked out through the back door and the Mejia boys followed him, Edward walking behind Jesus. Just as Jesus was opening the door to go outside, the defendant fired several shots and fatally wounded both of said brothers. Edward died almost immediately and Jesus the next day. This witness, like some of the others who were present on that occasion, declared that he did not see any weapon in the hands of either of the Mejia brothers. There was introduced in evidence a dying declaration made by Jesus Mejia concerning the facts and circumstances of the tragedy. According to that statement the defendant and his two victims, together with others, had been playing in a crap game in the back yard, in which game Jesus lost $10. Then (in the language of the interpreter):

> "He says he lost his $10, and Tony Tuzzolino told him to get some more money, so he just told him that he hadn't got no more, and walked right into the pool hall, and he says later Tony come in the pool hall and motioned to him if he would come out in the back yard, and he says he and Edward get off the bench where we were sitting and follow him and before we get in the door into the back yard he started shooting.
> "Q. Who started? A. Tony started shooting at Jesus and Edward."

According to the testimony of the defendant, the Mejia brothers, after losing some money in the crap game, had a dispute with defendant about the money. In substance, defendant's statement was:

> That one of the Mejias drew back with his hand in his side pocket, but the brother drew him away, "telling him, let's go home, so finally he went with him"; that later the defendant went into the pool hall and while he was there the Mejia brothers came in and asked defendant if he wanted to fight; "I started to walk out towards the back, and when I got the screen door open this biggest boy he was right on my back, or in back of me, so I turned around; I thought he was going to fight. * * * So I turned around and I was ready to fight him, but he comes out with a knife out of his pocket, or he had it in his hand, he already had the knife in his hand; when I seen that, I pulled out my gun, and told him, I says, 'Drop that knife. * * *' So he raises the knife up like that to throw it at me and I shot him; as soon as I fired the first shot he came after me, still kept coming, I don't know just exactly where I hit him, he kept coming after me, and I shot him again, and that is when he fell down, and in the meantime the other brother come out, he was right at the door with his hand in his pocket like that, and he was trying to get it out, I don't know what he had, I didn't see it, and I shot him too."

According to some of the defendant's witnesses, one of the Mejias had a knife in his hand at the time of the preliminary altercation which took place in the yard at the time of the crap game. According to one of the defendant's witnesses, who testified as an eyewitness of the later transaction:

> The Mejia boys "got up and made motion and grabbing of the chest and pushed him backwards. * * * They were pushing him backwards and then when he got in the back yard there, then he shot. * * * One of them grabbed him by the chest and had knife in his pocket.
> "Q. Could you see any knife at all? A. There was a lot of people there and I couldn't see." (On motion, the statement that there was "knife in his pocket" was stricken out.)
> "Q. You saw the Mexican have his hand in his pocket? A. Yes; I saw."

According to this same witness, these two Mexicans, in following defendant out the back door, were five or six feet behind defendant, and the defendant was walking backwards. It will be noted that defendant himself did not agree with some of the statements made by this witness.

From the foregoing statement it is clear that the evidence is abundantly sufficient to justify the verdict, and that this is equally true as applied to both counts.

[2, 3] In addition to the claim that the evidence is insufficient to support a verdict of murder, the points on appeal are, first, that the court erred in overruling defendant's objection to a question asked by the district attorney on cross-examination of the defendant, inquiring whether the defendant, during the year 1924, in the superior court of Los Angeles county, "pleaded guilty to receiving stolen property, a felony." The defendant answered in the affirmative. But it further appeared in the testimony that in punishment of said offense the defendant had been sentenced only to serve six months' imprisonment in the county jail. Under those circumstances the offense to which the testimony referred became and should have been deemed "a misdemeanor for all purposes." Pen. Code, § 17; Doble v. Superior Court, 197 Cal. 556, at page 557, 241 P. 852. As the record was easily available to the district attorney, it was distinctly bad practice for him to attempt to create a prejudice against the defendant by compelling him to admit such former conviction. A witness may not be impeached by evidence of particular wrongful acts, except that it may be shown that he has been convicted of a felony. Code Civ. Proc. § 2051. Counsel for defendant, in objecting to this question, included as a ground of objection that the record itself would show that the witness was not convicted of a felony. We think that when such statement is made in connection with an objection of this kind, and when the record is easily obtainable without delaying the trial, the court should insist upon an inspection of such record, and, if it does show that the conviction was in law only a conviction of misdemeanor, further inquiry along that line should be peremptorily shut off. Subject to this limitation, however, we are of the opinion that the court did not err in overruling the objection. Many cases occur wherein a witness has been convicted of a felony and there is no available means of proving the fact, except by calling for his own admission of the truth.

[4] Appellant's next point is that the court erred in sustaining an objection to the question, "Why were you carrying the gun?" This occurred while the defendant was testifying, on direct examination, as a witness in his own behalf:

> "Q. When you had this first argument with them in the crap game, did you have this gun on you then? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. How long had you had this gun? A. Why, I used to carry it around with me at all times.
> "Q. Why were you carrying the gun?"

The district attorney objected that the question was immaterial, and called for a conclusion of the witness. Objection sustained. The prosecution had not introduced any testimony tending to prove that defendant had procured the gun for the purpose of shooting the Mejia brothers or either of them. Defendant's testimony that he carried the gun "at all times," that is, habitually, was uncontradicted. In that state of the evidence the question, "Why were you carrying the gun?" was immaterial, and the court did not err in sustaining the objection.

[5] We find no merit in appellant's contention that the evidence necessarily reduced the offense to manslaughter.

We are satisfied that the record is free from any prejudicial error, and that in the verdict and judgment there is no miscarriage of justice.

The judgments and order are affirmed.

MORRIS et ux. v. TURLEY. (Civ. 5158.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 4, 1928.

Forcible entry and detainer 🔑36—Finding that defendant "unlawfully withholds and keeps possession" of property is conclusion and not finding of fact.

Finding that defendant "unlawfully withholds and keeps possession" of property is conclusion and not finding of fact on cause of action alleging forcible detention of property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by Herman R. Morris and wife against Dora A. Turley. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Frank G. Tyrrell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Thomas S. Bunn, of Los Angeles, and W. Blair Gibbens, of Ocean Park, for respondents.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. The complaint in this case contains two causes of action. The first cause is for forcible entry and the second cause is for forcible detainer of real property. The court made findings to the effect that the allegations as to the forcible entry were true, and then, without finding upon the facts as to the forcible detainer, found that defendant unlawfully withholds and keeps possession of the property. The court further finds: "That by reason of the said acts of defendant the plaintiffs have been damaged in the sum of $300." Judgment follows, awarding $300 to plaintiff, and ordering restitution of the real property.

The judgment must be reversed for two reasons: The finding that the defendant "unlawfully withholds and keeps possession" of the property is a conclusion and not a finding of fact upon the cause of action alleging forcible detention of the property. Again, even if this were a sufficient finding, there is absolutely no evidence that the possession was withheld forcibly, as is alleged in the complaint. Assuming, but not deciding, that the facts proved a forcible entry, there is no manner of ascertaining from the findings whether the damages were wholly for the forcible entry, the "unlawful" withholding, or in some proportion for both.

Judgment reversed.

WALSH v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR ALAMEDA COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 6439.) ★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 8, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 6, 1928.

Mandamus ⟹4(3)—Order denying motion to substitute defendant's executrix, on ground that action abated, held appealable, preventing interference therewith by mandamus (Code Civ. Proc. § 1086).

Where motion to substitute executrix after defendant's death was denied, on ground that action did not survive, objection was equivalent to a general demurrer, and order denying substitution was in effect final judgment, from which an appeal could be taken, thus requiring denial of mandamus to control trial court's action on account of existence of plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1086.

Application by Harry Edward Walsh for writ of mandate to be directed to the Superior Court for Alameda County and Hon. John J. Allen, Judge in Department 7 thereof, to compel respondent to grant a motion to substitute. Writ denied.

Vincent Surr, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

John L. McVey, of Oakland, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff alleges that his wife employed George H. Derrick for a compensation to perform, and he performed, an illegal operation on her. The plaintiff heard of the incident, a family quarrel was had, the wife obtained a divorce and the custody of the minor child, and the plaintiff commenced an action against Derrick to recover damages. It is not alleged that the plaintiff's wife was confined to her bed or made sick, or that medical expenses were incurred; but it is alleged the plaintiff's wife left him on May 9, 1927, and that since then they have continuously lived apart.

In his claim for damages the plaintiff inserted (1) loss of services, $15,000; (2) loss of services of his daughter, $15,000; (3) loss of the unborn child, $20,000. Derrick interposed a demurrer. Before the demurrer was heard, Derrick died testate, and his wife was appointed executrix of his estate. The plaintiff presented his claim to the executrix of the estate of Derrick, the claim was rejected, and the plaintiff prepared a supplemental complaint, and moved to substitute the executrix in the place of the deceased. The plaintiff supported his motion by his complaint, supplemental complaint, and all the records and files in the action. No other evidence was offered by either side. The motion to substitute was denied. Relying on the doctrine as stated in Wood v. Strother, 76 Cal. 545, 18 P. 766, 9 Am. St. Rep. 249, the plaintiff has made an application in this court for a writ of mandate compelling the trial court to grant the motion.

The plaintiff sets forth in his petition for a writ of mandate copies of the briefs which he presented to the trial court on his motion for a substitution of the executrix in the place of her deceased husband. The record before us does not show that in the trial court any question arose or was considered regarding the regularity of the proceedings, or of the sufficiency of the papers used by the moving party. But it does show that the sole question presented to the trial court was whether the plaintiff's cause of action, if any, survived the death of Derrick. But whether the proper practice or otherwise, that question was before the court only by treating the contention of the executrix as in effect a demurrer. The contention was sustained, and the motion to substitute was denied. It follows that the ruling thereon was in effect an order sustaining a demurrer. In the case of Howard v. Lunaburg, 192 Wis. 507, 509, 213 N. W. 301, at page 302, the Supreme Court of Wisconsin said:

> "The objection to the survival of the action was that, since the sole defendant was dead, it appeared from the face of the complaint that it stated no cause of action against the executrix. The objection was equivalent to a general demurrer, and the order overruling it was therefore appealable."

It is stated in 21 California Jurisprudence, 180:

> "While objections to the filing of a proposed amendment may be heard, objections to the sufficiency of proposed amendments and those based on the statute of limitations should not be considered; orderly procedure requiring the testing of the sufficiency of an amended pleading in the first instance by demurrer after it is filed."

Nevertheless we are aware that it has been more or less the common practice to convert the hearing on the motion into a hearing as on a demurrer. While the practice is not the best practice, it is sometimes adopted. When, as here, that practice is adopted, the order made on such a hearing is not merely a ruling on the motion to substitute, but it is also, in legal effect, an order sustaining a demurrer, or overruling a demurrer, as the case may be.

The executrix contends that a writ of mandate should be denied, because the plaintiff had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by appeal. In making this contention she calls attention to the fact that the effect of the order made by the trial court was not only to decline to make the order of substitution but to terminate and finally end the litigation. In other words, she contends that the order was in effect a final judgment. The recent case entitled Howe v. Key System Transit Co. (Cal. Sup.) 246 P. 39, clearly supports her in the contention which she presents. See, also, Zappettini v. Buckles, 167 Cal. 27, 33, 138 P. 696. It follows that the plaintiff was entitled to appeal from the order. As he was entitled to appeal, apparently he had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. Code Civ. Proc. § 1086. As there is nothing in the record showing that his remedy was not plain, speedy, and adequate, the writ should be denied. Carton Corporation v. Superior Court, 76 Cal. App. 434, 438, 244 P. 932.

It is so ordered.

MASTER BUILDERS' CO. v. CLINTON CONST. CO. OF CALIFORNIA. ★

Rehearing Granted July 10, 1928.

1. Sales 🔑52(5)—Facts held to show meeting of minds of parties when buyer accepted price in telegram from seller to its agent.

Facts held to show meeting of minds between parties to oral contract for sale of colormix when buyer accepted price contained in telegram from seller to its agent.

2. Frauds, statute of 🔑89(3)—Buyer's acceptance of part of colormix ordered held sufficient to take oral sales agreement out of statute of frauds (Civ. Code, § 1739).

Where buyer orally agreed to buy 18,000 pounds of red colormix and 3,500 pounds of gray colormix, buyer's acceptance and use of gray colormix was sufficient, under Civ. Code, § 1739, to take oral agreement out of statute of frauds.

3. Sales 🔑181(11)—In action for breach of sales contract, facts held not to show that seller did not perform, nor offer to perform.

In action by seller for breach of contract to purchase colormix, facts held not to show that seller did not perform, nor offer to perform, alleged contract.

4. Corporations 🔑410—Vice president and manager of corporation could bind corporation on oral contract to purchase.

Vice president and manager of corporation had authority to bind corporation by oral contract to purchase colormix.

5. Sales 🔑377—In action for breach of contract to purchase colormix, allegation on which damages were based held sufficient.

In action for breach of contract to purchase colormix, allegation that defendant had failed and refused to take balance of colormix, and that plaintiff had incurred liability for commissions on sale of same, and had lost profits arising from sale, and had thereby been damaged in sum of $3,060, on which damages were based, held sufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action for damages for breach of contract by the Master Builders' Company against the Clinton Construction Company of California. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ernest K. Little, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Willard P. Smith, of San Francisco (Walton C. Webb, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from the judgment awarding plaintiff $3,060 upon a contract found by the court to have been entered into between plaintiff, an Ohio corporation, and defendant, a California corporation, whereby plaintiff agreed to manufacture for, and deliver to, defendant 21,500 pounds of colormix at 22 cents per pound, to be delivered f. o. b. Cleveland, Ohio, between January 21 and May 1, 1925, upon which contract plaintiff manufactured and delivered between January 21 and April 13, 1925, 3,550 pounds of the colormix, and was at all times ready and willing to deliver the balance, but that defendant refused to accept the same, and finding that, by reason of defendant refusing to accept the balance of the colormix called for in the contract, plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $3,060, for which judgment was entered, and from such judgment defendant has instituted this appeal.

Appellant urges under general headings the following points on which he relies for a reversal of the judgment: (1) There was no meeting of the minds of the parties; (2) an oral order would have been within the statute of frauds; (3) plaintiff did not perform, nor offer to perform, the alleged contract on its part; (4) the vice president of defendant corporation had no authority to bind the corporation by an oral order; (5) the complaint does not set forth facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

Under the first general heading, appellant asserts:

> "(a) Plaintiff communicated its acceptance of a written proposition, bearing the false signature of defendant and its vice president, but which was never submitted to defendant; (b) there was no acceptance by either party; (c) there was no acceptance communicated until February 3, 1925, while Mr. Rodgers admits that he knew, as early as January 30, 1925, that Mr. Huber desired to withhold the alleged order for redtile colormix; and (d) the letter of January 21, 1925, from Mr. Rodgers was not a proposition from plaintiff; it was merely a suggestion from Mr. Rodgers as to the proposition which defendant should make to plaintiff."

These four contentions may be considered together.

[1] The record contains the following evidence relative to the transaction between the parties. In January, 1925, Joseph E. Rodgers, local agent of plaintiff, called upon A. Huber, vice president of defendant corporation, at defendant's place of business, and discussed the placing by defendant of the order for colormix. Mr. Rodgers testified:

> "We figured up the quantity of material that would be required from the plans and specifications of the San Francisco Relief Home," —and Mr. Huber then placed the order at 27 cents per pound. Mr. Huber stated that "for the quantity involved the price was, in his judgment, a little bit high," and, in an effort to secure a price that might be a little more favorable to defendant, he (Rodgers) wired to Cleveland, and received a reply to his telegram by wire, which he showed Huber:

> "Best price on eighteen thousand pounds red colormix twenty two cents per pound f. o. b. Cleveland."

Mr. Rodgers further testified as follows:

> "Mr. Huber then told me to go ahead and write up the order on the basis of 18,000 pounds of one color and 3,500 pounds of another color, which I did. He requested if I could not make that price which was mentioned in the telegram the guaranty delivery price at San Francisco, and I said that that would be impossible, because it would—as the material was then requested for delivery later in the year, I didn't know definitely whether a carload of material would be coming forward at that time, in which this could be included, or whether it would have to come by itself, and, of course, it would take different rates of freight both ways. I then phoned in Mr. Huber's—I phoned the railroad—and told him the difference in the rates between the two materials, and why it was impossible for me to give a guaranty delivery price at San Francisco. I told Mr. Huber then, if a full car was coming forward at the time when he would require his material, that the company would give him the benefit of the carload rate rather than L. C. L. (less carload lots) rate, but that I wanted it understood that, if we did not have a car coming forward, he would have to pay the 22 cent price f. o. b. Cleveland, plus whatever freight was involved."

Mr. Rodgers wrote and mailed a letter, which bears date January 21, 1925, to defendant, containing the following:

> "Confirming our verbal agreement of to-day we are entering your order for 18,000 lbs. Master Builders' tile red colormix and 3,500 lbs. battleship gray colormix, at the agreed price of 22¢ per pound, f. o. b. Cleveland, Ohio—same price both colors."

Mr. Rodgers received no reply to this letter. Prior to February 5, 1925, Rodgers received a phone message from Mr. Huber requesting that the red part of the order be held up, and Rodgers informed him that it would be impossible to hold up any part of the order originally given, because the matter was entirely in the hands of the Master Builders' Company, and they would be the ones to come to any decision regarding the matter. On January 23, 1925, Rodgers filled out an order blank, and forwarded it to plaintiff, calling for 18,000 pounds of red colormix and 3,500 pounds of battleship gray, and at the bottom wrote in the name under the signature of purchaser, "Clinton Const. Co. A. Huber." On February 5, 1925, defendant wrote J. E. Rodgers & Co.:

> "Kindly enter our order for approximately 3,500 lbs. battleship gray colormix. Price: 22 cents per pound, f. o. b. Cleveland, Ohio. Deliveries: 700 lbs. immediately. Balance April 1, 1925. Confirming our telephonic conversation of recent date, we wish to inform you that we have not made a decision on the type of red color hardener we intend to use. We will mail you a written order should we decide to use Master Builders' red tile colormix."

Plaintiff wired to defendant, February 5, 1925, as follows:

> "Our representative Rodgers advises substitution for colormix order being attempted Stop Be advised that order accepted manufactured for you and partly shipped Stop Can accept no change or cancellation See order signed by your Mr. Huber."

Sylvester W. Flesheim, president of plaintiff corporation, testified that J. E. Rodgers & Co. of San Francisco acts as their sales agent in California; that J. E. Rodgers & Co. is authorized to solicit orders subject to their approval; that every order J. E. Rodgers & Co. receives must be sent to plaintiff at Cleveland for acceptance; that, when plaintiff received the telegram from Rodgers containing the order for 18,000 pounds of red colormix and 3,500 pounds of gray colormix, the order was immediately accepted, and defendant notified accordingly; that tile red colormix is not a product that has a ready market, and little is carried in stock; that 18,000 pounds is a very large order; and that, when the order was accepted, instructions were immediately given to the factory to manufacture the material.

There was clearly a meeting of minds when defendant accepted the price of 22 cents contained in the telegram from plaintiff and confirmed in Rodgers' telegram to plaintiff. The fact that plaintiff in its telegram to defendant of February 5, 1925, stating that it would accept no cancellation or modification of the order, referred to the order signed by Huber, does not alter the situation, as the written order to which Rodgers attached Huber's name was merely an order reciting the terms of the verbal contract before entered into. If this were a case where it was agreed that the terms of the verbal contract were subsequently to be reduced to writing, there would be merit in defendant's contention (Las Palmas, etc., Distillery v. Garrett & Co., 167 Cal. 399, 139 P. 1077), but such is not the case here.

[2] As to appellant's second point that the oral agreement is within the statute of frauds, in that "(a) there is no evidence to sustain the finding of the court that there was a contract to manufacture; and (b) the gray colormix was not accepted as and for a part performance of the alleged oral order," it may be said Mr. Huber in his testimony admitted that a part of the colormix was received and used in the building for which it was ordered. "Q. Is it not a fact that the gray colormix was used on this job and part of the red? A. Yes. Q. Where was it used, on the sidewalks? A. No, on the floor. Q. But the gray was used first? A. Yes. Q. Is it not a fact that you got some shipment in January? A. of the gray? Q. Of the gray. A. We might have; I think we did probably." This is sufficient, under section 1739 of the Civil Code, to take the oral agreement out of the statute of frauds. The fact that the gray colormix "and part of the red" was used on the job is sufficient to sustain the finding that the gray colormix was accepted as a part performance of the oral contract.

[3] From the foregoing it is apparent that there is no merit in appellant's third contention "that plaintiff did not perform nor offer to perform the alleged contract on its part."

[4] It may likewise be said that appellant's fourth and fifth contentions, viz., that the vice president of defendant corporation had no authority to bind the corporation by an oral order, and that the complaint does not state a cause of action, are likewise without merit. It is true that Mr. Huber testified that he never did give any orders, unless they were in writing, as it is against the rules of the company. He further stated that, as vice president of the company, he had charge of buying the materials for jobs. It appears that Mr. Huber was vice president and manager of the corporation, and therefore, as such, could bind the corporation (Eells v. Gray Bros., etc., Co., 13 Cal. App. 33, 108 P. 735; Fowler Gas Co. v. First Nat. Bank. 180 Cal. 471, 181 P. 663; Davis v. Pacific Studios Corp. [Cal. App.] 258 P. 440). The court, having determined that Mr. Huber did enter into the oral agreement here, evidently did not place credence in his statement that he never gave verbal orders.

[5] The objection to the complaint is that the allegation on which damages are based is insufficient. The paragraph objected to is:

> "That defendant has wholly failed and refused to take the balance of said colormix, and that plaintiff has incurred liability for commissions on the sale of the same, and has lost the profits arising from said sale, and has thereby been damaged in the premises in the sum of $3,060."

This allegation is sufficient. Ahlers v. Smiley, 163 Cal. 200, 124 P. 827; Tahoe Ice Co. v. Union Ice Co., 109 Cal. 242, 41 P. 1020.

We have examined the authorities cited by appellant, and do not question the principles they announce, but merely their application to the facts in the present case.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Negligence 🔑136(9)—Contributory negligence, though generally question of fact, becomes question of law, where only legitimate inference from evidence is that plaintiff's negligence contributed to injury.

Contributory negligence is generally question of fact for determination by the jury, but it becomes a question of law for the court when the evidence is such that it will support no legitimate inference except that negligence of plaintiff contributed to injury; entire absence of conflict in evidence not preventing court's determination of question.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by W. F. Filson against N. J. Balkins for damages for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jones, Wilson & Stephenson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAZLETT, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff was given judgment upon the verdict of a jury in the sum of $1,500 on account of personal injuries he suffered while walking across a public highway, in a collision between his person and a Willys-Knight sedan automobile driven by defendant. Defendant appeals, contending that the evidence does not support the verdict or judgment, in that it is established that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. Defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was not presented in time, and was denied by operation of law.

The only controversies in the evidence are as to the speed at which defendant's automobile was traveling at the time of the accident and whether plaintiff looked to his left before he started to walk across the highway.

The evidence shows the following facts without conflict: Plaintiff was employed by the Midway Gas Company, and in charge of a crew of men repairing a gas main located under the pavement of the state highway at a point about 2 miles south of Newhall. This highway ran north and south, and it was paved with a pavement 21 feet wide. The men were digging holes at the west of the pavement and tunneling under the pavement about 6 feet to the joints of the gas main. The highway was straight, unobstructed, and down grade for a distance of about 500 feet from a curve south of the point. Preceding the collision, machines were passing, some at a rapid rate and some slow. Just before the collision, plaintiff walked across the pavement from the west to the east and procured two flags for use in warning drivers of automobiles and trucks passing from traveling over the tunneled portion of the pavement. Intending to return to the west side of the pavement, plaintiff looked to the north and to the south to see if any automobiles were approaching, and observed one coming from the north and one from the south, and he stood off the pavement, to its east until they passed. He again looked each way, and saw no machine coming from the north, but observed defendant's machine approaching down the hill from the south, at the curve, about 400 or 500 feet distant (he also testified that he had a faint recollection of having seen the machine), and he testified that he started right away to cross the pavement. He walked in a diagonal direction, northwesterly at an average gait, but did not again look to the south. In fact, he looked down at the pavement until he reached a point 3 or 4 feet westerly on the center line of the pavement when he looked north to see if any machines were approaching from that direction. He or his witnesses heard no warning sound from any automobile or from the approach of defendant's machine before the collision occurred. His sight and hearing were good. When defendant's machine arrived at a point about 50 feet south of the place of collision, it was on the east half of the pavement and defendant thereafter swerved it toward and partly upon the west half of the pavement to go around and in front of plaintiff. When the collision occurred, the automobile had reached about the center of the pavement, a little more than half of the machine being west of the center line. Plaintiff's head came in contact with the glass in the right front door of the automobile, breaking the glass, and throwing it inside the machine, and the door handle was bent toward the rear. Plaintiff was thrown to the pavement about its center, with his body lying partly over on its west half, and his injuries consisted of a laceration over his left eye, one on top of his head on the left side, a wound on the back of his head, fractures of three bones on his right foot, and numerous contusions. The automobile proceeded 20 to 25 feet beyond the place of collision, stopped for a moment, and was then driven a short distance beyond. Skid marks were seen at the place, commencing on the easterly half of the pavement a few feet south of the place of collision, swerving toward the west until they were wholly upon the west half, and, in all, were about 20 feet long. One of plaintiff's witnesses, who was working about 50 feet north of the place of collision stated that in his opinion defendant's machine was traveling at about 30 miles per hour when the accident happened. Defendant and a passenger he had in his machine testified that when defendant's machine arrived about 100 feet south of the place of collision they observed plaintiff standing just easterly of the pavement and watched him all the time thereafter until the collision occurred; that the machine was traveling 12 to 15 miles per hour; that plaintiff did not look south toward the oncoming machine, and, when it was about 12 to 15 feet from plaintiff, plaintiff started to walk across the pavement and continued to the time of the collision, looking down, going in a northwesterly direction at a fair gait; that defendant sounded his horn when he first observed plaintiff and again when plaintiff started out on the pavement; that, in order to avoid striking plaintiff, defendant applied his brakes and swerved his machine toward and partly upon the west half of the pavement to go around him; that plaintiff walked into the right front door of the machine; and that at the time of the collision the machine was traveling 5 to 10 miles per hour; and defendant testified that traveling at 12 miles per hour he could stop his machine in 25 to 30 feet.

[1, 2] Negligence is a question of fact for determination by the jury, but it becomes a question of law for the court when the evidence is such that it will support no other legitimate inference except that plaintiff was guilty of negligence which contributed to his injury. It is never a question of pure law. The decision of the question by the court is a decision of fact. When the evidence is of such a character that the court is impelled to say that the record is not in conflict on the facts, and that from the facts reasonable men can draw but one inference pointing unerringly to the conclusion that plaintiff's negligence contributed to his injury, then the law forbids his recovery. To warrant the court in determining that plaintiff was negligent as a matter of law, it is not necessary that there should be an absence of conflict in the evidence, but, if there be a conflict, it must not be a substantial one. However, if the conceded facts are such that reasonable minds might differ upon the question, it is one of fact for the jury. Seller v. Market-Street R. Co., 139 Cal. 268, 271, 72 P. 1006; Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 339, 343, 208 P. 125; Smith v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. Sup.) 255 P. 500; Moss v. Boynton Co., 44 Cal. App. 474, 476, 186 P. 631; Finkle v. Tait, 55 Cal. App. 425, 431, 203 P. 1031; Carey v. Pac. Gas & Electric Co., 75 Cal. App. 129, 134, 242 P. 97. "The question of contributory negligence must be determined without regard to any negligence on the part of defendant." Moss v. Boynton Co., supra; Mayer v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 740, 742, 173 P. 174; Lord v. Stacy, 68 Cal. App. 517, 521, 229 P. 874. While it has been held that a pedestrian crossing a street may presume that drivers of automobiles will use due care and caution to avoid striking them (Dullanty v. Smith [Cal. Sup.] 265 P. 814) reliance upon the presumption does not excuse one who is himself negligent. Truitner v. Knight (Cal. App.) 257 P. 447.

The facts in this case are such as to fairly raise the question whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. Viewing the testimony of plaintiff and his witnesses most favorably to plaintiff, it appears therefrom that plaintiff saw defendant's automobile at least 400 feet distant, and without again looking in the direction from which the automobile was approaching, but looking straight ahead or down (plaintiff testified he looked in the direction he was walking, and one of his witnesses said he was looking down as he walked), defendant proceeded to cross the pavement, walking at an ordinary pace, with his back partly toward the automobile, and that the collision occurred between his head and body and the door of the moving automobile. By calculation it appears that about one and one-half times the miles traveled per hour gives the feet per second, and at 30 miles per hour it required about 9 seconds for the automobile to travel the 400 feet; and, if plaintiff did not loiter, he walked at a pace of about 4 miles per hour, and in the 9 seconds he should have walked about 54 feet or past the west edge of the pavement to a position of safety. Apparently he walked about 19 feet from the east side of the pavement to the point of collision, the automobile was about 130 feet distant when he started across, and there was a period of 5 or 6 seconds between the time when he started to cross and the time of collision. From this it is evident that he did not look south immediately before he started to cross, and he proceeded without looking for danger. According to plaintiff's own testimony and that of his witness who saw him crossing, he did not exercise due care or ordinary care for his safety, and he was either mistaken in saying that he looked to the south immediately before he stepped upon the pavement, or he looked and was so preoccupied that he failed to see the proximity of defendant's automobile, and stepped out when it was too close to avoid the collision. He was not excused in either event. Lord v. Stacy, supra. The foregoing conclusions drawn from the evidence produced by plaintiff are reinforced by the testimony of defendant and the passengers in his machine; there being little if any substantial conflict in the evidence of the parties. While it is true that one of plaintiff's witnesses, who was about 50 feet north of the place of collision, testified that in his judgment the machine was traveling about 30 miles per hour; on the other hand, defendant and his passenger testified that the speed was 12 to 15 miles per hour, and that the machine was 12 to 15 feet from plaintiff when he started to cross. Defendant said his machine could be stopped in about 25 to 30 feet when traveling at 12 miles per hour, and plaintiff's witnesses testified that the skid marks were about 15 to 25 feet long, and that the machine proceeded about 25 feet beyond the place of collision before it stopped. In fact, plaintiff's evidence tends to corroborate the evidence produced by defendant in relation to the speed of the machine as well as the manner in which it was driven and its proximity. Had the machine not swerved to the west side of the pavement, plaintiff would have been hit by its front end and probably killed.

[3-5] It is the duty of a pedestrian to use due care before proceeding to cross a highway where vehicles frequently pass and repass, to see that he is not in immediate danger in attempting to cross, and he is required to look in both directions to see if any are approaching, and, if so, their rate of speed and proximity. Niosi v. Empire Steam Laundry, 117 Cal. 257, 49 P. 185. The observation of due care on the part of a pedestrian is not fully performed by merely looking to the left or right as he steps upon the street. It is imperative upon him during all the time that he is crossing, particularly if he proceeds in a diagonal course. Sheldon v. James, 175 Cal. 474, 479, 166 P. 8, 2 A. L. R. 1493; Mayer v. Anderson, supra, page 742 (173 P. 174); Atkins v. Bouchet, 65 Cal. App. 94, 223 P. 87; Moss v. Boynton Co., supra. Immediately before placing himself in a position of danger it is the duty of a pedestrian to look in the direction from which danger is to be anticipated, and this is a continuing duty, and is not met by looking once and then looking away. Moss v. Boynton Co., supra; Judd v. Webster, 50 Cal. App. 743, 747, 195 P. 929; Lord v. Stacy, supra. However, it has been held that, where a pedestrian crossing a street observed an automobile approaching from her left, half a block distant, and she continued to observe it until she reached the center of the street, when she looked to her right for vehicles approaching from that direction, that this appeared to have been reasonable prudence on her part. Wright v. Foreman (Cal. App.) 261 P. 481. The question whether or not a pedestrian is negligent is to be determined from all the facts and circumstances in evidence in the case. Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., supra; Burgesser v. Bullock's, 190 Cal. 673, 678, 204 P. 649.

[6] Under all the circumstances shown in this case, it was plaintiff's plain duty, when about to proceed across the pavement, to see that he was not in immediate danger from the traffic on the highway. Having observed defendant's machine approaching 400 or 500 feet distant, it was his duty to again look for it immediately before starting to cross, and he should have looked and listened as he proceeded so as to avoid colliding with the machine; defendant exercising the common privilege of using the highway (see Judd v. Webster, supra; Niosi v. Empire Steam Laundry, supra), which he failed to do.

We hold that as a matter of law plaintiff was guilty of negligence which contributed proximately to his injuries.

[7] No attention is given to the question whether defendant was negligent in the operation of his automobile, for the reason that plaintiff was guilty of negligence contributing to his injuries, and therefore cannot rely upon the negligence of defendant, if any; and, for the same reason, we give no consideration to the question whether plaintiff had the right to rely upon any presumption to the effect that defendant would use due care to avoid a collision.

The judgment is reversed.

Richard A. Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This action is one to foreclose a contractor's lien and recover a balance claimed to be due in the sum of $2,757.88 on the construction of an apartment house in the city of Los Angeles. Defendant in her answer sets up the defense that the contract was procured by plaintiff through fraud and misrepresentation; that plaintiff represented that he was a licensed architect and a builder of skill and efficiency, when in truth and in fact he was not a licensed architect, nor had he, at the time of entering into the contract—February 3, 1923—any experience in the building of apartment houses.

Under the terms of the contract on which this action is founded, the plaintiff undertook to construct for defendant on certain property owned by her in the city of Los Angeles a 56-room apartment house. The contract is what is commonly referred to as a cost plus contract; that is, one whereby the owner agrees to pay for all materials and labor furnished thereunder, and in addition thereto a percentage thereon as compensation to the contractor for his services. In the contract here the percentage on the net cost of the materials and labor was to be 10 per cent. of the cost of the construction of the building. The contract also provided for the payment to plaintiff of an additional compensation of 5 per cent. for services in drawing plans.

The evidence discloses the following facts: At the time of entering into the contract, the plaintiff was 28 years of age; that he had been engaged in selling automobiles and was engaged in the real estate business; that on February 3, 1923, he had in course of construction an apartment house, but prior to that time had never built an apartment house. While the contract provided for architectural supervision, plaintiff, as he himself testified, was not a licensed architect, and never had been, and made no statement in this regard to the defendant. The plans and specifications were not prepared by a licensed architect, but were prepared by the Home Seekers' Service Corporation, as plaintiff testified, "whom I employed to draw the plans. They were not licensed architects at that time."

Defendant testified that prior to entering into the contract she had never engaged the services of a contractor, architect, or builder. Plaintiff, in the procurement of the contract, represented to defendant that he could build a 56-room apartment house for $40,000 and that the building could be financed by his father; that she had no advice or counsel other than from plaintiff; that she believed the statements he made that he was an architect and builder; that at the time the contract was signed there were no plans or specifications attached to the contract; that plaintiff said he was qualified; that he had built some very good houses, lots of houses in Portland, and big apartment houses; that he built a number of houses in Los Angeles, and defendant asked to see some of them; that all he showed her were two or three bungalow courts and the Santos Apartments, which was under construction; that defendant told plaintiff that she was not very strong and would have to have somebody that was perfectly capable to look after the building and put it up; that he said he could recommend himself to be the best in the city; that she believed his statements that he was an architect and did building, or she would not have employed him.

After the building was started, it became necessary to remove the foundation forms in order to put in a deeper foundation. When the foundation forms were taken out, no cement was taken out, and no concrete was poured.

On June 22, 1923, defendant notified plaintiff in writing that she intended to sublet all the carpenter work, both rough and finished, and finish hardware, in connection with the construction of the apartment house as specified in the contract, according to the plans and specifications, and that, with plaintiff's consent to such subletting and waiving the right to furnish the labor and material as may be involved therein, she would waive, relinquish, surrender, and extinguish any claim against plaintiff for defective workmanship or material or damages arising out of the contract. At the bottom of this notice plaintiff signed the following consent: "In consideration of the foregoing waiver, I hereby consent to the subcontract herein referred to."

Plaintiff did no further work or supervision under the terms of his contract subsequent to June 22, 1923, the date the consent mentioned was signed releasing him from liability. Up to this time there was not expended in construction under the contract in excess of $4,000.

According to the testimony of defendant, George R. Nickerson, superintendent for plaintiff, was there only a few minutes each day to check up the lumber for the purpose of seeing that the money represented by a mortgage of plaintiff's father was used for the purchase of materials to go into the building. Defendant further testified that all material after June 22, 1923, was ordered by the foreman working under the direction of defendant; that she was on the job a great deal of the time when Mr. Gale was there, and that after he left she was there most of the time; that she did not see Mr. Nickerson more than once every three or four days after June 22, 1923, and never saw plaintiff on the job after that date.

[1] Two thousand dollars of the amount claimed is for preparing plans and specifications, which admittedly were not drawn by a licensed architect, and on account of which, prior to learning that plaintiff was not a licensed architect, defendant paid $1,500. Plaintiff not being a licensed architect and not informing defendant of such fact, but on the contrary representing to her that he was a licensed architect, the contract in this respect is unlawful and void.

The act to regulate the practice of architecture (Stats. 1901, p. 641) establishes a state board of architecture and empowers such board to examine persons who desire to follow the profession of an architect and to issue them a license for that purpose. Section 5 of the act makes it a misdemeanor punishable by a fine "for any person to practice architecture without a certificate in this state"; and further provides "that nothing in this act shall prevent any person from * * * furnishing plans or other data for buildings for other persons, provided the person so furnishing such plans or data shall fully inform the person for whom such plans or data are furnished, that he, the person furnishing such plans, is not a certified architect." The act of 1901 was passed for the protection of the public, and "every case from every court recognizes that, when a statute has been made for the protection of the public, a contract in violation of its provisions is void." Payne v. De Vaughn, 77 Cal. App. 399, 403, 246 P. 1069, 1071; Tatterson v. Kehrlein (Cal. App.) 263 P. 285.

Up to June 22, 1923, according to the testimony of defendant, there was not to exceed $4,000 expended in the construction under the provisions of the contract, while Albert A. Hasford, auditor and general office man of plaintiff R. V. Jones, Jr., testified:

> "Up to the 22d day of June, 1923, on this job, there was paid out $2,718.10. * * * That was the amount that was actually paid out on this job to the 22d day of June, 1923, but $15,000 worth of bills had been contracted prior to that time on this job, approximately. In other words, we had made commitments to this extent; that is, we had obligated ourselves to the subcontracts to give orders to this amount, which we had issued. The subcontract had not been paid; it amounted to fourteen hundred and some off dollars. It was not completed prior to the 22d day of June, 1923, only partially completed. * * * On this $15,000 item some of the work had been done; some of the material was on the job, but had not been paid for; some of the contracts had been started, but nothing had been applied on them. Part of the $2,700 was for pay roll for labor performed, surveys, excavating; the original item is there for $1,500."

If the contract was modified or canceled on June 22, 1923, as found by the court, then the best plaintiff could claim would be 10 per cent. on the amount due for materials and labor on that date. According to the testimony of respondent, there was expended but $4,000, and there would therefore be nothing due, and, if we adopt the figure of $15,000 given by appellant's auditor and office man, he would be entitled to but $1,500, which amount he had received.

Appellant, in support of this appeal, urges only objections to certain findings wherein the court finds that the contract was terminated as of date June 22, 1923; that no services as provided by said contract were furnished by plaintiff to defendant subsequent to June 22, 1923; that plaintiff had little experience as a builder of apartment houses; that he represented to defendant that he was an experienced designer and experienced in building apartment houses, and that he concealed from defendant that he had practically little or no experience as a designer of apartment houses and that, had defendant known such facts, she would not have entered into the contract; that plaintiff represented to defendant that the maximum cost of construction of a 56-room apartment house, including plans and specifications, would not exceed $40,000, but that the apartment house consisting of but 48 rooms cost $50,000 by reason of the inexperience, unskillfulness and inefficiency of plaintiff as a builder. These findings are attacked by appellant in his brief on the ground that they are not supported by any evidence in the case.

[2, 3] The objection that the findings are not supported by the evidence is not available to appellant. He chose to appeal by a bill of exceptions. In the bill of exceptions he failed to specify wherein the findings are unsupported by the evidence. The bill of exceptions purports to set forth the evidence adduced at the trial, but contains no specifications whatever. This being the state of the record, the point made by appellant that the evidence is insufficient cannot be raised here. Moore v. Franklin, 49 Cal. App. 103, 108, 192 P. 1047. Such specifications are necessary in order to authorize the court to review the evidence and consider its sufficiency. Goldman v. Dahlberg, 79 Cal. App. 380, 249 P. 536; Winterburn v. Chambers, 91 Cal. 185, 27 P. 658; Meades v. Lasar, 92 Cal. 227, 28 P. 935; Estate of Depeaux, 118 Cal. 290, 50 P. 387; Estate of Behrens, 130 Cal. 418, 62 P. 603; Code Civ. Proc. § 648. We must assume that the findings are sustained by the evidence which was presented at the trial, as appellant has not in his bill of exceptions made any specification of insufficiency in that respect. Winterburn v. Chambers, supra.

The judgment is affirmed.

SENEY v. PICKWICK STAGES, NORTHERN DIVISION, Inc., et al. (Civ. 5738.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 8, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Aug. 6, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Ordinarily, findings of fact by lower court, supported by evidence, are conclusive.

Ordinarily, when sufficiently supported by evidence, findings of fact made by lower court are conclusive on appeal.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1008(3)—Findings of fact by lower court, based on typewritten transcript of testimony in former action, may not be disturbed on appeal.

Findings of fact made by lower court based on evidence consisting of typewritten transcript of testimony given by witnesses in former action may not be disturbed on appeal.

3. Negligence 🔑121(2)—"Res ipsa loquitur" is inference of negligence of defendant from which prima facie case is established for plaintiff, subject to rebuttal.

Effect of doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur" is merely that inference of negligence on part of defendant is indulged, from which it results that prima facie case only is established in favor of plaintiff, and such condition is not at all conclusive as to negligence of defendant, but is subject to rebuttal, same as though prima facie case had been established by testimony of witnesses.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Res Ipsa Loquitur.]

4. Carriers 🔑318(4)—Judgment in bus passenger's action was properly rendered for carrier, if prima facie case was overcome, or evidence did not preponderate in passenger's favor.

In passenger's action for wrongful death of her minor child and personal injuries to herself, where auto stage was overturned, though prima facie case of negligence on part of carrier may be inferred, nevertheless, if, by evidence introduced on behalf of carrier, effect of such prima facie case was either overcome or entire evidence left in such condition that it did not preponderate in favor of passenger, trial court was justified in rendering judgment in favor of carrier.

5. Carriers 🔑316(1)—Passenger had burden of proving carrier's negligence in action for injuries to herself and death of minor son when auto stage overturned.

In passenger's action for injuries to herself and death of minor son when auto stage overturned, burden of establishing negligence of carrier by preponderance of evidence rested on passenger.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1099(7)—Finding carrier was not negligent held conclusive on appeal, though based on typewritten transcript of evidence in former case in which carrier's negligence was affirmed on appeal.

In passenger's action for injuries to herself and death of minor son, where evidence consisted of typewritten transcript of testimony given by witnesses in former action brought for death of husband in same accident wherein judgment was rendered in favor of passenger and affirmed on appeal, finding that carrier was not negligent held conclusive on appeal.

and plaintiff sustained personal injuries. In an action brought against the defendant for damages caused by the death of her husband, a judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, which judgment on appeal to this court was affirmed. Seney v. Pickwick Stages (Cal. App.) 255 P. 279. In the second action, plaintiff sought damages against the defendant caused by the wrongful death of her minor child, as well as for damages arising from the personal injuries sustained by plaintiff in said accident. In the latter action, judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant. It is from such judgment that the present appeal is taken. In the second action, the record discloses the fact that, with the exception of evidence necessary to establish the amount of damages, if any, sustained by plaintiff, the evidence therein was identical with that of the first case; it having been stipulated by the parties to the litigation that the transcript of the evidence in the first case might be introduced on the trial of the second case with the same force and effect as though the respective witnesses were actually present and personally testifying in the action on trial. It should be noted that the judge who presided at the trial of the first action did not preside at the trial of the second action.

[1, 2] Appellant concedes the point that ordinarily the law is established that, when sufficiently supported by the evidence, the findings of fact made by the lower court are conclusive. However, in this connection, appellant contends that the rule should not apply where the evidence upon which the finding of fact is made consists of a typewritten transcript of testimony given by witnesses in a former action. In the matter entitled Estate of Bell, 157 Cal. 528, 108 P. 497, in substance it is held that the credibility of witnesses, whether testifying orally or by affidavit, is for the trial court; and in the case of McElhaney v. McPherson, 12 Cal. App. 678, 108 P. 525, the same principle of law is announced in the statement to the effect that the appellate court is not concerned with the credit which is to attach to the testimony of the several witnesses in the trial of an action; and the fact that much of such testimony may be produced by depositions of such witnesses does not affect the rule. In the instant case, based upon the assumption that the findings of fact are supported by the evidence, this court is led to the conclusion that such findings of fact may not be disturbed on appeal.

[3] In affirming the judgment in the first case between plaintiff and the defendant, among other things, this court held that, considering the facts therein, the doctrine known as res ipsa loquitur was applicable. Relying upon such declaration of law as affecting the facts in the first case and applying it to the identical state of facts in the instant case, appellant contends therefrom that, although the judgment in the trial court in the instant case was rendered in favor of the defendant, the duty devolves upon this court to order a reversal of such judgment and order a judgment in favor of plaintiff. But it is well-established law that the effect of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is merely that an inference of negligence on the part of the defendant is indulged; from which it results that a prima facie case only is established in favor of the plaintiff. Such a condition is not at all conclusive as to the negligence of the defendant, but is subject to rebuttal the same as though a prima facie case had been established by the testimony of witnesses regarding the manner in which the accident occurred. The law with reference thereto is succinctly stated in the case of Scarborough v. Urgo, 191 Cal. 341, 346, 216 P. 584, 586, where it is said:

> "* * * In this class of cases a prima facie case of negligence is made out by proving that the passenger was injured while being carried as such, and this being done, the carrier is called upon to rebut or overcome a presumption of negligence that follows from the mere fact of injury, by showing, if it can, the exercise of that degree of care which will excuse it under the rule of law above stated. Such a presumption is evidence in the case, but it has no greater or different effect than the testimony of witnesses, and in no degree changes the rule as to the burden of proof, viz., the burden of producing a preponderance of evidence. That burden does not shift from side to side on the trial of a case, but constantly remains with the party having the affirmative of the issue, who, in this case, is the plaintiff. All that is required of the defendant is to produce evidence sufficient to offset the effect of a plaintiff's showing. He is not required to offset it by a preponderance of the evidence. Valente v. Sierra Ry. Co., 151 Cal. 534, 91 P. 481. As is said in Sweeney v. Erving, 228 U. S. 233, 33 S. Ct. 416, 57 L. Ed. 815, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 905 (see, also, Rose's U. S. Notes), the doctrine of 'res ipsa loquitur, where it applies, does not convert the defendant's general issue into an affirmative defense. When all the evidence is in the question for the jury is whether the preponderance is with the plaintiff' [citing cases]."

To the same effect, see 4 Cal. Jur. p. 980 et seq.; 19 Cal. Jur. p. 717 et seq.

[4-6] It follows that from the circumstances present in the instant case a prima facie case of negligence on the part of defendant may have been properly inferred; nevertheless, if by the evidence introduced on behalf of the defendant the effect of such prima facie case was either overcome or the entire evidence left in such a condition that it did not preponderate in favor of plaintiff, the trial court was justified in rendering a judgment in favor of the defendant. Concededly, the evidence presented by the defendant had a tendency to establish the ultimate fact necessary to its defense—that the accident in question was occasioned by inevitable casualty, or by some other cause which human care and foresight could not have prevented.

Throughout the trial of the action the burden of establishing the negligence of the defendant by a preponderance of the evidence rested with plaintiff. Relative to the negligence of the defendant, the question of the weight of the evidence on either side of the controversy, or, in order that plaintiff should be entitled to a judgment in the action, whether the evidence preponderated in favor of plaintiff, was solely for the determination of the judge of the trial court, and with whose conclusion, notwithstanding the affirmance by this tribunal of the judgment in the first action in favor of the plaintiff therein, this court is unauthorized to interfere. It would serve no useful purpose to here set forth the substance of the evidence; suffice it to state that an examination of the record discloses the fact that the evidence adduced on behalf of the defendant was substantial in its nature and effect. It is clear that in reaching the conclusion that plaintiff had failed to establish negligence of the defendant by a preponderance of the evidence the trial judge acted entirely within his province.

CRAIG, J. Appellants were convicted of maintaining a common nuisance, in that between January 10, 1928, and January 30, 1928, they continually maintained a place where intoxicating liquor was kept, sold, and bartered unlawfully. Appellants urge the appeal from the judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial on the sole ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the conviction, because, they assert, there is no proof that they operated or maintained the place known as the Bradford Café, where it is conceded the liquor was sold during the period alleged in the information.

One Hatzke, a witness called by the prosecution, testified that during the month of January, 1928, the defendants were "running the Bradford Café at Hemet." No objection was made to this evidence, and the witness was not cross-examined as to the subject-matter of his answer. The defendants did not take the stand. Hatzke's testimony was uncontradicted, and was sufficient to establish the defendants' connection with the place where other evidence showed intoxicating liquor was sold in the defendants' presence, so as to clearly show the creation of a nuisance within the meaning of the statute.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Fact that there are conflicts in the evidence does not justify disturbing judgment of trial court on appeal.

In suit for alienation of affections, in which plaintiff alleged that defendant was worth $100,000, and defendant alleged that her worth did not exceed $5,000, $6,000 verdict in plaintiff's favor was not excessive as a matter of law by virtue of fact that no evidence was introduced concerning defendant's worth, where trial court found that defendant had gained affections of plaintiff's husband, and that plaintiff and her minor daughter were left entirely without support.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. M. Jamison, Judge.

Action by Beatrice Mayer against Georgia Malloy. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry G. Bodkin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

F. O. McGirr and Joseph Musgrove, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff obtained a judgment against the defendant awarding her damages for the alienation of the affections of her husband. The defendant has appealed, bringing up the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions. In framing her complaint, the plaintiff in certain instances pleaded her evidence. The findings as signed followed the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, and are quite long.

[1] In presenting her case on appeal, the defendant makes nine different attacks, claiming that certain findings are not supported by the evidence. We have read the bill of exceptions from cover to cover. The material findings are supported by substantial evidence. True it is that there are some conflicts, but the fact that there are conflicts in the evidence does not justify this court in disturbing the judgment of a trial court.

[2-4] When the plaintiff was testifying in her own behalf, her attorney had developed the fact that on certain occasions the plaintiff's husband did not come home at night. Thereupon her attorney asked her what was the cause of his inability to come home. The defendant objected on the ground that the question called for hearsay. The objection was overruled. No error appears from the ruling. In the first place, the question did not necessarily call for hearsay; in the second place, the answer was that the plaintiff found in her garage three barrels, and that upon making inquiries of her husband he told her that he would subsequently explain. There was no motion to strike out. What the husband told her was not addressed at all to why he did not come home. Furthermore, the answer made to the question was apparently wholly immaterial to the issue on trial. Continuing, plaintiff's attorney asked her if the three barrels were in any way connected with the defendant. The defendant objected that the question called for the conclusion of the witness. The court ruled that she could state what she knew, but not her conclusions. Her reply was that she later learned that the three barrels were connected with the defendant. The ruling made by the trial court was clearly correct. There was no motion to strike out, and furthermore the answer, as made, does not show that any error was committed. The same witness had stated that in the month of July, 1924, she learned the reason why her husband was staying away from home. That she got the first statement from him. Her attorney then propounded to her the question, "What did he state to you in that regard?" The defendant objected that the question called for hearsay and that no proper foundation had been laid. After some argument it was claimed by the plaintiff that the subject-matter was admissible as showing what were the feelings of the plaintiff's husband. The court ruled that the question could be asked and answered for that purpose alone. The record does not disclose that the evidence was used for any other purpose. The defendant now argues that, if the evidence was considered for any other purpose, then the ruling of the court was erroneous. Conceding, for the purposes of this case, that the contention is well made, as the record does not show that the evidence was used for any other purpose, no error appears.

During the trial the plaintiff introduced several photographs. The defendant asserts that there was no foundation laid as to when the photographs were taken. In making this assertion, the defendant is mistaken. It may be claimed that there was some conflict in the evidence on the subject, but it may not be claimed that there was no evidence.

[5] The jury returned a verdict in the sum of $6,000. The defendant claims that the verdict was excessive. In making this contention, the defendant calls attention to the fact that in her complaint the plaintiff alleged that the defendant was worth $100,000, that in her answer the defendant alleged that she was not worth to exceed $5,000, and that no evidence was introduced by either party regarding the value of the defendant's properties. Conceding, without deciding, that the issue as to the worth of the defendant was properly inserted in the pleadings, and that no evidence was introduced on that issue, it does not follow as a matter of law that the verdict was excessive. Among other things, the trial court found that the defendant "willfully, wickedly, and maliciously gained the affections of said George P. Mayer" away from the plaintiff; and that the plaintiff and her minor daughter of 8 years were thus left entirely without support. There was evidence in the record tending to support each one of these findings. This court may not say, as a matter of law, that the verdict was excessive. We find no error in the record.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court July 30, 1928.

1. Brokers 🔑53—Broker securing acceptance of proposition is entitled to commission, unless right thereto was forfeited because of false statements inducing transaction.

Where real estate broker undertaking to secure an acceptance of proposition to exchange property secured acceptance thereof, he became entitled to commission, unless his right to demand it was forfeited by his false statements concerning incumbrance on land agreed to be exchanged as specified in such agreement.

2. Brokers 🔑84(1)—Owners disputing broker's right to commission had burden of establishing fraud in inducing contract.

The burden of establishing fraud on part of broker agreeing to effect exchange of properties rested on property owners disputing right to commission on ground statements concerning incumbrance on property exchanged were false.

Action by M. F. Darrow against J. P. Houlihan and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

T. W. Duckworth and Ben Harrison, both of San Bernardino, for appellant.
U. F. Lewis, of Redlands, for respondents.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff commenced the action to recover the sum of $600 alleged to be due for services rendered as broker in the exchange of two parcels of real estate. He appeals from a judgment in defendants' favor. On August 19, 1924, defendants signed an instrument by which they agreed to exchange certain real property owned by them, valued at $6,000, and subject to "an indebtedness in the sum of $2,000," for certain other real property owned by W. S. and Lillian M. Little, also valued at $6,000, and subject to an "indebtedness of $2,000." It was provided in the instrument that, if plaintiff should within 10 days "secure an acceptance of the proposition to exchange" the properties, defendants would pay him the regular commission. A period of 60 days from the date of acceptance was provided for the furnishing of the deeds and certificates of title. It was further provided in the instrument:

> "And in case either party fails to carry out any of the terms of this contract such failing party agrees to pay the agents herein mentioned the regular brokerage commission on the exchange value of all the properties involved."

Plaintiff immediately obtained from Mr. and Mrs. Little an acceptance in writing of the offer contained in the instrument signed by defendants. The Littles promptly put their papers in escrow, but the Houlihans refused to consummate the transaction for the reason, as alleged by them, that plaintiff had falsely represented to them that the property of the Littles was incumbered with a mortgage of $2,000 due in about six months, when in truth the incumbrance was in the form of a trust deed, payable at the rate of $25 per month, and that only the sum of $1,000 remained unpaid thereon. Mr. Houlihan testified that plaintiff had told him before the offer was signed that the Littles' property was incumbered by two mortgages of $1,000 each. On the day following the acceptance of the offer by the Littles, Mr. Houlihan had a conversation with Mr. Little, and suggested to him that the two mortgages might be consolidated with one single mortgage. He was then notified by Mr. Little of the true facts concerning the trust deed. Mr. Houlihan thereupon telegraphed his wife to cancel the contract and refused to proceed with the exchange. Plaintiff now claims the right to recover the commissions on both properties.

[1] Defendants agreed to pay the commission to plaintiff "when he has secured an acceptance of the proposition." Plaintiff secured the acceptance and became entitled to his commission, unless his right to demand it was forfeited by his statements concerning the incumbrance upon the Little property. In Jauman v. McCusick, 166 Cal. 517, 137 P. 254, the court said:

> "She agreed to pay a commission for securing a specific agreement. Such agreement having been secured, she was liable under the precise terms of her contract."

If defendants were in fact induced to sign the agreement by fraud on the part of plaintiff, there can be no question but that they should be relieved from paying the commission. The rule is well stated in 4 R. C. L. 49:

> "Once the customer procured by the broker is accepted by the employer, the latter is thereafter estopped from denying the purchaser's ability or willingness to complete the contract, inasmuch as he is not bound to accept the offer of such persons without a reasonable opportunity to inquire and satisfy himself in relation to it. Consequently his acceptance should estop him from alleging anything against the claim except fraud on the part of the broker in inducing the acceptance."

This rule has been followed in a number of California cases. Carrington v. Smithers, 26 Cal. App. 460, 147 P. 225; Freeman v. Creelman, 60 Cal. App. 14, 212 P. 56; Wood & Tatum Co. v. Basler, 37 Cal. App. 381, 173 P. 1109.

[2-5] The burden of establishing fraud on the part of plaintiff rested upon defendants. The real question to be determined on this appeal is whether defendants sustained this burden. Notwithstanding the findings are in favor of defendants, we are of the opinion that the conduct of plaintiff, taking as correct the testimony of defendants, was not such as justified their refusal to pay the commission. The Littles had 60 days within which to present the necessary documents to bring about a consummation of the transaction in exact accordance with the agreement. The rule is well stated in 25 Cal. Jur. 495:

> "The general rule is that a vendor is only required to have title to the property at the time when he becomes obligated to convey, and that one may contract to convey property which he does not own, or even in which he has no interest at the time, if he acts in good faith, since he may be able to furnish a good title when the time for performance arrives. Such a contract will be upheld and enforced if, when the time for performance arrives, the vendor is able to furnish the title he contracted to convey. The vendor has until that time to acquire such title, and is in default only when the purchaser has performed his part and made demand for a title which the vendor is unable to furnish."

There is nothing before the court to show that defendants would not have received exactly what they bargained for if they had performed their part of the agreement. No effort was made by defendants to proceed with the transaction and comply with the terms of the contract. On the contrary, they flatly refused to go into escrow. Manifestly it cannot be contended that any damage was shown. Before defendants could properly refuse to pay plaintiff's commission they would have to show that they had suffered some appreciable pecuniary damage, or that their position had been altered to their prejudice. In Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 92 P. 1011, the court said:

> "That fraud which has produced, and will produce, no injury will not justify a rescission, nor support an action either for rescission or damages, is an established principle of law and equity. * * * It may be conceded that it must be shown that the plaintiff, by reason of the fraud, suffered an injury of a pecuniary nature, that is, an injury to his property rights, as distinguished from a mere injury to his feelings, but it will be sufficient if the facts alleged show that material injury will necessarily ensue from the fraud, although the amount of the pecuniary loss is not stated."

In the case of Munson v. Fishburn, 183 Cal. 206, 190 P. 808, the court quoted with approval from Stillwell v. Rankin, 55 Mont. 130, 174 P. 186, wherein it is stated:

> "Most of the courts and textwriters employ the term 'damage' in the sense of injury; a few restrict its meaning to financial loss. We prefer to adhere to the rule which gives to the term its broader significance, as including either pecuniary loss or the alteration of one's position to his prejudice."

Applying the rule stated in these decisions to the case at bar, we find that the facts established fall short of a justification for the defendants' conduct in refusing to proceed with the exchange of the properties. It was not shown that they did not or could not obtain what they bargained for; nor is it shown that defendants would have suffered any damage or prejudice whatever by the exchange of their property for the property of the Littles incumbered by a trust deed on which there was unpaid only the sum of $1,000 instead of two mortgages for $1,000 each. In such case it is apparent that defendant's pecuniary condition would have been improved rather than injured.

The judgment is reversed. A new trial of the action will not be necessary. It is ordered that the findings of fact and conclusions of law by the trial court, be stricken and that in lieu thereof the following be inserted:

> "That all of the allegations contained in plaintiff's complaint are true; that none of the representations or statements made by plaintiff to defendants at the time the defendants signed exhibit A, attached to the complaint, caused any damage or injury whatever to defendants or caused them to alter their position to their prejudice."

Upon the going down of the remittitur it is ordered that the superior court enter judgment, upon the findings as herein set forth, in favor of plaintiff and against defendants in the sum of $600, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from August 19, 1914.

WALDRON v. LYON et al. (Civ. 6295.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 4, 1928.

1. Corporations ⚷259(1)—Action against stockholders by indorsers paying notes held action on new obligation, arising by operation of law when notes were paid (Civ. Code, §§ 2847, 2848).

In action for stockholders' liability by assignee of rights of indorsers of notes of corporation who were forced to pay same, where stockholders asserted that only an action in assumpsit would lie for reimbursement or contribution between indorsers under Civ. Code, §§ 2847, 2848, and no such action was filed, held, that action was not on notes, but on new and original obligation which arose ipso facto by operation of law, when notes and obligations evidenced thereby were paid by indorsers.

2. Appeal and error ⚷544(1)—Finding of payment at instance of corporation which agreed to repay held conclusive on appeal, in absence of bill specifying insufficiency of supporting evidence.

In action for stockholders' liability, where indorsers were forced to pay corporate notes, finding that sum was paid at special instance and request of corporation on account of indebtedness, and that corporation agreed to repay same, held conclusive on appeal, in absence of bill of exceptions specifying insufficiency of evidence to sustain such finding.

3. Assignments ⚷41—Assignment that indorser did sell, assign, and transfer all sums of money due from corporation or stockholders held valid.

Assignment containing words "do hereby sell, assign, and transfer all and whatsoever sum or sums of money now due from corporation or stockholders thereof," held valid assignments of rights of indorser who was forced to pay corporate notes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Action by A. N. Waldron against Ernest C. Lyon and others for stockholders' liability. A. E. Wallace, J. W. Harriman, Sam McKee, and C. Pederson appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff. Affirmed.

Norman T. Mason, of Los Angeles, for appellant Harriman.

D. Joseph Coyne, of Los Angeles, for other appellants.

McGee, Sumner & Tilden, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment entered severally against the defendants, and from such judgment defendants A. E. Wallace, J. W. Harriman, Sam McKee and C. Pederson have appealed.

The complaint alleges, and the court found, the following facts: That on or about June 20, 1923, Shallow Field Oil Company became indebted to the Marine Trust & Savings Bank of Long Beach for money loaned in the sum of $15,000, for which Shallow Field Oil Company delivered to such bank its promissory note, which note was indorsed by Andrew N. Waldron, Herbert Jutson, Thos. H. Waldron, M. V. Housman, F. S. Brennan, J. K. Hull, Libbie S. Lotz, F. B. Steen, W. F. Pascoe, C. I. Thorpe, and J. H. Sleeper; that the note was so indorsed for a valuable consideration; that at maturity the note was presented for payment to Shallow Field Oil Company, but no part thereof was paid, and suit was brought upon the note, and judgment by default was entered against the maker and indorsers of the note, and each of them became obligated to pay, and indorsers Herbert Jutson, M. V. Housman, F. S. Brennan, and Libbie S. Lotz paid the amount due to Marine Trust & Savings Bank; that, on or about December 11, 1922, Shallow Field Oil Company became indebted to the Marine Trust & Savings Bank of Long Beach for money loaned in the sum of $10,000, for which Shallow Field Oil Company delivered to such bank its promissory note, which note was indorsed by J. K. Hull, F. S. Brennan, M. V. Housman, W. F. Pascoe, John H. Sleeper, F. B. Steen, and Thos. H. Waldron; that this note was indorsed for a valuable consideration, and at maturity was presented for payment to Shallow Field Oil Company, but no part thereof was paid, and suit was brought upon the note, and a default judgment was entered against the maker and indorsers of the note, and each of them became obligated to pay, and indorsers Herbert Jutson, M. V. Housman, F. S. Brennan, and Libbie S. Lotz paid the amount due to the bank; that, on or about February 2, 1922, Shallow Field Oil Company became indebted to one John K. Hull, trustee, for money loaned in the sum of $3,500, for which Shallow Field Oil Company delivered to John K. Hull, trustee, its promissory note; that Shallow Field Oil Company, within three years prior to the filing of the complaint, became indebted to A. W. Wallace in the sum of $750, George Edwin in the sum of $250, I. N. Vining in the sum of $350, Pugh-Miller Drilling Company in the sum of $5,000, and that, prior to the commencement of the action, the indorsers Herbert Jutson, M. V. Housman, F. S. Brennan, and Libbie S. Lotz, of the first two promissory notes mentioned, and who did pay and discharged the indebtedness of Shallow Field Oil Company to Marine Trust & Savings Bank, and A. E. Wallace, George Edwin, I. N. Vining and M. V. Housman, did severally sell, assign, and transfer unto plaintiff their respective claims against Shallow Field Oil Company, and that plaintiff is now the owner and holder of such claims.

[1] Appellant urges three points: First, that no action can be maintained on the first two promissory notes under the theory of the stockholders' liability, for the reason that the principal obligation was satisfied by the payment of the notes, and only an action in assumpsit would lie against the corporation for reimbursement or for a contribution between indorsers, and cites us to sections 2847 and 2848 of the Civil Code; that no action was filed against the corporation to seek reimbursement in assumpsit, nor was the corporation made a party to the suit. In answer to this objection, it may be said that plaintiff's action is not on the notes, but on a new and original obligation which arose ipso facto by operation of law, when the notes and the obligations evidenced thereby were paid by the indorsers of the notes. The case of Yule v. Bishop, 133 Cal. 574, 62 P. 68, 65 P. 1094, cited by appellant, is not in conflict with this view, nor are the other cases cited. The cause of action against the stockholders, although arising at the same time as that against the corporation, is entirely independent of the cause of action against the corporation, and the creditor need not resort to the assets of the corporation, nor seek a judgment against it before bringing an action against the stockholders. Eva v. Andersen, 166 Cal. 420, 137 P. 16; Ellsworth v. Bradford, 186 Cal. 316, 199 P. 335; Union Trust Co. v. Journeay, 29 Cal. App. 502, 156 P. 999. The fact that plaintiff was a stockholder in Shallow Field Oil Company, or that plaintiff's assignors were also stockholders in such company, does not affect plaintiff's right to recover on the assigned claims their pro rata share of the corporate indebtedness from the other stockholders. Knowles v. Sandercock, 107 Cal. 629, 640, 40 P. 1047.

Yule v. Bishop, supra, principally relied upon by appellants, is a case where the accommodation indorser paid the note and took an assignment of the note from the bank. She subsequently assigned the note to one Black, who brought an action against the corporation, and recovered judgment for the amount so paid by the accommodation indorser. Thereafter the note was assigned to the plaintiff, who brought suit to enforce the statutory liability of the stockholders on this debt of the corporation evidenced by the note and judgment, which original debt the court held no longer existed—that by the payment to the payee the note became extinguished, and ceased to be a binding obligation. Here plaintiff does not seek to recover on the notes, but upon a new obligation which arose ipso facto by operation of law when the notes and the obligations evidenced thereby were paid by the indorsers.

[2] Appellant's next point is that the testimony of M. V. Housman, a witness called by plaintiff, shows that Housman paid the $5,000 as a volunteer—as a stockholder whose primary obligation was to pay the corporate debts, and as an officer and director he was not in a position to agree to repay himself in such manner as to constitute him a surety for the corporation debt to Pugh-Miller Drilling Company on a partial settlement of a demand in suit paid to release an attachment on his private business; that the evidence shows an entire lack of authority to support the allegation that the Shallow Field Oil Company promised and agreed to repay Housman the money paid to release the attachment. The court, however, finds that the sum of $5,000 was paid at the special instance and request of the corporation upon account of the indebtedness to Pugh-Miller Drilling Company; and that the corporation agreed to repay to Housman the $5,000; and that no part thereof had been paid. We must assume, therefore, that this finding of fact is sustained by the evidence which was presented at the trial, as appellants have not in their bill of exceptions made any specification of insufficiency in that respect. Winterburn v. Chambers, 91 Cal. 170, 185, 27 P. 658.

[3] There is no merit in the final objection to the sufficiency of the assignment from M. V. Housman to plaintiff. The assignment contains the following:

> "* * * Do hereby sell, assign and transfer to said A. N. Waldron all and whatsoever sum or sums of money now due to me from the Shallow Field Oil Company, a corporation, or the stockholders thereof."

This disposes of the points urged by appellants in support of their appeal, and from what has been said it follows that we find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

HALEY v. TRAEGER, Sheriff. (Civ. 5151.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 1, 1928.

1. Replevin 🔑93—Finding held not objectionable because value of interest of third party in property he was purchasing under agreements was not found, where interest was determinable by calculation.

In action for claim and delivery against sheriff for goods which he had seized from third party under writ of attachment, where court determined value of property, and by calculation it was readily determinable what portions third party was purchasing under agreements, held that finding was not objectionable, because there was no finding of third party's interest in portion of property purchased under agreements.

2. Trial 🔑404(2)—That finding of fact was erroneously placed in conclusion of law does not prevent it from being treated as finding of fact.

In action for claim and delivery, where finding of value of third party's interest in property was erroneously placed in conclusions of law, held, that fact did not prevent it from being considered and treated as finding of fact.

3. Evidence 🔑113(8)—Amount third party paid on purchase price of property held some evidence of value of his interest therein.

In action for claim and delivery against sheriff who seized property from third person under writ of attachment, amount third party actually paid on purchase price of portions of property he was buying under agreement held some evidence of value of his interest in property, since it was proper to consider sum actually paid for property in arriving at its value.

4. Replevin 🔑93—Where one finding determined value of property and another date of attachment, there was no merit in contention that there was no finding of value on date of levy.

In action for claim and delivery against sheriff who seized goods from third party under writ of attachment, where plaintiff contended that there was no finding of value of third party's interest in portions of property he owned outright on day of levy, held, that contention was without merit, where value of items was determined in one finding and date of attachment in another.

5. Appeal and error 🔑920(4)—Appellate court must assume that payment was made prior to attachment, where it was apparent trial court made that assumption.

In action for claim and delivery against sheriff who had seized property from third party under writ of attachment, where plaintiff asserted that attaching creditors could only secure lien on interest which third party had in attached property on date of attachment, and that attaching creditors acquired no lien whatever on any interest third party acquired in property after levy, basing contention on fact court did not expressly find sum was paid before levy, held, on appeal on judgment roll alone, that, since all intendments must be indulged in support of judgment appealed from, and it being apparent that court assumed sum was paid before levy of attachment, appellate court must assume payment was made prior to attachment.

6. Judgment 🔑248—Attachment plaintiff, seizing tires as equipment of gasoline station, could not predicate error in judgment requiring their return, though amended complaint did not mention tires.

Judgment, in action of claim and delivery against sheriff who seized equipment of gasoline and oil station under writ of attachment requiring return of tires not mentioned in amended complaint held not erroneous since tires were treated as station equipment.

7. Appeal and error 🔑762—Appellate court need not consider contention made for first time in reply brief.

Appellate court need not consider contentions made for first time in reply brief, and, in absence of showing good cause for their omission, they will be considered as waived.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harold Louderback, Judge.

Action by John O. Haley, etc., against William I. Traeger, Sheriff of Los Angeles County, etc., in claim and delivery. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Edward Winterer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, and Meserve & Meserve, Clifford E. Hughes, and Timon E. Owens, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAZLETT, Justice pro tem. This is an action in claim and delivery. Defendant, as sheriff of Los Angeles county, had seized the personal property in question as the property of one J. E. Lange, under a writ of attachment in an action brought by Richfield Oil Company against Lange. Plaintiff, claiming to be the owner of the property, demanded that defendant deliver it to him, and, his demand being refused, brought this action, and by means of this action obtained possession of the property from defendant. Judgment was given in favor of defendant requiring that plaintiff return the property to defendant or that plaintiff pay defendant $944.20 as the value of the interest of Lange in the property, and plaintiff appeals upon the judgment roll alone.

[1] The court found that certain described portions of the property were owned outright by Lange, and that the remainder were being purchased by him under executory agreements of sale. Appellant contends that there is no finding of the value of Lange's interest in the portions of the property he was purchasing under the agreements. Finding VII of the findings of facts is in part as follows:

> "That for some months prior to May 24, 1923, and up to the 29th day of May, 1923, and the time of taking of said property under attachment as hereinafter set out, said above-described property, except as hereinafter set out was owned by, and the same was lawfully in the possession of, and under the control of, one J. E. Lange; that on said 29th day of May, 1923, and at the time of the commencement of this action, the Paramount Service Station, described in paragraph IV of the amended complaint, together with all the appliances and equipment used and incidental thereto, together with the reasonable value thereof, was as follows: [Here follows an itemized list of all the property, showing the reasonable value of each item, totalling $2,979.45.]"

Finding VIII finds and describes those particular items of the property listed in finding VII which Lange was purchasing under the agreements, and finds that Lange had paid $370 of the purchase price thereof, but the values of those items so being purchased were not repeated in finding XIII. By simple calculation from the figures as to values found and set out in finding VII it is readily determined that the value of the portions of the property Lange owned outright was $574.20, and that the whole value of the remaining portions he was purchasing under the agreements was $2,405.25, on the day the attachment was levied.

[2] We find erroneously placed in the conclusions of law a finding of the value of Lange's interest in all of the property as follows:

> "Defendant is entitled to judgment * * * for the return of all the following described property: [Here follows an itemized description of all the property] or the value of the interest of J. E. Lange therein, to wit, $944.20. * * *"

Therefore the value of Lange's interest in all of the property was clearly found. The fact that a finding may be mistakenly placed in the conclusions of law does not prevent it from being considered and treated as a finding of fact, and our courts have uniformly held that it will be so treated. Matter of Forrester, 162 Cal. 493, 495, 123 P. 283; Collins v. Ramish, 182 Cal. 360, 366, 188 P. 550; Stanward v. Yellow Taxicab Co., 75 Cal. App. 96, 102, 241 P. 902; 24 Cal. Jur. 961.

[3] The amount Lange actually paid on the purchase prices of the portions of the property he was buying under the agreements was some evidence of the value of his interest in the property. It is proper to consider the sum actually paid for property in arriving at its value. Otten v. Spreckels, 24 Cal. App. 251, 261, 141 Pac. 224. The findings clearly determine that the value of Lange's interest in the portions he was purchasing was $370—the amount he had paid under the agreements of purchase. This is the difference between the value of the portions he owned outright ($574.20) and the value of all his interests in the property ($944.20). There is no merit in the contention made by appellant.

[4] Appellant also contends that there is no finding of the value of Lange's interest in the portions he owned outright on the day of the levy of attachment. There is no merit in this contention, for the reason that finding VII determines that those items were of the value of $574.20 "at the time of the taking of said property under attachment" (all of the property, including those portions), and it is found in finding IX that the attachment was levied on or about the 29th day of May, 1923.

[5] Appellant asserts that Richfield Oil Company, through the levy of the writ of attachment, could secure a lien only on the interest which Lange had in the attached property on the date of the attachment, and contends that the company acquired no lien whatever on any interest Lange acquired in the property after the levy. Apparently he bases this contention on the fact that the court did not expressly find that the sum of $370 was paid or was all paid before the levy. However, when an appeal is taken on the judgment roll alone, which is the case here, "all intendments must be indulged in support of the judgment appealed from and findings should be so construed as to support the judgment, and any uncertainty will be construed to uphold rather than defeat it." Jarrett v. Redman, 79 Cal. App. 482, 250 P. 183; Willett v. Schmeiser Mfg. Co. (Cal. App.) 255 P. 529; Booth v. Friedman (Cal. App.) 255 P. 222. "And, if from the facts found other facts may be inferred which will support the judgment, it will be assumed that the trial court made such inferences." Smith v. Armstrong (Cal. App.) 260 P. 347. The findings are such that it is very apparent the trial court properly assumed that the $370 was all paid by Lange before the levy of the attachment. The latter contention is likewise without merit.

[6] Appellant also contends that the judgment erroneously requires the return of certain automobile tires not described in the amended complaint. The amended complaint and the answer thereto describe the property in question as "that certain gasoline and oil station [giving its location] known and designated as the Paramount Station, consisting of [here listing items of personal property] together with all other appliances and equipment of and for said Paramount Station and used with and incidental thereto, including 530 gallons of gasoline." But no automobile tires were therein listed. The findings include 22 Firestone automobile tires of the value of $300 among the items of the property which the court found were owned by, and in the possession of, Lange at the time of the levy of attachment and seized by defendant under the writ and taken from defendant in this action. It is apparent that the tires, like the gasoline, were treated and considered as a part of the equipment of the station, and having taken the tires from defendant in and by reason of this action, plaintiff is not in a position to retain the tires. His contention that they were improperly included among the items of the property he was ordered to return is not well taken.

[7] In his reply brief, for the first time, appellant makes the additional contention that "the findings do not support the judgment for $944.20, or in any other sum, because there is no finding of any indebtedness existing or owing by said J. E. Lange to said Richfield Oil Company, at the time of the attachment or at any other time." All the points which an appellant desires to urge for a reversal should have been presented in his opening brief, and, unless good reason is shown why the points were not made in the opening brief, we are not required to look with favor upon a point so made. Such practice is not fair to a respondent, and tends to delay final disposition of appeals. Therefore the courts of appeal may properly consider the points waived which are not presented in the opening brief. Hibernia Savings & Loan Society v. Farnham, 153 Cal. 578, 584, 96 P. 9, 126 Am. St. Rep. 129; Burns v. Ross, 190 Cal. 269, 275, 212 P. 17; Philbrook v. Randall, 195 Cal. 95, 104, 231 P. 739; California National Supply Co. v. O'Brien, 51 Cal. App. 606, 612, 197 P. 414. No showing is made by appellant in this appeal why the point he urges in his reply brief was not presented in his opening brief and respondent given an opportunity to answer it. Therefore we are not required to consider the point.

ATKINSON v. ADKINS. (Civ. 5194.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 6, 1928.

1. Judgment 🔑900—Statute relating to enforcement does not affect right of judgment creditor within period of limitation to institute action on judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 685).

Code Civ. Proc. § 685, under which plaintiff might have enforced original judgment by execution either before or after lapse of five years from date of entry, and under which plaintiff by supplemental pleading might have renewed judgment without instituting separate action, does not affect right of judgment creditor within period of limitation to institute an action upon his judgment.

2. Pleading 🔑345(1)—In action on judgment, in which defendant admitted judgment was duly made and did not allege payment, court properly granted plaintiff's motion for judgment on pleadings.

In action on judgment, in which defendant admitted that judgment was duly given and made within five years before commencement of action, and answer alleged that defendant was not informed as to whether judgment remained unpaid, and therefore did not allege payment, court did not err in granting plaintiff's motion for a judgment on pleadings, since, prima facie, the judgment was unpaid.

3. Process 🔑63—Action was not barred by estoppel or laches because summons was not immediately served at time of commencing action (Code Civ. Proc. § 336, subd. 1).

Action was not barred by estoppel or laches because summons, which was served within period limited by statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 336, subd. 1), was not immediately served upon defendant at or near time of commencement of action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action on judgment by Lynn S. Atkinson, Jr., against Charles H. Adkins. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James W. Barbee, of Long Beach, for appellant.

H. G. Bittleston and Edward Judson Brown, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Judgment on the pleadings was rendered against the defendant. The complaint, duly verified, which was filed on the 24th day of August, 1923, declared upon a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant Adkins (and the defendant Delaney, who was not served and did not appear in this action), on the 29th day of August, 1918. In his answer appellant admitted that he has not paid the judgment, but "as to whether or not no part of said judgment has ever been paid and/or that said judgment now remains wholly or at all unpaid this defendant is not informed, and this defendant has no information or belief upon the subject sufficient to enable him to answer said allegation, and, placing his allegation upon that ground, denies the same." As a separate defense appellant pleaded that the action is barred by the provisions of section 336, subd. 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which prescribes a five-year limitation for action upon a judgment. As a further defense appellant pleaded that the plaintiff is estopped because of laches, in that the summons herein was not served upon appellant until April 25, 1925, although appellant during all of the preceding time while the action was pending was residing and well known to be residing in the city of Los Angeles.

The grounds of appeal are: That appellant's general demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained, for the reason that no cause of action was stated; that the motion for judgment on the pleadings should not have been granted, inasmuch as, in the manner hereinabove stated, the defendant denied that no part of the judgment has been paid, and denied that the judgment remains wholly or at all unpaid; that respondent is estopped by reason of laches and delay in the prosecution of the action.

[1] Section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

> "In all cases the judgment may be enforced or carried into execution after the lapse of five years from the date of its entry, by leave of the court, upon motion or by judgment for that purpose, founded upon supplemental pleadings. * * *"

It is the contention of appellant that because the plaintiff might have enforced his original judgment by execution either before or after the lapse of five years from the date of its entry, or by supplemental pleading might have renewed the judgment without instituting a separate action, the right to institute a separate action is by law superseded and denied. We think that there is no merit in this point. Section 685, Code of Civil Procedure, deals only with the method of enforcing a judgment, and especially the method of enforcing a judgment after the right to institute a new action has become barred. The section does not either directly or by implication affect the right of a judgment creditor, within the period of limitation, to institute an action upon his judgment.

[2] With regard to appellant's claim that his answer raised an issue which entitled him to go to trial upon the matter of nonpayment of the judgment, we are of the opinion that, the existence of the judgment being admitted, and in the absence of any plea of payment, there was no fact undetermined, and on the face of the record the plaintiff was entitled to judgment. In Janeway & Carpender v. Long Beach, etc., Co., 190 Cal. 150, 211 P. 6, the defendant admitted the existence of a certain obligation to pay money, and denied the allegation of nonpayment. Judgment on the pleadings was granted, and the defendant appealed. The Supreme Court, after noting the denial as above stated, said:

> "But the admissions of the other essential allegations of the complaint established the proposition that the defendant owed this sum of money to plaintiff for the goods sold to him. When that is established the rule of law is that it then devolves upon the defendant to prove the payment thereof. Melone v. Ruffino, 129 Cal. 518, 62 P. 93, 79 Am. St. Rep. 127. Consequently the plaintiff might have rested its case upon the pleadings, and awaited the introduction of proof of payment of this count, or part hereof by the defendant."

The court then said that if it was technically erroneous to grant the motion for judgment on the pleadings, the error was cured by certain subsequent stipulations. The court did not definitely say that the granting of the motion was erroneous, but affirmed the judgment because on the entire record it was considered to be a case within the scope of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, because evidently there was no miscarriage of justice.

In Melone v. Ruffino, 129 Cal. 514, at 518, 62 P. 93, 94 (79 Am. St. Rep. 127), the court said:

> "Where a plaintiff has proved the existence of a debt sued on—at least, within the period of statutory limitation—the burden of proving payment is on the defendant. That this is the rule at common law no one can doubt; and we have no statutory law changing it. Greenleaf states it as follows: 'The defense of payment may be made under the general issue, in assumpsit; but, in an action for debt on a specialty or on a record, it must be specially pleaded. In either case the burden of proof is on the defendant, who must prove the payment of money, or something accepted in its stead, made to the plaintiff, or to some person authorized in his behalf to receive it.' In Cowen & Hill's Notes to Phillips on Evidence, vol. 1, side page 810, the authors, quoting from an authority and citing others, give the rule in this language: 'The principle that he who alleges himself to be the creditor of another is obliged to prove the fact of agreement upon which his claim is founded, when it is contested; and that, on the other hand, when the obligation is proved, the debtor who alleges that he has discharged it is obliged to prove the payment, is clearly one of those propositions in which every system of jurisprudence must concur in general, whatever particular rules may be adopted, as to the mode and form of the allegations, by which the necessity of such proof is to be determined.' The same rule has been recognized and declared frequently in this state."

See, also, Miller & Lux v. Dunlap, 28 Cal. App. 313, 152 P. 309.

In the case at bar the action is "on a record"—that is to say, on a judgment. It being admitted that the judgment was "duly given and made" within five years before the commencement of this action, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment thereon in this action, unless the defendant alleged and proved payment, or some other valild defense. The answer as made herein did not allege payment. Prima facie, the judgment was unpaid. In such state of the pleadings, the court did not err in granting the motion for judgment on the pleadings. Moreover, there is no suggestion that the defendant, either by answer or in resisting the motion, asked to be permitted to prove payment.

[3] The answer is wholly insufficient as a plea of estoppel. We are not aware of any rule of law or of equity which permits an action to be barred by estoppel or laches merely because a summons which was served within the period limited by the statute, was not immediately served upon the defendant at or near the time of commencement of the action.

It appearing that the appeal has been taken for purposes of delay, it is ordered that the judgment be affirmed, and that respondent recover his costs of appeal together with added damages in the sum of $50.

PIGG et ux. v. KELLEY et ux. (Civ. 5463.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 31, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 30, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⚷694(1)—Where evidence was wholly documentary and documents were set out in findings, appeal was determinable from brief containing judgment roll without evidence.

Statement of evidence was not required to be printed in brief on appeal, where evidence was entirely documentary and entire judgment roll was printed, including findings which set out all the documents.

2. Landlord and tenant ⚷214—Provision in lease acknowledging receipt of rent in advance held not affected by subsequent provision that part of amount was retained as forfeiture in case of breach of condition.

Provision in lease acknowledging receipt of payment "representing the first and last two months' rent paid in advance" held not altered or affected by later provision that part of the amount was to be retained by the lessors as a forfeiture if the terms of the lease were violated, since lessor may retain rent paid in advance, on lessee's breach of condition, without any provision to that effect.

3. Landlord and tenant ⚷214—Rents paid in advance are not recoverable after termination of lease through tenant's fault.

Rents paid in advance cannot be recovered by the tenant upon the termination of the lease for condition broken, where such termination is not brought about by the wrongful act of the landlord.

4. Landlord and tenant ⚷214—Provision for forfeiture of advance payments of rent is void if constituting attempt to fix damages in advance.

Provision in lease for forfeiture of part of amount received as advance payment of rent on breach of condition is void if constituting attempt to fix damages for breach of contract in advance.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⚷196—Contract for sale and escrow instructions were considered together in determining whether vendor assigned purchaser advance payments of rent (Civ. Code, § 1642).

Contract for sale, buyer's escrow instructions, and rent statement to which escrow instructions referred were considered and construed together to ascertain whether vendor assigned rents paid in advance in connection with assignment of lease to purchaser under Civ. Code, § 1642.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⚷196—Purchaser held not entitled to advance payments of rent made vendor by tenant, under escrow instructions prorating rent based on rent statement which failed to provide for such payments.

Purchaser held not entitled to recover rent paid in advance by vendor's lessee covering last two months of term, where escrow instructions called for prorating rents based on rent statement, which failed to provide for assignment to purchaser of the advance rents paid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by Frederick W. Pigg and wife against Freeman McG. Kelley and wife for rents claimed to be due under a lease. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Sidney J. Parsons, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Evans, Pearce & Campbell, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. [1] The defendants appeal from a judgment against them. The record on appeal was prepared under sections 953a et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appellants have printed in their brief the entire judgment roll, but nothing purporting to be a statement of the evidence. However, the respondents concede that the evidence was entirely documentary and that all of the documents are set out in the findings, and hence we conclude that the parts of the record printed in appellants' brief are sufficient for a determination of the appeal.

To state very generally the nature of the controversy, this action was brought by the plaintiff Carrie D. Pigg, as purchaser of certain real property on which a lease was outstanding at the time of her purchase, to recover from the defendants, who were the sellers, rents which defendants had received under the said lease prior to the sale, and which said plaintiff claims under the provisions of the agreement of sale. From the findings the following facts may be gleaned: On May 1, 1922, the defendants, as owners of the real property above mentioned, made a written lease thereof to Leo Kanner and Aaron Gershen for a term of five years, at the rental of $16,800, payable in monthly installments of $200 per month for the first year and $300 per month for the last four years. The lease contained the following provision:

> "Receipt is hereby acknowledged of the payment of $800.00, representing the first and last two months' rent paid in advance; $600.00 of said amount to be retained as a forfeiture by the parties of the first part if the terms of the lease are violated."

[2-4] The object of this action is to recover the sum of $600 mentioned in the quoted provision of the lease. Although the plaintiffs in their complaint alleged that said sum was a payment of rent, on this appeal they contend that it was a deposit by way of security, and that since it is such security, and they have taken an assignment of the lease and agreed to perform all of the lessor's covenants, they are entitled to the security. Defendants admitted by their answer, and still contend, that this $600 was an advance payment of rent. It thus appears that there was no issue raised as to the nature of this payment—notwithstanding which, the court in its findings declared that said sum of $600 was paid as security for the faithful performance of the conditions of the lease. But since the entire lease was copied in the findings, this statement must be regarded as a mere legal conclusion, setting forth the opinion of the court as to the construction of the lease. We think the construction so adopted is erroneous. The provision of the lease is that the $600 is "rent paid in advance." This provision is not altered or affected by the later provision that it is to be retained by the lessors as a forfeiture if the terms of the lease are violated. Without the latter provision the lessors would be entitled to retain any advance payment of rent if the tenants' violation of the lease led to a termination thereof. "Rent paid in advance cannot be recovered by the tenant upon the termination of the lease for condition broken, when such termination was not brought about by the wrongful act of the landlord." Wetzler v. Patterson, 73 Cal. App. 527-532, 238 P. 1077, 1078. To the same effect see Curtis v. Arnold, 43 Cal. App. 97, 184 P. 510. If the provision as to forfeiture was intended to go further than this, it is void as an attempt to fix in advance the damages for a breach of contract. Green v. Frahm, 176 Cal. 259, 168 P. 114; Wetzler v. Patterson, supra. These provisions of the lease are much like those under consideration in Wetzler v. Patterson, where it was held that the lease provided for the payment of rent in advance and that the provision as to forfeiture was inserted merely to declare the result which the law would work in case of an advance payment of rent. The difference between the two leases is merely that in the case last cited the advance payment was included in a specified sum to be paid upon the execution of the lease, with a subsequent provision that it should be credited upon the rental due for the last three months of the term, and there was no other express provision for payment of rent for the last three months; whereas here the provision was for rent to be paid at fixed rates upon the 1st day of each month of the term, with a subsequent provision that the rent for the last two months is paid in advance. This difference is not sufficient to require a different construction of the two leases.

[5, 6] Adopting this construction of the lease, we turn our attention to the facts upon which plaintiff claims the right to recover this $600 payment. On August 21, 1923, the plaintiff Carrie D. Pigg and the defendants entered into an agreement by which said plaintiff agreed to buy and defendants to sell the real property above mentioned, "subject to a lease of record executed by Freeman McG. Kelley and wife in favor of Leo Kanner and Aaron Gershen, dated May 1, 1922, the vendee herein assuming all conditions and terms in said lease which have been heretofore assumed by the lessor herein." On the same date the same parties gave certain written escrow instructions to the Glendale State Bank regarding this sale. The instructions given in behalf of the buyer contained the following provision:

> "Subject to leases of record which I am to approve. I understand said leases are made in favor of my grantors and you will hold for me an agreement whereby my grantors agree to assign all their interest in said leases to the above grantee when the deed to said grantee is filed, and that all rents collected under said leases are to be paid to said grantee from Aug. 21, 1923. Prorate insurance as of August 21, 1923. Prorate rents as of August 21, 1923, based on rent statement handed you by my grantors."

The agreement and the escrow instructions show by their terms that they relate to the same sale and the instructions refer to the agreement; hence these several instruments must be considered and construed together to ascertain the whole contract between the parties (Civ. Code, § 1642), and the clause just quoted from the instructions must be taken as a part of that contract. The contentions of the respective parties here are based on differing constructions which they give to this clause. The last sentence, calling for rents to be prorated, must, of course, be read with the preceding provision that rents are to be paid to the grantee. It appears to us that these two provisions are merely different statements of the same intent, and that both are qualified by the words, "based on rent statements handed you by my grantors," found in the later provision. The question at once arises, what rent statement is thus referred to? Looking further into the findings we discover that on August 15, 1923, the defendants, who are the grantors referred to in the escrow instructions, "submitted a rent statement, as called for by the escrow agreement, into the said escrow at Glendale State Bank."

Following this statement in the findings is a document dated August 15, 1923, which begins with a receipt for $1,000 as a first payment on the sale of the property already mentioned, after which, under the heading, "Rent Statement," is a schedule signed by defendant Freeman McG. Kelley, listing eight rooms or apartments, with the name of the tenant, the amount of rent, and the date to which rent is paid, stated after each, the statement as to the property subject to the lease above mentioned being "Store, Tanner, rented at $300 per month, paid to September 1, 1923." To our minds this statement is clearly the document referred to in the escrow instructions. It had already been delivered into the escrow and was therefore before the parties when the escrow instructions were given. It is exactly such a document as the instructions called for, and while it is signed by only one of the defendants, yet, according to the findings, it was submitted by "the defendants," and the one who signed it was acting for both defendants in giving the escrow instructions. This instrument must therefore be referred to in order to ascertain what rents are to be prorated and paid to the plaintiffs. Looking at it we find that the rents sued for are not mentioned, and hence plaintiff is not entitled to recover them.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered.

PHELAN et al. v. DRESCHER et al.
(Civ. 3450.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 2, 1928.

1. Boundaries 🔑48(6)—Acquiescence of adjoining landowners in fence and occupancy of disputed strip held not to prevent determination of true line, where there was no agreement that fence should be dividing line.

Acquiescence of adjoining landowners in location of division fence and occupancy of disputed strip by defendants and their predecessors in title for 54 years held not to prevent establishment of true boundary other than that acquiesced in, in action to quiet title, where there was in fact no agreement that the fence should be the dividing line between the properties.

2. Boundaries 🔑37(5)—Evidence held to sustain finding of absence of agreement on fence as dividing line, in action between adjoining landowners to quiet title.

In suit between adjoining landowners to quiet title to disputed strip after acquiescence in division fence and occupancy over long period, evidence that the true line was straight, whereas the fence was irregular and built to avoid overflow of river, and that defendants' predecessors admitted it was not the true line, held to sustain court's finding that there was no agreement between the property owners that the fence should be the dividing line.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Weighing of conflicting evidence is function solely for trial court.

Weighing of conflicting evidence is a function exclusively for the trial court sitting as a jury, and is not within the province of the reviewing court.

4. Adverse possession 🔑66(2), 89—Defendants occupying land under agreement as to division fence could not claim title by adverse possession, where they failed to pay taxes and there was no agreed dividing line.

In suit to quiet title between adjoining property owners, defendants who occupied property in dispute under agreement as to division fence were not entitled to claim the land by adverse possession, where they failed to pay taxes thereon, and where there was in fact no agreed dividing line.

5. Adverse possession 🔑112—One claiming title by adverse possession has burden to prove all necessary elements.

There are no equities in favor of one claiming title by adverse possession, but claimant must prove all the necessary elements to establish his right.

6. Adverse possession 🔑19, 20, 21—Defendants, claiming adverse possession under old statute, were required to prove protection of disputed property by substantial inclosure, or cultivation and improvement (Code Civ. Proc. § 325, prior to amendment of 1878).

Defendants, claiming title by adverse possession under Code Civ. Proc. § 325, prior to the amendment of 1878, which did not require payment of taxes, were required to show that strip of land claimed was either protected by substantial inclosure or was cultivated and improved for a continuous period of five years.

7. Adverse possession 🔑19—Inclosure under claim of adverse possession must involve complete inclosure of land by fences alone or in conjunction with natural barriers.

To constitute inclosure necessary for adverse possession, lands must be completely inclosed by fences or by combination of fences with natural barriers.

8. Adverse possession 🔑27—Defendants, who failed to prove inclosure of land, except on one side, or cultivation or improvement thereof, failed to show title by adverse possession (Code Civ. Proc. § 325, prior to amendment of 1878).

Defendants, who merely showed inclosure of land claimed on one side and who failed to show that land was cultivated or improved, were not entitled to property on ground of adverse possession, under Code Civ. Proc. § 325, prior to amendment of 1878.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action to quiet title by James D. Phelan and others against P. C. Drescher and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

William E. Kleinsorge, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Bond & Deirup, of Chico, for respondents.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. Plaintiffs brought this action to quiet title to about 24 acres of land in Butte county, and to establish the dividing line between their lands and those of defendants. The defendants answered, asserting title by adverse possession to the land claimed by plaintiffs, and alleging that the dividing line between their lands is different than that claimed by plaintiffs. Defendants also allege in their answer that plaintiffs' claims are barred by the various provisions of the statute of limitations.

Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiffs, from which judgment defendants prosecute this appeal.

The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury. The court found, among other things, that the true and correct dividing line between the lands of plaintiffs and defendants is as claimed by plaintiffs, and that plaintiffs owned the land in dispute, and it is north of this dividing line, and that defendants owned the land to the south of said line. The court further found in favor of the plaintiffs on the issues of adverse possession, agreed boundary, and the bar of the statute of limitations.

Appellants contend that these findings are not supported by the evidence.

The first question to be determined, therefore, is the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding of the court that no agreed boundary line was ever established. There is no direct evidence that there was, or was not, such an agreement, and the question must be determined by the conduct of the respective owners of the lands, viewed in the light of the surrounding circumstances.

The sole purpose of this action was to determine the ownership of a triangular strip of land, containing about 24 acres, which plaintiffs claim lies within the south boundary of their land, and which defendants claim lies within the north boundary of their land. Prior to September 10, 1868, one D. M. Reavis owned more than 10,000 acres of land, lying on the east bank of the Sacramento river, in the county of Butte, and was known as the "Farwell rancho." On September 10, 1868, D. M. Reavis conveyed a portion thereof, consisting of more than 2,000 acres, to John W. Bowers, the predecessor in interest of the appellants. The land conveyed to Bowers was more or less covered with brush and oak trees; only a part of it being cultivated. In the year 1871 John W. Bowers constructed a fence along the north boundary of his land, and from the date of its acquisition by him, in 1868, until 1891, Bowers lived upon the land and farmed a portion thereof. During that period, the Sacramento river at times overflowed its banks, and some portions of the fence were washed away, particularly in the swales or low places. Immediately after the waters had subsided, Reavis and Bowers would repair the fence and place it in its original position. During all the period from 1871 to 1891 Reavis owned the land on the north side of the fence and also north of the true line, and Bowers owned the land on the south side, and, as far as the record shows, at no time during that period was there ever any dispute or controversy of any kind between Bowers and Reavis regarding the fence or its location. The evidence shows that the land in dispute was brushy and in places covered with a heavy growth of trees, and in many places the fence was attached to the nearest tree in the course of the line of the fence, and at other places it was fastened to oak posts, many of which are still to be found in the present fence, although repairs have been made to the fence frequently from the date when it was first built until the commencement of this action, in May, 1925.

On October 1, 1891, the said John W. Bowers sold his land to John Crouch. In 1894 the lands of D. M. Reavis lying on the north side of the Bowers or Crouch land, and constituting the north half of the Farwell rancho, were sold under foreclosure, and by that sale the respondents became the owners of the property of the said D. M. Reavis. The record does not reveal any dispute between Crouch and Reavis regarding the fence or its location. John Crouch farmed his land from 1891 until the 27th of April, 1905, and during that time the strip of land in controversy was cleared of brush and trees and cultivated by Crouch.

The witness Murphy, who had for some 33 years been the superintendent and resident manager of the lands of respondents, testified that in the year 1893 or 1894 John Crouch told him that when he (Crouch) bought the property there was a fence along the north boundary line, and the said Crouch cleared the property to the fence, that he grubbed and cut out the timber on the property to that fence line, and that the said Crouch agreed with him (Murphy) that the true line is as claimed by respondents and found by the court, and that said Crouch further stated "that he might some time go ahead and fix the fence," but that nothing was ever done by either party. Murphy further testified that he took the matter up several times with respondents, but they never did anything, and the said Crouch never did move the fence. Murphy further testified that at times thereafter the fence was repaired and that it was repaired by him and placed where it was originally, and at other times respondents furnished the material for the repairs and appellants did the work of repairing, and each time the fence was put back approximately where it had been originally.

John Crouch died before the time of the trial. On the 27th of April, 1905, said John Crouch conveyed the land to John Crouch Land Company, a corporation, which company cultivated and farmed said land until the 10th of February, 1912, when the said corporation conveyed the property to the appellants herein, who have ever since last-named date cultivated and farmed the entire property.

The witness Henry Bowers, son of John W. Bowers, testified that about 1871 he and his father built a fence along pratically the same line as that occupied by the present fence; that the fence line was put upon high ground, wherever practical, for the purpose of avoiding the damage that would have been done to it by the overflow of the river.

The evidence also shows that the old fence followed the high land and, to strengthen it against overflow, was fastened to trees when they appeared within a few feet of the line of the fence. In recent years the fence has been straightened out so as to run directly through certain swales, or lagoons, rather than around upon the high ground.

The facts necessary to be proven in order that a fence may become an agreed boundary line between two property owners has been the subject of consideration by the Supreme Court and also by this court on numerous occasions, and the decisions on the question are by no means harmonious. In the earlier cases decided by the Supreme Court, notably Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal. 619, the court said:

> "The authorities are abundant to the point that, when the owners of adjoining lands have acquiesced for a considerable time in the location of a division line between their lands although it may not be the true line according to the calls of their deeds, they are thereafter precluded from saying it is not the true line. The better opinion is that the considerable time mentioned in the cases must at least equal the length of time prescribed by the statute of limitations to bar a right of entry."

See, also, Helm v. Wilson, 76 Cal. 476, 18 P. 604; Truett v. Adams, 66 Cal. 223, 5 P. 96; White v. Spreckels, 75 Cal. 610, 17 P. 715; Wheatley v. San Pedro, etc., R. R. Co., 169 Cal. 514, 147 P. 135; Columbet v. Pacheco, 48 Cal. 397; Loustalot v. McKeel, 157 Cal. 642, 108 P. 707.

Under this rule the facts in the case at bar would preclude respondents from saying that the old fence in question is not the true line dividing their lands and those of appellants. But, under the recent decisions of both the Supreme Court and this court, it has been held that the mere acquiescence in the existence of a fence and the occupancy of the land on either side of it does not amount to an agreement that it is an accepted boundary line. See Staniford v. Trombly, 181 Cal. 372, 186 P. 599; Hill v. Schumacher, 45 Cal. App. 362, 187 P. 437; Dauberman v. Grant, 198 Cal. 586, 246 P. 319, 48 A. L. R. 1244; Wilder v. Nicolaus, 50 Cal. App. 776, 195 P. 1068; Raney v. Merritt, 73 Cal. App. 250, 238 P. 767; Cosgrave v. Donovan, 52 Cal. App. 628, 199 P. 808, 810. These last-mentioned authorities hold that, in order to establish an agreed boundary line, the evidence must show more than mere acquiescence and occupancy for the time prescribed by the statute of limitations; it must go farther, and show that the boundary line was uncertain, or believed by all parties to be uncertain, and that the conterminous owners agreed among themselves to fix and establish the dividing line, and that they actually did designate said agreed line upon the ground.

In Clapp v. Churchill, 164 Cal. 745, 130 P. 1062, the court said:

> "But the doctrine of an agreed boundary line and its binding effects upon the conterminous owners rests fundamentally upon the fact that there is, or is believed by all parties to be, an uncertainty as to the location of the true line. When that uncertainty exists, or is believed by them to exist, they may amongst themselves by agreement, fix the boundary line, and that agreement will bind all the consenting parties. Acquiescence is merely evidence of the agreement and can properly be considered as evidence of an agreement only when a formal agreement would itself have made a binding contract."

See, also, Cosgrave v. Donovan, supra.

[1-3] Therefore we have this question squarely presented: Is acquiescence and occupancy of the disputed strip of land for 54 years, under the circumstances above stated, sufficient evidence to overthrow the finding of the trial court that there was no agreement that the fence should be the dividing line between the two properties? We think not. The fact that the true line was a part of the line cutting the Farwell rancho of 10,000 acres into two parts; that it was marked by granite monuments; that it was a straight line, while the fence was irregular and built partly on high ground to avoid the swales and overflow of the Sacramento river; that John Crouch admitted to respondents' superintendent, Mr. Murphy, that the fence was not on the true line, and agreed to move it—are all circumstances against appellants' claim that there was an agreed boundary line. Whether these and other similar circumstances are sufficient to overcome the inference from long acquiescence and occupancy of an agreed boundary, under the other circumstances shown, involves the weighing of conflicting evidence, a function exclusively of the trial court, and is not a question of law within the province of a reviewing court. Under such a situation, we are powerless to interfere with the findings of the trial court.

[4] Appellants have no record title to the strip of land in dispute, and have paid no taxes thereon. The court found there was no agreed line. Therefore appellants are in no position to claim the land by adverse possession, based upon the doctrine that, where an agreed line varies from the true line, a conveyance or payment of taxes according to the original description will be taken to extend to the agreed line and to cover the intervening land. Price v. De Reyes, 161 Cal. 484, 119 P. 893; Young v. Blakeman, 153 Cal. 483, 95 P. 888; Grants Pass Land Co. v. Brown, 168 Cal. 456, 143 P. 754.

[5] Irrespective of the payment of taxes, and the question of an agreed boundary line, appellants contend that John W. Bowers, their predecessor in interest, held the strip of land in question adversely to D. M. Reavis, the true owner, from 1871 to May, 1878, and thereby gained title by adverse possession. The evidence is insufficient to sustain this contention. The payment of taxes was not a necessary element in gaining title by adverse possession under section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure prior to the amendment of 1878. The burden is, however, upon appellants to show that all the requirements of section 325, Code of Civil Procedure as it stood prior to 1871, were fully complied with in order to sustain their claim of adverse possession.

There are no equities in favor of one claiming title by adverse possession; he must prove all the necessary elements to establish adverse possession. Glowner v. De Alvarez, 10 Cal. App. 194, 101 P. 432; Janke v. McMahon, 21 Cal. App. 781, 133 P. 21.

[6] The appellants do not claim under a written instrument, judgment, or decree. It was therefore incumbent upon them to show that the strip of land in question was either protected by a substantial inclosure or was cultivated or improved for a continuous period of five years immediately following 1871.

[7, 8] There is no evidence in the record that there was any fence to inclose the land conveyed to John W. Bowers other than the asserted boundary line fence on the north. Lands must be completely inclosed by fences, or, in proper cases, such fences may be combined with natural barriers. Goodwin v. McCabe, 75 Cal. 584, 17 P. 705; Baldwin v. Durfee, 116 Cal. 625, 48 P. 724; Nathan v. Dierssen, 146 Cal. 63, 79 P. 739; Hibberd v. McCosker, 55 Cal. App. 568, 203 P. 810; Botsford v. Eyraud, 148 Cal. 431, 83 P. 1008. The evidence also shows that the strip of land in question was not usually cultivated or improved; it never had any improvements on it. Before 1878 nearly the entire length of the strip was uncultivated. There was a portion of the tract purchased by Bowers which had trees, but no brush on it, and at some time or other Bowers cultivated this part of his land, but there is no evidence he ever did so before 1878. For these reasons alone appellants' claim of title by adverse possession must fail.

While appellants plead in their amended answer that plaintiffs' right to maintain this action is barred by sections 318 and 319 of the Code of Civil Procedure, no effort was made to sustain this contention. The defense of laches was not raised, either in the trial court or this court; neither was it pleaded.

Under the record presented, we are not authorized to disturb the findings and judgment of the trial court.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

We concur: HART, Acting P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

92 Cal. App. 487

HARVEY et al. v. SAN DIEGO ELECTRIC RY. CO. (Civ. 6327.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 11, 1928.

1. Trial 🔑260(1)—Refusing instruction held not error, where court fully instructed jury on subject.

In action for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff mailing letter on street corner when part of derrick defendant street railway was using in street, broke, and materials fell on plaintiff, refusing instruction that question to be determined was whether defendant acted with due care held not error, where court fully instructed jury on subject.

2. Street railroads 🔑118(1)—Instruction that due care by street railway engaged with tools and materials over thoroughfare was reasonable or ordinary care held properly refused.

In action for damages for personal injuries caused when part of street railway derrick broke, instruction that due care on part of defendant was reasonable or ordinary care held properly refused, where defendant was engaged with tools and materials directly over thoroughfare, since defendant was called on to exercise greatest care and caution in performance of work in such case.

3. Street railroads 🔑118(10)—Instruction that, if defect in tool used over thoroughfare could not have become known to street railway, it was not liable, held properly refused.

In action for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff when material from derrick fell on plaintiff while she was mailing letter, instruction that, if bull-ring on derrick-truck, used by street railway company, and breaking of which caused injury to plaintiff, was purchased from reputable manufacturer, and gave no indication of being unsafe, and defect in bull-ring was screened, and could not have become known to defendant, verdict must be for defendant, held properly refused, since it was incorrect as stating that defendant was not liable, if it used ordinary care under circumstances.

4. Street railroads ⚿118(10)—Instruction that street railway is not liable for damages through latent defects in machinery which could not have been discovered by examination "or tests" held proper.

In action for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by breaking of bull-ring on derrick-truck used by street railway company over thoroughfare, instruction that person is not liable for damages incurred through latent defects in machinery, which could not have been discovered by examination "or tests," held not erroneous on ground that instruction was to effect that, if defect in bull-ring could have been ascertained by any test, practicable or impracticable, defendant was liable in damages for not discovering flaw.

5. Street railroads ⚿118(1)—Instruction that street railroad, using tools and materials over thoroughfare, must exercise greatest care, held not erroneous because derrick extended partly over street and partly over sidewalk.

In action for personal injuries due to breaking of derrick-truck used by street railway company, instruction that party or corporation engaged with tools and materials directly over throughfare where people are constantly traveling must exercise greatest care and caution in performance of work held not erroneous because derrick did not extend over entire sidewalk, but in part extended over street.

6. Trial ⚿296(7)—Instruction that "law presumes" accident arose from defendant's lack of care held harmless error, in view of other instructions.

In action for personal injuries, instruction that, where accident is such as in ordinary course of things does not happen, in absence of explanation, "law presumes" that accident and injury to plaintiff arose from lack of care on part of defendant street railway, held harmless error, in view of other instructions.

7. Street railroads ⚿117(3)—Whether street railway met burden of showing lack of negligence, where pedestrian was injured when derrick broke, held for jury.

In action for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff who got out of automobile to mail letter, when part of derrick defendant street railway company was using in street broke, and materials fell on plaintiff, question whether defendant met burden resting on it to explain how accident happened and to show that it had not been guilty of any negligence held for jury.

8. Street railroads ⚿114(4)—Evidence sustained verdict for plaintiff struck by falling materials when derrick street railway was using in street broke.

In action for damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff when she got out of automobile to mail letter, and was struck by falling materials when part of derrick defendant street railway company was using in street to remove poles broke, evidence held sufficient to sustain verdict for plaintiff.

9. Street railroads ⚿117(17)—Contributory negligence of one struck by falling materials when street railway's derrick broke held for jury.

In action for damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff when she got out of automobile to mail letter on street corner, and was injured by falling materials when part of derrick defendant street railway was using on street to remove poles broke, contributory negligence of plaintiff held for jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action for damages for personal injuries by Henry Harvey and another against the San Diego Electric Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sweet, Stearns & Forward and Elwin L. Eckert, all of San Diego, for appellant.

Alfred T. Roark, of San Diego, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The defendant is the owner and operator of a street railway in San Diego. The cars are operated by electricity, which is conducted by an overhead trolley, and the trolley is supported by poles located on the opposite sides of the streets, including, among others, Broadway. Prior to the 11th day of February, 1925, the defendant used wooden poles to support the wires. About that time it had commenced to substitute metal poles and to take out the wooden poles. Broadway runs east and west. State street intersects Broadway, and runs north and south. On the afternoon of February 11, 1925, at about 3 o'clock, the defendant was engaged in removing a wooden pole at the northeast corner of Broadway and State streets. For that purpose it used a truck having attached to it a derrick not unlike a steam shovel, excepting that the truck-derrick had no shovel attached, but did have appliances for attaching to the wooden poles and lifting and pulling the poles. The truck was backed toward the pole at the corner of Broadway and State, but was located on the north line of Broadway from 8 to 15 feet east of the pole which the defendant's servants were engaged in pulling. The plaintiffs, together with some guests, drove north on State street, and, when they noticed a mail box at the corner of Broadway and State, Mr. Harvey stopped his automobile on the east side of State street and north of Broadway. The automobile was therefore slightly around the corner from the derrick-truck. The corner was built up, and was occupied by the Federal drug store. Mrs. Harvey stepped out of the automobile and returned to the mail box. As she did so, her hand was crushed and bruised by falling missiles. It later was learned that the defendant's apparatus broke, and a part fell on the lamp post, causing metal and glass to fall on Mrs. Harvey's hand. This action was commenced to recover damages for the injuries sustained. The defendant answered, and a trial was had before the trial court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1, 2] Claiming that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applied to the facts, the plaintiffs introduced their case accordingly. In the trial court the defendant made no objection to the procedure, and we do not understand that it makes any objection to that procedure in this court. However, it claims that certain rules of law governing the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur were departed from to the prejudice of the defendant. The first point made in this behalf is that the trial court improperly refused one of its instructions worded as follows:

> "You are further instructed that plaintiffs do not here complain that the servants of the defendant were incompetent or inexperienced, and the only question for you to consider with reference to them is whether on the occasion of the accident they acted with the care and prudence which reasonably prudent men under the circumstances would have exercised."

As we understand the defendant, it contends that the proposed instruction was to the effect that the issue before the court was whether the defendant, at the time and place alleged in the pleadings, acted with due care. Conceding such to have been the meaning of the instruction, the court did not err in not giving it, for the reason that it most carefully and fully instructed the jury on that subject; and, moreover, it confined its instructions to that subject. However, the proposed instruction was so worded as to advise the jury that due care under the circumstances of this case was reasonable or ordinary care. Such is not the law. In Knott v. McGilvray, 124 Cal. 128, 131, 56 P. 789, 790, the court quoted with approval:

> "Respondent's evidence also established a prima facie case of negligence upon the part of the appellant. He was engaged with tools and materials directly over |a thoroughfare where people were constantly traveling and had an undoubted right to travel. Under such circumstances, the law demanded of him more than ordinary care. He was called upon to exercise the greatest care and caution in the performance of his work, in order that travelers might not be injured."

[3] The defendant requested, and the trial court refused to give an instruction worded as follows:

> "You are further instructed that latent defects which are concealed in defective workmanship of a reputable manufacturer are among the casualties which no man can avoid without that extraordinary care and vigilance which the law does not impose. If you believe from the evidence that the 'bull-ring' on the derrick-truck, the breaking of which caused the injury to the plaintiff, was purchased from a reputable manufacturer, and gave no indication of being unsafe up to the time of the accident testified to, and if you find from the evidence that the defect in said bull-ring was screened and unknown to defendant, and by the exercise of ordinary care could not have become known to defendant, then your verdict must be for defendant."

The instruction was clearly incorrect as stating that defendant was not liable if it used "ordinary care" under the circumstances. Knott v. McGilvray, supra.

[4] The defendant requested, and, after adding the last two words, the trial court gave, an instruction as follows:

> "You are further instructed that a person is not liable for damages incurred through latent defects in machinery which could not have been discovered by examination or tests."

The defendant argues that the instruction as given was to the effect "that, if the defect in the bull-ring could have been ascertained by any test, whether reasonable or unreasonable, practicable or impracticable, defendant was liable in damages for not discovering the flaw." The attack is wholly without merit. The same attack could have been addressed to the instruction as tendered by the defendant as well as to the instruction as modified and given by the trial court. The trial court in other instructions most carefully instructed on the degree of care. Reading the instructions together, there was no room whatever for the attack made by the defendant.

[5] The trial court instructed the jury as follows:

> "You are instructed that, where a party or corporation is engaged with tools and materials directly over the thoroughfare where people are constantly traveling and have an undoubted right to travel, under such circumstances the law demands of such party or corporation more than ordinary care. Such party or corporation is bound, under such circumstances, to exercise the greatest care and caution in the performance of his work in order that travelers may not be injured."

The defendant asserts that the instruction should not have been given because the derrick did not extend over the entire sidewalk, but in part extended over the street, and therefore that it did not extend "over the thoroughfare where people are constantly passing, and have the undoubted right to pass." To state the argument is to answer it.

[6] The court instructed the jury as follows:

> "You are further instructed that if, in your judgment, based upon the evidence in this case, it is shown that the instrumentality causing the injury to plaintiff, if any, was under the management and control of the defendant, San Diego Electric Railway Company, a corporation, and that the accident was such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen, in the absence of explanation of said defendant the law presumes that the accident and injury to plaintiff arose from the lack of care on the part of said defendant." (Italics defendant's.)

Both in the trial court and in this court the defendant has made the contention that the instruction was erroneous. Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 116 P. 530; Albert v. McKay & Co., 53 Cal. App. 325, 200 P. 83. Conceding that the instruction, if standing alone, would be erroneous, the slight error was cured in this particular case by the other instructions which were given by the court. When the point was called to the attention of the trial court on a motion for a new trial, the learned trial judge replied as follows:

> "I doubt very much whether I ever gave a set of instructions that there was no error in. The question arises whether or not, if there were any errors, were they prejudicial errors? I can't think for a moment that the court would hold that it was prejudicial error to use 'presumption' instead of 'inference.' The average juror, I think, wouldn't be expected to distinguish between the two. In the ordinary use of the word, outside of court, I think there is very little distinction between 'presumption' and 'inference.'" (Italics ours.)

It is sufficient to state that we fully concur in that comment as applicable to the facts of this case.

[7, 8] After the plaintiffs had rested, the defendant took up the proof and proceeded to introduce evidence showing exactly how the accident happened. In doing so it called an outsider as an expert witness. It also called three of its employees who were operating the derrick-truck when the accident happened. In this manner the defendant introduced evidence tending to prove a bull-ring was used on the derrick-truck; that the bull-ring had been purchased from a reputable house; and that the defendant had not noticed any defect therein. In this behalf the defendant contends that it had made a careful examination. However, an examination of the record does not sustain the defendant in this contention. Some of its employees testified that they had examined the truck, had seen it, had oiled certain parts, etc., but no single witness testified that he had personally examined the ring for the purpose of locating defects, if any, therein. After the above evidence had been given by the defendant's witnesses, the plaintiffs did not call any witnesses in rebuttal. Both in the trial court and in this court the defendant earnestly contended that it had met the burden resting on it to explain how the accident happened and to show that it had not been guilty of any negligence. The point is not a new one. In the recent case, Michener v. Hutton (Cal. Sup.) 265 P. 238, the court said:

> "In view of the authorities, the implied finding of the jury that the appellants had failed in their attempt to rebut the inference of negligence created by the application of said maxim cannot be said to be without support in the evidence. And this despite the uncontradicted testimony of the appellant Goekler tending to show that the top length of pipe as placed and secured by him could not have fallen upon the respondent. For, as stated in Quock Ting v. U. S., 140 U. S. 417, 420, 11 S. Ct. 733, 734 (35 L. Ed. 501): 'Undoubtedly, as a general rule, positive testimony as to a particular fact, uncontradicted by any one, should control the decision of the court; but that rule admits of many exceptions. There may be such an inherent improbability in the statements of a witness as to induce the court or jury to disregard his evidence, even in the absence of any direct conflicting testimony. He may be contradicted by the facts he states as completely as by direct adverse testimony; and there may be so many omissions in his account of particular transactions or of his own conduct, as to discredit his whole story. His manner, too, of testifying may give rise to doubts of his sincerity, and create the impression that he is giving a wrong coloring to material facts. All these things may properly be considered in determining the weight which should be given to his statements, although there be no adverse verbal testimony adduced.'"

Further authorities regarding the conclusiveness of the testimony of the defendant's employees will be found collected in 8 A. L. R. 814–828. As to the conclusiveness of the testimony of the expert, see Spencer v. Collins, 156 Cal. 298, 306, 307, 104 P. 320, 20 Ann. Cas. 49. Bearing these authorities in mind, it follows that the trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion for a directed verdict; nor in denying its motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict; nor in denying defendant's motion for a new trial. Moreover, it is clear that it cannot be said that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict, or that the verdict is against law.

[9] Finally, it is contended by the defendant that the evidence affirmatively shows that Mrs. Harvey was guilty of contributory negligence. The defendant cites certain passages, and specially calls them to our attention, but it does not show wherein Mrs. Harvey was guilty of contributory negligence. No diagrams are before us, but the record shows that, when Mrs. Harvey stepped out of the automobile and returned to the mail box, the truck-derrick was around the corner, and not necessarily within her vision. She testified that she did not see the truck until after the accident happened. There was nothing improbable in this testimony. The implied finding of the jury is to the effect that the jury believed her. There is not a particle of evidence in the record that Mrs. Harvey could have known that the defendant's agents were in the very act of pulling on the pole at the instant that she approached the mail box, nor that she should have seen or known that the defendant had its appliances attached to the pole.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MALONEY. (Cr. 1649.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 2, 1928.

1. Criminal law ⚷1169(1)—Witnesses ⚷359—Admission of commitment for felony, to impeach defendant's testimony, held error but not prejudicial, though judgment should have been presented (Code Civ. Proc. § 2051; Cal. Vehicle Act, § 146).

Where defendant prosecuted for robbery testified that he had not been convicted of felony, judgment showing conviction of felony, should have been presented to impeach defendant under Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, but evidence of commitment to Preston School of Industry, reciting that defendant had pleaded guilty in superior court to violation of Vehicle Act, § 146 (St. 1923, p. 564), a felony, was not prejudicial.

2. Criminal law ⚷1172(1)—Instruction naming prosecuting witness as "Ramola Leon," which witness gave as name without objection, held not injurious error under information naming witness as "Leon Ramola."

Where defendant was charged in information with having committed robbery by taking certain property from "Leon Ramola," and prosecuting witness testified without objection on ground of variance that his name was "Ramola Leon," instruction to convict if jury found defendant feloniously took property from "Ramola Leon" was not miscarriage of justice or error injuring defendant.

3. Criminal law ⚷781(2)—Elaborate and argumentative instruction regarding extrajudicial admissions held properly refused, where defendant admitted only to accompanying party cashing bill similar to one stolen.

In prosecution for robbery in which $50 bill was stolen and only evidence of admission by defendant was testimony of officer that defendant told him he was with a party who cashed a $50 bill, it was not error for court to refuse elaborate and argumentative instruction regarding extrajudicial admissions, in view of paucity of testimony thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Frank Maloney was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Theodore Gottsdanker, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Defendant was tried by a jury and convicted of the crime of robbery. On the night of December 18, 1927, two men entered the room of one Ramola Leon and aroused him from his sleep. One of them carried a revolver which he held against Leon's stomach. Leon was robbed of the sum of $74 and a watch and chain, a $50 bill being part of the money taken. The next morning Leon recognized the defendant in a barber shop as one of the robbers and called the police. At the trial he positively identified defendant as the man who had held the revolver. Officer Steventon testified that the defendant admitted to him that he was with a man who "cashed" a $50 bill at a store after the robbery; that defendant stated that he did not know the name of the man who "cashed" the bill.

[1] The defendant was sworn as a witness, and on cross-examination was asked whether or not he had been convicted of a felony, to which he replied in the negative. Thereupon the court received in evidence what counsel for defendant terms "a certified copy of action No. 29736, in which the defendant was sentenced to Ione." The document was in fact a certified copy of the commitment of the defendant to the Preston School of Industry, in which it is recited that defendant had "pleaded guilty in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Los Angeles, of an offense of violating section 146 California Vehicle Act, a felony, as charged in the information." Defendant now contends that the court erred in admitting this document in evidence. The Attorney General has filed a brief in which he concedes that error was committed, but asks this court to refuse a reversal on the ground that defendant was not prejudiced thereby. He insists that the evidence so conclusively established defendant's guilt that there has been no miscarriage of justice. In conceding error the Attorney General cites the cases of People v. Hoffman, 199 Cal. 155, 248 P. 504, and People v. Adams, 76 Cal. App. 178, 244 P. 106. The facts in those two cases were very different from the facts in the case at bar. In the Hoffman Case the record of the juvenile court was held to be erroneously admitted for the reason that the proceedings in that court are not penal in their character. In the Adams Case the error consisted in the admission of evidence showing that defendant had been committed to the Whittier Industrial School at the age of 13 years. In neither case could it be said that defendant had been convicted of a felony. The commitment which was admitted in evidence in the case now before us did not issue in a proceeding in the juvenile court. Defendant had pleaded guilty to a violation of section 146 of the Motor Vehicle Act. In this section certain acts are described, followed by the statement that any one guilty thereof "shall be deemed guilty of a felony." In People v. Ward, 134 Cal. 301, 66 P. 372, a witness was asked upon cross-examination whether he had been convicted of a felony. It was shown that the witness had been found guilty by a verdict of the jury, but had not been sentenced. The court said:

> "It is contended that at the time the witness testified he had not been 'convicted of a felony'; that to sustain the ruling of the court, it must be assumed, as a matter of law, that the verdict of guilty constituted a 'conviction.' That such verdict does constitute a conviction within the ordinary as well as the technical meaning of the word, seems to be well settled." People v. Kepford, 52 Cal. App. 508, 199 P. 64.

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

Section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a witness may be impeached by "the record of the judgment, that he had been convicted of a felony." In accordance with this section, the proper procedure would have been for the district attorney to present the judgment itself rather than the commitment wherein the plea of guilty is set forth. We think, however, that the criticism is only technical and that the defendant was not prejudiced by the admission in evidence of the commitment.

[2] Defendant is charged in the information with having committed robbery by taking certain property from "Leon Ramolo." The court instructed the jury that if they found that defendant feloniously took the property from "Ramolo Leon" by means of force or fear, they should find defendant guilty. Defendant now contends that the instruction was erroneous and that defendant could not be found guilty unless it was shown that he robbed a person named "Leon Ramolo." The record discloses that when the prosecuting witness was sworn he gave the name Ramolo Leon and that the defendant did not at that time or at any other time make any objection to his testimony on the ground of variance, or call the attention of the court to the error of the district attorney in stating in the information that the witness robbed was named Leon Ramolo. Doubtless if this matter had been brought to his attention the district attorney would have sought and obtained permission to amend the information. We are of the opinion that defendant did not suffer any injury by the error complained of and that there has been no miscarriage of justice on this account.

[3] Defendant complains of the refusal of the court to give the following instruction:

> "The court instructs the jury that evidence has been introduced to show the defendant made certain admissions appearing in evidence. Verbal statements or admissions should be received by you with great caution, as they are subject to much imperfection and mistake, owing to the person speaking not having clearly expressed his own meaning, or the person spoken to not having clearly understood the speaker. It frequently happens, also, that the witness, by unintentionally altering a few words or expressions really used, gives an effect to the statement entirely at variance with what the speaker actually did say. But when such verbal statements are precisely given, and identified by intelligent and reliable witnesses, they are often entitled to great credit."

No evidence was introduced showing an admission on the part of defendant unless it be found in the testimony of officer Steventon, who stated that defendant had told him he was with a party who had "cashed" a $50 bill. It cannot be said that the court erred in refusing to give this elaborate and somewhat argumentative instruction in regard to extrajudicial admissions in view of the paucity of testimony on the subject.

We cannot say that there has been a miscarriage of justice in this case.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

92 Cal. App. 470

PEOPLE v. PECCOLE. (Cr. 1022.)

1. Assault and battery 🔑92—Conviction for assault with deadly weapon held authorized under evidence (Pen. Code, §§ 217, 245).

In prosecution for assault with intent to murder under Pen. Code, § 217, evidence that defendant threatened to get gun and kill prosecuting witness, that defendant returned next day and shot at prosecuting witness, who did not assault defendant prior to firing of shots, together with inconsistent and false statements by defendant of manner in which he received injury sustained in struggle with prosecuting witness, supported conviction of assault with deadly weapon under section 245.

2. Criminal law 🔑706, 1171(1)—Question by district attorney whether witness became hysterical on seeing defendant fire gun in same manner as she became on being asked to identify gun held error but not prejudicial.

Question by district attorney of witness whether she became hysterical on seeing defendant draw and fire gun in same manner as she became on being asked to identify gun as that used by defendant, though error, was not prejudicial to any substantial right of defendant as matter of law, since it afforded defendant opportunity to show that witness' testimony as to events at time of assault was not dependable.

3. Criminal law 🔑382—Collateral matters relevant to issue being tried may be inquired into.

In examination and cross-examination of witness, collateral matters which are relevant to issue being tried made by pleadings may be inquired into.

4. Assault and battery 🔑88—Circumstances of quarrel between prosecuting witness and defendant day before assault held admissible to show occasion for threats by defendant and intent with which act was done (Pen. Code, § 245).

Testimony concerning trouble occurring between prosecuting witness and defendant, convicted of assault with deadly weapon under Pen. Code, § 245, which was direct cause of assault on following day, held relevant to issue as showing occasion for threat by defendant to return and kill prosecuting witness and intent with which defendant's act was committed.

5. Criminal law 🔑351(10)—Testimony of false stories told by defendant to police officers, brought out in rebuttal and as impeachment, held admissible to show motive of assault and to raise inference that defendant feared arrest.

Testimony brought out in rebuttal and as impeachment of defendant regarding false stories told by defendant to police officers of manner in which he received injuries sustained in quarrel with prosecuting witness held admissible to show defendant's motive in assaulting prosecuting witness with deadly weapon and to raise inference that defendant knew of unjustifiable attack and sought to withhold facts under fear of arrest.

6. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Witnesses 🔑370(4)—Question of witness whether she lived as wife of prosecuting witness held proper as affecting credibility of testimony, but exclusion, though error, was not prejudicial under other testimony (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Cross-examination of state witness whether prior to commission of assault by defendant she had been living with prosecuting witness as husband and wife, though not married, held proper as tending to show witness' friendly interest in prosecuting witness, which would bear on question of credibility of her testimony, and exclusion of question, though error, was not prejudicial or miscarriage of justice under Const. art. 6, § 4½, where evidence otherwise showed witness maintained intimate personal relation with prosecuting witness.

7. Criminal law 🔑1170(2)—Exclusion of impeaching testimony held not prejudicial where jury, presumed to believe other testimony, could not reasonably have reached any other conclusion.

Exclusion of cross-examination impeaching witness held not error, though testimony sought to be disclosed would have discredited witness' entire testimony, where jury, presumed to believe other testimony, could not reasonably have reached any other conclusion.

8. Criminal law 🔑1165(1)—Errors to show miscarriage of justice would have to be prejudicial on their face where evidence was convincing of guilt (Pen. Code, § 245).

Where evidence was singularly convincing as to guilt of defendant of assault with deadly weapon under Pen. Code, § 245, errors of themselves or on their face prejudicial to rights of accused would have to be found to show miscarriage of justice.

9. Criminal law 🔑1170½(1)—Error in examining prosecuting witness in rebuttal on same matter testified to in main case held not prejudicial, where result could not have been changed.

Where prosecuting witness in main case denied striking defendant assaulting him, examination in rebuttal on same matter was error but not prejudicial, where evidence of guilt was too apparent to justify conclusion that conviction would not have been obtained but for error.

10. Witnesses 🔑407—Witnesses should not be permitted to reiterate testimony given in main case for prosecution under guise of rebuttal.

It is improper to allow witnesses to reiterate testimony previously given in original case under guise of rebuttal, since testimony should not be emphasized before jury by reiteration thereof after defendant in defense has presented proof tending to contrary effect.

11. Criminal law 🔑720(7)—Argument in assault case suggesting course of conduct by defendant and threats held within evidence, though misstating witness giving testimony (Pen. Code, § 245).

Argument of district attorney in prosecution for assault with deadly weapon under Pen. Code, § 245, suggesting that accused might have procured weapon and subsequently returned to place of assault, to show that defendant had feeling of malice toward prosecuting witness for beating sustained on previous day and had threatened to return with gun, held within theory established by evidence, though prosecuting attorney misstated witness testifying to threat.

12. Criminal law 🔑720(6)—Prosecuting officer may advance any theory in argument which reasonably comes within evidence received.

Prosecuting officer in arguing case for people to jury is entitled to advance any theory of case which may reasonably and fairly come within evidence received into record.

Appeal from Superior Court, Calaveras County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Pete Peccole was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Jos. R. Huberty, of San Andreas, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, Acting P. J. The defendant was accused by an information filed in the superior court of Calaveras county of the crime of assault with intent to commit murder (Pen. Code, § 217), and was convicted of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon (Pen. Code, § 245). He brings his case to this court on an appeal from the judgment of conviction and also from an order denying a motion for a new trial made by him.

It is not claimed by the accused that there is not disclosed by the record evidence sufficient to uphold the verdict. His contention is that the court erred to the serious prejudice of his rights by allowing and disallowing certain testimony, and, further, by certain asserted misconduct of the district attorney in the presentation of the case of the people to the jury; that such errors and such misconduct were of sufficient gravity to require this court to order a reversal, notwithstanding that the verdict stands supported by sufficient evidence.

The facts will be stated herein mainly in narrative form, and, with the exception of such reference to the testimony of the defendant and a witness introduced by him as may be deemed necessary, will be taken from the testimony presented by the people to support the charge. The witnesses upon whose testimony the verdict was in the main evidently founded were R. L. Blackburn, Mrs. Edna G. Blackburn, Mrs. Dorothy Hayes, and William Azevedo, the prosecuting witness. The Blackburns mentioned were husband and wife.

The crime charged in the information was committed in the early evening of December 7, 1927, at a "roadhouse" or public resort situated approximately a mile from the town of Campo Seco, in Calaveras county. The party alleged to have been assaulted is one William Azevedo, who at the time the assault was committed was in possession of and managing said public resort, which, for brevity, will hereinafter be referred to as "the resort" or "the premises." These premises were owned by one Nick Ponzetto. It was through the defendant that Azevedo met Ponzetto and leased from the latter the premises. The house consisted of a large front room, in which customers, when desiring so to do, engaged in the pastime of dancing, and in which also "soft" drinks (and as is to be inferred "drinks" not so "soft") were dispensed, two bedrooms, a kitchen, and a small dining room. The premises were situated a short distance back from a public road and were divided from the road by a fence with a gate of sufficient width to admit of the entrance of the ordinary automobile into the premises from the road. This road extended from Campo Seco to and beyond the premises.

Near the hour of 11 o'clock p. m. of December 6, 1927—the day immediately preceding that on which the assault is alleged to have been committed—the defendant, accompanied by his wife, one Giannotti, and Nick Ponzetto, made his appearance at the resort, having gone there from Campo Seco in his (defendant's) automobile. Present at the resort at that time were the Blackburns, Mrs. Hayes, and Azevedo. There is no testimony that, up to the time that defendant and his party arrived at the resort, there were any but the most amiable and cordial relations existing between the defendant and Azevedo, or any cause for any other character of personal relations between them. However, immediately upon the appearance at the resort of the defendant, his wife, Giannotti and Ponzetto, all the parties began drinking, and, after a few hours thus spent, Mrs. Peccole began to show evidence of being intoxicated. The defendant, observing her condition, took hold of her and started to the point where their automobile was parked on the premises, near and inside of the fence above spoken of. It appears that the other members of the party, including Azevedo, followed the defendant and his wife, going to the spot near which the automobile stood. Mrs. Peccole got into the car, and the defendant, probably enraged because of her intoxicated condition, immediately began beating her about the face and body. Azevedo thereupon rushed to the car, and, placing his hand on the shoulder of defendant, exclaimed, "For ——— sake, cut that out!" While Azevedo and the defendant were engaged in this altercation, Mrs. Peccole jumped from the car and started to walk "up the road," whereupon defendant started after her, and, upon overtaking her, struck her a blow which knocked her to the ground and thereafter struck her several times about her body. Azevedo, observing this, or hearing the sounds of the blows, rushed to the point on the road where the defendant and his wife then were, and, declaring that he would not "stand for any man beating a woman," took hold of defendant and a fight between them ensued. Defendant struck at Azevedo several times, and the latter dealt the former several blows with his fists, finally knocking him (defendant) to the ground. Defendant received several minor injuries about his face and head. The fighting having ceased, the defendant returned to and got into his car, and overtook his wife, who was walking on the road towards Campo Seco. She entered the car, and the two then started in the direction of Campo Seco. Before getting into his car (Mrs. Hayes' testimony), the defendant declared that he intended to procure a weapon and return to the premises and "shoot and kill" Azevedo, to whom the threat was immediately communicated by Mrs. Hayes.

On the following day (the 7th of December) between the hours of 5:45 and 6:30 p. m., Mrs. Blackburn, who, with her husband, at the times concerned herein, was residing at the resort, was in the kitchen of the house, and from there, looking through the kitchen door to the outside, she observed a party, whom at first she did not recognize. When the automobile arrived at the point near the gate to the fence, she saw the driver get out of the car, and, leaving the car, with the motor still running, start toward the house. As the party was approaching the house and on reaching a point sufficiently near thereto to enable her to recognize him as the defendant (darkness then coming on) she closed the kitchen door, and then in a tone of voice loud enough to be heard by Azevedo, warned the latter of the defendant's presence. The defendant was let into the kitchen by Mrs. Blackburn and immediately asked her, "Where is my friend?" explaining to Mrs. Blackburn, upon inquiry by her as to the party he was thus referring to, that he meant Azevedo. At that moment of time Azevedo was in the "front room," or the "dance hall" part of the building. Upon being told by Mrs. Blackburn that the defendant was at the house, Azevedo stepped from the "front room" to his bedroom and procured from under the mattress of the bed his pistol. He opened his shirt and placed and concealed the weapon in the bosom thereof and thereupon stepped from the bedroom to the door between the dining room and the kitchen. Azevedo, proceeding in the direction of the point in the kitchen where the defendant was standing with his hands in the pockets of his trousers, addressed the latter in a friendly way, saying "Hello, Pete." Without replying to that salutation or saying a word, and immediately, the defendant drew a revolver from the right front pocket of his trousers (Mrs. Blackburn's testimony) and fired in the direction of Azevedo, who testified that in his opinion the bullet missed hitting his person by approximately an inch. Azevedo, so he testified, thereupon sprang upon the defendant and "grabbed" him by the wrist of his right hand, in which he (defendant) held his pistol. A struggle between the two men followed. Azevedo (so he testified) "grabbed one arm (of the defendant) about the wrist and the other by the shoulder and give him a twist and threw him on the floor, and I think I had my knee on his hand, the one he had the gun in; then I grabbed him by the throat and choked him and he begin to beg for me not to choke him. * * * I let loose of his throat and he rolled over on his stomach, and he got up kind of on his hands and knees, and I had one hand on his back, and I told him to give me the gun. He didn't do it, so I reached in and got my gun out and took it by the barrel and hit him on the head. I saw he didn't have the gun in his hand; and there was an icebox by the door, and I thought maybe it was under there, and I was watching. Then he reached under the stove and pulled the gun out, and then I hit him a light tap on the head and reached down and took the gun away from him. He got up and then wanted to shake hands. I did. I told him if he behaved himself that I wouldn't say a word to nobody about it. He agreed to the fact. When he was going out the door he said, 'I am going to get another gun and come back.' * * * I unbuttoned my shirt and stuck the gun down in here (indicating his bosom). They said he was going to kill me. I didn't think he would shoot. I didn't want him to know I had the gun if he did not want trouble. * * * I had no coat or vest on that night." Azevedo further testified that he at no time, on the evening of the 7th of December, struck or assaulted the defendant until after the latter fired his pistol, as related.

The Blackburns saw the defendant fire his pistol, and Mrs. Blackburn said she saw the flash reflect upon the body of Azevedo. Mr. Blackburn was at the time putting wood in the stove in the kitchen, but he saw defendant shoot at Azevedo. Both witnesses testified that, instantly upon the shot being fired, Mr. Blackburn grabbed his wife and "hustled" her out of the house, both going together. Neither saw the struggle between Azevedo and the defendant after the shot was fired, but both heard the noise produced by the struggle.

The defendant's testimony of the occurrences in the house was very much different from the story thereof as told by Azevedo and his witnesses. As to the difficulty between Azevedo and the defendant near the gate on the night of the 6th day of December, the witness Giannotti testified that he saw Azevedo follow the defendant to the gate as the latter was taking his wife to his automobile, and heard Azevedo, when the three were near the gate, call defendant a "dago s——n of a b——ch." The witness at the time was between 25 and 30 feet from the gate. It was dark, Giannotti said, and he therefore could not see what was going on between the parties, but that he "heard" Azevedo strike the defendant several blows and saw the latter fall to the ground and Azevedo thereupon return to the house.

The defendant's testimony was to the effect that Azevedo started the trouble on the 7th of December by assaulting him (the defendant) without cause. He said that he went to the resort on the 7th of December merely to learn how the trouble of the night before had occurred and "what it was all about." He admitted, though, that he went there with a loaded pistol on his person and had it in his hand in the house, having drawn it after being struck by Azevedo; but, he continued, while the two were engaged in a struggle after he was knocked to the floor by Azevedo, his weapon was accidentally discharged. In a conversation with an officer of San Joaquin county, the defendant having gone to Stockton on the night of the 7th after the alleged assault was committed, and in a conversation subsequently with the sheriff of Calaveras county, to whose custody he was delivered by the Stockton officer, he made inconsistent statements regarding the manner in which he received his injuries, both of which were confessedly untrue. To the Stockton officer he stated that while traveling "down" a certain road about a mile from Campo Seco, he was intercepted by two men, who "pulled him out of the machine and hit him over the head with a revolver." When asked by said officer if he knew who the parties thus assaulting him were, he replied in the negative. That officer in the same conversation then said: "I will go and call up Sheriff Zwinge (sheriff of Calaveras county); this is a case for Calaveras county," whereupon the defendant said: "Don't call the sheriff." To Sheriff Zwinge, the defendant, in reply to categorically propounded questions by that officer, stated that he received his injuries by being hit "over the head by a fellow"; that he did not know who the party was that hit him, nor why he (such party) hit him; that he was hit by the party on Main street of Campo Seco, near "two vacant lots by the old butcher shop"; that his assailant said nothing to him, but stepped up to him, struck and then choked him; that the party took no money from him; that he had on his person the sum of $1.50 only; that he could not give a description of his assailant.

[1] The officers, upon investigation of the premises and particularly the room in which the shooting occurred, discovered two holes, apparently made by a bullet, in the floor near the spot where Azevedo stood when, as he and the Blackburns stated, the defendant fired the shot. It was also likewise discovered that a bullet had entered and passed through the bottom of the radio stand which stood in the dining room near the door leading therefrom into the kitchen and at which Azevedo appeared upon hearing the defendant ask Mrs. Blackburn where he (Azevedo) was. The table on which the radio stood was 17½ inches in height from the floor. In view of the reduced verdict, it is not important, and therefore not necessary, to attempt to indicate herein, from the sheriff's description of the situation in the room as it appeared after the shooting, the probable course of the bullet after it left the pistol, since it is true that there is ample evidence which shows that the accused fired at the body of Azevedo the instant the latter appeared at the door between the dining room and the kitchen. It may be suggested that it is apparently true from the testimony that, if he took any aim at all, the defendant directed the shot towards the lower part of Azevedo's body, perhaps below the waist; but, as above intimated, conceding that to be the fact, the evidence clearly and abundantly supports the conclusion of the jury, as indicated by their verdict, that the accused was guilty at least of assault with a deadly weapon.

[2] The first assignment of error occurring during the course of the trial is as to the conduct of the people's witness, Mrs. Blackburn, when testifying. In the brief of defendant it is stated that that witness, when shown by the district attorney, for the purpose of identifying it, the weapon with which the defendant assaulted Azevedo, became hysterical, and stated, in response to a question by the prosecutor, that on the occasion of the assault, upon seeing defendant fire his pistol at Azevedo, she was thrown into a like nervous condition. The specific objection is that it was misconduct on the part of the district attorney to ask the witness that question. The record does not show that Mrs. Blackburn became hysterical while she was on the witness stand and giving her testimony, nor does it show what her particular conduct or actions were that caused the district attorney to ask her the question as to the effect upon her upon seeing the defendant draw his weapon and fire the shot on the occasion of the assault. We may judge that, when testifying, she became nervous or excited and betrayed such condition in a noticeable manner. But whatever may have been the nature of her actions on the witness stand, whether due to hysteria or other less demonstrative acts of a supernervous condition, the question asked her by the district attorney whether she was likewise overwrought when she witnessed the near tragedy was improper. If the question were proper under any circumstances, it involved, it seems from defendant's brief, an inquiry more appropriate for the defendant's counsel to have pursued with the view of showing, if thus he could, that the witness' mind, by reason of the nervous state into which she had been thrown by witnessing a near tragedy, was so upset or shifted from its normal poise as to render her testimony of what she claimed to have seen of the trouble not altogether dependable. Brought into the record and before the jury as it was, and assuming that the witness became hysterical upon the witness stand while testifying, and that she was, as she said, in reply to the district attorney's question, thrown into a like condition at the time of the trouble, on seeing defendant with a weapon and shoot at Azevedo, defendant's counsel, if he did not do so in his argument to the jury, thus had opened up to him by the prosecutor an opportunity to treat the incident, if not successfully, so far as the ultimate result was concerned, in a manner favorably to his client's defense. This proposition is so obvious that it would seem that a jury composed of persons of average intelligence would thus view the matter; and for this very reason, if for no other, the error in permitting the district attorney's question to be asked and answered cannot be held, as a matter of law, or at all, to have resulted in prejudicing or militating against any substantial right of the accused in the trial of the case.

[3, 4] The objection that the court erred in allowing, over defendant's objections, the district attorney to show the circumstances of the difficulty between the two men on the 6th of December, is untenable. The contention is that the effect of allowing that testimony was to put before the jury "a collateral issue in the case." The rule as to the examination and cross-examination of a witness upon matters collateral to the issue made by the pleadings is that where such collateral matters are relevant to the issue being tried it is proper to inquire into them. Of course, if the collateral matters have no relevancy to the issue on trial they cannot be gone into or inquired about. In the present case, the trouble occurring between the two men on the 6th of December, as the evidence unquestionably shows, was the origin or direct cause of the assault upon Azevedo by the defendant on the 7th day of December, and therefore testimony showing the circumstances and the nature of the difficulty between the two men on the 6th would obviously involve matters relevant to the issue under trial. Indeed, that testimony had a direct bearing upon the issue before the jury, since thus it was revealed that the defendant had threatened that he would return to the resort and kill Azevedo for the beating the latter had administered to him (defendant). It tended to show that there was occasion for such a threat being made, and further to show that the motive or purpose of defendant's return to the resort on the 7th, armed with a loaded revolver, was to carry out the threat so made. We have yet to learn that, an assault or a homicide having been committed by a party, it is improper to prove that such party at some time previous to the commission of such crime, had threatened to commit it. Such testimony bears directly upon the question of the intent with which the act was done.

[5] The testimony of the officers above mentioned of the representations to them by the accused as to the circumstances under which he received his injuries was properly allowed. The testimony was brought out in rebuttal and as in impeachment of the denial by the accused that he had had any such conversations with the officers. The testimony would have been proper as in proof of an independent fact relevant to the case. As above stated, the defendant told a different story to each officer as to how he was injured, in neither of which did he say that his injuries were the result of a physical combat between him and Azevedo; or that he had had any difficulty with the latter. He certainly had some motive for giving the officers a fabricated account of how he had been injured, and we think the falsity of his stories as so given affords the inference that, being conscious of having committed an unjustifiable attack upon Azevedo, he purposely withheld from the officers knowledge of his visit, with a loaded revolver, to the resort on the evening of the 7th, under the fear that a disclosure of those facts to the officers would be followed by an investigation which probably would result in his arrest and prosecution for the assault. Undoubtedly, had he honestly believed, as he undertook to show at the trial of his case, that he was not in the wrong in the trouble between him and Azevedo on the evening of the 7th of December, he would have unhesitatingly told the officers the truth of how he was beaten and bruised about the head and face. This view of the defendant's false representations of the circumstances under which he received his injuries is, in no slight degree, reinforced by the fact that, when the Stockton officer, on hearing the story of the accused, stated, in the presence of the latter, that the case was one for the Calaveras county authorities and that he (the officer) would call Sheriff Zwinge of that county on the phone and give him information regarding the assault, he (defendant) protested against calling Zwinge or giving him any information about the matter. The foregoing, we think it clear from a consideration of the entire affair as the record here reveals it, is a fair and reasonable and, indeed, the only rational interpretation of the motive of the accused in giving to the officers false accounts of how he was injured, and we may therefore well assume that such was the view the jury took of the untruthful representations of the circumstances under which he received his injuries. Being rationally subject to such interpretation, the testimony of the officers that the accused had given to them untruthful accounts of how he was injured was properly allowed.

[6, 7] On cross-examination of the people's witness, Mrs. Hayes, counsel for the defendant asked her whether she and Azevedo were, and for some time prior to the commission of the assault charged in the information, had been, living together as husband and wife, notwithstanding that they were not and never had been husband and wife. The court sustained the district attorney's objection to the question, and erred in so doing. The inquiry was proper as tending to show that the witness cherished a friendly interest in Azevedo which would bear upon the question of the credibility of her testimony. People v. Souleotes, 27 Cal. App. 288, 289, 149 P. 802; People v. Crandall, 125 Cal. 129, 136 et seq., 57 P. 785, concurring opinion of Justice Temple, in which Justice Henshaw and Chief Justice Beatty joined. But it is not made to appear that from that ruling the defendant suffered prejudice to any of his substantial rights at the trial. In fact, it is quite clear from the general situation of affairs as to these parties, as the record shows it, that the jury could readily acquire the impression—a strong impression—that Azevedo and Mrs. Hayes maintained intimate personal relations with each other while they resided at the resort and even prior to the time at which Azevedo leased the premises from Ponzetto. They went to Campo Seco together in an automobile and were together when Azevedo first told the defendant that he was desirous of renting the resort. They were together when the contract of lease was executed and Azevedo thereupon put in possession of the premises. From the time such possession was taken by Azevedo until the evening of the assault both resided at the premises and occupied rooms in the house. From all these circumstances, the jury could make no mistake in concluding that the two were practically maintaining between themselves the relation of husband and wife. At any rate, it could not have been a matter of serious difficulty for the jury to discern, upon all the circumstances mentioned, that there existed between the two an uncommonly strong tie of personal friendship, naturally sufficient, if so she was disposed, to lead her so to magnify the conduct of the defendant on the occasion of the shooting as to make it appear to the jury that he was not only the aggressor in the combat, but that whatever part Azevedo took in the affray was required of him for his own protection against injury or death at the hands of the former. Thus the defendant lost no benefit or advantage of which otherwise he would have been deprived by the erroneous ruling foreclosing his right to inquire of Mrs. Hayes whether she and Azevedo were maintaining and for some time prior to the date of the assault had maintained, practically, the relation of husband and wife. But further may it be stated that if the cross-examination interdicted by the ruling now under consideration had been permitted and the fact thus sought to be elicited had been disclosed, either through the cross-examination or later by impeaching testimony, and the witness' testimony thereby wholly discredited, the jury, believing the other testimony, as it is to be presumed that they did, could not reasonably have reached any other conclusion than that evidenced by their verdict. Certainly, in view of the testimony referred to, and which has been hereinabove reviewed, it cannot properly be held that the ruling now under consideration resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

[8] There are several other assignments involving attacks upon the rulings of the court relative to the evidence. These we will not take the time specifically to consider herein. We have carefully examined the assignments. Some of them are without a foundation, legally, to support them. Others, even if exposing errors, are not of sufficient gravity to call for a reversal. There can hardly be any doubt from the evidence that the defendant went to the resort on the evening of the 7th day of December with the deliberate purpose of assaulting or killing Azevedo. He admitted that on the 6th of December Azevedo struck and beat him, and claimed that the act of Azevedo in thus attacking him was wholly without cause or justification. That for the punishment inflicted upon him by Azevedo he conceived and nourished a bitter grievance against Azevedo was quite natural, and, indeed, cannot well be questioned upon a consideration of the view which he (defendant) thought he was justified in taking of the circumstances under which the punishment was administered. He threatened to procure a weapon, return to the resort, and avenge the wrong to which he firmly believed Azevedo had without just cause subjected him, and he did return, with a loaded revolver on his person, to the resort. This fact itself, it may be suggested, corroborates the testimony of Mrs. Hayes that, on the night of the 6th, he made the threat that he would procure a weapon and return to the resort for the purpose of killing Azevedo. Errors in and of themselves or upon their face prejudicial to the rights of the accused would have to be found in this record to compel the conclusion that, in the face of the singularly convincing evidence of the guilt of the defendant as disclosed by the record, and as pointed out herein, a miscarriage of justice had been thereby produced; and we have found here no such errors.

[9, 10] There are several assignments of misconduct on the part of the district attorney in the trial of the case which it is claimed worked prejudice to the rights of the accused. Two of these assignments only we deem worthy of special notice herein. The first which may be considered arises from the act of the prosecuting officer in recalling in rebuttal the principal witnesses for the people, and, against the objection of defendant, causing them to repeat in part the testimony they had given in the people's original case. The defendant, testifying in his own behalf, stated that Azevedo started the fight on December 7th by striking him (defendant) on the head with a revolver; that up to that time he had made no threat of bodily injury upon the person of or hostile demonstration towards Azevedo. As in rebuttal, the district attorney recalled Mr. and Mrs. Blackburn and Azevedo to the witness stand and asked them if the last named, before the defendant fired at him or displayed any purpose to assault him, struck the accused about his head or body with a revolver. The same question was asked the same witnesses in the people's original case, and the answer of each was, as was the answer of each to the same question when called in the purported rebuttal, that Azevedo made no such assault or any assault on the defendant until the latter fired the shot. It is improper to allow witnesses to reiterate the testimony previously given by them in the original case of the people "under the guise of rebuttal." People v. Van Ewan, 111 Cal. 144, 149, 43 P. 520. The reason for the rule is, obviously, that testimony tending to show the guilt of the accused, having been properly and necessarily received in the presentation of the people's original case, should not, in fairness to the defendant, be emphasized before the jury by a reiteration thereof by such witnesses after the defendant in his defense has presented proof tending to a contrary effect. But the error in permitting that course to be adopted by the district attorney in this case is not of such seriousness as to require a reversal. The evidence of guilt, as stated and shown hereinabove, is too apparent to justify the conclusion that a conviction would not have been obtained but for that error. The case of People v. Van Ewan, supra, cited by the defendant, was reversed, but not because of the like error committed therein.

[11, 12] The other assignment of misconduct on the part of the prosecuting officer to be considered occurred in the course of his argument to the jury, and the particular language of that officer which defendant condemns as misconduct is the following:

> "Mr. Peccole was able after the shooting that night and after this choking and after these beatings over the head to get up and go out and get into his automobile, start his car, and leave. Mr. Blackburn tells us that Peccole's car passed him with Peccole in it as he was going to town for help upon the hill by the cemetery. Mr. Peccole says he didn't go into Campo Seco. Very well—not a great deal of importance, but if Mr. Blackburn is telling us the truth Mr. Peccole went into town; his gun had been taken away from him by Azevedo. If he (referring to defendant) had come there that night to get Azevedo with a gun and he was still able to go about and use his strength and drive his car, as he tells us, would not the first thing that he would want to do, was to do as Mrs. Blackburn said he stated he would do—go and get another gun and come back. I say to you that Mr. Blackburn, I think, was telling us the truth, and Mr. Peccole's car went on into town and he was on his way perhaps for another gun; that then it was that he came back; perhaps he went back there that night. We don't know. The other witnesses left; they came to Valley Springs and swore out a complaint."

The criticism of the foregoing language specially stressed by counsel for the defendant is that there is no evidence to be found in the record which warranted it. Mrs. Blackburn, in narrating such of the circumstances of the fight between the two men on the 7th as she witnessed, did state that she heard the defendant, as he was leaving the house after the trouble had ceased on that occasion, "make the remark that he was going to get another gun and come back and get him," referring to Azevedo; but that portion of her testimony was stricken from the record on the motion of defendant's counsel. But Azevedo testified that he heard defendant make such a threat as he was departing from the house, and that testimony remained in the record. Of course, so long as the testimony was before the jury it could make no difference as to the person giving it, in so far as may be concerned the arguments of counsel for the parties before the jury. The theorizing by the district attorney as to what the defendant might have done after he left the premises on the 7th, thus suggesting that the accused might have procured a weapon and later on that night returned to the resort, involved merely one of those speculative suggestions which are often justified, as is true here, by the general facts and circumstances of the case as they are shown by the evidence. In this instance the district attorney, in advancing the suggestion referred to, was evidently endeavoring to impress upon the jury the proposition that, from the time he was beaten and bruised by Azevedo on the 6th up to the night of the shooting, the accused carried in his heart and mind for and towards the latter a feeling of malice and a determined purpose to gratify such feeling. There is evidence in the case which clearly authorizes that theory, and the testimony of Azevedo that defendant did make the threat referred to constituted a sufficient predicate for the theory advanced by the prosecutor as indicated in his remarks before the jury objected to here. It will be borne in mind that Azevedo testified that he, Mrs. Hayes, and the Blackburns left the premises immediately after the shooting and did not return thereto that night, the implication from that testimony being that those parties feared further trouble from the accused. But be that as it may, it is clear that the remarks of the prosecutor complained of here were well within the general theory of the case as it was established by the evidence. A prosecuting officer, in arguing a case for the people to the jury, is entitled to advance any theory of the case which may reasonably and fairly come within the evidence received into the record. Upon this proposition, see the following cases: People v. Glaze, 139 Cal. 154, 72 P. 965; People v. Rossi, 37 Cal. App. 778, 782, 174 P. 916, 918; People v. Swigart, 80 Cal. App. 31, 47, 48, 251 P. 343; People v. Piazza, (Cal. App.) 257 P. 592.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

MURPHY v. AGEN. (Civ. 5206.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 9, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 6, 1928.

Usury ⇐32—Amount added to price of automobile to one purchasing on monthly installments held not to render contract usurious; "forbearance" (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii; Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757).

Amount added to price of automobile purchased on monthly installments, which was made a part of the purchase price, was not paid on account of forbearance in relation to installments provided for by the contract and was not an exaction of interest or charges in the nature of interest so as to permit purchaser's recovery of penalty under Usury Law (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii; Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757); "forbearance" being the act by which the creditor waits for payment of debt due him by debtor after it has become due.

George M. Cook, of Taft, for appellant.

Brittan & Brittan and O. V. Anderson, all of Bakersfield, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover the sum of $440.37, alleged to be three times the amount of interest paid by him to the defendant on a contract in violation of the Usury Law (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii). After the defendant had filed an answer denying the principal allegations of the complaint, each party moved for judgment on the pleadings. The plaintiff's motion was denied, and defendant's motion was granted, and judgment thereupon entered that plaintiff take nothing. The plaintiff appeals.

The transaction between the parties was not a loan of money or other property, nor was it anything in the nature of a loan. It appears that the Taft Motor Company, Inc., sold to the plaintiff an automobile for a stated price. The written contract, a copy of which is attached to the complaint, provides that the sale shall be for the total price of $1,987.24, of which $550 was paid at the signing of the contract and the remainder was payable in certain monthly installments. The only provision of the contract referring to interest is a provision for interest in the event of default in the payment of any installment. It appears that all installments were paid in full, either to the Taft Motor Company, Inc., or (after assignment of the contract to defendant) to the defendant Agen. Nevertheless in his complaint the plaintiff alleged that the actual price of the automobile, together with certain accessories and including an item of $66.50 for insurance, amounted to only the sum of $1,840.45, and that the remaining $146.79 which the plaintiff paid was interest on the unpaid installments. And the plaintiff alleged that said sum, when thus treated as interest on the installments, amounted to interest in excess of 1 per cent. per month, and that therefore the interest so paid was an exaction of interest which was in violation of the Usury Law.

From the foregoing statement it is clear that no interest was paid on account of "forbearance" in relation to the installments provided for by the contract. "Forbearance" is "the act by which a creditor waits for the payment of a debt due him by the debtor after it has become due." 2 Bouv. Law Dict. p. 1254. The transaction was not one in which an agreement was made to pay interest upon the loan of any "money, goods, or things in action." It is our opinion that the contract was not one within the scope of the terms or objects of the usury law. Stats. 1919, p. lxxxiii; Deering's General Laws, 1923 Ed., Act 3757. Moreover on the face of the contract itself said sum of $146.79 was a part of the purchase price of the property sold to plaintiff, and was not an exaction of interest or of charges in the nature of interest. The facts alleged in the complaint are not to the effect and do not show directly or indirectly that the contract as drawn was intended to accomplish an evasion of the law against usury, or that it was anything except a sale of personal property for the full stated price thereof. The complaint did not state a cause of action.

The judgment is affirmed.

ANDREWS et al. v. GLICK et al. (Civ. 5049.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 31, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court July 30, 1928.

1. Continuance 🔑48—Dismissal and nonsuit 🔑73—Court concluding statute requiring partnership to file certificate applied held not obligated to take testimony, where pleading fully disclosed firm name (Civ. Code, § 2466).

Court concluding that Civ. Code, § 2466, providing that partnership transacting business under fictitious name or designation not showing names of persons interested must file certificate with clerk of county in which principal place of business is situated, applied to action brought by corporation, held not obliged to hear testimony before denying continuance or entering dismissal, where pleading revealed all in regard to firm name that proof could do.

2. Partnership 🔑64—Statute requiring certificate held inapplicable to action by Andrews and Cordano, doing business under firm name of Andrews-Cordano Plumbing Company; "fictitious name" (Civ. Code, § 2466).

Where action was brought by Harry W. Andrews and Frank Cordano, doing business under firm name and style of Andrews-Cordano Plumbing Company, a copartnership, pending publication of certificate required by Civ. Code, § 2466, for partnerships doing business under fictitious name or designation not showing names of persons interested as partners, held, that statute was inapplicable, since such partnership was not transacting business under "fictitious name" nor "designation not showing names of persons interested as partners."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Fictitious Name.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry A. Hollzer, Judge.

Action by Harry W. Andrews and Frank Cordano, doing business under the firm name and style of the Andrews-Cordano Plumbing Company, a copartnership, against Fannie Glick and others. From a judgment of dismissal as to the named defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

★Superseded by opinion of Supreme Court, 272 P. 587.

Irvin C. Taplin, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Overton, Lyman & Plumb, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. A judgment of dismissal was entered as to defendant Glick. Plaintiffs appeal therefrom.

The title of the cause as to plaintiffs is as follows:

> "Harry W Andrews and Frank Cordano, doing business under the firm name and style of 'Andrews-Cordano Plumbing Company,' a copartnership."

And it is alleged in the complaint:

> "That at all times herein mentioned plaintiffs were and now are copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Andrews-Cordano Plumbing Company."

This allegation is specifically admitted in the answer. At the opening of the trial much discussion was had over the fact that the certificate required by section 2466 of the Civil Code had not been filed, though it was in process of publication. At no time do plaintiffs specifically conceded that they come within the terms of the Code section, but, as they put it in their brief, they sought to comply therewith "as a precautionary measure only." No evidence was introduced upon the merits of the case, but one of counsel for plaintiffs testified as to his and his associate's connection with the case and as to their diligence in the question of filing the certificate. The court refused to grant a motion for continuance until after the required publication had been completed, but ordered a judgment of dismissal as against the defendant Glick. No findings were asked for, offered, or signed, nor were findings waived. The judgment contains the following recital:

> "* * * A trial by jury having been waived, and the plaintiffs and defendant Fannie Glick, through their respective attorneys, having stipulated in open court that said plaintiffs had not filed and published the certificate required by section 2466 of the Civil Code of the state of California, and defendant Fannie Glick having moved for a judgment of dismissal, and the court, being fully advised in the premises, now grants said motion. * * *"

[1, 2] Counsel for appellants contend in their briefs that the court was not possessed of sufficient knowledge of the case upon which to refuse to grant a continuance or to enter the dismissal judgment, and that it was necessary for the court to take testimony or to receive an opening statement of the facts. With this we cannot agree. Viewing the law as the court did, viz. that the section of the Code referred to covers the case, it was not obliged to go forward consuming time vainly. There was no need of taking testimony to reveal the situation, as the pleadings reveal all in regard to the firm name that proof could do. The facts are alleged and admitted, viz. that Harry W. Andrews and Frank Cordano were doing business under the firm name and style of "Andrews-Cordano Plumbing Company," and that no others were associated therein. Sweeney v. Stanford, 67 Cal. 635, 8 P. 444. The real point in the case is: Does section 2466 apply to these admitted facts? We think it does not.

Section 2466, Civil Code, reads as follows:

> "Except as otherwise provided in the next section every person transacting business in this state under a fictitious name and every partnership transacting business in this state under a fictitious name, or a designation not showing the names of the persons interested as partners in such business, must file with the clerk of the county in which his or its principal place of business is situated, a certificate, stating the name in full and the place of residence of such person and stating the names in full of all the members of such partnership and their places of residence. Such certificate must be published once a week for four successive weeks, in a newspaper published in the county, if there be one, and if there be none in such county, then in a newspaper in an adjoining county. An affidavit showing the publication of such certificate shall be filed with the county clerk within thirty days after the completion of such publication."

In analyzing the meaning and intent of this Code section we discover at the outset that there is no "fictitious" name used. Nor is the name "Andrews-Cordano Plumbing Company" a "partnership transacting business in this state under a fictitious name." It is not fictitious at all, but is a real name of the partnership. As was said in Spreckels v. Grace Darling Hospital Ass'n, 28 Cal. App. 646, at page 648, 153 P. 718:

> "The complaint affirmatively shows that the business in which the plaintiff is engaged is that of publisher of a newspaper known as the San Francisco Call. The name of this newspaper is not fictitious, but is as real as the name of a hotel or a building or a steamship, or any other medium of business or article of commerce, which, for convenience or of necessity, should have a particular designation."

And again in Pendleton v. Cline, 85 Cal. 142, 145, 24 P. 659, 660:

> "Nor is there any opposition or contrast between the phrase 'a fictitious name,' and the phrase 'a designation not showing the names of the persons interested.' The latter is supplementary to the former. For instance, if in the case before us Pendleton or Williams was not the real name of either partner, the firm name would be fictitious. But if such names were the true names of the partners, and the firm name was Pendleton & Co., it would not be fictitious, but would be a designation not showing the names of all the persons interested as partners."

The same point is decided the same way in McLean v. Crow, 88 Cal. 644–647, 26 P. 596.

Is the firm name in the instant case, then, "a designation not showing the names of the persons interested as partners in such business"? In our opinion it is not. Heretofore we have referred to the fact that the pleadings themselves make it certain that the two men named and no others were interested in the partnership, but the question of course is broader. Under the law does the designation, aside from the pleadings, show the names of those interested as partners? The case of Pendleton v. Cline, supra, decides the point that the name "Pendleton and Williams" sufficiently designates those interested in the partnership. In Lauferty v. Wheeler, 11 Daly (N. Y.) 194, where it is held that a person doing business under the name of "Alderney Manufacturing Company, Oleomargarine Butter, E. Lauferty, Proprietor," does not violate the statute in using the words "Alderney Manufacturing Company," the court says:

> "I have read the statute in vain to find any prohibition therein contained which is applicable to the case at bar. The statute * * * merely prohibits the use of the name of a partner not interested in the business, and the use of the words 'and company' or '& Co.' unless representing an actual partner. The plaintiff in this action does not use the name of a partner not interested in the business, neither does he use the words 'and company' or '& Co.' in any form."

While the foregoing decision is premised upon a different statute, the case by analogy is authority for the point that the mere addition of the word "company" does not purport to suggest that others than those named in the designation have a partnership interest, and our statute merely requires that those so interested shall be named.

The Supreme Court of Oklahoma, in Patterson v. Byers, 17 Okl. 633, 89 P. 1114, 10 Ann. Cas. 810, under a statute the same as the California Code section 2466, decided that a designation "Patterson Furniture Company," with two partners named Patterson, does not come under the statute as a fictitious name. It further decides that such a designation sets out the name of the partners in such a way as not to require the certificate provided by the section. Whether our court would go this far, in view of the decision in North v. Moore, 135 Cal. 621, 67 P. 1037, wherein was held that the name "Abrams Bros." does not sufficiently designate the interested persons, is a question not necessary here to decide. See, also, Guiterman v. Wishon, 21 Mont. 458, 54 P. 566, where exactly the opposite decision was given as to the name "Guiteman Bros." Lander v. Sheehan, 32 Mont. 25, 79 P. 406, holds that where a single individual named Lauder conducts a business under the designation "Lauder Furniture & Carpet Company," the certificate is not required.

The case of Kohler v. Stephenson, 39 Cal. App. 374, 178 P. 970, is in point, and for the sake of brevity we quote from the syllabus:

> "In an action by the owner of a laundry called the 'Kohler Steam Laundry,' to recover moneys collected by the defendants while in her employ as drivers, the special defense that the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain the action because she was doing business under a fictitious name without having complied with the provisions of sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code, was not sustained, when it appeared from the record by the direct testimony of the plaintiff, and also from the face of the bills, receipts and the printed matter used in the business, that the plaintiff personally conducted the business under her own name as the proprietor thereof."

In our opinion the judgment of dismissal in the instant case was had upon a mistake as to the law as applied to the pleadings in the action.

The judgment is reversed.

Finding that pedestrian, killed while attempting to cross street in front of approaching truck, was guilty of contributory negligence, held conclusive on appellate court, where supported by evidence.

12. Automobiles ⚷245(49)—Negligence of truck driver in turning to avoid one pedestrian, thereby killing another, held question of fact for trial court.

In action for death of pedestrian killed while attempting to cross street in front of approaching truck, negligence of driver of truck in turning suddenly to left to avoid hitting another pedestrian, thereby striking deceased, held question of fact for trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by Ching Wing as administrator of the estate of Ching Wing Sing, deceased, against Frank Kishi for damages for death. Judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Harry M. Irwin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. Marion Wright, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant in an action for damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, Ching Wing Sing.

Ching Wing Sing was killed at a street crossing in the city of Los Angeles by being struck by an automobile truck driven by defendant.

Plaintiff alleges that deceased was killed through the negligent and careless operation of said truck by defendant. Defendant denies any negligence on his part, and pleads in his answer, and contends that deceased came to his death by reason of his own negligence and carelessness.

The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and the court found that deceased met his death by reason of his own contributory negligence, and rendered judgment accordingly. Appellant contends that this finding is not supported by the evidence, and that the evidence shows that respondent was guilty of gross negligence, which caused the death of deceased.

[1, 2] The question of the contributory negligence of deceased, like that of the negligence of defendant, were questions of fact for the trial court to determine from all the evidence in the case. When the facts are clear and undisputed, and when no other inference than that of negligence, or contributory negligence, can be drawn from such facts, then, and only then, is the question of negligence or contributory negligence one of law. Moss v. H. R. Boynton Co., 44 Cal. App. 476, 186 P. 631; Fike v. San Joaquin Light & Power Co., 73 Cal. App. 712, 239 P. 344, and cases there cited.

[3-5] The law, of course, is also well established that any finding of the trial court upon conflicting evidence is conclusive, and all reasonable inferences are to be indulged in support of such finding. Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 228 P. 25; Wilbur v. Wilbur, 197 Cal. 7, 239 P. 332. The burden is upon appellant, who claims error, to show its existence. When two or more inferences can be reasonably deduced from a certain state of facts or circumstances, a reviewing court is not permitted to substitute its deductions for those of the trial court. Wilbur v. Wilbur, supra.

When appellant contends, as he does in the case at bar, that any particular finding is not supported by the evidence, our power begins and ends with the inquiry whether there is substantial evidence, contradicted or uncontradicted, which in and of itself will support the conclusions reached by the trial court. If, upon any material point, the testimony is in conflict, it must be assumed that the trial court resolved the conflict in favor of the prevailing party. Gjurich v. Fieg, 164 Cal. 429, 129 P. 464, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 111; Treadwell v. Nickel, supra. Therefore the sole question presented on this appeal is whether there is substantial evidence, contradicted or uncontradicted, which in and of itself will support the conclusion reached by the trial court that deceased met his death through his own carelessness and negligence.

The accident occurred in the city of Los Angeles on March 11, 1924, at about the hour of 7 p. m. North Los Angeles street is a business street of the city of Los Angeles. The deceased attempted to cross from the east side of North Los Angeles street to the west side thereof at a regular pedestrian crossing. Another man was crossing just in front of him. Respondent was driving his Ford truck south on the west side of Los Angeles street. There was no other traffic on the street at that time, and the vision of the deceased was unobstructed between him and the approaching truck. Deceased, when he entered the street, did not look either to the right or to the left, but looked straight ahead, and, when he reached the center of Los Angeles street, he did not stop or look north, from which the traffic would come, but looked straight ahead, and continued on his course until he reached a point about five feet east of the west side of Los Angeles street, when he was struck by respondent's truck, and instantly killed. There is some evidence in the record that respondent was traveling at an unlawful rate of speed. Respondent testified that he did not see the deceased until he was within about five feet of him, and that he turned his car to avoid hitting the man in front of deceased, and, as he did, the deceased "jumped," as he expressed it, in front of his truck, and was struck.

The foregoing is only a brief summary of the evidence produced at the trial; it would serve no useful purpose to state it all in detail. We have, however, examined the entire record with care, and are satisfied that the trial court was warranted in finding that deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, which caused his death.

[6] It was the duty of the deceased, as the act of an ordinary prudent person, immediately before placing himself in a position of danger, to look in the direction from which danger was to be anticipated. This was a continuing duty, and would not have been met by looking once and then looking away. In the exercise of ordinary care, it was the duty of deceased, as well as it is the duty of every pedestrian, "to look to the right and to the left whenever he has voluntarily put himself in a position which may be one of peril, coming from either direction." Sheldon v. James, 175 Cal. 474, 166 P. 8, 2 A. L. R. 1493; Moss v. H. R. Boynton Co., supra; Straten v. Spencer, 52 Cal. App. 98, 197 P. 540; Davis v. Breuner Co., 167 Cal. 683, 140 P. 586; Lord v. Stacy, 68 Cal. App. 517, 229 P. 874.

[7] The evidence shows that for 150 feet to 200 feet the deceased had a clear and unobstructed view to the north from whence respondent's truck was approaching, and that its lights were on. He therefore could have seen the truck at all times if he had looked, and could have used ordinary care for his own protection. If he did not look, then it was contributory negligence on his part, as no man is permitted to cross a busy thoroughfare without looking both ways for vehicles and traffic which might be expected thereon.

[8] The mere fact, that respondent might have been traveling at an unlawful rate of speed and, therefore, guilty of negligence, would not preclude the court from finding that deceased's own negligence was the efficient and proximate cause of his death. In such a case, if the negligence of deceased directly contributed to his death, then appellant cannot recover. Davis v. Breuner Co., supra, and cases there cited; Lord v. Stacy, supra.

[9-11] We are not to be understood, however, as holding that a person is guilty of contributory negligence merely because he attempts to cross a street when an automobile is approaching. If that were so, he never could attempt to cross a street upon which automobiles are being operated; he has a right to expect that persons operating automobiles upon a public street will operate them in the manner and at the speed customary at the particular place. We think the following authorities sustain this position: Scott v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 604, 93 P. 677; Clark v. Bennett, 123 Cal. 275, 55 P. 908; Schneider v. Market Street Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 482, 66 P. 734; Erdevig v. Market Street Ry. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 264 P. 252. While the above authorities all deal with the right and duties of a pedestrian in crossing a city street in front of an approaching street car, still we think the same rule should govern in a case of a pedestrian crossing in front of an automobile. What we do hold is that whether deceased was guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to cross the street in front of respondent's approaching truck depends upon all the circumstances under which he acted, and the question is one of fact for the determination of the trial court. Its finding that deceased was guilty of contributory negligence finds support in the evidence, and is therefore binding upon this court.

[12] Appellant lays great stress upon the admission of respondent, on cross-examination, to the effect that he did not see the deceased until his truck struck him, and that he did not see the man in front of deceased until he was within about five feet of the "first man," and he then suddenly turned his truck to the left to avoid hitting the "first man," and, when he did so, he struck deceased.

Appellant contends that this shows gross negligence on the part of respondent. It is true that there is some contradiction in the testimony of respondent, but the amount of weight and credit to be given to the testimony of respondent was a question for the trial court, and whether respondent was guilty of negligence in suddenly turning his truck to the left was, likewise, a question of fact to be determined by the trial court in the light of all the other facts and circumstances revealed by the evidence.

We find no reason for disturbing the conclusions reached by the trial court.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

CREMER v. LITTLEJOHN et al. (Civ. 5140.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 13, 1928.

Executors and administrators ⟹132—Administratrix could not bind estate by implied consent to contract for repair of building without probate court's approval.

Administratrix could not bind estate by implied consent to contract between plaintiff and tenant for repair and alteration of building without approval of probate court, so that plaintiff could not enforce asserted mechanic's lien.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Action for foreclosure of mechanic's lien by F. E. Cremer against Frances W. Littlejohn, formerly Frances M. Wilson, individually and as administratrix of the estate of Peter Wilson, deceased, and another. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. A. Klein, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Rowen Irwin and Rollin Laird, both of Bakersfield, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. From the record it appears that the real property against which the claim of lien is asserted formerly belonged to one Peter Wilson. Upon the death of Wilson his surviving wife, Frances M. Wilson (now Littlejohn), was appointed administratrix of the estate. While the estate was in course of administration the plaintiff and one Raymond Chow entered into an agreement for the repair and alteration of a certain building on said premises. We assume, as intimated by counsel, that Chow was a tenant of the premises. On the completion of the repairs made under the contract between plaintiff and Chow, plaintiff filed his claim of lien, and also presented to the administratrix his claim as a creditor of the estate, which claim was rejected. Thereupon he instituted this action in which, by his complaint, he alleged the foregoing facts, and alleged that during the times mentioned defendant Wilson, individually and as administratrix of said estate, was the owner of said land and building and had knowledge of such work, and that it inured to the benefit of such estate. It was stipulated that the allegations of the complaint are true; but the argument of counsel for appellant seems to admit, as evidently the fact was, that Mrs. Wilson's interest in the premises was only such interest as she acquired by reason of the fact that the property was community property and that she was the sole heir at law of her late husband, and that the property at the close of administration would be distributed to her as such heir if not required in satisfaction of the claims of creditors of the estate.

The court allowed personal judgment against the contracting party defendant Chow, but refused to recognize the plaintiff's claim of lien. It is from that part of the judgment refusing to enforce said asserted lien that the plaintiff appeals.

We think that the judgment was correct. There is no pleading or proof that the contract was ever submitted to the probate court for approval. In San Francisco Paving Co. v. Fairfield, 134 Cal. 220, 66 P. 255, the Supreme Court declared that it is not within the power of an executor without an order of the court to make a contract which would give a right to file liens on estate property. As recently as last year the Supreme Court (in a decision wherein, however, it must be admitted that the question did not directly arise) referred with apparent approval to San Francisco Paving Co. v. Fairfield, supra, and other decisions covering the same point. Mailhebuau v. Russ Bldg. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 258 P. 378. If the administratrix could not bind the estate by direct contract without approval by the court, of course she could not do so by any implied consent.

The judgment is affirmed.

Failure of holder of bond constituting a lien for public improvements to comply with Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 8208, § 5, subd. (j), requiring that notice be posted on the premises, held fatal to title claimed solely through deed issued under such statute.

4. Eminent domain 🔑262(5)—Failure of judgment quieting title against purchaser of bond constituting public improvement lien to require reimbursement did not require reversal under circumstances.

Failure of judgment in eminent domain proceedings, quieting title against purchaser of bond constituting a lien for public improvements to require reimbursement for purchase of bond, held not to require reversal, when issue was not raised in trial court, nor supported by any citation of evidence showing what was expended, or that such amount had not been repaid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Pearl E. Keeler, Judge.

Condemnation proceeding by the City of Los Angeles against Lida W. Darms, Grace P. Warden, Edith Wake Danziger, formerly Edith Wake Bishop, and others, wherein defendants Warden and Danziger filed adverse claims to portion of land. Judgment for plaintiff, awarding damages for taking of land and for defendant Danziger on issue as to title and defendant Warden appeals. Affirmed.

J. Everett Brown, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Montgomery, Stick, Moerdyke & Gibson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to condemn certain land for public purposes, a portion of which was claimed by defendants Warden and Danziger, the former as a purchaser of a bond which was a lien for public improvements, and the latter as owner by mesne conveyances. Judgment was in favor of the city, and, among other things, awarded damages for the taking of the land claimed by these two defendants in the sum of $353; damages to remainder of parcel by said taking, $94; and damages to improvements on the parcel, $252. By stipulation of counsel the issue as to the ownership of the land was specially set for trial, and special findings and judgment were made and entered, quieting the title to this parcel in defendant Danziger, subject to a lien thereon in favor of defendant Warden in the sum of $95.38. The defendant Warden has appealed on a typewritten record.

In her opening brief she advances two grounds for a reversal: That the court was without jurisdiction to try the issue of title to the entire parcel in a condemnation suit; and that the evidence does not support the finding that the party upon whom appellant served notice of sale was the occupant of the premises.

[1, 2] The first point is scarcely open to discussion on this appeal. Though the complaint of the city sought to condemn but a small portion of lot 4 (the property here in controversy), both appellant and defendant filed their answers, claiming ownership to the entire parcel. Under the evidence it became necessary for the court to determine these conflicting claims because it was found that damages should be allowed to the entire parcel for the portion taken. The jurisdiction of the court to hear and determine such conflicting claims is found in section 1247, Code of Civil Procedure. City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 124 Cal. 597, 609, 57 P. 585. The fact that neither party filed a cross-complaint, or a traverse to the pleading of the other, is of no moment, as they stipulated before the hearing that the issue could be tried on the pleadings as they stood. Where a cause is tried without objection to the sufficiency of the pleadings, both parties assuming that the issues have been properly pleaded, the judgment will not be reversed because of a defect in pleading alone, unless the error complained of is found to have resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Etienne v. Kendall (Cal. Sup.) 259 P. 752.

[3] The trial court found that the party upon whom appellant served notice of sale was not an occupant of the premises in dispute. The evidence is that the house rented to this party was located on an adjoining lot; that, though under a prior lease a garage located on lot 4 was rented with this house, this was not done when the house was rented on this occasion, but that the party served exercised no right of possession or occupancy of this garage, or any portion of the parcel in dispute. The property being unoccupied at the time, the statute under which the bond was issued (Deering's Gen. Laws, 8208, § 5, subd. (j) required that the notice be posted on the premises. This was not done. As appellant claimed solely through a deed issued under this statute, her failure to comply with these provisions resulted in a finding that she had no title.

[4] In her final brief appellant has raised for the first time the point that the judgment should have required respondent to reimburse appellant for her outlay in the purchase of the bond and that respondent's pleading is defective in that it fails to show a tender of this amount. This pleading was filed long before appellant's deed was recorded, and if appellant was entitled to any reimbursement she should have raised the issue in the trial court. The point is not supported by the citation of any evidence showing what appellant expended, or that she had not been repaid, and we are not required to search for error in the typewritten record, particularly in support of a point which is first raised in appellant's closing brief.

OSCAR KRENZ COPPER & BRASS WORKS, Inc., v. SHAMGOCHIAN et ux. *

(Civ. 6075.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 2, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 30, 1928.

1. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑300(5)—Evidence held to sustain finding that deed from husband to wife was given to defraud creditors.

Evidence held to sustain finding that husband's deed to wife of factory property was given without valuable consideration for purpose of defrauding creditors when husband was in contemplation of insolvency, in suit by judgment creditor to set aside deed.

2. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑249—Two and one-half years delay of judgment creditor before suing to set aside judgment debtor's deed as fraudulent did not constitute laches, where no prejudice was shown.

Two and one-half years delay of creditor after recovering judgment before commencing suit to set aside conveyance from judgment debtor to his wife as fraudulent did not bar recovery on ground of laches, where laches was not apparent on face of pleading, and no prejudice to defendants was shown.

3. Equity 🔑88—Laches must be pleaded and proved, where not apparent on face of pleading.

Where laches is not apparent on the face of the pleading, it is a defense that must be pleaded and proved like any other issue of fact.

4. Equity 🔑87(2)—Delay for time less than period of limitation does not amount to laches, unless the other party is prejudiced.

Delay for time less than period of limitation does not amount to laches, unless it occasions, or may be presumed to occasion, prejudice to other party.

5. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑310—Want of finding, in fact warranted by evidence, that wife participated in fraud, held not to preclude relief.

Evidence in creditor's suit to set aside conveyance from judgment debtor to wife as fraudulent sustained plaintiff's recovery, on ground that conveyance was without consideration and void as to the wife, notwithstanding failure of trial court to find that wife actually participated in fraud with full knowledge of circumstances.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Suit by the Oscar Krenz Copper & Brass Works, Inc., against M. G. Shamgochian, otherwise known as M. G. Zamgochian, also known as Maridos Shamgochian, also known as Madiros Zamgochian or M. Shamgochian, and wife, to set aside a deed to certain real property. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Carl E. Lindsay and Lindsay & Conley, all of Fresno, for appellants.

E. A. Douthitt and Dudley D. Sales, both of San Francisco, and Theodore M. Stuart, of Fresno, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued the defendants as husband and wife to set aside as fraudulent the deed of the husband to his wife of certain real property in Fresno county Plaintiff had judgment, from which the defendants have appealed on a typewritten transcript.

In the early part of 1918 the defendant husband erected a factory at Manteca in which he installed certain machinery which he had purchased from plaintiff under a written contract under which he agreed to keep the machinery insured against fire. As an inducement for this contract this defendant then represented that he was the sole owner of the real property in suit and that it was clear of all indebtedness. The Manteca plant was destroyed by fire in 1918 and soon thereafter this defendant was arrested and charged with arson. Pending trial of the charge, and on August 28, 1918, this defendant voluntarily conveyed to his wife the property in suit, consisting of 58 acres of vineyard land of the estimated value of $60,000. In March, 1919, this defendant was tried and acquitted of the charge of arson and in August of the same year the insurance companies paid him $27,554.68 for the loss sustained in the fire, the adjustment having been made by a broker employed by this defendant immediately after the fire and given full authority by him to deal with his numerous creditors. This agent, with the sanction of this defendant, assured these creditors that their claims would be paid from the moneys received from the insurance, but, when this defendant received the moneys, he failed to make payment. In a suit upon the claim judgment was had by the plaintiff herein for the full amount of its claim and execution thereon was returned in the sum of $8.78, which was credited on the judgment.

[1] At the time of the execution of the deed to the property in suit the liabilities of the husband far exceeded his assets other than this particular property. There was no consideration for the transfer other than an indebtedness claimed to be owing the wife which defendants claim to have been $9,250. The net annual income from the property was estimated to be $9,000. The two defendants continued to live upon the property after the transfer; the wife claiming that she paid her husband $700 a year for his services in caring for the property.

The trial court found that the deed was voluntarily given, without valuable consideration, at a time when the husband was in contemplation of insolvency and with the purpose of defrauding his creditors; that by this conveyance he rendered himself insolvent; and that plaintiff was not barred by laches.

On this appeal the burden of appellant's attack is that these findings of the trial court are not sustained by the evidence. Though the appeal is presented on a typewritten transcript, the appellants have not printed the findings attacked or the evidence upon which they were made, as required by section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure. Estate of Berry, 195 Cal. 356, 358, 233 P. 330. The respondent has come to their assistance to some extent, printing some evidence in support of the findings attacked. The appellants told a fanciful tale of how the wife, a girl of 15 years, came from Armenia in 1907 with $3,000 in Turkish gold, which she carried on her person, of how she met and married her codefendant at Ellis Island, N. Y., and joined him in his tailoring shop near Boston, where she earned and saved some $4,800 in a period of four years. The stories of the investments of these moneys and of the purported assignment of a mortgage to her brother-in-law in 1918, which was shown from the records of the county recorder to have been fully satisfied and canceled in 1914, are of such a character that the trial court was fully justified in rejecting the appellants' testimony. We do not deem it necessary to copy into this opinion the conflicting testimony merely to say that it supports the findings. We are satisfied that the evidence and the inferences applicable fully support every finding under attack.

[2-4] It is argued that the action of respondent is barred by laches because it was not commenced until about 2½ years following the judgment on the machinery contract. Where, as here, laches is not apparent on the face of the pleading, it is a defense which must be pleaded and proved like any other issue of fact. "Delay for a time less than the period of limitation does not amount to laches, unless it occasions, or may be presumed to occasion, wrong or prejudice to the other party." Cohen v. Cohen, 150 Cal. 99, 105, 88 P. 267, 270 (11 Ann. Cas. 520). Appellants have failed to show any error here.

[5] It is argued that the conveyance is good as to the wife, even though made by her husband in contemplation of his insolvency. The argument is based upon the claim that the wife was a "bona fide" creditor of her husband and that the conveyance was made for a valuable consideration. It means little that the trial court did not find that the wife actually participated in the fraud with full knowledge of the circumstances. If the issue had been raised in that form, the finding would have of necessity been adverse to appellants. The trial court could well have found under the evidence that all the claims of indebtedness made by the wife were purely fictitious and that the conveyance was wholly without consideration.

Judgment affirmed.

CHARLES BROWN & SONS v. WHITE LUNCH CO. (Civ. 6267.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 9, 1928.

1. Contracts 🔑10(4)—Contract providing that, if hardware company bought stock in restaurant, it would buy supplies from company, lacked mutuality so far as executory.

Where hardware company contracted to purchase stock in restaurant providing that restaurant would purchase supplies from it, and hardware company was left free to terminate contract at will at any time and under no obligation to supply any goods to restaurant for any price at any time, held that contract, so far as it remained executory, was not binding for want of mutuality.

2. Sales 🔑1(3, 4)—Contract to purchase supplies from hardware company held unenforceable for uncertainty as to price and subject-matter.

Where hardware company contracted to buy stock in restaurant in consideration for restaurant's buying supplies from it, and goods to be ordered were not specified, no price fixed, or any standard agreed upon by which price could be fixed so that restaurant's liability could be determined in event of breach, held that such contract was unenforceable as indefinite and uncertain.

3. Contracts 🔑249—Unenforceable contract could not be rescinded.

In action to rescind contract between hardware company and restaurant, whereby hardware company agreed to purchase stock in restaurant in consideration for its promise to buy supplies from hardware company, because, after change in management, restaurant bought supplies in open market, held that, contract being unenforceable, there could be no rescission.

4. Sales 🔑106—Hardware company held precluded by laches from rescinding contract with restaurant, where it delayed action about two years after notice of breach (Civ. Code, § 1691).

In action to rescind contract by which restaurant promised that, in consideration for hardware company's purchasing stock in restaurant, it would buy supplies from hardware company, where hardware company had notice of breach about two years before bringing action to rescind, held that it was precluded by laches under Civ. Code, § 1691, providing rescission must be prompt.

5. Evidence 🔑413—In action to rescind contract providing restaurant would purchase supplies from hardware company, testimony of prices of supplies held inadmissible.

In action to rescind contract by which restaurant agreed to purchase supplies from hardware company in consideration of its purchasing stock in restaurant, exclusion of testimony regarding prices of supplies held proper, since, when an agreement is reduced to writing, it is considered as containing all terms of contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by Charles Brown & Sons against the White Lunch Company for rescission of a contract to purchase stock and for return of the purchase price. From a judgment of nonsuit, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Vogelsang & Brown, of San Francisco (L. Seidenberg, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

R. G. Hudson and H. S. Young, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an action brought for the rescission of a contract and the recovery of the purchase price of certain stock of the defendant corporation purchased by the plaintiff.

The plaintiff is a corporation engaged in the hardware business in the city of San Francisco, and the defendant corporation is engaged in operating a chain of restaurants. The contract between the parties, which plaintiff seeks to rescind, is evidenced by two letters, one from the defendant to plaintiff, and the other from plaintiff to defendant. The letters are as follows:

"April 11, 1922.

"Messrs. Chas. Brown & Sons, San Francisco, Calif.—We are pleased to confirm herewith your purchase of $5,000 of our 8% preferred stock, payment to be made at the rate of $500.00 monthly for ten consecutive months. You are to receive interest on your payments at the rate of 6% per annum. The stock will be issued to you as soon as the same is paid in full. In turn, we will purchase from you such of your wares that you can supply and which we are in need of; in other words, we intend to give you all of our business that we possibly can. We feel assured that our relationship with you will be very satisfactory.

"Yours very truly,
"White Lunch Company,
"Z. W. White, President."

"San Francisco, April 12th, 1922.

"White Lunch Co., 122 Kearny St., San Francisco, Calif.—Gentlemen: Attention Mr. Z. W. White, President. In keeping with yours of the 11th instant we are pleased to inclose you herewith our check for $500.00 as first payment covering our purchase of $5,000.00 on your 8% preferred stock, and in consideration of which purchase it has been mutually understood and agreed upon between us that we are to enjoy your future purchases on such of our wares that you may be in need of, and which we can supply. Thanking you in advance, we are pleased to remain,

"Yours very truly,
"Chas. Brown & Sons,
"Per M. M. Brown."

The stock mentioned in the foregoing letters was transferred to plaintiff and fully paid for. For several months after the date of the letters Z. W. White continued to be president of the defendant corporation, and during such time the defendant corporation purchased all of its supplies, which plaintiff could supply, from plaintiff. About August or September, 1922, the officers and management of defendant corporation changed, L. E. Foster becoming its president. Thereafter defendant purchased its supplies in the open market—some being purchased from plaintiff and the rest elsewhere. In August, 1924, plaintiff demanded compliance with the promise contained in the letter from defendant corporation, and Mr. Foster, as president of the corporation, denied the existence of any contract to purchase supplies from plaintiff. On September 4, 1924, plaintiff delivered to defendant a written notice of rescission of the contract, and tendered the 500 shares of preferred stock held by it, and demanded return of the purchase price. Defendant refused the tendered rescission and to rescind the contract, whereupon plaintiff, on September 5, 1924, instituted this action.

At the conclusion of plaintiff's case, the defendant moved for a nonsuit on the following grounds: First, that these letters in evidence did not constitute a valid and enforceable contract which a court of equity will recognize, sanction, and enforce. Second, that plaintiff has slept on its right for so long a period of time after knowing that the contract was being breached that it cannot now come into a court of equity and receive relief of the character it seeks at the hands of a court of equity; in other words, its claim is so stale that a court of equity will not recognize, sanction, and enforce it for them. And, third, that the contract is so vague and uncertain that a court of equity will not and has not the right to enforce it and give it its sanction; that it is uncertain as to whether or not Charles Brown & Sons would be bound to sell any goods at any price, or would be bound to sell any goods unless the terms offered by the defendant were satisfactory to the plaintiff; the contract is silent as to goods; it is silent as to terms of credit; it is silent as to any price which was to be paid for the goods; that it does not appear from the pleadings or from the evidence in this case that any specific goods were to have been purchased, or any price agreed upon, or any terms of credit. The court granted the motion for nonsuit, and from the judgment entered thereon plaintiff has appealed.

The contract for the purchase of the stock was fully executed, while the alleged contract as to the purchase of supplies was executory, the consideration for which was the previously executed contract for the purchase of the stock. The alleged executory contract is embodied in the following excerpts from the two letters: Defendant's offer, "In turn, we will purchase from you such wares that you can supply and which we are in need of; in other words, we intend to give you all of our business that we possibly can." Plaintiff's acceptance is as follows: "And in consideration of which purchase it has been mutually understood and agreed upon between us that we are to enjoy your future purchases on such of our wares that you may be in need of and which we can supply."

[1] It will be noted that the executory contract imposes no burdens, promises, or restrictions upon the plaintiff. It was free to terminate the contract at will at any time, and it imposed no obligation to supply any goods to defendant for any price or at any time. It appears, therefore, that there exists no mutual obligation imposed by the writings, except as to the purchase of the stock by plaintiff, which was fully executed. Had plaintiff discontinued its business or refused to sell its wares to defendant, defendant would have been without a remedy. A contract which can be terminated at the will of one of the parties without liability for damages, so far as it remains executory, is not binding for want of mutuality. Fowler Utilities Co. v. Gray, 168 Ind. 1, 79 N. E. 897, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 726, 120 Am. St. Rep. 344.

[2, 3] The promise made by defendant was a promise to enter into future contracts for the purchase of supplies from plaintiff, which defendant might from time to time be in need of, and which plaintiff could supply. No goods to be ordered are specified, no price fixed, or any standard agreed upon by which the price would be fixed so that defendant's liability could be determined in the event of a breach by it of the contract. "Unless an agreement to make a future contract is definite and certain upon the subjects to be embraced therein, it is nugatory. Consequently, the acceptance of a proposition to make a contract, the terms of which are to be subsequently fixed, does not constitute a binding obligation. The reason for this rule is that there would be no way by which the court could determine what sort of a contract the negotiations would result in; no rule by which the court could ascertain what damages, if any, might follow a refusal to enter into such future contract on the arrival of the time specified." 1 Elliott on Contracts, § 175. Only a valid and binding contract may be rescinded. "Loosely the term 'rescission' has been employed in a wide and generic sense. But it is not properly applicable to the undoing of anything except that which has been the subject of mutual agreement. * * * Again, before there can be any 'rescission,' properly so called, there must be a contract completely formed and in force, or at least provisionally binding on the parties." 1 Black on Rescission and Cancellation, 6. If the facts establish the nonexistence of the alleged contract sought to be rescinded, in that there was no meeting of minds, there can, of course, be no rescission. Hardison v. Davis, 131 Cal. 635, 63 P. 1005. In Jules Levy & Bro. v. A. Mautz & Co., 16 Cal. App. 666, 669, 117 P. 936, 937, the court says:

> "It is elementary in law that a contract of sale must be certain as to the thing sold and designate the price to be paid for it (Civ. Code, § 1729); and it is well settled that if an executory contract of sale is uncertain and incapable of being made certain in the essential particular of the price to be paid for the thing sold, neither of the parties can be held to its terms nor recover damages for its breach [citing authorities]. It is true, generally, that where no price is fixed in a contract for the sale of a commodity, the law, upon a delivery and acceptance of the thing sold, implies an understanding between the parties that a reasonable price is to be paid, and in such a case the contract will be deemed to be executed. * * * In the case at bar the prices to be paid for the goods which were to be purchased yearly by the defendant, for a period of five years, as well as the terms and conditions upon which the sales of said goods and merchandise were to be made, were not specified in the contract, but were, as indicated by the contract and the findings of the court below, to be ascertained and fixed from time to time by the future agreement of the parties. The due execution of a contract requires the assent of at least two minds to each and all of the essentials of the agreement; and it is only upon evidence of such assent that the law enforces the terms of a contract or gives a remedy for a breach of it."

See, also, Los Angeles Immigration Assn. v. Phillips, 56 Cal. 539; Breckinridge v. Crocker, 78 Cal. 529, 21 P. 179; 1 Elliott on Contracts, § 181.

The cases of Dickerman v. Ohashi Importing Co., 63 Cal. App. 101, 218 P. 458, and S. F. Bowser & Co. v. Marks, 96 Ark. 113, 131 S. W. 334, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 429, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 357, cited by appellant, in which it is said that, where the contract does not determine the amount of the consideration, the consideration must be what the goods are reasonably worth, are distinguishable from the present case, as in those cases the contract was for the purchase of a single commodity.

The only deduction that can be drawn from the failure of the correspondence to mention prices is that such prices were to be fixed by subsequent agreement when the goods were ordered. The testimony of Bernard C. Brown, president of the plaintiff corporation, and George W. Meierdierks, manager of the hotel and restaurant department of plaintiff corporation, confirms this. The former testified:

> "We asked him why he was not buying the goods from us. He said he could buy his glasses for less than we were offering them, and I told him that we would give him some prices from the East and also out of stock; that stock prices had one price and import had another, so we didn't have to handle them."

And the latter testified:

> "Q. How did you know that Mr. Russell had given an order for tumblers? A. Because he had taken the matter up with me and wanted to know in regard to what I could supply him this particular tumbler for."

[4] Furthermore, even though the letters constitute a binding contract, plaintiff would be precluded through laches from rescinding it, as the record shows that defendant purchased its supplies in the open market from October, 1922, until the commencement of the action on September 5, 1924. This was a breach of the claimed contract of which plaintiff had notice, as the testimony of Meierdierks, the manager of the department having charge of selling and supplying the goods to defendant, shows he had knowledge of the breach as early as January, 1923. Plaintiff therefore did not act with promptness in effecting a rescission. "To take advantage of this remedy he must act immediately when he discovers the facts that entitle him to rescind and he is aware of his right to rescission." Maginess v. Western Securities Corp., 38 Cal. App. 56, 175 P. 277; Civ. Code, § 1691.

[5] There is likewise no merit in appellant's contention that the court erred in excluding testimony as to conversations had regarding prices before the letters constituting the alleged contract were written. The judgment would not have been affected by such testimony, if admitted; moreover, the statement of counsel as to the purpose for which the testimony was offered shows that it was intended to prove some agreement as to price. As the writings constituting the contract were silent in this respect, the evidence was not admissible. As is said in Baume v. Morse, 13 Cal. App. 456, 458, 110 P. 350:

"No purchase price is named therein, and the description given is not sufficiently definite to justify a court of equity in enforcing the conveyance of any property. The offer to supply the other alleged terms of the contract by parol was properly denied by the trial court. * * * When an agreement is reduced to writing, the writing is to be considered as containing all the terms of the contract, and no other evidence of the terms of the agreement will be admitted."

We think the motion for nonsuit was properly granted, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

HURTADO v. SAN DIEGO ELECTRIC RY. CO. et al. (L. A. 9431.)

Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1046(5)—Remark of court that evidence probably pertained to important matter, if error, held not to require reversal.

Error, if any, of trial court in allowing question in making remark that "it is probably an important matter," held not to require reversal, where defendants merely excepted, neither assigning remark as misconduct nor making any request for withdrawal, nor asking for any instruction to disregard.

2. Master and servant 🔑109—Employee, on truck carrying employees to and from work, held invitee as regards employer's liability for collision between truck and street car.

Plaintiff, as an employee of company, which was accustomed to transport employees to and from work on its trucks, held an invitee as regards liability of company for injuries received in collision between truck and street car.

3. Master and servant 🔑109—Employee on truck as invitee was entitled to use of reasonable care to avoid collision with street car.

Employee as invitee on truck colliding with street car was entitled to use of reasonable care on part of employer and its agent in operation of such truck to avoid the collision.

4. Trial 🔑133(6)—Misconduct of counsel in questioning juror as to codefendant's connection with insurance company held not reversible in view of court's instruction to disregard.

Misconduct of one defendant's counsel in questioning juror as to codefendant's connection with certain insurance company, implying that such company was an insurer of defendant, held not to require reversal, where trial court sustained objection, rebuked counsel, and instructed jury to disregard question.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by Antonio R. Hurtado against the San Diego Electric Railway Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, for appellant San Diego Gas & Electric Co.

Read G. Dilworth, of Coronado, V. F. Bennett, of San Diego, and Morrison, Hohfeld, Foerster, Shuman & Clark, of San Francisco, for San Diego Electric Ry. Co.

Jas. E. O'Keefe and C. H. Van Winkle, both of San Diego, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This action was instituted by the plaintiff to recover damages from the two corporations, defendants, for personal injuries sustained by him on August 13, 1924, as a result of a collision between a truck of the defendant San Diego Consolidated Gas & Electric Company, of which corporation plaintiff was an employee, and upon which truck he was riding, and a street car operated by and on behalf of the San Diego Electric Railway Company upon and along certain streets in the city of San Diego. The trial of the action before a jury resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and against both defendants in the sum of $3,000, for which sum judgment was rendered and entered by the trial court. The defendants had appeared separately, and the contest before the trial court took the form of a three-cornered contest, wherein the plaintiff sought a verdict against each of the defendants, and wherein the defendants were in some aspects of the trial united in an endeavor to defeat the plaintiff's claim, and in other aspects of the trial were divided, each attempting to fix responsibility upon the other for the accident, or, in so far as the railway company was concerned, in an effort on its part to show that if it was to be held responsible, its codefendant was also jointly liable. The defendants separately made motions for a new trial, each of which was denied, and they have both perfected appeals, which by stipulation of all parties are presented in a single transcript on appeal.

[1] The first point upon appeal to be considered is that upon which the appellants agree in their assignments of error. One of the issues presented in the trial court was that of the seriousness of the plaintiff's injuries. The plaintiff having introduced his evidence touching that subject and having rested, the defendant gas and electric company placed upon the witness stand a witness named Ditommaso to testify with reference to the happening of the accident, in which he was also injured and taken to the same hospital to which the plaintiff, while unconscious from his injuries, had been carried. Upon cross-examination of this witness by plaintiff's counsel with relation to matters occurring at the hospital the witness was asked whether upon the morning following the accident the plaintiff was conscious or unconscious. Various objections were made to this question by both defendants, upon the ground that it was not proper cross-examination or proper rebuttal, and considerable argument ensued, at the conclusion of which the court allowed the question, and in so doing made the remark that while perhaps not proper rebuttal "it is probably an important matter, and I think it is within the discretion of the court to permit the testimony to be received." To the remark of the trial court that "it is probably an important matter," the defendants took exception and have assigned the remark of the court as misconduct and as prejudicial error. The objection to the offered evidence upon the ground that it was not proper cross-examination or proper rebuttal may possibly have been a good objection, but the defendants do not urge in relation to the episode that objection, confining their assault to the merely casual and incidental remark of the court at the conclusion of the argument that "it is probably an important matter." It is not here contended that the matter to which the witness was permitted to testify was not an important matter, since it related to the length of time during which the plaintiff had remained unconscious after his injury. As such the plaintiff would have been entitled to make this proof as a part of his main case, and had he done so the jury would have been entitled to treat the evidence given as important. The force of the defendants' contention is expended upon the claim that this purely incidental remark of the court constituted a prejudicial interference with the functions of the jury in determining the importance to be given to this bit of evidence. The defendants at the time the remark of the court was made contented themselves with a mere exception, neither assigning it as misconduct nor making any request for its withdrawal, nor asking for an instruction to the jury to disregard it. For the foregoing reasons we are of the opinion that the error, if any, committed by the trial court, was not sufficiently prejudicial to justify a reversal of the case.

[2, 3] As to all other questions presented upon appeal the two appellants are in sharp disagreement, the appellant electric railway company uniting with the plaintiff in seeking to hold its codefendant jointly responsible with it for the plaintiff's injuries. The evidence in the case touching the occurrence of the collision is concededly sufficient to charge both defendants with some degree of negligence. It is the contention of the appellant gas and electric company, however, that the plaintiff, though one of its employees, and though riding upon one of its trucks at the time of the collision, was, in being upon its said truck, a mere licensee, and that hence as to him the degree of duty which it owed to its said employee as such mere licensee was too slight to justify its being held liable for the injuries which the plaintiff sustained by reason of the greater negligence of its codefendant which proximately caused the accident and the plaintiff's consequent injuries. The plaintiff and the appellant electric railway company unite in opposing this contention, and the facts of the case would seem sufficiently to sustain their view as to justify the trial court in charging the jury that if they found such facts to be true they should hold the defendant gas and electric company liable for the breach of the duty which it owed to the plaintiff as an invitee upon its truck at the time of the collision.

The facts with relation to this matter are these: The plaintiff was an employee of the appellant gas and electric company as a day laborer, in which capacity he had been in its employ for some time. The plaintiff's daily employment with the gas company began on each morning and ceased at 5 o'clock in the afternoon. The plaintiff, with other laborers of the gas company, was accustomed to ride from the plant of the corporation to the point where their daily work was to be done on one of its trucks which carried the tools and equipment for the day's work, and which regularly left the plant each morning carrying such of the laborers as lived near the plant or along the route, and at the close of the day left the place of work and carried its employees to or near to their respective homes. Such had been the regular custom in the use of said truck for a number of years, the company or its employees even going so far as to provide planks as seats for the use of its said employees in going to and from their work. Under such conditions we have no hesitation in holding that the plaintiff as an employee of said appellant gas and electric company was upon its said truck as an invitee at the time of the happening of the accident wherein he received his injuries, and that as such he was entitled to the use of reasonable care upon the part of his employer and its agent in the operation of said truck to avoid said collision. Said appellant concedes that if the plaintiff was such invitee the evidence of the negligence of its other employees, while meager, was probably sufficient to justify the jury in finding said appellant guilty of a degree of negligence which would render it liable with its codefendant for the plaintiff's injuries. We find no error, therefore, in the instructions of the court or in the finding of the jury in the foregoing regard.

[4] The next contention of the appellant gas and electric company is that the court committed as to it reversible error in refusing to declare a mistrial on account of certain alleged misconduct on the part of counsel for the railway company occurring during the examination of the jurors, the alleged misconduct consisting in a question asked of one of the jurors as to his connection with a certain insurance company, the implication of the question being that the said insurance company was an insurer of its codefendant the gas and electric company. The trial court promptly sustained an objection to the question, rebuked counsel for the railway company for his misconduct in asking it, and immediately and strongly charged the jury to disregard it. Under these conditions we are not disposed to hold, in the absence of any showing that the jury or any of its members disregarded the court's admonition, the misconduct of counsel for the railway company continued to be so prejudicial as to compel a reversal of the case.

The appellant gas and electric company makes the further contention that the trial court was in error in the giving of certain instructions which are set forth in detail in its brief. These instructions in the main relate to the question as to whether the plaintiff was an invitee or a mere licensee of said appellant at the time he received his injuries. Its codefendant joins with the plaintiff in the claim that the instructions of the trial court, both in the foregoing and in whatever other respects they are subjected to criticism, constitute when read as a whole a correct exposition of the law of the case. The instructions were very voluminous, as might well be expected from the three-cornered aspect of this controversy, and while instances may be found therein where the court did not in certain single instructions cover the entire situation to which such isolated instructions related, we are still of the opinion, upon a careful reading of the entire body of instructions, that the jury were not misled thereby to the prejudice of the appellant gas and electric company. The verdict of the jury was quite moderate in view of the extent and seriousness of the plaintiff's injuries; and while said injuries were not permanent, they were sufficiently severe and painful as to fully justify the jury's award, and to thus indicate that in making such award the jury was not materially influenced by the acts of misconduct and alleged errors of which the appellant gas and electric company complains.

GARRITY et al. v. MILLER et al.

(Sac. 4049.)

Supreme Court of California. June 28, 1928.

1. Equity ⟹219—Defense of laches may be raised by demurrer, where laches is apparent on face of complaint.

Defense that by reason of plaintiff's laches equitable relief may not be granted may be raised by demurrer, where laches is apparent on face of complaint.

2. Equity ⟹71(1)—Equity will not lend its aid in enforcement of stale demands.

Equity will not lend its aid in enforcement of stale demands, but will refuse to interfere where there has been gross laches in prosecuting rights, or where long acquiescence in assertion of adverse rights has occurred, especially where principal participants in transactions have died.

3. Trusts ⟹365(2)—Suit to enforce trust approximately 55 years subsequent to its inception, where all parties to original transaction were dead, held barred by laches.

Suit to enforce trust, commenced approximately 55 years subsequent to its alleged inception, where alleged trustees died many years after creation of alleged trust, and alleged original beneficiary died about 48 years subsequent to its alleged creation, and court could only arrive at respective rights of parties by going into an investigation of particulars of purchases and sales of property covering period in excess of 55 years, held barred by laches.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Action to establish a trust by Thomas Garrity and another against Frank M. Miller, as administrator of the estate of Henry Jacob, deceased, and others. From a judgment of dismissal, after sustaining a demurrer without leave to amend, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Fern Rosenheim and Emma Tofanelli, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

H. R. Given, of Weaverville, for respondents.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of dismissal, after order made sustaining, without leave to amend, a demurrer to the second amended complaint. The plaintiffs are the sons and sole heirs of Elisa Jacob, deceased. By their complaint they sought the entry of a decree impressing a trust upon certain described real property, situate in Trinity county, title to which appeared in the names of Henry and John Jacob at the time of their respective deaths.

[1] The respondent Miller as administrator of the estate of each of said persons, interposed a demurrer, specifying, among other grounds, that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, and that by reason of plaintiffs' laches equitable relief may not be granted. That this defense may be raised by demurrer, where laches is apparent upon the face of the complaint, is now well settled in this state. Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 245, 250, 81 P. 516; Wadleigh v. Phelps, 149 Cal. 627, 633, 87 P. 93; Marsh v. Lott, 156 Cal. 643, 646, 105 P. 968; Ewald v. Kierulff, 175 Cal. 363, 365, 165 P. 942; Hopkins v. Lewis, 18 Cal. App. 107, 113, 122 P. 433.

The action was commenced on January 20, 1920, and the second amended complaint, thereafter filed, sets forth a series of transactions covering a period of years extending from October 12, 1865, to November 28, 1918. It is therein averred, in substance, that on October 12, 1865, the mother of the plaintiffs, Elisa Jacob, deceased, intermarried with Barthel Jacob, deceased, a brother of Henry and John Jacob; that the marital status continued until May 28, 1891, at which time Barthel Jacob passed away. Elisa Jacob died on March 4, 1913. Proceeding, the complaint alleges that at the time of said marriage Elisa Jacob possessed in her own right certain described water rights and mining claims, patented and unpatented, situate in Trinity county; that Barthel Jacob and his brothers owned no property, and were without independent means at that time; that shortly after her marriage, and upon the representations of her husband and his brothers, Henry and John, Elisa Jacob transferred and conveyed, without consideration, to Henry Jacob all of her right, title, and interest in and to certain designated water rights; that the latter in turn, and in accordance with the agreement of the parties, conveyed said water rights to Barthel Jacob, husband of Elisa; that such transfers, though absolute in form, were understood by the parties to be upon trust for the benefit of Elisa Jacob; that continuously during the existence of the marital state Elisa Jacob permitted her husband to have full management and control of her separate property, all, however, for her asserted benefit; that in the year 1883 Barthel Jacob with the rents, issues, and profits of said separate property of Elisa Jacob purchased in his own name various other described water rights, promising that he would hold the properties in his name for her benefit; that from 1865 to 1891 Barthel Jacob, alone or in conjunction with his brothers, used and controlled all of said separate property and the additions thereto under the agreement to hold the same in trust for Elisa Jacob; that he undertook to and did perfect in his own name, but upon trust for Eliza Jacob, a patent to the "Garrity claim," which was thereafter designated and known as the "Barthel Jacob gold placer mining claim"; that on September 21, 1887, Barthel Jacob conveyed by deed to Henry and John Jacob the said mining claim; that the grantees gave no consideration therefor, and took the same with knowledge that the beneficial ownership was in Elisa Jacob; that with the rents, issues, and profits derived from said claim, and from the water rights theretofore transferred by Elisa Jacob, the Patterson and Low Bar mining claims were acquired, perfected, and developed by and in the names of Barthel and John Jacob; that on September 21, 1887, Barthel conveyed, without consideration, his interest therein to Henry Jacob, who took with full knowledge of Elisa Jacob's beneficial interest; that the Henry Jacob placer mine was likewise so acquired, the patent thereto issuing to Henry and Barthel Jacob; that the patentees thereafter conveyed and reconveyed certain interests therein to each other, all with the alleged consent of Elisa Jacob; that all of the property acquired by the three Jacob brothers in Trinity county was obtained through and by the use of Elisa Jacob's separate property, and the rents, issues, and profits therefrom and under the agreement to hold the whole thereof, together with the additions thereto, in trust, for the benefit of said Elisa Jacob; that in the year 1900, and at divers other times subsequent to the death of Barthel Jacob, Henry and John Jacob assured Elisa Jacob, in the presence of the plaintiffs, that she would receive the proceeds from the sale of any of said properties, and in the event said properties were not sold they would, by testamentary devise, appropriately transfer said properties to her; that subsequent to the death of Eliza Jacob similar assurances and promises were made to the plaintiffs; that Henry and John Jacob died intestate on June 2, 1917, and August 20, 1918, respectively; that on November 28, 1918, plaintiffs filed in the estate of John Jacob written protests and objections to the letting of the mining claims above referred to; that the estate of Barthel Jacob has never been probated; that the inventory and appraisement filed in the estate of Henry Jacob listed as assets of said estate certain specified interests in and to each of the properties above enumerated; that a similar claim of ownership was made in the petition for letters of administration filed in the estate of John Jacob; that, unless the equitable title of plaintiffs to the properties standing in the names of Henry and John Jacob be established by a decree of court, the plaintiffs will be deprived of their rightful inheritance. Substantially the same averments appear in the second count of the complaint; it being added, however, that the false and fraudulent representations of Barthel Jacob and his brothers served to induce Elisa Jacob to originally transfer away her separate property.

[2] In our opinion the foregoing allegations, taken in substance from the second amended complaint, show on their face such laches as will justify a court of equity refusing to enter upon an inquiry of the merits of the plaintiffs' claim. It is well settled that from considerations of public policy equity will not lend its aid in the enforcement of stale demands. The peace and convenience of society require that such demands be not encouraged. Emerson v. Kennedy Min. & Mill. Co., 169 Cal. 718, 723, 147 P. 939. This principle is well stated in Hammond v. Hopkins, 143 U. S. 224, 250, 12 S. Ct. 418, 427 (36 L. Ed. 134), where it is declared:

> "No rule of law is better settled than that a court of equity will not aid a party whose application is destitute of conscience, good faith and reasonable diligence, but will discourage stale demands, for the peace of society, by refusing to interfere where there have been gross laches in proscuting rights, or where long acquiescence in the assertion of adverse rights has occurred. The rule is peculiarly applicable where the difficulty of doing entire justice arises through the death of the principal participants in the transactions complained of, or of the witness or witnesses, or by reason of the original transactions having become so obscured by time as to render the ascertainment of the exact facts impossible."

Harrison v. Gibson, 23 Grat. (Va.) 212, 223, states that:

> "If, from the delay which has taken place, it is manifest that no correct account can be rendered, that any conclusion to which the court can arrive must at best be conjectural, and that the original transactions have become so obscured by time and the loss of evidence and the death of parties as to render it difficult to do justice, the court will not relieve the plaintiff. If, under the circumstances of the case, it is too late to ascertain the merits of the controversy, the court will not interfere, whatever may have been the original justice of the claim."

The doctrine has long since been recognized in this state, the leading case upon the subject being that of Kleinclaus v. Dutard, supra, which parallels in all material respects the present case. It was said in that case:

> "Following the maxim that equity aids the vigilant and not those who slumber on their rights, it has been universally declared that only conscience, good faith, and reasonable diligence can call a court of equity into activity, and that, entirely independent of any statutory period of limitations, stale demands will not be aided where the claimant has slept upon his rights for so long a time and under such circumstances as to make it inequitable to enter upon an inquiry as to the validity thereof. Where such is the condition, the demand is, in a court of equity, barred by laches. * * * Where the lapse of time in the assertion of the claim and the enforcement thereof, taken in connection with the circumstances disclosed, are such as to show inexcusable delay on the part of the claimant, considerations of public policy, and the difficulty of doing entire justice obtain, and are often sufficient to warrant a court of equity in declining, upon the ground of laches, to commence an investigation."

To the same effect, see Fleming v. Shay, 19 Cal. App. 276, 278, 125 P. 761; Elliott v. Clark, 5 Cal. App. 8, 10, 89 P. 455; Elliott v. Bunce, 10 Cal. App. 741, 744, 193 P. 897; Emerson v. Kennedy Min. & Mill. Co., supra. In the latter case it was declared:

> "The authorities support the proposition that lapse of time may be a good defense in equity, independently of any statute of limitations, and they show that the doctrine rests not alone upon laches; it is often put upon one or all of the following grounds, namely: First, that courts of equity must, for the peace of society and upon grounds of public policy, discourage stale demands by refusing to entertain them; second, that lapse of time will, if long enough, be regarded as evidence against the stale claim equal to that of credible witnesses, and which, being disregarded, would in a majority of cases lead to unjust judgments; third, that, after the witnesses who had personal knowledge of the facts have all passed away, it is impossible to ascertain the facts, and courts of equity will, on this ground, refuse to undertake such a task."

[3] In the present case the Jacob brothers, over a long period of years, dealt with the property in dispute as absolute owners. They developed and perfected the mining claims and water rights in their own names. They invested and reinvested the rents, issues, and profits therefrom in their own names and as they deemed best. They transferred the property so acquired, or interests therein, from one to another, without ever recognizing any other person as having an interest therein. They apparently kept no accounts and rendered none to any one. The alleged trustees died many years after the creation of the alleged trust, and the alleged original beneficiary, Elisa Jacob, died about 48 years subsequent to its alleged creation. This action to enforce the trust was commenced approximately 55 years subsequent to its alleged inception. From the whole complaint it is apparent that the court could only arrive at the respective rights of the parties by going into an investigation of the particulars of purchases and sales of property covering a period in excess of 55 years. All the parties to the original transaction, out of which plaintiffs' alleged claim arose, being dead, it is manifest that it would be practically impossible for a court at this late day to do justice as between the parties.

We conclude, therefore, that the trial court was justified in rendering the judgment of dismissal. We have examined the authorities cited by the plaintiffs, and find nothing therein that would warrant a different conclusion on the record before us.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; TYLER, Justice pro tem.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by Grace Leslie Hugill against A. M. Keene and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Dorsey & Campbell, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Alfred Siemon, Paul F. Garber, and Siemon & Garber, all of Bakersfield, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. Appeal from judgment for plaintiff in an action to rescind the purchase of 10 acres of land upon the ground of fraud and misrepresentation, and to recover the purchase price of $1,000 paid therefor. The several contentions made by appellants involve only questions primarily for the trial court, and as, in our opinion, the evidence warrants no conclusion other than that reached by said court and amply supports the findings and judgment, our consideration of the case compels a resolution of all of said questions in favor of respondent.

Briefly, the facts, as shown and found, are: In 1919 defendant A. M. Keene sold plaintiff said property after she had been led to believe by false representations that it was of the character of land theretofore exhibited to her, located in an oil-producing field, and that it was situated in or near said oil field. Said defendant, in executing and recording the conveyance to plaintiff, knew that the property was located at least 5 miles from the land shown to her; that it was not oil producing, and that within 2½ miles thereof no oil had ever been discovered or exploration for oil development made. In 1922 said defendant paid plaintiff the sum of $151, falsely represented to be dividends under a trust agreement which plaintiff had also been induced to sign, transferring said property to a trust company for development and improvement purposes. In short, without further detailing the testimony, it shows clearly that, by various false and fraudulent representations, plaintiff was deceived and induced to pay said defendant the sum of $1,000 as a part of a scheme or plan to cheat and defraud her. Rescission of the entire transaction was thereafter attempted, but failed because of the attitude of said defendant, and this action was finally instituted in 1924.

Appellants' main attack is directed against the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings and judgment, but such contention, as above stated, we find to be without merit, as the record contains competent evidence sufficient to support each and every finding made.

[1] Appellants urge also that the court failed to find upon the material issue of laches, and they likewise plead the statute of limitations. Upon the question of laches, the court specifically found "that, within a reasonable time after her discovery of the falsity of said representations and of the fraud and deceit that had been practiced upon her, * * * plaintiff notified defendant * * * that she rescinded said agreement of purchase. * * *" As conclusions of law, the court further found that plaintiff's rescission was made within a reasonable time after her discovery of the falsity of said representations, that she commenced her action within a reasonable time thereafter, and that her cause of action was not barred by the provisions of section 338, subd. 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure, or at all. Thus, not only did the court definitely find upon the issue of laches, but the record shows such findings to be justified. "Mere delay in bringing an action for a time less than the period of limitation does not amount to laches. There must be also present the element that the delay has been to the prejudice of the opposite party." Victor Oil Co. v. Drum, 184 Cal. 226, 242, 193 P. 243, 250. Here the court found that defendants suffered no prejudice on account of any delay of plaintiff in rescinding said agreement.

[2] Whether or not a defrauded party has rescinded promptly depends upon the circumstances of each particular case, and is a question primarily for the trial court. French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 579, 589, 217 P. 515. "Whether or not the plaintiffs have been guilty of laches will have to be determined by the evidence adduced at the trial. Each case where laches is depended upon must rest upon its own facts. It is difficult to state as a general proposition what period will bar relief from consequences of fraud, and there is wide scope for the exercise of the discretion of the chancellor." Dufour v. Weissberger, 172 Cal. 223, 225, 155 P. 984, 985; 10 Cal. Jur. p. 526, par. 64; Newport v. Hatton, 195 Cal. 132, 147, 231 P. 987. No abuse of discretion by the trial court is shown in this case.

[3] Section 338, subd. 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure, provides a period of three years within which an action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake shall be commenced, "the cause of action in such case not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery, by the aggrieved party, of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake." Here the court found that the plaintiff did not discover the falsity of the representations which had been made to her by said defendant until after March 14, 1922. This action was instituted in 1924, well within the period prescribed by the statute; hence their plea of the statute of limitations cannot avail appellants.

Numberless authorities may be found upholding the conclusions reached herein, but the plain facts of this case speak for themselves, and we do not deem that the matter warrants further discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

Superior Court of San Joaquin County denying demand for change of place of trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Dean Cunha, of San Francisco, for appellants.

George F. McNoble, Stanley M. Arndt, and McNoble & Arndt, all of Stockton, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. This appeal is from an order denying the demand of appellants for a change of the place of trial from the county of San Joaquin, in which county the action was commenced, to the place of the residence of the respective appellants, to wit, the city and county of San Francisco. It is the contention of respondent that the action is one to remove a cloud upon his real property and for the determination of an interest in said real property, situate in said county of San Joaquin, and that the venue is, under the provisions of section 392, Code of Civil Procedure, where said real property is situated.

The only papers offered upon the hearing in support of the motion were the complaint and the demurrers of the respective appellants, general and special.

[1] In considering the appeal, the allegations of the complaint must be taken as true. The allegations of the complaint are to the effect that respondent was the owner of a large number of lots, pieces, and parcels of land situate in said county of San Joaquin; that on May 18, 1925, and while he was and continued to be such owner, one Barbara Hecker recovered in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco a judgment in the sum of $12,925.73 and costs against him and his cosurety, J. L. Craig, upon an appeal bond jointly executed by them, with one Walter F. Hogan as principal. On May 19, 1925, respondent and said Craig took an appeal from said judgment by filing in the office of the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco a notice of appeal, and entering into a written undertaking on appeal in the sum of $26,000 to stay the execution of said judgment with two sureties, and on said day notified appellants herein that said undertaking had been filed. On May 21, 1925, said appellants served upon respondent, J. A. Coley, and his cosurety, J. L. Craig, notice of exception to said sureties. Five days thereafter, to wit, May 26, 1925, said respondent, Coley, and Craig served upon appellants notice of justification of sureties, and filed said notice on the same day in the office of the county clerk of said city and county of San Francisco. The time therein fixed for justification was May 28, 1925. On the day last above mentioned one of the original sureties and a third person, who was substituted in place of the other original surety, appeared and justified before a judge of the superior court of said city and county of San Francisco upon a written undertaking, as required by law, in the sum of $300 for costs, and in more than double the amount named in said judgment, to wit, the sum of $26,000. Said undertaking was then and there, in the presence of Harry I. Stafford, the agent and attorney for appellant Barbara Hecker, regularly approved by said judge of the superior court. Said appellants were, on said May 28, 1925, regularly notified that said undertaking staying execution had been filed, and that said sureties had justified, and that said bond had been approved by said judge of the superior court.

It is next alleged that on the day following the filing of said stay bond, to wit, May 29, 1925, appellants, acting maliciously, and with the evil purpose of vexing and annoying respondent, and slandering the title to all lands owned by him in the county of San Joaquin, and clouding the title thereto, recorded in the office of the county recorder of San Joaquin county an abstract of judgment in said action, well knowing that said abstract of judgment was inoperative, and of no legal effect, by reason of the filing of said undertaking in said city and county of San Francisco, and that said appellants well knew said abstract of judgment, when filed by them, would be a cloud upon, and a slander against, all the lands owned, or which might thereafter be owned, by respondent situate in said county of San Joaquin. It is further alleged that the recordation of said abstract of judgment decreased the value of said real property and rendered it unmarketable to the damage of respondent in the sum of $26,000.

As an additional damage, respondent alleged that appellants, in recording said abstract of judgment, were moved by malice and a desire to oppress him, and as a penalty therefor he prayed for punitive and exemplary damages in the sum of $25,000. The prayer of the complaint is that appellants be required to set forth the nature of their claims; that it be decreed and adjudged that appellants have no interest or estate in said lands situate in San Joaquin county, and that respondent's title be decreed to be valid in all respects; that appellants be enjoined from asserting any title thereto adverse to respondent; that the recordation of said abstract of judgment recorded in the county of San Joaquin be canceled, and declared null and void, and for general relief.

The first and principal point presented by appellants is that, respondent having joined a real and personal action, to wit, an action to quiet title to real property with an action to recover for slander of title, did thereby lose his right to hold the case in the county where the real property was situate. This contention is based upon the claim that an action for the recovery of damages for slander of title sounds in personal action, and does not bring the venue within the purview of section 392, Code of Civil Procedure. Said section provides:

"Actions for the following causes must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action, or some part thereof, is situated subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial, as provided in this code:

"1. For the recovery of real property, or of an estate or interest therein, or for the determination in any form, of such right or interest, and for injuries to real property; * * *

"3. For the foreclosures of all liens and mortgages on real property."

[2, 3] We think the language of the section clearly justifies the construction that the owner of the slandered title is given the right to bring and maintain the action in the county where the real property is situated, upon the theory that the action is one in which the determination of the owner's right or interest therein is properly adjudicated, and for the additional reason that slander of title is an injury to real property. It is difficult to discern a single consideration which may be assigned as the legislative reason for the adoption of the Code section as to the venue of actions affecting the ownership of an interest in real property that may not with equal force be applied to actions to recover damages for injury for the false and malicious disparagement of the owner's title by another, a wrong which has by use become a recognized phase of the law known as "slander of title." By the filing of the abstract of judgment, duly certified by the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco, said judgment became a lien upon all the real property of the respondent, not exempt from execution, situate in said county of San Joaquin. Section 674, Code Civ. Proc. The enforcement of the judgment had been stayed by the giving of an undertaking on appeal prior to the time said abstract of judgment was filed by appellants, a fact, according to the allegations of the complaint, well known to them, and which was not stated in said abstract of judgment. Prima facie a lien exceeding the sum of $26,000 at once fastened itself upon respondent's San Joaquin county real property. As another ground supporting the intention of the Legislature to cover by said section 392, supra, and fix the venue of all actions wherein title to real property may be affected, it is provided that an action to foreclose liens upon real property must be tried in the county in which the real property is situate. To remove the lien, which constitutes the essence of the injury complained against, the venue of the action would necessarily be in the county in which the real property affected thereby is situate.

[4, 5] Damages for injury to the real property are but an incident to the action to remove the cloud wrongfully cast upon respondent's real property by the filing of said abstract of judgment. It is the proximate result of an alleged wrongful act. The fact that damages are demanded for maliciously doing an act from which an injury is the necessary consequence does not split the action into two separate causes of action merely because dual relief may be properly or improperly sought. And this is especially true where the cause of action sounds in trespass. Gomez v. Reed et al., 178 Cal. 759, 174 P. 658.

[6, 7] The phrase "slander of title" is a figure of speech in which the title is personified. In the instant case, the phrase seems to be an anomaly as applied to a situation which, strictly speaking, is a libel upon the title, inasmuch as the damage was accomplished by the recordation of a written document, and no spoken words were uttered. However, the term "slander of title" includes both spoken and written means by which the right of property may be invaded and a right of action exists, irrespective of the means by which the title is traduced. This is so because a property right has been invaded—an injury to real property has been sustained. "Persons may have a right in or to a thing—the right of property—and this right may be invaded by language concerning the thing. When this invasion occurs, the language which affects a thing is actionable." Edwards v. Burris, 60 Cal. 157, and authorities cited; Fearon v. Fodera et al., 169 Cal. 370, 148 P. 200, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 312.

[8] It is appellants' contention that, by the term "injury to property," as used in section 392, supra, it was intended to include only physical interference with, or physical injury to, real property, such as waste, or some sort of physical trespass committed upon the lands, and that the term was not intended to be as broadly applied as its meaning would seem to imply. In addition to the construction which we feel constrained to place upon said section, and which is supported by the construction given to practically the same language by the Supreme Court of Louisiana in Labarre v. Burton-Swartz, etc., Co., 126 La. 982, 53 So. 113, to the effect that slander of title is an actual intrusion upon one's property, and is in the "nature of a trespass, a real action to protect title," our conclusion is further fortified by eminent authority holding that a libel written or published in disparagement of title is in the nature of an action of trespass on the case. "The term 'injury to real property' is in itself a wider and less technical term than 'trespass to real property.' As applied to questions of venue, it has been declared to embrace every wrong which in legal contemplation is an injury to real property, not only the direct and forcible injury, but consequental injuries, and threatened injuries to land, and even a mere nonfeasance, as permissive waste." 40 Cyc. 74; 17 R. C. L. 454.

[9] The trend of decisions of this court is generally in accord with the doctrine, whenever the question has come before it, that trespasses may be committed by consequential and indirect injuries as well as by direct and forcible injuries. Appellants cite Monk v. Ehret, 192 Cal. 186, 219 P. 452, as a case supporting by analogy the view that the term "injuries to real property" should be interpreted as affecting a physical injury to real property only. Monk v. Ehret had to do largely with "injuries to person," considered with reference to a Code amendment adopted to meet a situation brought about by the increasing use of motor vehicles, as in said case pointed out, and was intended to apply to a trespass based upon false imprisonment. We are satisfied that the Monk Case is not in conflict or inconsistent with the conclusion reached in the instant case.

[10] Burkett v. Griffith, 90 Cal. 532, 27 P. 527, 13 L. R. A. 707, 25 Am. St. Rep. 151, liberally quoted from by appellants, cannot be regarded as an authority ruling the facts of the instant case. In Burkett v. Griffith, supra, the slander consisted of false and malicious statements made by the defendant concerning certain property of the plaintiff. It is therein said that:

> "In order to show that the words uttered have caused injury to the plaintiff, it is generally necessary to aver and show that they were uttered pending some treaty or public auction for the sale of the property, and that thereby some intending purchaser was prevented from bidding or competing. * * * If the plaintiff has merely a general intention to sell, or if the words uttered do not reach any intending purchaser, or if they do not prevent any sale, * * * the plaintiff does not suffer any damage from their utterance."

There the words were merely spoken and were transitory, but in the instant case the libel was recorded in the office of the county recorder where the land was situate, and constituted a continuing, permanent notice to the world that a judgment lien to the extent of more than $12,000 rested upon respondent's real property. In the instant case the libel or slander was communicated to the entire purchasing public. The allegation of the complaint that the malicious recording of said abstract of judgment falsely asserting an interest in said property decreased the value of said real estate and rendered it less marketable is obviously true.

[11] Appellants further contend that the recording of the abstract of judgment, if it gives rise to any cause of action, is one for malicious abuse of process, and consequently is a personal action, the venue of which is at appellants' place of residence. We think there is no merit in the contention that the facts alleged state an action for the abuse of process rather than slander of title. It was the filing, maliciously and falsely, of a document which clouded the title of respondent that caused the injury. The effect would be the same had said document been a forged deed, rather than an unauthorized abstract of judgment. In either event, no question of abuse of process would be involved.

The order is affirmed.

WAGNER v. ULRICH et al. (L. A. 9118.)

Supreme Court of California. June 27, 1928.

Homestead 🔑197—Action to quiet title held proper method of testing sufficiency of homestead declaration, where value of entire land is within statutory limitation (Civ. Code, §§ 1237–1261).

Where defendant in action filed declaration of homestead, held that an action to quiet title by purchaser at constable's sale pursuant to execution to satisfy judgment against such defendant was proper method of testing sufficiency of declaration as to portion of land not used as homestead and claimed to have been improperly included in declaration of homestead, where value of entire land is within statutory limitation; remedy prescribed by Civ. Code, §§ 1237-1261, not being exclusive.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action to quiet title by H. F. Wagner against Harry F. Ulrich and others. From a judgment, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. T. McNeely and Walter Eden, both of Los Angeles, for appellant California Title Ins. Co.

W. T. McNeely, of Los Angeles, for appellants Harry F. Ulrich, Doris E. Ulrich, and Security Trust & Savings Bank.

C. L. Kilgore, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J. The action in which this appeal is prosecuted was instituted for the purpose of quieting title in the plaintiff to the real property described in the complaint.

The plaintiff purchased the property at a constable's sale held in December, 1922, pursuant to execution issued in January, 1922, to satisfy a judgment theretofore, and in December, 1921, rendered against the defendant Harry F. Ulrich. The action in which said judgment was rendered was commenced in the justice's court of Los Angeles township on November 5, 1921. On November 25, 1921, the defendants Ulrich filed a declaration of homestead on said real property. The evidence disclosed that at the time of the declaration there were two houses on the land described therein—one occupied by the defendants Ulrich as a dwelling, and the other leased by them to one Courter. The total value of all the real property described in the declaration was not over $5,000. The trial court found that the portion of said property leased to the tenant was not subject to the declaration of homestead, and gave judgment quieting title in the plaintiff to that portion only. Judgment was entered for the defendant Harry F. Ulrich as to that portion of the property occupied by the defendants Ulrich as a dwelling at the time of the declaration.

Appellants contend that the action to quiet title was not the proper remedy, but that the exclusive remedy is prescribed by sections 1237 to 1261 of the Civil Code. It is not questioned that the declaration of homestead was valid to the extent of the dwelling found to have been occupied by the Ulrichs at the time of the declaration, together with the portion of the land used in connection therewith, and we think the sufficiency of the declaration may be tested as to the portion of the lot not so used in a quiet title proceeding. The sections of the Civil Code relied upon are applicable to cases where land alleged to be of a value in excess of the statutory amount has been attempted to be impressed with a homestead and it is sought to subject the excess to a levy of execution. But said sections of the Code would seem to have no application to cases such as the present one, where a portion of land, the whole of which is valued within the statutory limitation, is claimed to have been improperly included in a declaration of homestead, and is therefore exempt from execution. The distinction between these two classes of cases indicates the reason why our courts have in numerous instances entertained causes and proceedings apart from those prescribed in the Code sections to determine what portion of the land described in the declaration of homestead is needed for the convenient use of the declarant and what portion thereof is excess land. See Gregg v. Bostwick, 33 Cal. 220, 91 Am. Dec. 637; Mann v. Rogers, 35 Cal. 316; Tiernan v. His Creditors, 62 Cal. 286; Laughlin v. Wright, 63 Cal. 113; Maloney v. Hefer, 75 Cal. 422, 17 P. 539, 7 Am. St. Rep. 180; Tromans v. Mahlman, 111 Cal. 646, 44 P. 327; In re Ligget, 117 Cal. 352, 49 P. 211, 59 Am. St. Rep. 190; Guernsey v. Douglas, 171 Cal. 329, 153 P. 227; Lorenz v. Hunt (Cal. App.) 266 P. 617; 13 Cal. Jur. pp. 464, 465.

Appellants also claim that the liens of a deed of trust and a mortgage in favor of defendants title company and bank were and are prior to the lien of the plaintiff. In other words, they contend that the evidence does not sustain the finding of the trial court that their liens were subsequent, because, it is insisted, the deed of trust and the mortgage were a continuation of previous liens which had attached prior to the creation of plaintiff's lien. On the state of the record we are concluded on this point by the finding of the trial court which we deem supported by the evidence. The last point raised is that the levy and subsequent sale were irregular because of certain erroneous recitals of dates in the return and in the certificate of sale. An examination of the record does not disclose any error or irregularity sufficient to invalidate the proceedings.

CURTIS v. THAXTER. (L. A. 9491.)

Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1928.

1. Usury 🔑49—Provision of note for maximum rate of interest and for addition to principal if unpaid violates statute (Usury Law, § 2).

Provision of note for maximum rate of interest allowed by Usury Law, § 2 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757), and for payment of interest quarterly and addition to principal if not paid, violated such section.

2. Usury 🔑111(1)—It is not necessary to plead usury, where face of contract shows usurious character.

It is not necessary to plea usury, where contract shows its usurious character on its face, and it is court's duty sua sponte to deny any interest.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edward T. Bishop, Judge.

Action by Emma F. Curtis against Laurie E. Thaxter, to foreclose a mortgage and recover on note. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Hugh Gordon, of San Francisco, for appellant.

George M. Harker, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. This is an action to recover upon a promissory note and to foreclose the mortgage securing it; default having been made in the payment of both principal and interest. The terms of the note, so far as here material, are as follows:

> "* * * I promise to pay * * * three thousand * * * dollars with interest from date until paid at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum; payable quarterly. Should the interest not be so paid, it shall become a part of the principal, and thereafter bear like interest as the principal. * * *"

The answer admitted the principal indebtedness, but denied any liability for interest.

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

Judgment of foreclosure, however, went for plaintiff in an amount which included both said principal sum of the note and interest thereon at 12 per cent. per annum compounded quarterly to date of trial.

Allowance of usurious interest is the only error claimed. In other words, the question is: Does the provision in the note for payment of interest quarterly at the maximum legal rate, and compounded if not so paid, render said interest usurious, void, and forfeited by virtue of section 2 of the Usury Law (Act 3757, Deering's Gen. Laws, 1923, Part 1, p. 1384)?

Section 2 of said statute reads in part:

> "No person * * * shall directly or indirectly take or receive * * * any greater sum * * * for the loan * * * of money * * * than at the rate of twelve dollars upon one hundred dollars for one year. * * * Any agreement or contract of any nature in conflict with the provisions of this section shall be null and void as to any agreement or stipulation therein contained to pay interest and no action at law to recover interest in any sum shall be maintained and the debt cannot be declared due until the full period of time it was contracted for has elapsed."

[1, 2] Several opinions have recently been handed down by this court upholding the constitutionality of the Usury Law (In re Washer, 200 Cal. 598, 254 P. 951) and construing the above and other provisions of it. The very question here presented is determined in and controlled by the case of Haines v. Com. Mtg. Co., 200 Cal. 609, 624, 254 P. 956, 255 P. 805, 53 A. L. R. 725, wherein it is held that a contention that, as long as the limit of the rate of interest is maintained at 12 per cent. per annum, the compounding of the interest, if not paid at the time provided for, should be allowed, is in the teeth of the statute itself, and cannot be maintained. It is not even necessary to plead usury where the contract shows on its face its usurious character. Under such circumstances it is the duty of the court sua sponte to deny any interest. Wallace v. Zinman, 200 Cal. 585, 589, 254 P. 946. These rulings have been reannounced in English v. Culley (Cal. App.) 259 P. 355, where facts similar to those of the instant case are presented. See, also, Verbeck v. Clymer (Cal. Sup.) 261 P. 1017, and Blodgett v. Rheinschild, 56 Cal. App. 728, 206 P. 674. Admittedly the enforcement of this rule may work a hardship but the answer is that the plain reading of the statute compels such interpretation thereof.

The judgment is modified to exclude the allowance of any interest. The second paragraph thereof is hereby stricken out and a new provision is inserted in its stead to read as follows:

> "Now therefore it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff have judgment against defendant Laurie E. Thaxter for three thousand (3,000) dollars and costs of suit and of sale of the property hereinafter described."

And the fifth paragraph thereof is likewise hereby stricken out and a new provision is inserted in its stead to read as follows:

> "2. That the sum of three thousand dollars ($3,000) to the plaintiff and plaintiff's further costs of suit amounting to fourteen dollars ($14.00)."

As so modified, said judgment is affirmed.

BROWNE v. T. J. LAWRENCE CO. et al.

1. Appeal and error 🔑907(3)—On appeal on the judgment roll alone finding is deemed supported by evidence, unless contrary is conclusively shown by judgment roll.

On appeal on judgment roll alone finding that plaintiff received nothing of value under agreements sought to be canceled must be deemed supported by evidence, unless contrary is conclusively shown by judgment roll itself.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑341(2)—No offer to return everything of value need be alleged or proven when nothing of value was received (Civ. Code, § 1691, subd. 2).

When nothing of value has been received, it is unnecessary, in action to cancel agreements and recover partial payments, to allege or prove an offer to return everything of value, and Civ. Code, § 1691, subd. 2, does not apply.

3. Judgment 🔑194—Trial 🔑397(1)—Vendor and purchaser 🔑341(4, 6)—Court should have made findings and judgment on issues raised by cross-complaint seeking determination of interests under earlier agreements.

In action to cancel agreements to purchase land and recover partial payments, where cross-complaint sought determination of parties' interests in land covered by earlier agreement, court should have made findings and rendered judgment on issues joined thereon.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1178(6)—Case will not be remanded for further proceedings respecting cross-complaint, when plaintiff disclaims and consents to modification.

In suit to cancel agreements to purchase lots and recover partial payments, where cross-complaint sought determination of parties' interests in lots covered by earlier agreement, and answer admitted plaintiff claimed such interest, but on appeal plaintiff disclaimed any interest, and consented to modification of judgment, case would not be remanded for want of findings or judgment on such issues.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Mayme C. Browne, a married woman, against the T. J. Lawrence Company and another, to cancel agreements to purchase real property and to recover partial payments made thereon. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Moote & Patterson and Noren Eaton, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Mart Coles, of Los Angeles (Wm. G. Randall, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff in an action wherein the plaintiff sought to cancel certain agreements to purchase real property and to recover partial payments on the purchase price made thereunder.

On January 18, 1924, the plaintiff entered into two agreements in writing with the defendant T. J. Lawrence Company, whereby the latter agreed to reserve for the plaintiff, at a specified purchase price, lots 96 and 97 of tract No. 7888, Pacific Gateway tract, a subdivision then being formed. These agreements were preliminary and it was understood that final contracts of purchase and sale were to be signed later. Pursuant to these preliminary agreements the plaintiff made payments on the purchase price of the lots described therein. In March, 1924, the defendant Lawrence Company presented to the plaintiff the final agreements to purchase, which the plaintiff signed, and pursuant to which she continued to make payments on the purchase price up to a total of $1,312.50 in the belief that she was paying for and acquiring lots 96 and 97 of tract No. 7888. Thereafter the plaintiff discovered that the agreements to purchase signed in March described lots 96 and 97 in tract No. 5498, Pacific Gateway Tract, instead of lots 96 and 97 in tract No. 7888 as described in the preliminary agreements. The plaintiff brought this action for cancellation of the contracts and the return of the moneys paid thereunder. The plaintiff had not yet received any title under the contracts, nor had she entered into possession.

The trial court found that the lots described in the contracts of sale were not the same lots described in the preliminary agreements; that no consideration passed to the plaintiff for the moneys paid to the defendant; and rendered judgment canceling the contracts and for the repayment to the plaintiff of the sums paid thereunder. From this judgment, the defendants have appealed on the judgment roll alone.

[1, 2] It is the contention of the defendants that the complaint and findings are insufficient because the plaintiff's notice and demand alleged and found to have been given to and made upon defendants prior to the commencement of the action did not contain an offer to return everything of value which the plaintiff received under the contracts. The court found that the plaintiff received nothing of value from the defendants on account of the money paid by her. On an appeal on the judgment roll alone that finding must be deemed supported by the evidence, unless the contrary is conclusively shown by the judgment roll itself. When nothing of value has been received, it is well settled that it is unnecessary to allege or prove an offer to return everything of value, and the rule laid down in subdivision 2 of section 1691 of the Civil Code does not apply.

It is contended, however, by the defendants that the judgment roll on its face shows that the plaintiff had received something of value from the defendants for the payment of her money. This contention is based on the following condition of the record: In addition to their answer the defendants filed a cross-complaint against the plaintiff wherein it was alleged that the defendant bank was and is the owner in fee and entitled to the possession of lots 96 and 97 of Pacific gateway tract No. 5498, and that the plaintiff claimed some interest in and to said lots adverse to the defendants, which claim was without right. The cross-complaint prayed that the plaintiff be required to set forth her interest in said property; that the rights of the parties be determined; and that it be decreed that the claims of the plaintiff are without right. The plaintiff filed an answer to this cross-complaint wherein she admitted an interest in said lots in tract No. 5498 by virtue of the agreements of March 4, 1924, and prayed that the defendants take nothing by their cross-complaint. In the absence of any record of the evidence taken at the trial, we are not prepared to say that the admission of the plaintiff in her answer to the cross-complaint would conclusively rebut and overthrow the finding of the court in the main action that the plaintiff had received nothing of value for the money she had paid to the defendants.

[3, 4] The trial court made no finding or judgment on the issues joined on the cross-complaint, which, of course, was an independent cause of action. We think the court should have done so. Findings on those issues would seem to be required in order to terminate this litigation, if it were not for the fact that the plaintiff now disclaims any interest in said lots and consents that the judgment be modified accordingly. Under these circumstances it would be useless to remand the cause for further proceedings.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the trial court herein be modified by adding thereto the following:

"It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff has no right, title, or interest in and to lots 96 and 97 of Pacific Gateway tract No. 5498, as per map of said tract recorded in Book 90 at pages 10 and 11 of Maps, in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county, and she is forever barred from asserting any claim or title thereto whatsoever."

As so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

PACIFIC INDEMNITY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al.

(S. F. 12794.)

Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1928.

1. Master and servant 🔑405(5)—Evidence held to support finding in compensation proceeding that mother was wholly dependent on deceased son (Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act).

In a mother's proceeding, under the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831), to recover compensation for the death of her son, evidence held to support finding that she was wholly dependent on him and that another son contributed nothing to her support.

2. Master and servant 🔑405(5)—Commission held justified in disregarding small amount received by petitioner in determining dependency (Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act).

In mother's proceeding, under Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831), for compensation for death of her son, where evidence showed that apartment house proprietor allowed the mother a "little" for showing people rooms until he could get somebody to manage the place, the commission was justified in disregarding the amount received, in determining question of dependency, as inconsequential and temporary.

3. Master and servant 🔑416—Finding that payment based upon earnings of $5 a day for six days a week held sufficient (Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act).

In proceeding for compensation for death, under Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831), finding of Industrial Accident Commission that payments therein specified were based upon earnings of $5 a day for six days a week, was sufficient finding as to earnings.

4. Master and servant 🔑405(6)—Stipulation held to support finding as to average weekly earnings (Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act, § 12 [a] [1]).

In workmen's compensation proceeding, stipulation that deceased's average earnings were $5 a day for six days a week was sufficient to support finding as to his average weekly earnings, though there was no evidence that he had worked in the same employment for 260 days as provided by Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act, § 12 (a), (1), (St. 1917, p. 831).

5. Master and servant 🔑391¼—Industrial Accident Commission was without authority to allow interest on unpaid portions of award (Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act).

In compensation proceeding under Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831), portion of award allowing interest on unpaid portions was outside authority of the commission.

In Bank.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act by Mrs. Minnie Jaynes, claimant, to recover compensation for the death of her son, John Jaynes, opposed by the Pacific Indemnity Company, insurance carrier of the Page Modern Garage, employer. Compensation was awarded by the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California, and the insurance carrier brings certiorari. Award affirmed in part, and annulled in part.

Cooley, Crowley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. This is a proceeding to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of Mrs. Minnie Jaynes, the mother of John Jaynes, who met his death while in the employ of the Page Modern Garage. The petitioner was the insurance carrier of the employer. The award was based upon the finding of the commission that said John Jaynes left surviving him his mother, who was wholly dependent upon him. The amount of the award, aside from burial expense, was $4,446, payable $5.29 forthwith and the further sum of $18.52 per week, beginning September 8, 1927, and continuing until the whole of the award shall have been paid. It is further provided in the award that all payments shall bear interest from the date of the award until paid, or until the date at which payments become due.

Petitioner attacks the award upon three grounds: First, that there is no evidence to justify the finding of the commission that the applicant, Mrs. Minnie Jaynes, was wholly dependent for her support upon the deceased; second, insufficiency of the findings to support the award; third, that the commission exceeded its jurisdiction in allowing interest upon the deferred payments.

[1] First. In support of its claim that there is no evidence to support the finding of the commission that Mrs. Jaynes was totally dependent upon the earnings of her deceased son, petitioner relies upon certain evidence to the effect that Mrs. Jaynes was, at the time her said son was injured, receiving support from another of her sons, who was residing with her at said time, and also upon certain evidence that she was receiving compensation as manager of the apartment house in which she and her two sons were residing as tenants. The household of Mrs. Jaynes at the time of her son's injury consisted of herself and her two sons, John, aged 27 years, and Herman, aged 22 years. The evidence shows that John was at the time he received the injury which caused his death receiving in wage $5 per day, and that he worked six days a week. After taking out a few dollars each week for personal expenses he turned the balance of his wages over to his mother for the support of the family household. The amount thus paid his mother is shown by the evidence to be approximately $25 per week. The other son, Herman, had been out of employment since May 7, 1927, and only secured a position on August 14, 1927. The date upon which John Jaynes received his fatal injury was September 3, 1927. He died two days later. Herman Jaynes testified that he had contributed nothing to his mother's support during the time he was out of employment, which was from May 7th to August 14, 1927, and that since securing employment, on account of a number of unsettled accounts owing to other persons, he had not contributed anything toward his mother's support. As to the amount contributed by Herman before losing his position in May, 1927, the evidence shows that he paid to his mother only about $6 per week, which amount would not more than pay for his own board and room. We think the commission was justified in concluding that Herman was not at the time his brother John was injured contributing anything to his mother's support.

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

[2] As to petitioner's contention that Mrs. Jaynes was receiving compensation as manager of the apartment house in which she and her sons resided, there is but little if any evidence to support such a claim. The evidence shows that the apartment house had recently changed hands, and that Mrs. Jaynes was showing people the rooms therein for the new proprietor until he could get somebody to manage the place for him, for which services she was allowed a "little"; the evidence does not show the exact amount. The commission undoubtedly considered this amount inconsequential, and the duration of such employment but temporary. Under such conditions, it was justified in disregarding the amount so received in determining the question of the total dependency of Mrs. Jaynes. Peterson v. Industrial Acc. Com., 188 Cal. 15, 204 P. 390.

Petitioner further claims that Mrs. Jaynes testified that the family expenses amounted to $132 to $146 per month, and that she only received $25 per week from her son John. From this evidence petitioner contends that it conclusively appears that she was not totally dependent upon her son John for support. In the first place, these items of expense were only given approximately by her. In the second place, they include the support of her son Herman. If we deduct from the total amount of the household expenses as given by her the reasonable cost of board and room rent for Herman, the difference is not far from the amount contributed by John during his lifetime toward the support of the household. There is no merit, we think, in this contention of petitioner.

[3] Second. Petitioner contends that there is no finding by the commission as to the average annual earnings of the deceased, and that without such a finding the award cannot be sustained. Finding 3 of the commission is as follows:

> "The employee left surviving him, and wholly dependent upon him, Minnie Jaynes, his mother, who is entitled to a death benefit of $4,446.00, payable at the rate of $18.52 per week, together with an award for $150 burial expense payable direct to Barry & McDonnell, and that said burial expense has been paid by the insurance carrier. The payments herein mentioned are based upon earning of $5 a day for employment six days a week. Amount accrued to and including September 7, 1927, (2/7 week) is the sum of $5.29."

By the italicized portion of this finding shown above the commission evidently intended to fix the average weekly earnings of the deceased. While the finding is not clear or as explicit as it might be, yet we think it is sufficient for the purpose intended. Having found the average weekly earnings of the deceased, it was simply a matter of computation under the provisions of the "Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act" (St. 1917, p. 831) to ascertain his average annual earnings. The basic fact, therefore, for determination by the commission, was the average weekly earnings of the deceased, and, having found that fact, the commission could and did compute the amount of the award based upon said average weekly earnings.

[4] Petitioner contends that there was no evidence to support the finding of the commission as to the average weekly earnings of the deceased. It is true that there is no evidence that deceased worked in the same employment as that followed by him at the time of his injury for the period of 260 days, as provided by section 12 (a) (1) of said act but it was stipulated by the parties to the proceeding before the commission that the average earnings of the deceased were $5 per day, working six days per week. This stipulation, we think, was sufficient to support the finding of the commission as to the average weekly earnings of the deceased.

[5] Third. That portion of the award allowing interest on the unpaid portions of the award is without the authority of the commission. Pacific Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com. (Cal. Sup.) 261 P. 987. It should, therefore, be annulled.

The award, excepting that portion thereof calling for interest, is affirmed. The order providing for payments of interest on the award is annulled.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Thompson, Judge.

Action to establish a trust, brought by Jessie Guilloz against Ida J. Parkinson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. J. Miller, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Stewart & Stewart, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J. The plaintiff is the daughter, and the defendant is the sister, of Charles A. Parkinson, who died testate on April 7, 1921, in the county of Los Angeles. The will of the decedent, bearing date March 18, 1921, was admitted to probate on the 9th day of the following May. The decedent left as heirs at law his widow, who resided in Michigan, two sons, and the plaintiff. The will acknowledged the marital relationship of the testator, made certain bequests to his children, and designated the defendant herein as the residuary legatee and devisee. Certain real estate located in Fresno, Hollywood, and in the city of Detroit had been acquired by the decedent, and at the time of his death the title to the Fresno and Detroit properties stood of record in the name of the defendant, and the title to the Hollywood property stood in the name of the decedent.

In connection with the purchase of the Hollywood property the escrow instructions provided for the transfer of the title thereto to Charles A. Parkinson and Ida J. Parkinson as tenants in common, but through some inadvertence the deed signed by the grantors was in form a grant deed, with Charles A. Parkinson named as the sole grantee. Before this deed was recorded the same was altered by the notary, who took the acknowledgment of the grantors, without the latter's consent, so as to cause the grantees therein to appear as provided for in the escrow instructions. The defendant herein brought an action to have said deed reformed, so as to conform to the escrow instructions; but she was unsuccessful in that litigation. The court decided in that case that the plaintiff therein, the defendant herein, was entitled to no legal or equitable relief with reference to said deed, so as to give her any right, title, or interest in or to said property. The effect of that litigation was to cause the Hollywood property to be inventoried in the estate of the decedent. In the course of probate it was sold, and the defendant herein became the purchaser for cash.

The plaintiff, joining with others interested, commenced a proceeding to revoke the probate of the will of the decedent, on the ground that the same was void, as having been procured through the exercise of undue influence on the mind of the testator by the defendant herein. This contest resulted in the denial of any relief to the contestants, and the order refusing to revoke the probate of the will was affirmed on appeal. Estate of Parkinson, 190 Cal. 475, 213 P. 259. An order of the probate court granting to the surviving widow a family allowance was also affirmed on appeal. Estate of Parkinson, 193 Cal. 354, 224 P. 453.

Under date of April 19, 1921, the defendant executed a deed quitclaiming to the plaintiff all of her right, title, and interest in and to the Detroit property. Later on the defendant brought an action against the plaintiff in Wayne county, Michigan, to have it declared that said deed was and is void, and that action is still pending.

Following the affirmance by this court in February, 1923, of the order refusing to revoke the probate of said will, the plaintiff brought the present action to have it declared that, notwithstanding the residuary clause in said will, vesting title in the defendant to the real propery of the decedent's estate, the defendant is holding the title to all of said real property as trustee of and for the plaintiff, by reason of an alleged promise on the part of the defendant to the testator to convey said real property to the plaintiff, a partial execution of that trust by the quitclaim deed to the plaintiff of the Detroit property, and a subsequent renunciation of said trust relationship by the commencement of the action in Michigan and the assertion by the defendant of ownership in and to all of said real property. The plaintiff in this action prays that all of said real properties be impressed with the alleged trust, that instruments be executed by the defendant conveying title thereto to the plaintiff, and that the defendant be restrained from prosecuting said suit to set aside the deed in Detroit. After a protracted trial on the merits, the court found against the plaintiff on all of the material issues, and rendered judgment accordingly. From that judgment this appeal is taken.

[1, 2] The greater part of the voluminous briefs of the plaintiff constitute an argument as to the weight of the evidence bearing upon the issue of the alleged trust relationship. The trial court permitted wide latitude in the introduction of eidence and was painstaking in the consideration of the case. The record discloses inconsistencies in the statements of witnesses for both parties. However, the evidence was conflicting, and it is not for this court to resolve the conflict. In order to do so would require us to judge of the credibility of the witnesses. A survey of the record discloses that there is sufficient evidence to support the findings. The validity of the will has been conclusively established. As to the Hollywood property there is no contention that the purchase thereof by the defendant was irregular, or that full value was not paid therefor or that the purchase price was not paid into the estate. The judgment in the reformation suit did not purport to adjudicate the rights of the defendant thereto under the will. Under the facts as found by the court and otherwise disclosed by the record, the purchase of that property by the defendant was consummated in order to pay the costs of administration and of litigation in which the estate had become involved.

The defendant has title to the Fresno property, either by the sheriff's deed to her, following the assignment of the certificate of sale to her by the decedent, or under the terms of the residuary clause in the will. As to the Detroit property the court found that the defendant originally acquired title thereto as security for the repayment of money advanced to the decedent by the defendant, and that after repayment had been made the record title was continued in the defendant by the decedent until his death, for the express purpose of defrauding his wife. The court further found that it is not true that the defendant held title to any of the property of the decedent by or through any fraud practiced or committed by her.

Both parties to this case appear to concede that the title to that property was continued in the defendant for the purpose of defrauding the wife of the decedent. The court found, however, that the continuation of this record title in the defendant was not because of her wish or desire. The record supports the conclusion that the decedent, by instruments executed by the defendant in 1905, had it within his power to cause the transfer of the title to said property to himself at any time before his death.

[3-5] As to the controversy over this Detroit property, the trial court found and concluded that at the time of the death of the decedent the same became a part of his estate. Notwithstanding this finding, the court further concluded that it had no jurisdiction to adjudicate with respect to the rights, if any, of the plaintiff and the defendant therein arising out of any transactions between them, and held that the parties must seek their remedy by the litigation in the courts of the state of Michigan. Taken alone and without qualification, the latter conclusion might well be questioned, as the court would have the power in a proper case to assume jurisdiction and render judgment in personam, and control the acts of the parties in regard to properties outside the jurisdiction of California. Title Insurance Co. v. California Development Co., 171 Cal. 173, 152 P. 542.

The conclusion of the court that it had no jurisdiction to adjudicate with respect to the rights of the parties hereto in the Detroit property must be considered in the light of the finding and conclusions of the court, elsewhere expressed, that the defendant did not take or hold said property as trustee for the plaintiff's benefit. As we read the record, the court merely concluded that it should not render a judgment in personam the effect of which would be to determine the litigation pending in Michigan for the annulment and cancellation of the deed filed of record in that state and thus directly adjudicate the status of the res, a question determinable in the forum of the situs of the property. If the ruling of the trial court be of broader significance than that here indicated, we cannot say, under the circumstances here shown, that the ruling was prejudicial to the appellant in view of what was actually and properly decided by the trial court.

Other points made by the parties need not be discussed.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Action in partition by Thomas J. Horan against Mary A. Varian, H. M. Driscoll, R. McColgan, and others, in which H. M. Driscoll filed a cross-complaint. From the decree, McColgan appeals. Modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

Superseding opinion in 265 P. 263.

George D. Collins, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellant.

Loyd Wright, of Los Angeles, and Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for respondent H. M. Driscoll.

PRESTON, J. This is an appeal by one defendant from a portion of an interlocutory decree in partition. The contest is really a claim of priority between appellant and respondent Driscoll in and to a portion of the fund arising from a sale of the property for partition. The story opens with the death intestate and without issue of Sabina A. Lanon, leaving a considerable estate in Los Angeles county. A contest arose as to the persons who were entitled to inherit said estate under the laws of California. An impostor, Kyle, who claimed to be decedent's son, asserted the right to inherit the whole thereof; other claimants were Mary A. Varian, a sister, and Mark Edward James Horan, John P. Horan, and Thomas J. Horan, nephews.

In October, 1921, one W. C. Cox of Chicago, known as a "lost heir hunter," secured from said sister and from two of said nephews an assignment of a one-third interest in and to their respective portions of said estate, upon the consideration that he should employ and pay attorneys and bear the other expenses necessary to establish their heirship thereto. Said persons executing this conveyance claimed a $\frac{45}{64}$ interest in said estate. On November 25, 1921, said Cox assigned his right in said conveyances to one E. A. Platt, also an "heir hunter," who was to carry out the covenants made with the said claimants with respect to the establishment of their heirship to said estate, said Cox upon distribution to receive one-third of the third transferred to him by said claimants, or $\frac{5}{64}$ of said estate. Platt thereupon employed attorneys George K. Ford and Lloyd Wright to wage the legal battle necessary to establish the rights of said claimants. The fee of said attorneys was to be a contingent percentage of said estate so recovered by them. They did successfully rout as an impostor the said Kyle, and established the claim of these assignors as heirs to said estate, but their fees were not paid, and their claim for them is the basis of the litigation out of which has grown the present appeal; said attorneys having assigned their respective interests for collection to respondent H. M. Driscoll.

During the pendency of said litigation in said estate, Platt removed to Paris, and remained there at all times herein, leaving not only the above-mentioned attorneys' fees unpaid, but other creditors as well, among whom was appellant McColgan. Looking to payment of their claims against Platt and acting together, McColgan and Ford induced Platt to execute a general power of attorney, prepared by said Ford, to said McColgan, the idea evidently being to dispose of the California property of Platt, including that to be derived from said estate, and to pay the said attorneys' fees, the claim of McColgan against Platt, and perhaps other creditors. Acting in apparent harmony, McColgan, as attorney in fact, conveyed the interest of Platt in the above-mentioned estate to one Russell, who paid nothing for the transfer, claimed no interest in the property, and who, of course, was merely acting as intermediary or trustee for the better handling of the property to which Platt had title.

Distribution of said estate was applied for and the Cox-Platt interest therein, to wit, 15/64 thereof, was distributed to said Russell. The date of the transfer to Russell was June 29, 1922; the date of the decree of distribution was September 7, 1922. Following the distribution of said interest to Russell, Cox received from him on October 20, 1922, in settlement of his claim, a conveyance of 5/64 interest in said real property. About April 20, 1923, Russell, at the instance of Ford and McColgan, instituted a partition proceeding touching the real property distributed in said estate. Prior thereto, however, and on November 14, 1922, H. M. Driscoll, assignee of Ford and Wright above mentioned, commenced an action in the superior court of the state of California against said heirs who made assignments to Cox and also against Platt, for the sum of $8,000, together with interest, as attorneys' fees in said estate matter, and caused to be issued on said day a writ of attachment which was duly levied upon the property of said Platt remaining in the name of Russell, to wit, 5/27 interest in said real property, the subject of the decree of distribution in said estate. Ford testified that this suit and attachment was with the consent and at the suggestion of appellant McColgan, in order to prevent other creditors from levying attachments thereon. It is certain that all the parties were friendly and co-operating at this time and for several months thereafter.

Following this event, however, on the 11th day of June, 1923, Thomas J. Horan, the nephew who did not join in the transfer to Cox and one of the established heirs of said estate, began the present proceeding in partition, making said Russell, said Cox, said Driscoll, said McColgan, and others, defendants herein. The record shows that friendliness and co-operation still obtained between Ford, McColgan, and Platt during the settlement of the issues in this present partition proceeding. However, in the fall of 1923 something came over the spirit of the dreams of McColgan, for on January 9, 1924, we find him therefor bearing date of September 28, claim to all of the property left standing in the name of Russell. In confirmation of such claim, he produced a deed from Russell to him therefore bearing date of September 28, 1922, but not filed for record until August 20, 1923. Relying upon said deed, McColgan asserts that this property derived from the estate of Lanon, to wit, a 5/27 interest therein, belongs to him free of any claim under said attachment levied in the said Driscoll action. He refused to treat further with the hired servants who made the realization of the fund possible. The law of California gives the attorneys no right to assert a lien upon the fund realized for the value of their services in connection therewith; hence Ford and Wright rely upon the efficacy of the attachment to hold their priority over the McColgan deed.

The court in this connection found that Russell took said deed from Platt without consideration, and as the trustee of said Platt, who, at the time of the levy of said attachment, was the owner of the equitable title in and to said real property so conveyed, and further found that the deed to McColgan, although executed prior to the levy of said attachment, was not delivered until subsequent thereto. The interlocutory decree followed this finding, but the findings and judgment went further than this, in that the court found that McColgan also took said deed as trustee of the legal title for Platt. The finding in this latter behalf is as follows:

> "Seven. That the defendant Lyman Russell was at the time of the commencement of said action the holder of the legal title as tenant in common of an undivided 10/64 interest in said property; that, prior to the time of the commencement of the above-mentioned action, said Lyman Russell signed and acknowledged and, after the commencement of said action, delivered a certain deed wherein and whereby said Lyman Russell conveyed the legal title to said undivided 10/64 interest in and to said property to defendant R. McColgan, who acquired and holds said undivided 10/64 interest in and to said property as the trustee of a constructive trust in favor of said Eugene A. Platt, and not otherwise; and that said Eugene A. Platt was at the time of the commencement of said action, since has been, and is now, the owner and seized in fee-simple absolute as a tenant in common of said undivided 10/64 interest in and to said property. In this connection the court further finds that all of the allegations of the first and second separate defenses contained in the amendment to the answer of the defendant H. M. Driscoll and all of the allegations of the first and second counts of the cross-complaint of defendant H. M. Driscoll against defendant R. McColgan herein are true."

The portion of the pleadings adopted by the findings as far as here material is as follows:

> "* * * That prior to said November 14, 1922, without instructions from, notice to, consent of, valuable or any consideration to, or thereafter or at all, reporting the same to said Eugene A. Platt, said R. McColgan, as said attorney in fact for said Eugene A. Platt, made, executed, and delivered an assignment and transfer, whereby said Eugene A. Platt, by and through his said attorney in fact, assigned and transferred the legal title to said undivided 5/18 interest in and to said property to Lyman Russell; that said undivided 5/18 interest in and to said property thereafter and at the time said attachment was levied, as aforesaid, stood of record in the name of said Lyman Russell. * * *"

[1] Appellant at this point insists that there is no warrant in the evidence for a finding that he held the legal title to said property as trustee for the equitable owner, Platt. He contends that the evidence not only shows no fact warranting such a conclusion, but shows affirmatively that Platt, on the 11th day of April, 1924, executed a written instrument confirming the absolute title in him. From the evidence we must conclude that the findings and judgment are too broad in this respect and that appellant, at least on and after April 11, 1924, did not hold the legal title as trustee for Platt, but held same in his own right.

[2] It is next contended by appellant that the evidence does not furnish support for the finding that, when the attachment was levied to wit, November 14, 1922, the property was owned by Platt and stood in the name of Russell but appellant insists that the deed to him though unrecorded was nevertheless delivered at or about the date it bears which said date antedates the attachment levy. We do not so view the evidence. When it is borne in mind that the power of attorney was prepared by Ford while acting in conjunction with appellant for the purpose of getting themselves in a position to realize upon the property interest of Platt in order to pay Ford and his associate their attorneys' fee and to pay appellant his claim against Platt the significance of further facts clearly appears among which are the following: (1) The transfer from Platt to Russell was made in furtherance of the purpose above noted; (2) the property in the Lanon estate was distributed in the name of Russell; (3) after the date of the deed to appellant and date of delivery thereof as claimed and after the levy of attachment both Russell and appellant claimed the legal title to be in Russell and Russell thereafter made a deed of Cox's interest in said property to him; (4) after the claimed date of delivery of said deed appellant Ford and Russell caused a partition suit to be filed in which Russell was named as owner of said property and made plaintiff in said action, verifying under oath the allegation that he was on such date the owner thereof; (5) the testimony of Ford was that appellant admitted to him that said property stood in the name of Russell, and, while so admitting, advised him to file the attachment suit here under consideration for the purpose of protecting the property against the claim of creditors other than themselves; (6) for almost a year after the levy of said attachment said attorneys and appellant remained on friendly relations, appellant using Mr. Bourquin, an associate of Ford, as his own attorney in filing an answer in the present partition proceeding, in which no denial whatever was made of the validity and integrity of the attachment.

These and other facts in the record well warranted the court in disregarding the positive swearing of Russell and appellant as to the date of delivery of said deed. Indeed, the domination of Russell by appellant and his repeated refusal, until compelled to do so, to answer questions pertaining to the date of delivery of said deed, while acting under the instructions of appellant's attorney at the time, furnish still further grounds for disregarding such testimony altogether. The case seems clearly to be one where appellant saw what he believed was a chance to pay himself at the expense of attorneys Ford and Wright, whose labors produced the fund which he wants decreed to him. Appellant, tiring of riding side by side with his fellow creditors, maneuvered with "spur and rein" to lead, and it is but a just decree of fate and law if he now finds himself riding in the rear.

[3] Property standing in the name of one person, but owned by the debtor, may be attached at the suit of the creditor. Section 542, subd. 2, Code Civ. Proc.; Brown v. Campbell, 100 Cal. 635, 35 P. 433, 38 Am. St. Rep. 314; Bank of San Francisco v. Pike, 53 Cal. App. 524, 200 P. 752; 23 C. J., p. 344.

The court held the attachment lien valid, and reserved for future action the proceeds of sale of the property interests here in dispute. This was proper. If a judgment is obtained in the attachment proceedings, the court can subject all or so much of this fund as may be necessary to the discharge of such judgment. In view of the possibility of the attachment proceedings failing to absorb all the Russell-Platt-McColgan interest in said fund, it is proper that the interlocutory decree be modified so as to secure to appellant any surplus remaining.

Accordingly, paragraph 7 of said interlocutory decree is hereby stricken out, and a new provision is inserted in its stead to read as follows:

"7. That the defendant R. McColgan is the owner, as a tenant in common, of an undivided 10/64 interest in and to said property, subject, however, to the lien of attachment of the defendant H. M. Driscoll in that certain action entitled 'H. M. Driscoll, Plaintiff, v. Mary A. Varian, John P. Horan, Mark Edward James Horan and Eugene A. Platt, Defendants,' pending in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Los Angeles, register No. 113617," —and paragraph 9 of said interlocutory decree is also hereby stricken out and a new provision inserted in its stead to read as follows:

"9. That the interests of said Mary A. Varian, Thomas P. Horan, Mark Edward James Horan, Eugene A. Platt, and R. McColgan are subject to the lien of attachment of the defendant H. M. Driscoll in that certain action entitled 'H. M. Driscoll, Plaintiff, v. Mary A. Varian, John P. Horan, Mark Edward James Horan, and Eugene A. Platt, Defendants,' pending in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Los Angeles, register No. 113617."

The other questions discussed in the briefs are not considered, as under the holding here made they are immaterial. The interlocutory decree as modified is affirmed.

BAIRD et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 12224.)

Supreme Court of California. June 25, 1928.

1. Judgment ⚷948(½)—Plea of res judicata in and of itself is insufficient to oust court of jurisdiction.

While res judicata must be affirmatively relied on and shown in evidence to be available, and in some cases must be pleaded, the plea in and of itself is not sufficient to oust the court of jurisdiction.

2. Prohibition ⚷5(3)—Prohibition held not to lie to prevent further proceedings upon petition for distribution on ground former judgment was res judicata.

Prohibition held not to lie to prevent further proceedings upon a petition for distribution on ground that former judgment, entered in obedience to mandate of Supreme Court on similar petition, was res judicata, which contention was denied by claimant to estate, since question of res judicata was for determination of the trial court.

3. Prohibition ⚷17—Objection to jurisdiction should be urged and overruled by trial court before applying for prohibition.

Ordinarily objection to jurisdiction should be urged before trial court and overruled before applying for prohibition.

In Bank.

Application for writ of prohibition by Veronica C. Baird and others, prayed to be directed to the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and another. Writ denied.

Superseding opinion in 255 P. 820.

Karl C. Partridge, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

R. P. Hinshall, Robert R. Moody, C. M. Fickert, and E. A. Cunha, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. This is an application by Veronica C. Baird, Benjamin H. Baird, and Thomas R. Baird, who are named as devisees and legatees in the will of David J. Baird, deceased, against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, to restrain further proceedings by one David Jennings Baird, by his guardians, on a petition filed by him on the 28th day of August, 1926, asking for final distribution to him as the pretermitted son and heir at law of all of the estate of said David J. Baird, deceased, and demanding that said superior court strike his petition from the proceedings in said estate, and that said court be enjoined from further proceeding in the matter of hearing said petition. This is another effort to test the right of David Jennings Baird to share in the estate left by his father, David Jennings Baird, deceased, and it marks about the eighth proceeding in said estate to reach this court. The claim of this son to succeed to the estate of his father has been the subject of judicial controversy for a period of twenty years. The history of said proceedings as noted upon the records of this court will be found as follows: Estate of Baird, 173 Cal. 617, 160 P. 1078; Id., 181 Cal. 742, 186 P. 351; Id., 182 Cal. 338, 188 P. 43; Id., 193 Cal. 225, 223 P. 974; Id., 195 Cal. 59, 231 P. 744; Id., 198 Cal. 490, 246 P. 324; Baird v. Superior Court, No. 11141, prohibition denied May 1, 1924; Baird v. Superior Court, No. 11192, prohibition denied June 19, 1924.

David J. Baird died on November 25, 1908, leaving a will in which he neither provided for nor mentioned the minor, David Jennings Baird. On April 27, 1914, the said minor, by his guardian, filed a petition for partial distribution of the estate of the decedent, in which he alleged that he was the son of decedent and his heir by adoption and legitimation complying with all the requirements of section 230 of the Civil Code. His claim was opposed by the mother, brothers, and sister of decedent. This petition was heard by the court sitting without a jury and decided adversely to the claimant upon the issues of adoption. The order denying the petition was reversed by this court on appeal because of the refusal of the probate court to grant a jury trial on said issues of adoption. Estate of Baird, 173 Cal. 617, 160 P. 1078. Later a jury trial was had, and the matter came before this court upon an appeal from an order distributing the entire estate of decedent to the claimant pursuant to special verdicts of the jury on the issues of adoption. This court reversed the lower court, holding that the evidence was insufficient to support the finding that decedent had adopted said minor child (Estate of Baird, 182 Cal. 338, 188 P. 43), and a second jury trial was had, which resulted as in the previous case in special verdicts favorable to the minor on the issues of adoption. The order distributing the entire estate to said minor, which was entered pursuant to the special verdicts, was likewise reversed by this court on appeal (Estate of Baird, 193 Cal. 225, 223 P. 974); the court holding that by reason of the law of the case the evidence was insufficient to establish the claim of adoption and also that, independent of the rule of the law of the case, the evidence introduced was insufficient to sustain said claim. This court thereupon ordered and directed the trial court to set aside the special verdicts and again reversed the decree of distribution. The remittitur in pursuance of which said judgment was entered contained the following provision:

> "It is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the decree of partial distribution of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco in the above-entitled cause be, and the same is hereby, reversed, and the trial court is ordered and directed to set aside the special verdict and findings and to enter judgment for appellants denying the petition for partial distribution upon the ground that respondent is not the adopted son or heir of the deceased."

The judgment entered by the lower court, after quoting the remittitur, provided as follows:

> "It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the hereinbefore mentioned special verdicts and findings be and the same are hereby vacated, annulled, and set aside, and the said petition for partial distribution of David Jennings Baird, a minor, is hereby denied."

After the going down of the remittitur to the lower court, two notices of intention to move for a new trial were filed on behalf of said minor, David Jennings Baird. Both motions were granted. Upon appeal to this court, the order granting the motions was reversed on April 23, 1926. Estate of Baird, 198 Cal. 490, 246 P. 324. On August 18, 1926, Veronica C. Baird and I. I. Brown, as executors of the estate of David J. Baird, deceased, filed their final account and petition for final distribution. The petition was set for hearing on August 30, 1926. On August 28, 1926, said minor, David Jennings Baird, filed a petition for distribution to him of the estate of said decedent. When the petition of the executors came on for hearing on August 30, the court, after hearing the account, continued the hearing on the executors' petition for distribution to September 20, 1926, and set the petition of said minor child for hearing on said date. Veronica C. Baird, decedent's mother, and Benjamin H. Baird and Thomas R. Baird, his brothers, all of whom are named as legatees and devisees in decedent's will, thereupon filed the petition for writ of prohibition now before us with the object of restraining further proceedings for the consideration of the petition of said minor child for distribution. The petition for distribution does not differ in material respects from the petition considered by this court on the four former appeals. In each the petitioner claims to be the legitimate son and heir of decedent by virtue of an adoption complying with the requirements of section 230 of the Civil Code.

Petitioners contend that under the judgment entered on April 22, 1924, in obedience to the mandate of this court (Estate of Baird, 193 Cal. 225, 223 P. 974), it was then and there finally adjudicated that said minor child was not the adopted son and heir of said deceased, and therefore can never succeed to any portion of the estate of said decedent. On the contrary, the child contends that said judgment was nothing more than a judgment of nonsuit, and, being a judgment of nonsuit only, he is not precluded from asserting his right to heirship in said estate in the present proceedings. It is quite true that a judgment of nonsuit does not bar a subsequent action upon the same cause, but a judgment upon a directed verdict is considered a judgment upon the merits and determines the issues. 9 Cal. Jur. 547, 15 Cal. Jur. 131, 24 Cal. Jur. 913; 2 Freeman on Judgments, 1590; Estate of Sharon, 179 Cal. 447, 177 P. 283; City and County of San Francisco v. Brown, 153 Cal. 644, 96 P. 281; Mohn v. Tingley, 191 Cal. 470, 217 P. 733. But we are not called upon to determine these questions, serious though they may be, for in our view of the matter under no hypothesis does the writ of prohibition lie.

[1, 2] Res judicata must be affirmatively relied upon and shown in evidence, and in some cases must be pleaded, but in no case is the plea in and of itself sufficient to oust the court of jurisdiction. In its strongest form it is nothing more than conclusive evidence upon all or some of the issues involved. When a former judgment is pleaded either in bar or as an estoppel on some issue, there immediately arise questions as to identity of the parties, the validity of the judgment as shown by the judgment roll, the legal effect to be given it, and perhaps many other questions. Such matters are for the determination of the trial court, and, whether correctly or incorrectly determined, it is nevertheless the exercise of jurisdiction over the subject-matter and the parties.

In Spitzer v. Superior Court, 74 Cal. App. 494, 498, 499, 241 P. 270, 271, this question was ably discussed, and the court there used the following language:

> "A former adjudication as a defense is generally regarded as an affirmative one, which must be presented, whether by pleading or evidence, by the one relying upon it (McLean v. Baldwin, 136 Cal. 565, 69 P. 259; Brown v. Campbell, 110 Cal. 644, 43 P. 12; Estate of McNeil, 155 Cal. 333, 100 P. 1086); and the benefit of a prior adjudication constituting a bar may be waived by failing to plead or prosent it in the subsequent action (15 Cal. Jur., Judgments, § 233; Freeman on Judgments, § 808 [5th Ed.]). Where it appears, however, that there was no opportunity to plead a judgment urged as a bar, owing to the fact that it did not become final until after the entry of an interlocutory decree in a subsequent action, it may be presented before the entry of a final decree therein. Penfield v. Potts & Co., 126 F. 475, 61 C. C. A. 371; Bradley, etc., Co. v. Eagle Mfg. Co., 57 F. 980, 985, 6 C. C. A. 661; Freeman on Judgments, § 798 (5th Ed.). It is not a plea to the jursidiction; but where it is pleaded to the whole cause of action it is a plea in bar; or if to a particular fact or issue a plea in estoppel; but cannot be given the effect of depriving the court of jurisdiction. Fields v. Walker, 23 Ala. 155; Granger v. Superior Court, 159 Cal. 2, 112 P. 854. * * * The fact of a judgment urged as a bar, the identity of the parties, jurisdiction to render it, and the legal effect to be given it, are matters for determination in the first instance by the trial court, are questions on which the party against whom the judgment is urged has the right to be heard, and such determination, though erroneous, and hence not an act in the proper exercise of its jurisdiction, would nevertheless be an act in the exercise of its jurisdiction over the parties and the cause."

The case of Granger v. Superior Court, 159 Cal. 1, 5, 6, 112 P. 854, 856, cited in the above opinion, sustains the holding there made by use of the following language:

> "The opinion declared that Granger was entitled to be reimbursed for the amount of his purchase money and that an accounting should be had of the rents received during his possession. A cross-complaint was filed in that case by William G. Richards, as executor, and the case is still pending, no trial having been had since the reversal of the first judgment. It is obvious that the court still has jurisdiction of that case and that a writ of prohibition cannot be issued. It may be conceded that with respect to everything except the taking of a supplemental account and making of a decree requiring Granger to reconvey the property to the estate upon the payment of the money found due him upon the accounting, the whole controversy has been settled by the judgment in the action of Benallack v. Richards [154 Cal. 478, 98 P. 528]. But this does not affect the jurisdiction of the court to proceed in the action. That judgment can be pleaded as an adjudication of the matters determined by it, but it cannot be given the effect of depriving the court of jurisdiction."

There is in the case before us this further situation: The executors of said estate filed their petition for final distribution, which was regularly noticed for hearing on August 30, 1926. On the 28th day of August said minor filed, not only his petition for distribution, but asked the court to consider it as an opposition to the petition filed by the executors. Apparently this suggestion was acceded to by the court. Under this statement of facts the doctrine of res judicata might be a bar to the petition filed by said minor, and his opposition to the petition of the executors; it would therefore be a settlement of but one of the issues involved, and there would still be left the issue as to the parties to whom and the proportions in which the estate of said decedent should be inherited. But whether the claim of the doctrine of res judicata be pleaded as a complete bar or as conclusive evidence of one or more only of the material issues, the rule is the same. For a recent discussion of the doctrine, see Price v. Sixth District (Cal. Sup.) 258 P. 387.

It should also be noted that the minor claimant here asserts that, by reason of the fact that one Miles T. Baird, the brother of said decedent and one of the legatees under his will, did not appeal from the former decree of distribution made in said estate, said minor child succeeded to so much of said estate as would be inherited under said will by said Miles T. Baird. This observation is also made to apply to certain other persons claiming to be assignees of the interest of said Miles T. Baird in said estate under said will. This, of course, furnishes an added reason for a consideration by the trial court of the said former judgment before disposing of the petition for final distribution in said estate.

[3] It should also be noted that ordinarily the objection to the jurisdiction should be urged before the trial court and overruled before applying for prohibition. McAneny v. Superior Court, 150 Cal. 6, 87 P. 1020; Havenmeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 24 P. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192; Shriver v. Superior Court, 48 Cal. App. 576, 192 P. 124; Drew v. Superior Court, 43 Cal. App. 651, 185 P. 680; 21 Cal. Jur. 627.

The petition is denied.

FETTERLEY v. OSBORNE. (L. A. 9107.)

Supreme Court of California. June 19, 1928.

1. Insane persons ⚷97—Complaint alleging plaintiff, adjudged insane, was incarcerated by defendant after escaping from state hospital, failed to state case for damages for illegal restraint and unlawful expenditures by guardian.

Complaint for damages for illegal restraint and for unlawful expenditures on behalf of plaintiff by defendant, while acting as guardian of estate, alleging plaintiff had been adjudged insane, and subsequently adjudged sane and restored to rights, and that guardian unlawfully expended money for benefit of plaintiff, and alleging that guardian caused plaintiff to be incarcerated after plaintiff ran away from state hospital, failed to state cause of action.

2. Appeal and error ⚷917(2)—As against plaintiff's unsupported statement of late filing, demurrer is presumed to have been properly sustained.

As against unsupported statement by plaintiff that demurrer was filed too late, and judgment should have been rendered in favor of plaintiff on default, not sustained by anything in record, it will be presumed that court rightfully exercised jurisdiction in sustaining demurrer.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Action by Oliver Fetterley against Thomas A. Osborne. From a judgment of dismissal, after an order sustaining a demurrer to the second amended complaint without leave to amend, in action for illegal restraint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Oliver Fetterly, in pro. per.

Irvin C. Taplin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TYLER, Justice pro tem. [1, 2] This is an appeal from a judgment dismissing the action after an order sustaining a demurrer to a second amended complaint without leave to amend. The plaintiff appears in propria persona, and he attempts to state a cause of action for damages for illegal restraint, and also to recover certain sums which he claims were unlawfully expended on his behalf by defendant, while acting as the guardian of his estate.

The complaint indicates that plaintiff had been adjudged insane by the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, and it recites that on December 19, 1923, he was adjudged sane and competent, and fully restored to all his rights as a competent person. It alleges the appointment, in May, 1922, of defendant as guardian of plaintiff's estate, and it charges the unlawful and useless expenditure by defendant, as such guardian, of certain sums for clothing and other expenses for the benefit of plaintiff. A further allegation recites that plaintiff ran away from the Southern California State Hospital, where he was incarcerated, and defendant caused him to be returned to that institution without sufficient reason. It is then charged that, by reason of the acts of defendant, plaintiff was wrongfully deprived of his liberty, friends, and social surroundings, and damages are alleged in the sum of $15,000.

It is here claimed that the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint, as it was filed too late, and judgment should have been rendered in favor of plaintiff upon a default. There is nothing in the record before us that sustains appellant in this contention. As against his unsupported statement, it will be presumed that the court rightfully exercised its jurisdiction. That the complaint does not state a cause of action is plainly manifest.

FETTERLEY v. BROWN et al. (L. A. 9316.)

Supreme Court of California. June 19, 1928.

1. Malicious prosecution ⚷47—Complaint against defendants for conspiring to confine plaintiff in insane asylum, not alleging how or in what manner plaintiff was damaged, failed to state case for malicious prosecution.

Complaint alleging defendants conspired to imprison plaintiff in state hospital for insane without reasonable cause, that confinement of plaintiff was based on representation of defendant parole officer that plaintiff was insane, and that defendant physicians maliciously testified that plaintiff was insane, failing to allege how or in what manner plaintiff suffered damage by defendants' acts, failed to state cause of action for malicious prosecution.

2. Pleading ⚷189—Demurrer to complaint patently deficient on its face held properly sustained.

Where complaint was patently deficient on its face, judgment sustaining demurrer was proper, and should be affirmed.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by Oliver Fetterley against Harry J. Brown and others for malicious prosecution. From a judgment of the superior court for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent Meyer.

Everett W. Mattoon and McIntyre Faries, both of Los Angeles, for respondents Brown, Johnson, and Steele.

Caroline R. Kellogg, of Los Angeles, for respondent Rosenoff.

TYLER, Justice pro tem. Appeal from a judgment, after the sustaining of demurrers to an amended complaint without leave to amend in an action for damages for malicious prosecution.

[1] The plaintiff appears in propria persona, and by his complaint he attempts to allege that all the defendants entered into a conspiracy to imprison him in a California state hospital for the insane; such conspiracy being without reasonable or probable cause. It appears therefrom that the arrest of the plaintiff and his subsequent confinement were based on the representations of defendant Brown, a deputy parole officer, which representations were to the effect that plaintiff was insane. Defendant Johnson is designated as a deputy sheriff, and the other defendants as physicians connected with the county hospital of Los Angeles and the California State Hospital for the Insane at Patton, Cal., all of whom, it is alleged, maliciously testified that plaintiff was insane, upon an official hearing had to determine the mental condition of plaintiff. The demurrers were rightfully sustained. Aside from other objectionable features, the complaint carries no averment showing how or in what manner plaintiff suffered damage by the alleged acts of the defendants.

[2] The complaint being patently deficient on its face, the judgment sustaining the demurrer was proper, and it should be and is hereby affirmed.

LAHTI v. McMENAMIN. (S. F. 12177.)

Supreme Court of California. June 25, 1928.

1. Automobiles 🔑153—Driving on wrong side of street is negligence.

Automobile driver on wrong side of street at time he struck pedestrian was negligent.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1066—Instruction as to pedestrian's failure to look was not prejudicial when failure to look at different place was alleged.

Where, in action for injuries, answer alleged contributory negligence in failing to look in westerly direction while south of center of street, instruction that plaintiff was not negligent because she failed to look in such direction after reaching the north half of the street did not prejudice the defense, whether correct or not.

3. Damages 🔑132(3)—$15,000 for fractured skull and permanent injury to mentality held not excessive.

Where person struck by automobile received fractured skull, was unconscious for 12 days, required trephining operation, and sustained permanent injury to her mentality, a verdict of $15,000, in addition to hospital and other expenses, was not excessive.

4. Damages 🔑185(2)—Evidence held to sustain finding of permanent injuries materially disqualifying plaintiff from performing former duties.

In action for injuries, evidence held to sustain finding that plaintiff sustained permanent injuries, which seriously and materially disqualified her from performing her former duties.

5. Damages 🔑216(1)—Instruction authorizing damages not exceeding those claimed and specifying amount was not error.

In action for injuries, instruction that jury, after considering all elements of damage, might resolve what sum would compensate plaintiff not exceeding the amount prayed for in the complaint, to wit, $16,312.10, was not erroneous; it being for defendant to request instruction that amount named did not necessarily furnish any criterion for amount of verdict, if desired.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1050(1)—Judgment will not be reversed on ground that proper evidence that defendant had been drinking improperly influenced jury.

In action for injuries in automobile collision, it not being claimed that evidence that witnesses detected intoxicating liquor on defendant's breath was immaterial, judgment would not be reversed on ground that jury was improperly influenced thereby.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1050(1)—Judgment will not be reversed when verdict is not excessive on ground that jury were improperly influenced by evidence of insurance.

Where verdict for injuries in automobile collision was not excessive, and evidence that representatives of insurance company visited scene of accident was not claimed to have been erroneously admitted, judgment would not be reversed on ground that jury may have been improperly influenced by fact that defendant carried insurance.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Action by Mary Lahti against William McMenamin for damages for personal injuries. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Kelby & Lawson, Samuel M. Garroway, and L. J. Styskal, all of Los Angeles, and Leon French, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Charles O. Bruce, Elliott Johnson, and Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, all of San Francisco, and F. V. Cornish and Cornish & Cornish, all of Berkeley, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. [1] Plaintiff, while crossing East Twelfth street near its intersection with Twenty-Second avenue, in the city of Oakland, was struck by an automobile driven by the defendant. As a result of the collision, she received bodily injuries, and thereafter instituted this action to recover damages for the injuries so sustained. The defendant, as a defense to plaintiff's action, set up contributory negligence on plaintiff's part as the proximate cause of her said injuries, and alleged that "while plaintiff was at all times south of the center line of East Twelfth street, plaintiff carelessly, recklessly, and without regard to her own safety and protection, was facing and looking in a northeasterly direction, and as a result thereof, plaintiff walked into, and was struck by, the rear end of defendant's machine." The plaintiff claimed, and so testified, that at the time of the collision she was north of the center line of said street, and that defendant was traveling on the wrong side of said street, and while so traveling on the wrong side of said street struck and injured her. The evidence was conflicting as to whether the accident actually happened to the north or the south of the center line of said street. The case was tried before a jury, and its verdict was in favor of plaintiff. Therefore the jury impliedly, at least, found that the collision occurred on the north side of the street. It is admitted that defendant approached the point where the collision occurred from a westerly direction. In view of the finding of the jury just referred to, and this admission, it is apparent that defendant was traveling from a westerly direction on the wrong side of the street at the time his machine collided with plaintiff. Under these facts there can be no question as to defendant's negligence.

[2] The court, at the request of the plaintiff, gave the following instruction:

> "If you find from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff, when struck by defendant's automobile, had reached a point in her attempt to cross east Twelfth street on the northerly half thereof and at a point where vehicles operating in accordance with the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act [St. 1927, p. 517] would be reasonably expected to proceed from an easterly direction, then I instruct you that you cannot find the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence because she, at that point, failed to look in a westerly direction, or failed to anticipate the unlawful use of the streets by any other person."

Defendant contends that in so instructing the jury the court committed error, in that it took away from the consideration of the jury the question as to whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as alleged in defendant's answer. We do not think this contention of defendant can be sustained. As will be noted from the excerpt of defendant's answer above quoted, defendant's only plea of contributory negligence went to plaintiff's failure to look to her left, or in a westerly direction, being the direction from which automobiles or other vehicles might lawfully approach her as she crossed the south half of said street. The instruction complained of made no reference to plaintiff's failure to look in a westerly direction while crossing that portion of said street south of the center line thereof, but referred exclusively to her failure to look westerly for approaching vehicles after she had passed the center line of said street and while she was crossing the north half of said street. Had the jury believed that she was south of the center line of said street at the time she was struck by defendant's machine, there is nothing in the foregoing instruction which would have prevented them, or which would in any way have influenced them, from considering defendant's claim that her failure to look westerly as she crossed this portion of the street was the proximate cause of her injury. Whether the instruction contained a correct statement of the law applicable to plaintiff's actions after she crossed the center line of said street need not here be decided, and we expressly refrain from passing upon this question, but, even if erroneous, it did not prejudice defendant's defense of contributory negligence pleaded in his answer.

It is next contended by defendant that the damages were excessive. The verdict of the jury was for $16,312.10, being the entire amount prayed for. It was stipulated that the expenses incurred by plaintiff for services of physician and for hospital and other expenses of a like character were the sum of $1,312.10. This would leave $15,000 for general damages.

"The amount of damages in such cases is committed first to the sound discretion of the jury and next to the discretion of the judge of the trial court, who, in ruling upon the motion for new trial, may consider the evidence anew, determine anew the facts, and set aside the verdict if it is not just. Upon appeal, the decision of the trial court and jury on the subject cannot be set aside unless the verdict is 'so plainly and outrageously excessive as to suggest, at the first blush, passion or prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury.'" Hale v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 156 Cal. 713, 715, 106 P. 83, 84.

[3, 4] After reviewing the evidence in this case, we are satisfied that the verdict in plaintiff's favor is not "so plainly and outrageously excessive as to suggest, at the first blush, passion or prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury." The plaintiff, by reason of the collision, received a fractured skull. For two days thereafter it was doubtful whether she would survive her injuries. For twelve days she was unconscious, and thereafter she gradually regained consciousness. The fracture was what is known as a depressed fracture, and necessitated the use of a trephining operation. She remained in the hospital a number of weeks, but at the time of leaving had not regained her normal mentality. She resumed her former employment, but her employer testified that she had not the memory she had before the accident, and that she forgot directions, and a good deal of her work had to be done over again. The plaintiff attended night school some six months after recovering from her injuries, and the teacher at the school testified that plaintiff did not make any progress, and that she could not retain anything or follow the simplest directions. Defendant contends that this evidence did not prove that plaintiff had sustained any permanent injury, for the reason that it all went to the condition of plaintiff immediately after the receipt of her injuries or within six months thereafter, and was not sufficient to prove her condition at the time of the trial of said action, some eighteen months thereafter. In addition to this evidence, there was the testimony of an intimate friend of plaintiff that the latter was at the house of said friend for over three months after the accident, and that during that time plaintiff was partly out of her mind, and that, while she had improved, she was not normal even at the time of the trial. We think this evidence sufficient to support the conclusion at which the jury evidently arrived, that plaintiff had, as a result of the accident, sustained permanent injuries which seriously and materially disqualified her from performing the duties which she was able to perform prior to the time she met with said accident.

[5] Defendant suggests a number of circumstances happening during the trial which, he contends, had the effect of improperly influencing the jury to render the verdict in the amount specified, and which he claims was excessive. The first of these was an instruction of the court to the effect that the jury might, after considering all the elements contributing to plaintiff's damage, "resolve what sum will fairly compensate her for the injury and loss, if any, sustained by her; not exceeding, however, the amount prayed for in the complaint, to wit, $16,312.10." That portion of the instruction italicized is the portion to which defendant particularly objects. An instruction of this character is usually given in negligence cases, and it is difficult to understand how a jury in such class of cases can be properly instructed by the court without employing language similar to that used by the court in the instruction complained of. There could be no error, therefore, in so instructing the jury. If the defendant desired the jury further instructed to the effect that the amount named therein did not necessarily furnish any criterion for the amount of their verdict, it was his duty to ask for such qualifying instruction, and, not having done so, he cannot be heard to complain that it was not given. Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 263, 228 P. 25. While it was held that the giving of such an instruction is error in Alabama & V. Ry. Co. v. Dennis, 128 Miss. 298, 91 So. 4, the weight of authority is to the contrary. Van Meter v. Gurney, 240 Ill. App. 165; Stahl v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co. (Mo. Sup.) 287 S. W. 628; Ches. & Ohio Ry. Co. v. Carnahan, 241 U. S. 241, 36 S. Ct. 594, 60 L. Ed. 979; Norfolk & Western Ry. Co. v. Earnest, 229 U. S. 114, 33 S. Ct. 654, 57 L. Ed. 1096, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 172. We cannot say what influence the giving of this instruction had upon the minds of the jury, but, so long as the instruction was one which the court might properly give to the jury, the giving thereof could not legally prejudice any of the rights of the defendant.

[6] Another circumstance occurring during the trial which the defendant claims influenced the jury in rendering a verdict which was excessive was the asking by plaintiff's counsel of a number of the witnesses whether they detected intoxicating liquor on defendant's breath at the time of the accident. These witnesses all answer this question in the affirmative. Defendant makes no claim that this evidence was not material to the issues involved herein. His only contention is that the jury was improperly influenced by testimony which was entirely proper. We feel that but little weight can be given to this argument.

[7] The further circumstance which defendant contends improperly influenced the jury in rendering a verdict deemed by him as excessive is that the evidence shows that two representatives of an insurance company visited the scene of the accident with one of defendant's witnesses a few days following the accident. Here again defendant makes no claim that this evidence was erroneously admitted, but relies upon what he contends is a well-established fact, that juries are often influenced in the size of their verdict in negligence cases where they are advised that the defendant has insurance to protect him against any verdict that may be rendered against him. We are not disposed to dispute defendant's contention that juries are on occasions so influenced, and the rules of evidence are so framed to exclude any direct evidence of such matters. But, when the fact that defendant carries insurance is properly brought to the knowledge of the jury, either by the evidence on the part of the defendant, or indirectly in connection with proof of some material fact in the case, we know of no rule of law that empowers any court to set aside the jury's verdict upon the assumption that such evidence might have influenced the jury in rendering a verdict which was excessive in amount. If the verdict of the jury is excessive, then it should be set aside by the court, no matter what may have prompted the jury in the rendition thereof. On the other hand, if the verdict is not excessive, as we have held to be the case in this action, then it should be sustained, notwithstanding the fact that there is evidence in the record which might have tended to influence the jury in allowing excessive damages. The fact that the verdict is not excessive is conclusive proof that the jury were not improperly influenced by such evidence. We find no valid reason for disturbing the judgment herein, and for that reason it is affirmed.

We concur: PRESTON, J.; SEAWELL, J.

In re McCRAY'S ESTATE.

McCRAY et al. v. CITIZENS' TRUST & SAVINGS BANK OF LOS ANGELES.

(La. 9570.)

Supreme Court of California. June 25, 1928.

1. Wills 🔑439—Court must interpret will and carry out testatrix's intention, where not contrary to law.

It is duty of the court to interpret the provisions of a will and to carry out the intention of the testatrix, if that intention can be ascertained, provided no law is violated in so doing.

2. Trusts 🔑25(1)—Wills 🔑671—Technical language is unnecessary to creation of trust either by deed or will.

No technical language or set form of words is necessary to the creation of a trust either by deed or will.

3. Trusts 🔑25(1)—Words "upon trust" or "trustee" are not indispensable to create trust otherwise sufficiently evident (Civ. Code, § 2221).

The words "upon trust" or "trustee" are not indispensable to the creation of a trust, if the intent to create a trust is otherwise sufficiently evident; it being sufficient, if subject-matter thereof, purpose, and persons beneficially interested are indicated with reasonable certainty, under Civ. Code, § 2221.

4. Trusts 🔑160(2)—Failure to expressly appoint trustee held not fatal to creation by testatrix of trust in real property (Civ. Code, §§ 852, 857, subd. 3).

Testatrix's creation of trust in real property by will held not to fail in accomplishment because of omission to expressly appoint a trustee, under Civ. Code, § 857, subd. 3, will being writing complying with § 852, since a trust will not be allowed to fail for want of trustee, even though none be named.

5. Trusts 🔑156—Executor is proper trustee to hold property during existence of trust, where no trustee is named in will.

When by terms of will a trust is imposed on property to pay over income to designated beneficiaries, and no trustee is named in will, executor is proper trustee to hold property during existence of trust.

6. Trusts 🔑156—If executor is not expressly appointed trustee, court may determine from whole will whether he is to so act.

If executor is not expressly appointed trustee, where by terms of will a trust is imposed on property to pay over the income therefrom to designated beneficiaries, the court may determine from the whole will whether or not executor is to act as trustee.

7. Trusts 🔑156—Bank named as executor in will not naming trustee of testamentary trust held properly appointed trustee (Civ. Code, § 2289; Code Civ. Proc. § 1702).

Under will by which testatrix created trust without naming trustee in real property for her sons, bank named in will as executor held properly appointed trustee, under Civ. Code, § 2289, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1702.

8. Wills 🔑672(1)—That there was no direct devise of estate to trustee held not to affect validity of testamentary trust, where estate would vest by implication from nature of duties.

That there was in will no direct devise of an estate to trustee held not to affect validity of trust created by testatrix in real property, since where, from nature of the duties to be performed, the taking of such estate is necessary, an estate in the trustee will vest by implication.

9. Perpetuities 🔑4(3)—Beneficiaries becoming vested with title to testatrix's realty, subject only to trust estate for 10 years provided in will, rule against perpetuities did not apply.

Under will whereby testatrix created trust for 10 years through an unnamed trustee who was to have possession and control of her realty with no power of disposition, but with duty of collecting and dividing income thereof equally among her three sons and only heirs during that period, beneficiaries became vested with title to testatrix's real property on her death, subject only to trust estate for 10 years provided for in will, and hence there was no estate remaining to which the rule against perpetuities, and Civ. Code, §§ 715, 716, could apply.

10. Perpetuities 🔑4(3)—Vested interests do not violate rule against perpetuities.

Vested interests are never obnoxious to rule against perpetuities.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Ella McCray, deceased. From part of a decree of the superior court directing distribution and appointing the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles a trustee, Harold A. McCray and others appeal. Reversed in part, with instructions; otherwise affirmed.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal, 260 P. 940.

T. Frank Courtney and D. Webster Egan, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Henry Merton and Walter K. Tuller, both of Los Angeles, Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro and Brobeck, Phleger & Harrison, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

WASTE, C. J. Ella McCray died on February 19, 1925, leaving an estate consisting of both real and personal property. A holographic will, executed by her and bearing date August 20, 1924, was admitted to probate upon the petition of the respondent Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank, named therein as executor. By her will she bequeathed to her three sons and only heirs certain personal property, but did not devise to them, or otherwise attempt to dispose of, the fee in her real estate, except that in the body of her will there appears the following provision:

> "The real estate held in trust for 10 years at least and income equally divided among the sons."

On the reverse side of the paper upon which the will is penned this language is used:

> "I want this real estate fixed so that the McCray estate will be held in trust for a time so that it cannot be squandered and wasted."

The will contained no express appointment of a trustee. The "sons" referred to in the provision first above quoted were the then three living adult sons of the testatrix. One of them having passed away, his interest is represented in this proceeding by the administratrix of his estate. In due course, the probate court entered its decree of partial distribution, wherein appeared the following provision:

> "(5) To Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank, a corporation, of Los Angeles, Cal., as trustee, all the real property belonging to said estate, herein described, to be held in trust for 10 years from August 20, 1924, and the income therefrom to be equally divided annually hereafter share and share alike, one-third to Harold A. McCray, his heirs and assigns, one-third to Wilbur D. McCray, his heirs and assigns, and one-third between the heirs of Richard H. McCray, now deceased, their heirs and assigns until August 19, 1934, on which last date this trust shall terminate, and the title in fee of all said real property shall thereupon vest: An undivided one-third in Harold A. McCray, his heirs and assigns forever, an undivided one-third in Wilbur D. McCray, his heirs and assigns forever, and an undivided one-third in the heirs of Richard H. McCray, now deceased, their heirs and assigns forever, free from the control of said trustee, or its successors."

The surviving sons and the personal representative of the deceased son prosecute this appeal from the foregoing provision in the decree of distribution.

[1-3] The decedent's attempted creation of a trust in her real property is first assailed by the appellants upon the ground that the will should have expressly provided for the appointment of a trustee, the vesting of an estate in such trustee, and the designation of a purpose for which a trust may legally be created. Failing to do so, the effect, they contend, is to render abortive the decedent's effort, resulting in the devolution of such property as in the case of intestacy. We are unable to agree with this contention. It is the duty of the court to interpret the provisions of a will and to carry out the intention of the testatrix, if that intention can be ascertained, provided no law is violated in so doing. Estate of Reith, 144 Cal. 314, 316, 77 P. 942; Estate of Marti, 132 Cal. 666, 668, 61 P. 964, 64 P. 1071. No technical language or set form of words is necessary to the creation of a trust, either by deed or will. The words "upon trust" or "trustee" are not indispensable if the intent to create a trust is otherwise sufficiently evident. Estate of Tessier, 2 Coff. Prob. Dec. 362, 367; Taber v. Bailey, 22 Cal. App. 617, 620, 135 P. 975; Estate of Doane, 190 Cal. 412, 415, 213 P. 53. It is sufficient if the subject-matter of the trust, the purpose thereof, and the persons beneficially interested are indicated with reasonable certainty. Section 2221, Civ. Code. In the instant case, the testatrix, by the employment of explicit language, clearly evidenced an intention to impose a trust for a designated period upon her real property, during which period any income therefrom was to be paid over to her sons. That a trust may validly and legally be created for the purpose designated by her is recognized in subdivision 3 of section 857 of the Civil Code, and the will being in writing complies with the provisions of section 852 of the same Code in that respect.

[4-8] The testatrix did not fail in the accomplishment of her purpose because of the omission to expressly appoint a trustee. A trust will not be allowed to fail for want of a trustee, even though none be named. Hill v. Den, 54 Cal. 6, 20; Cauhape v. Barnes, 135 Cal. 107, 110, 67 P. 55. When, by the terms of a will, a trust is imposed upon property for the purpose of paying over the income therefrom to designated beneficiaries, and no trustee is named in the will, the executor is the proper trustee to hold the property during the existence of the trust. Estate of Tessier, supra, p. 367; 1 Perry on Trusts (6th Ed.) § 262. If the executor is not expressly appointed trustee, the court may determine from the whole will whether or not he is to act as trustee. Section 2289 of the Civil Code, following the rule in equity, provides that:

> "When a trust exists without any appointed trustee * * * the superior court of the county where the trust property, or some portion thereof, is situated, must appoint another trustee, and direct the execution of the trust."

Section 1702 of the Code of Civil Procedure is broad enough in its terms to confer that power upon the superior court sitting in probate, and in which the administration of an estate is pending. The respondent bank, named in the will as executor, was therefore properly appointed trustee by the court below. We find no merit in appellants' contention to the effect that there is in the will no direct devise of an estate to a trustee. In response to a similar contention, advanced in the Estate of Reith, supra, at page 320 (77 P. 944), this court held that:

> "It is sufficient to say that when from the nature of the duties to be performed the taking of such estate is necessary, 'an estate in the trustees will vest by implication.'"

See, also, Estate of Tessier, supra, p. 368. Neither is there any merit in the further contention of the appellants that the decree appealed from declares a trust other than and different from that attempted to be set up by the testatrix in her will.

[9, 10] Finally, the appellants contend that the trust decreed by the probate court to have been created by the testatrix is void, in that it suspends the absolute power of alienation for a fixed period of years, contrary to the limitations prescribed by the sections of the Civil Code relating to restraints upon alienations, when those sections are read in the light of section 9 of article 20 of the state Constitution. That section, taken verbatim from the Constitution of 1849, art. 11, § 16, declares that "no perpetuities shall be allowed except for eleemosynary purposes."

Section 715 of the Civil Code, as originally enacted in 1872, provides that the absolute power of alienation "cannot be suspended, by any limitation or condition whatever, for a longer period than * * * during the continuance of the lives of persons in being at the creation of the limitation or condition," except in the single case of contingent remainders in fee mentioned in section 772 of the same Code—an exception which has no bearing on the instant case. It remained unchanged until 1917 when it was recast and a new subdivision added. Stats. 1917, p. 699. As so amended, the section now reads:

> "715. Except in the single case mentioned in section seven hundred seventy-two, the absolute power of alienation cannot be suspended, by any limitation or condition whatever, for a longer period than as follows:
> "1. During the continuance of the lives of persons in being at the creation of the limitation or condition; or
> "2. For a period not to exceed twenty-five years from the time of the creation of the suspension."

By section 716 (enacted in 1872) every future interest is void in its creation "which, by any possibility, may suspend the absolute power of alienation for a longer period than is prescribed" in the chapter of the Code. It would seem that, by the subsequent addition of subdivision 2 to section 715 the Legislature had made provision for the creation of such trusts as the one here attacked; but it is the contention of the appellants that this amendment, which permits of a flat period of 25 years, independent of lives in being, within which the absolute power of alienation may be suspended, is unconstitutional and void as being in violation of the provisions of the Constitution, supra. We deem it unnecessary to decide the question presented by this contention, for we do not find any room in this case for the application either of the constitutional inhibition against perpetuities, supra, or the statutory provisions against restraints on alienation. The testatrix did not attempt to dispose of the fee in her real estate. The utmost which she did was to attempt to create a trust for the period of 10 years through an unnamed trustee who was to have possession and control of her real estate, with no power of disposition, but with the duty of collecting and dividing the income thereof equally among her three sons and only heirs during that period. By so doing, she carved out of the fee to her real estate nothing more than an estate for years; that being all that was necessary for the purpose and full execution of the trust. Title Insurance & Trust Co. v. Duffill, 191 Cal. 629, 648, 218 P. 14. She therefore failed to dispose of other than this limited interest in her real property, and the fee therein became vested immediately upon her death in her three sons as her only heirs at law; in other words, they became vested with the title to the decedent's real property, subject only to the trust estate for 10 years provided for in her will. This being so, and the entire real estate, including the trust estate for years created by her will, being thus vested immediately upon her decease, there was no estate remaining to which the rule against perpetuities could apply, for vested interests are never obnoxious to the rule. Gray, The Rule against Perpetuities (3d Ed.) § 99. See, also, Blakeman v. Miller, 136 Cal. 138, 68 P. 587, 89 Am. St. Rep. 120.

Assuming that the provision of the Constitution which forbids, but does not define, perpetuities, has reference to the rule which had become crystallized under the English common law, that rule merely provides that "all future estates" which may "arise by way of executory devise, conditional limitation, or shifting and springing uses, must vest within a life or lives in being at the death of the testator and twenty-one years; and in case the person in whom the estate or interest should then vest is en ventre sa mere, nine months more will be allowed; and all estates created as aforesaid, and so limited that they may not vest within that time, are void." 1 Perry on Trusts, §§ 379, 380; Goldtree v. Thompson, 79 Cal. 613, 620, 22 P. 50. The rule, "as applied to interests in land, may be stated as follows: Any limitation or provision, the purpose or possible effect of which is to cause an estate to commence in the future, is invalid if, as a result thereof, an estate may commence more than twenty-one years after a life or lives in being." Tiffany on Real Property (2d Ed.) § 179. See, also, Estate of Hinckley, 58 Cal. 457. Decisions from other jurisdictions where a like rule obtains, in causes similar to that before us, illustrate the nonapplicability of the rule against perpetuities to the situation presented in the instant case. Armstrong v. Barber, 239 Ill. 389, 88 N. E. 246; Mettler v. Warner, 243 Ill. 600, 90 N. E. 1099, 134 Am. St. Rep. 388; Belfield v. Booth, 63 Conn. 299, 27 A. 585; Cowherd v. Fleming, 84 W. Va. 227, 100 S. E. 84; In re Rhodes' Estate, 147 Pa. 227, 23 A. 553. The substance of these cases is set forth in the statement of the principle in Gray's Rule against Perpetuities, supra, § 186 et seq.

The appellants, however, contend that the statutory rules against restraints on alienation, supra, have application to the instant case for the reasons set forth in Estate of Walkerly, 108 Cal. 627, 41 P. 772, 49 Am. St. Rep. 97, upon which they strongly rely. The rule against restraints on alienation has been, in some cases, confused with the rule against perpetuities; but the two rules, while having the same end in view, viz. that of preventing undue interference with the freedom of transfer of property, are of entirely different origin and application. The rule against perpetuities, ingrafted upon our system by the Constitution, relates only to future interests in property, the vesting of which is to be postponed beyond the allotted time. The rule relating to restraints on alienation, on the other hand, is statutory in origin, and has reference to an undue prevention of the transfer of estates already vested. This distinction was clearly pointed out in Strong v. Shatto, 45 Cal. App. 29, 187 P. 159, and in Estate of Cavarly, 119 Cal. 406, 51 P. 629. In the latter case this court said (page 409 [51 P. 630]):

> "Our statute is not, properly speaking, against perpetuities. It simply prohibits restraints upon alienation."

The Estate of Walkerly, supra, was a case arising under the provisions of section 715 of the Civil Code, supra, as it read prior to its amendment in 1917, and which, at the time the facts in the case arose, forbade restraints on alienation beyond a life or lives in being. It is clear that the amendment to the section (paragraph 2, supra), which permits of alienation "for a period not exceeding twenty-five years from the time of the creation of the suspension," if valid, takes this case entirely out of the operation of the section, since, even if it should be assumed that there is any suspension of alienation in the instant case, it could at most be only for the period of 10 years.

The appellants undertake to argue that the amendment to the section is unconstitutional as in violation of the constitutional rule against perpetuities, but in so doing they fall into the confusion of terms to which we have referred, and we find no merit in their contention. The Estate of Walkerly, supra, while doubtless sound law as applicable to the facts of that case and to the state of the law as it then existed, has no application to either the facts in the present case or the law as it now exists.

For the foregoing reasons, the probate court was correct in recognizing and upholding the trust created by the will of the testatrix and, in the exercise of its power, in the appointment of a trustee in order to carry into effect the terms of the trust; but it was in error in providing in its decree that title in fee to the real property should not vest in those entitled thereto, their heirs and assigns, until August 19, 1934, on which last-named date, the decree further provided, the trust should terminate and the title in fee of all of the real property should thereupon vest. It should have distributed the real property of the testatrix to her heirs at law, or their heirs or assigns, subject to the term of the trust estate.

In so far as the court was in error in respect to the above-noted portions of its decree, the judgment is reversed, with instructions to the court below to make and enter its decree of distribution of the fee of the real estate to the heirs at law of the testatrix, their heirs or assigns, in accordance with the laws of succession, and subject to the terms of the aforesaid trust estate. In all other respects the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; SHENK, J.; CURTIS, J.; PRESTON, J.; SEAWELL, J.; TYLER, Justice pro tem.

PEOPLE v. LE BARON. (Cr. 1018.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 15, 1928.

Rehearing Denied July 14, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 13, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑511(2)—Slight evidence corroborating accomplice's testimony meets statutory requirement if it tends to connect defendant with commission of offense (Pen. Code, § 1111).

Even though it be slight and when standing alone entitled to but little consideration, evidence corroborating testimony of an accomplice sufficiently measures up to the requirements of Pen. Code, § 1111, if it tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense.

2. Criminal law 🔑511(1)—Evidence sufficient to justify conviction held sufficient corroboration of accomplice's testimony (Pen. Code, § 1111).

Evidence which, standing alone, would have been sufficient to justify conviction held sufficient as evidence corroborating the testimony of an accomplice and tending to connect defendant with commission of an offense within Pen. Code, § 1111.

3. Criminal law 🔑743—Jury are sole judges of credibility of accused's testimony.

The jury are exclusive judges of the credibility of the testimony of the accused.

4. Criminal law 🔑304(3)—Courts and juries may take notice of opiate user's need of keeping nerves stimulated.

Courts and juries may take notice of and apply the common knowledge that a confirmed user of opium, morphine, cocaine, and other like opiates must at all times keep his nerves stimulated, and when the effects of the poison are disappearing will develop a state of desperation unless the drug is immediately accessible to him.

5. Poisons 🔑4—Possession of drugs for others or for joint use with them is not defense to charge of violation of statute (State Poisons Act as amended by St. 1925, p. 137).

The fact that one's possession of drugs is for the use of certain other persons or for the use of himself and others rather than for himself alone is not a defense to charge of violation of State Poisons Act (St. 1907, p. 124), as amended by St. 1925, p. 137.

6. Criminal law 🔑1170½(5)—District attorney's improper cross-examination to show defendant prostitute held not ground for reversal of conviction for violating State Poisons Act (St. 1907, p. 124, as amended by St. 1925, p. 137).

Conviction of violation of State Poisons Act (St. 1907, p. 124), as amended by St. 1925, p. 137, would not be reversed because of district attorney's improper cross-examination looking to proof that accused was prostitute, where throughout the trial defendant's counsel appeared to regard the business and character of defendant as proper subject of inquiry, and verdict was more than satisfactorily supported by competent evidence.

7. Witnesses 🔑277(2)—Cross-examination to show defendant, charged with violating State Poisons Act, was prostitute, was improper as tending to prejudice jury (St. 1907, p. 124, as amended by St. 1925, p. 137).

Cross-examination of defendant charged with violation of State Poisons Act (St. 1907, p. 124), as amended by St. 1925, p. 137, looking to development before jury of fact that accused was prostitute, was manifestly erroneous as tending to prejudice the jury.

8. Criminal law 🔑1169(10)—Error in admitting letter was not reversible, where substance had been testified to without objection.

Case would not be remanded because of erroneous admission in evidence over defendant's objection of letter tending to show the motive which prompted witness to cause defendant's arrest, where all that could be gathered from the letter by construction or implication had been testified to by witness or defendant without objection.

9. Poisons 🔑9—Information for violation of state act need not allege intent (State Poisons Act, as amended by St. 1925, p. 137).

Intent is not declared to be an ingredient of the offense of possession of poisonous drugs by the State Poisons Act (St. 1907, p. 124), as amended by St. 1925, p. 137, and hence criminal intent need not be alleged in the information.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Isabel Le Baron was convicted of a violation of the State Poisons Act, and she appeals. Affirmed.

Edward Bickmore, of Merced, and Edwin V. McKenzie and J. H. Sapiro, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, Acting P. J. By an information filed in the superior court of Merced county by the district attorney thereof the defendant was charged with violating the provisions of the "State Poisons Act," so called. Stats. 1907, p. 124, as amended by the Legislature of 1925; Stats. 1925, p. 137.

The information, in two separate counts, accuses the defendant of the commission of two different offenses under said act, to wit: (1) Having in her possession cocaine, a poisonous drug; (2) having in her possession morphine, also a poisonous drug.

The trial of the defendant upon said charges resulted in her conviction by the jury of each of said offenses. She made and urged a motion for a new trial, which was denied. This appeal is prosecuted by her from the judgment of conviction and the order denying her motion for a new trial.

The points presented and vigorously pressed for a reversal are: (1) That the testimony relied upon by the people for a conviction—in fact, the only testimony, as it is the claim, tending to support the allegations of the information—was that of an accomplice of the accused in the alleged commission of the crimes charged, and that such accomplice's testimony was not corroborated by testimony independent of that of such accomplice in the manner prescribed by section 1111 of the Penal Code; (2) erroneous rulings on the admission of certain testimony; (3) that neither count of the information states a public offense.

It appears that in the city of Merced there was a house known as the "Palace Rooming House" or "Palace Rooms." At this house, at the times connected with the present inquiry, transients could secure lodgings and, if desired, according to the testimony of the alleged accomplice, and which testimony is strongly corroborated by circumstances, a customer or lodger could secure the unsavory companionship for the night or even for a less permanent duration of time of a female abandoned to the lowest vices to which a human of that sex can descend. In other words, speaking plainly, and in perfect accord with the facts and circumstances developed through the evidence, while it is true that a person could secure a room at said house to be used solely for the purpose of rest, it is also true that the place was conducted as a house of assignation or prostitution. It further appears that in the months of May, June, and July, 1927, a woman known as May Howard, also known as "May Wilson," had said house under lease and owned the furniture that it then contained; that, during that time and down to July 14, 1927, said May Wilson, by which name we will hereinafter refer to that party, did not herself, or personally, manage or conduct said house, nor was she then about the premises very often, but that she employed a young woman, of the age of 22 years, and who was known as Dewie Dale, to manage the establishment for her (Wilson); that Miss Dale did manage the place during the months mentioned. The evidence also discloses that, on the 14th day of July, 1927, the defendant purchased the leasehold interest of May Wilson in the premises and also all the furniture and household equipments it then contained. The defendant, it may here be stated, was the wife of a man by the name of McCracken, but who for some time and at all the times referred to herein passed under the pseudonym of "Paul Le Baron." After and from the time the defendant took possession of the premises, Dewie Dale (now quoting from the statement of the facts as it is presented in the defendant's brief) "continued as an inmate of the house up to the time of the arrest of the defendant on July 30th, 1927; that the defendant and her husband, Paul Le Baron, had stopped at this house at divers times prior to the taking over of the lease by the defendant on July 14th, and were there twice for a day or two at a time after the last-mentioned date (Dewie Dale still being in charge for defendant), coming to Merced and stopping at said lodging house on the evening prior to the arrest of the defendant; that at the times the defendant and her husband were present in Merced after said July 14th, and particularly on the evening and night preceding the arrest of the defendant, said Dewie Dale, the defendant, and her husband occupied several of the front rooms of said lodging house and particularly jointly used a front corner room of the same." On the morning of the 30th of July, 1927, a controversy of an acrimonious nature arose at the "rooming house" between Dewie Dale, on the one side, and the defendant and her husband on the other, the origin thereof being differently explained by Dewie and the defendant. The quarrel having ended, Dewie Dale by telephone called the chief of police and informed the party answering the call that the defendant had concealed in the house a quantity of narcotics. Two police officers shortly thereafter appeared at the house, and within a few minutes subsequently and while the Dale woman was telling said officers of the alleged fact of the possession of the narcotics by the defendant, the chief of police, Wayne Westfall, also appeared at the house. Miss Dale repeated to the chief the charge against the defendant, and at the same time led that officer into the lavatory or "toilet," as she expressed it, and, reaching through an aperture in the ceiling, brought out and delivered to the chief two cans containing morphine and a package containing cocaine. When the chief of police entered the rooming house the defendant was present. She heard the charge laid against her before the chief by Dewie Dale, but she denied having possession of the drugs and declared that she did not know until then that there were any such articles in the house, and had no knowledge of how or by whom the narcotics were placed above the ceiling of the toilet. The two women were placed under arrest by the chief and taken to jail, where they were incarcerated. Charges of unlawful possession of poisonous drugs were filed before a magistrate against both women, and, upon a preliminary examination of the charges, both were held for trial in the superior court for said offenses, and there a separate information, based upon the magistrate's commitment, was filed against each. At the time of the trial of the defendant, Dewie Dale had not been brought to trial. Paul Le Baron was at the rooming house at the time the Dale woman telephoned for the officers, but he left the premises either before or immediately upon the arrival of the officer (the record is not clear as to this), and, so far as the present record discloses, has not been seen or heard of since the date of the arrest of the two women.

At the trial of the defendant the chief of police testified to the facts embraced within the above general statement, in so far as was concerned his connection with the occurrences at the rooming house after he appeared there. The chief further testified that, in addition to the narcotics, the Dale woman also took from the ceiling of the toilet and delivered to him a package containing "little rubber tubes," "some little glass vials," a catheter, etc.; that, about an hour after the women were confined in jail, he, with Dewie Dale, returned to the rooming house, the latter having told him at the jail that there were some other articles at the house belonging to the narcotic equipment. Dale, on that occasion, after looking about the house for a time, found in the drawer of the phonograph stand a box containing "hypodermic needles," and passed the box and its contents over to the chief. The latter further testified that Dale delivered to him as a part of the "drug outfit" a small syringe. The witness was not certain whether that instrument was taken by the Dale woman from the place over the ceiling from which she obtained the cases of morphine and the cocaine package and at that time delivered to him, or was found and delivered to him by her on their return to the house after she had been taken to jail. He was positive, though, that the syringe was found and delivered to him by Dewie on the one or other of those occasions. The chief testified that the phonograph stand referred to was in the room which defendant stated to him that she and her husband occupied. He further testified that at the time of the arrest, and while he was still at the rooming house, the Dale woman stated to him that, while she had on two or three occasions used cocaine, she was not a "drug addict."

Dewie Dale, testifying for the people, stated:

That on the 30th of July, 1927, she was engaged in the business of prostitution at the "Palace Hotel" in Merced, and that the defendant at the same time and place was engaged in the same business. (This testimony was received without objection, and no motion to strike it from the record was made by defendant's counsel or by defendant herself.) Continuing, the witness said: That she placed the cases and the package of cocaine "in the attic" (as she termed it) of the toilet, "punching a hole through the ceiling for that purpose, by the direction of Paul Le Baron, given in the presence of the defendant. That one of the cans was so concealed within the last two weeks of June, 1927, and the second can, by his direction, placed in the same place about two or three weeks after putting the first can there. That the "little rubbers" and glass vials were, by direction of Le Baron, by her put in the same place, wrapped in a separate package, as was also the cocaine. The can of morphine last placed in the ceiling of the toilet, she said, was given to her by Paul Le Baron about half an hour after he and defendant arrived at the house from San Francisco. That Le Baron "took it from his bag"; that "he (Le Baron) said: 'Dewie, take this can and put it in the plant with the other.'" That, as Dewie took the can, Le Baron said to her: "Just wait a minute; I have something else." "So," continued Dewie, "he went through his bag and started to look for the cocaine, and he could not find it, and so Isabel says: 'Just a minute; I will get it for you.' And she (defendant) went to his bag and got his bathrobe and went in the pocket and took out the blue package of cocaine, and she handed it to me, and when she handed me that morphine, I put it in the plant, in the hiding place."

"Q. (By District Attorney): Is Paul Le Baron an addict? A. He is.

"Q. Is Isabel an addict? A. She is.

"Q. Do you know approximately the amount used by either of them, the amount of morphine? A. Well; I don't know to the grain, but I know just about how much of a cube they use. * * * Well; Isabel uses, I think, a little less than Paul, but not very much less—I would say a quarter of a tube less.

"Q. How does she (defendant) use it? A. With a hypodermic."

Witness explained how the syringe found in the room of defendant and the hypodermic needles were used by a narcotic addict for the purpose of self-injection of the narcotics, and stated that she had seen the defendant use those articles when injecting morphine or cocaine into her body. The witness testified that Le Baron stated to her, in the presence of the defendant, that he had acquired the leasehold interest of May Wilson in the premises and also had purchased from the same party the furniture and household equipment in the house, and that the house was to be under the charge and management of the defendant; that she (Dewie Dale) could remain at the house and conduct the same until the defendant (his wife) had so far recovered her health as to enable her to take personal charge and management thereof; that she (witness) did remain at the house and in control and paid to the defendant any moneys she received for the renting of rooms. At the time of the arrest (the witness stated) the defendant was in active charge of the house. Dewie Dale, on cross-examination, stated that the narcotics referred to herein were placed in the "hiding place" in the house by her while May Wilson was owner of the "Palace Rooms" or "Palace Hotel," as sometimes the premises in question were called by the witnesses. May Wilson herself was not at the house at any time while she owned it, but Dewie, as explained above, was managing the place for Wilson. In this connection it is proper to state that the defendant testified that both she and her husband stopped at the rooming house several times in the month of June, 1927. The Dale woman testified that on two of such visits she "planted," or concealed in the house, at the request of Paul Le Baron, the narcotics which she delivered to the chief of police on the 30th of July.

The defendant testified that she had known Paul McCracken, or Le Baron, for about six years prior to the time of the trial of this case, and that, about a year prior to the trial, she and Paul intermarried in Jackson county, Or. She testified that she and her husband had been occasional visitors to the Palace Rooming House and visited the house in the month of June, 1927; she admitted that she acquired from May Wilson the latter's leasehold in the premises and also purchased the furniture in the house and took possession thereof on the 14th of July, 1927, but that a written transfer was not executed until the 27th day of July of that year; that she was not in good health at the times referred to and for that reason she employed Dewie Dale, who had been conducting the place for May Wilson, to take charge of the place and manage it until she (defendant) was herself able to do so. She stated that she first met Dewie Dale at a roadhouse near Sacramento City on September 17, 1926, at which roadhouse Dewie was employed, and that she again met her in January, 1927, at her (defendant's) house in Los Angeles; that she became interested in the proposition of taking over the Merced rooming house through the suggestion of Dewie Dale. Defendant, in reply to questions by her own attorney, stated that her husband (Paul Le Baron) was "what is known as a drug addict," and that she herself was in the habit of taking morphine once a week. In assumed mitigation of this habit of herself and husband, she explained that both took the narcotics because of "ill health"; that, as to herself, she used the morphine by the advice of her physician for the purpose of relieving herself from the bodily pains incident to her ill health or the disease, whatever its specific nature was, from which she was and had for a year been a sufferer. She in effect admitted that she was a prostitute, a proposition as to which further consideration will be required when we take up for determination the point involving an attack on certain rulings as to the admissibility of certain testimony and upon which a demand for reversal is predicated.

The foregoing synoptical statement of the testimony is sufficient for the purpose of considering the point first made by the defendant for a reversal, to wit: That the testimony of Dewie Dale, who, it is claimed, was an accomplice of the defendant in the commission of the offenses charged in the information, was not corroborated as the law declares is indispensable to the support of a conviction, where such accomplice's testimony is the only testimony directly connecting the accused with the commission of the offense charged. In considering this question, we are not to be understood as deciding that Dewie Dale, under the evidence presented by the record before us and under the statute upon which the information herein is founded, is an accomplice. Nor is it to be understood that we here intend to hold that she was not such accomplice. See latter clause of section 1111, Pen. Code. We may and will assume, however, for the purposes of the decision herein, that she was an accomplice of the accused in the commission of the offenses of which the latter was convicted.

[1] As to the quantum and the quality of proof essential to the corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice to justify, legally, a conviction of the accused upon such testimony, section 1111 of the Penal Code provides:

> "A conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense; and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof."

It will be noticed that the language of the foregoing section is, in substance, that the corroborating testimony is sufficient if it tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, and the courts of this and of many, if not all, of the other state jurisdictions, in construing that language have uniformly held that if the corroborating evidence of itself tends so to connect the defendant, it sufficiently measures up to the requirements of the section, even though it be slight, "and entitled, when standing by itself, to but little consideration." People v. McLean, 84 Cal. 480, 482, 24 P. 32. See, also, People v. Melvane, 39 Cal. 616. "If," says the court, in People v. Blunkall, 31 Cal. App. 778, 783, 161 P. 997, 999, "there be some independent evidence fairly tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime, then the testimony of the accomplice is corroborated within the intent of the above section. People v. Garnett, 29 Cal. 622; People v. Clough, 73 Cal. 348, 15 P. 5; People v. Miller, 65 Iowa, 60, 21 N. W. 181; People v. Mayhew, 150 N. Y. 346, 44 N. E. 971."

[2] It seems to us very clear that the reading of the evidence, as in conspectus form it has hereinabove been reproduced, cannot leave in the mind of one free from a partisan interest in the case any doubt that there are facts and circumstances brought out by evidence independent of the testimony of Dewie Dale which in probative effect extends beyond that quantum of proof, which merely tends to connect the accused with the commission of the offenses with which the information charges her. Indeed, the facts and circumstances referred to were in part brought into the record by the defendant's own admissions and are these: (1) That the defendant and her husband visited and temporarily stopped at the rooming house on several different occasions in the middle part of the month of June, 1927, and also several different times in the month of July, prior to the 14th day of that month, on which date the defendant took possession of the premises under the lease transferred to her by May Wilson. (2) That, from and including the last named date she held possession of the house and through Dewie Dale, her agent, managed the business conducted thereat, until a few days prior to the 30th of July, when, as she admitted to the chief of police, she was herself in personal charge of the place. (3) That her husband was a drug addict, or, as that phrase really means, an habitual or confirmed user of narcotics, and that she herself, though denying that she was a "drug addict," used morphine once a week. (4) That (the chief of police testified) when Dewie Dale returned to the house with that officer, after her arrest, to look for and deliver to him, if she found them, certain articles which are necessary to be used where opiates are hypodermically administered, she searched several different rooms in the house and several different places in the rooms before she was able to locate any such articles, and finally found a number of "hypodermic needles" in the drawer of the phonograph stand, which was then in the room occupied by the defendant and her husband, a circumstance reasonably affording the inference that the needles were placed where found by some one other than the witness, otherwise the latter would have known their precise location and not have been required to search the several rooms in the house to locate them. (5) The undisputed fact that the narcotics were secreted in the toilet in the bathroom which was directly connected with the room occupied by the defendant and her husband on every occasion that they visited and stopped at the house.

[3, 4] These circumstances were more than sufficient to meet the requirement of section 1111 of the Penal Code as to the corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice. Indeed, we feel no reluctance in saying that upon those circumstances alone, or without regard to the testimony of Dewie Dale, the jury could, as they did, predicate an impregnable verdict of guilty. Of course, the jury were not bound by the testimony of the defendant denying knowledge of the fact that the narcotics were concealed in her house until the time of the arrest of herself and Dewie Dale. They were the exclusive judges of the question of the credibility of her testimony. It can readily be perceived how the jury could have concluded from all the circumstances of the case that the narcotics were secreted and kept in the house for her own as well as for the convenient use of her husband, admittedly a slave to the drug habit. It is known as a matter of common knowledge that a confirmed user of opium, morphine, cocaine, and other like opiates must at all times keep his system of nerve fibers maintained to a certain condition of stimulation, and that when the effects of the poison are disappearing, will develop a state of desperation unless the poisonous drug is immediately accessible to him. This proposition is, indeed, so generally known and understood that it would be absurd to say that the courts and juries may not take notice thereof and apply it where necessary in the determination of an issue such as is presented here. But this discussion need not further be pursued. As before stated, it is perfectly clear, as it has been our sole purpose to point out in the foregoing consideration of the evidence, that in any event there is sufficient evidence, apart from or independent of the testimony of Dewie Dale, to support the verdict, and that therefore, if Dewie Dale was an accomplice of the accused, such independent evidence more than measures up to the requirement of the law as to the quantum of corroborating evidence necessary in such instances.

[5] It may well here be suggested, in order to meet any argument which might be offered upon the proposition, that even if the defendant herself was not a drug addict (a matter for the jury to determine, notwithstanding her positive denial that she was), but held possession of the drugs for use by her husband or by Dewie Dale or for both, that fact would not constitute a legal defense to the charges alleged against her. Nor would it be a defense to said charges if it appeared that the possession was joint—that is, if the drugs were kept in the house to be used by herself, her husband, and Dewie Dale. In that case each would equally be subject to punishment for such unlawful possession. This proposition, though, is so clearly a commonplace that the citation of cases to support it is entirely unnecessary, yet, it may not be wholly amiss to state that precisely the same proposition is suggested in the case of the People v. Hay, 74 Cal. App. 464, 472, 241 P. 275.

[6, 7] The second point, as above declared, is founded on rulings admitting certain testimony which, it is claimed, resulted in seriously prejudicing the accused in the minds of the jury. On cross-examination, the district attorney examined the defendant as follows:

"Q. What is your occupation? A. I have none.

"Q. Haven't you been practicing prostitution? A. No, sir, not for one year; my health would not permit it.

"Q. You have not practiced prostitution nor been in a house of prostitution for one year? A. I have been in a house of prostitution, but I have not practiced it.

"Q. You were not working? A. I was not working; no, sir.

"Q. Weren't you working here for May Wilson? A. No, sir.

"Q. Never? A. No, sir."

There were no objections interposed by the defendant's counsel to those questions.

The district attorney, assuming (upon what theory or for what purpose we have been unable to discern) that it was not only legally proper but important to show, if he could, that the defendant had practiced prostitution within the year during which she stated that her health was such as to prevent her from actually engaging in that business, asked her on cross-examination if she had not "worked" during said period of time in several different houses of ill fame in the city of Los Angeles. There were no objections made by the defendant's counsel to those questions. The prosecutor then asked the defendant whether, on the night of the 9th of August, 1927, she was "entertaining" a "man" in her apartment at 355 Fulton street, San Francisco, when a detective entered the apartment looking for Paul Le Baron, and that the "man" then said to the detective, in the presence of the defendant, that "he had picked you (defendant) up on the street and paid you (defendant) $14, or some such sum." Counsel for the accused did object to that question and assigned the asking of the question as misconduct on the part of the prosecutor. The defendant admitted that within the year preceding the time of the trial of this case she was in several houses of prostitution in the city of Los Angeles referred to by the prosecutor but denied that during that time, or while in said houses, she actually practiced prostitution. As to the San Francisco episode, she positively denied that any such transaction occurred.

In rebuttal, the prosecutor introduced as a witness one A. J. Kane, the head of a San Francisco detective agency, who testified, in response to questions by the district attorney, that on the night of the 9th of August, 1927, he went to the apartment of the defendant at 355 Fulton street, in San Francisco, to look for and arrest Paul Le Baron; that upon entering the apartment, he saw a man in a room therein partly undressed and engaged in putting his clothes on; that he asked the man if he was McCracken (or Le Baron), and defendant interposed, saying, "He (the 'man') is my uncle." To which the "man" replied: "Uncle, hell! I am not; I paid her $14 to stay here all night." To that testimony the defendant made no objection. It should be explained, however, that after the detective had stated his purpose in visiting the defendant's apartment, to wit: to arrest Le Baron "for Merced county," counsel for the defendant objected to the testimony as "irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent"; but, upon the statement by the court that, while the defendant could not be impeached by testimony of particular acts, the testimony proposed, as explained by the prosecutor, was nevertheless admissible for the purpose of contradicting defendant's testimony that she was not then practicing prostitution or engaged in that business, as affecting the credibility of her testimony, counsel for the defendant acquiesced in that view of the law and made no further objections to the detective's testimony. The result was that the latter's testimony about seeing a man, not fully attired, in defendant's room, and of what the man stated was the occasion or reason for his presence there, went before the jury without objection. And so throughout the trial, as the record discloses, counsel for the defendant, from the nature of his objections, appears to have assumed that it was legally proper for the people to bring before the jury in a competent way any fact or circumstance which would tend to show that his client was not only a prostitute but that she had practiced prostitution continuously down to the date of her arrest for the offenses with which the information charges her, upon the theory that such testimony went to the impeachment of her testimony that she had not actually followed her sordid vocation during the course of the year immediately preceding the date of trial.

The cross-examination of the defendant by the district attorney looking to the development of the fact before the jury that the accused was a prostitute was manifestly erroneous and should not have been permitted. People v. Un Dong, 106 Cal. 83, 87, 88, 39 P. 12; People v. Crandall, 125 Cal. 129, 134, et seq., 57 P. 785; People v. Vatek, 71 Cal. App. 453, 468, 236 P. 163. In People v. Un Dong, supra, the defendant (on trial for the crime of assault with a deadly weapon alleged to have been committed on a public street in the Chinese quarters of San Jose) and an associate, one Ah Wei, lay in wait in the night time for the prosecuting witness, one Ah Bong, to appear upon the street from a restaurant where he was known by defendant to be at the time, and when, finally, Ah Bong made his appearance upon the street the defendant told Ah Wei to shoot; that the latter thereupon fired two shots at Ah Bong, one of which hit him in the back. In cross-examining the defendant, the district attorney asked him, among other questions, if it was not true that the house he resided in was a house of prostitution. Objection by the defense to that question was overruled, and the defendant answered in the negative. Other like questions were asked, objected to, the objection overruled and the defendant answered in the negative. In reply to the argument of the attorney-general that the negative answers of the defendant to the questions allowed had the effect of curing the error, or any prejudice to the rights of the defendant which affirmative answers might have produced, the court, after characterizing the cross-examination as "improper in the highest degree," said: "The error in such case lies in permitting an examination of that character," citing People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 459, 34 P. 1078. The rule as thus laid down is proper to invoke in all cases in which the testimony sought to be elicited by the indicated cross-examination has no possible connection with the issue under trial. Indeed, such a cross-examination in any case, unless it is one in which the accused is charged with some sex offense to which such an inquiry would or might be directly pertinent, is improper, so much so that the mere asking of questions along those lines, even if answers thereto were disallowed, would itself be highly prejudicial to the accused, because of the insinuation with which necessarily they are pregnant that the defendant is or has been guilty of living a life characterized by the worst kind of moral depravity, an insinuation which would be likely to find lodgment in the minds of the jury so that they, maybe unconsciously, would or might be more or less influenced against the accused, even in cases where, as the court stated was true in the case of Un Dong, supra, there was unsatisfactory competent proof of the defendant's guilt. In the present case, however, while we do not approve of the cross-examination of the defendant by the district attorney along the lines indicated, the situation with respect to such cross-examination is peculiar and entirely different from that found in any of the cases where a like cross-examination was prosecuted under the approval of the trial court and of which the cases above cited are exemplars. The fact that the place where the narcotics were kept and found was a house of prostitution was first brought out in the direct examination of Dewie Dale by the district attorney, and the further fact that both the Dale woman and the defendant were prostitutes was likewise shown. Naturally, the defendant's counsel did not object to Dewie Dale's testimony admitting that she was and had been engaged in the house where the narcotics were secreted and found in the business of prostitution, but counsel did not, as he should have done, object to that witness' testimony that the defendant was a prostitute. The only objection made by counsel in connection with the part of Dewie Dale's testimony describing the character of the house and stating that both she and the defendant were prostitutes was to the following question to that witness by the prosecutor: "What connection did Paul Le Baron have with that place?" referring to the Palace rooming house. The objection to that question by counsel for the accused was that it called "for a conclusion of the witness." Later on in the direct examination of Dewie Dale, the district attorney brought from the witness the statement that both she and the defendant were "girls" of Paul Le Baron—that is, that he practically lived with both of the women. Then the prosecutor asked: "You were both his girls, and you were working under him?" Objection here was made by counsel for the defendant upon the ground that the relationship of the women to Le Baron was foreign to the issues and assigned the asking of the question as misconduct. The district attorney stated, in an attempt to support the competency of the question, that its purpose was to bring out ultimately the fact that the defendant was in personal charge of the house when the narcotics were delivered to the chief of police. A colloquy followed between court and counsel, and finally the attorney for the defendant stated that the latter had admitted that she was in charge of the house at the time mentioned, and "that ought to be sufficient." Thus that particular matter ended.

It will thus be seen that, as above stated, counsel for the defendant, in the trial of the case, from its beginning to its conclusion, appears to have been of the opinion that the malodorous character of the business maintained in the "rooming" house as well as the bad personal character of the defendant was a legitimate subject of inquiry in the case. Allowing all that testimony to go before jury without objection clearly supports that conclusion, and as clearly does it place the defendant before this court in a position in which consistently or logically or legally she cannot ask for a reversal of the case because the testimony referred to thus became a part of the record upon which the jury were to decide the question of her guilt or innocence. It may here well be repeated that the verdict is more than satisfactorily supported by competent evidence, otherwise a different situation—such as the court said appeared in the case of People v. Un Dong, supra—might be presented here.

[8] Defendant emphasizes the proposition that timely objection was made in her behalf against a certain letter introduced in evidence by the district attorney by way of rebuttal. The record shows that Dewie Dale stated in her direct examination that she was in love with Paul Le Baron, and that she had frequently had sexual relations with him, not only with the knowledge but with the express approval of the defendant. On cross-examination, and upon the theory that it affected the credibility of her testimony, the defendant's counsel asked Miss Dale if the motive prompting her to cause the arrest of the defendant was jealousy of the latter's relations with Paul Le Baron. The witness replied in the negative, but declared that she caused the arrest of defendant because Le Baron had the day previously severely beaten her about the face and body,, had threatened to kill her, and that defendant had encouraged Paul to beat her and also stated that he (Paul) ought to "bump her off," meaning that he ought to kill her. Under the guise of rebuttal and upon the assumption that he had a right to show that jealousy was not the reason Miss Dale caused defendant to be arrested, the district attorney offered in evidence a letter (referred to above) written by the defendant at Los Angeles under date of May 23, 1927, and addressed to Dewie Dale, at Merced, in which defendant, addressing Dewie in endearing terms, gave a graphic account of the trip of herself and Paul Le Baron in an automobile to Los Angeles, gave a somewhat vivid description of the harrowing details of a physical combat which Paul had had with an unnamed drunken Mexican, who, it seems, had been traveling with them, told of the narrow escape of Paul from death at the hands of the Mexican, of how valiantly Paul fought the "crazy Mexican" and the skill with which he successfully defended both himself and defendant against injury and concluded by saying that if Dewie had only been present and had witnessed the fight she would now not only love and respect Paul, as she always had, but that she would "worship him." This is the substance of the contents of the letter. There was no necessity for introducing the letter in evidence, even if it were to be conceded that it was competent evidence for the purpose for which it was offered. Miss Dale, while denying that jealousy was her motive in causing the arrest of the defendant, admitted that she had a personal motive in exposing to the officers defendant's possession of the narcotics. All that the defendant needed or cared to show was that Miss Dale was interested in the success of the people's case for personal reasons. This shown, it could make no difference what the specific motive was, for, whatever it might have been, there was thus created an opening for the argument by defendant that she might, in her zeal for revenge against the latter, stray from the path of truth when giving her testimony to the jury. But, admitting that it was error to allow the letter to be received in evidence, there are substantial reasons arising from the record itself for holding that the case should not be remanded for such error, and they are these: (1) All that can be gathered from the letter (and this by construction or implication) is what Dewie Dale testified to without objection on her direct examination, viz., that she loved Le Baron and that she sustained immoral relations with him with the approval or acquiescence of the defendant. (2) That (also by construction or implication) the defendant, as without objection she testified, was a "professional" prostitute. It is perfectly clear that any testimony that she was engaged in that unholy business, received after she herself admitted on the witness stand and, after Dewie Dale, without objection, testified that her business was that of a prostitute, could not have intensified the harm, if any, which had already been done in that respect under the circumstances as fully explained above.

[9] The last point (and in regular order it should have been the first to be considered) to which attention is invited is that the information fails to state the offenses therein sought to be charged because the defendant is not thereby charged with "willfully, unlawfully and feloniously having narcotics in her possession." This contention means that, to state the crime set forth in the information, it is necessary to allege that the accused committed the acts constituting said crimes with the intent to do so. The contention is devoid of merit. The statute defining the offenses charged against the defendant does not declare that either intent or scienter is an ingredient thereof. It provides that the mere possession of the narcotics named in the information shall subject the possessor to the penalties prescribed therein. The rule of criminal pleading applying to cases of the character of the one here is exhaustively considered in the case of People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 171, 176, et seq., 31 P. 45, 47, and many authorities are cited, agreeing that:

> "When an act, in general terms, is made indictable, a criminal intent need not be shown, unless from the language or effects of the law a purpose to require the existence of such intent can be discovered"—citing Halsted v. State, 41 N. J. Law, 552, 32 Am. Rep. 247.

It is further declared in the O'Brien Case:

> "The same principle is applied to many cases, such as selling intoxicating liquors to minors, abducting girls under a certain age, usurping an office under the belief that the usurper was truly elected, illegal voting under the belief that the voter is a qualified elector, publishing a libel in ignorance of its contents, storing gunpowder, and the like. 1 Wharton's Crim. Law, § 88; 2 Wharton's Crim. Law, § 1584; Hill v. State, 62 Ala. 170."

To the same effect are the cases of People v. Hartman, 130 Cal. 487, 62 P. 823; People v. Pera, 36 Cal. App. 292, 304, 171 P. 1091; Commonwealth v. Weiss, 139 Pa. 251, 21 A. 10, 11 L. R. A. 530, 23 Am. St. Rep. 182; State v. Gould, 40 Iowa, 374; Commonwealth v. Holstein, 132 Pa. St. 357, 19 A. 273; Rex v. Ogden, 6 Car. & P. 611. See, also, Pen. Code. § 7.

We may add that if the defendant in a case, like the one here, is prosecuted under the State Poison Act, and his possession of any of the narcotics falling under the condemnation of the statute is upon the prescription of a physician given in good faith or for purely medicinal purposes, he may shield himself against punishment by exhibiting the prescription and so proving the fact that such possession was lawful. People v. O'Brien, supra. No such proof was offered in the present case.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

NYE & NISSON v. WEED LUMBER CO.
(Civ. 6081.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 19, 1928.

1. Sales 🔑384(7)—Seller may, on buyer's breach, recover excess of contract price over net proceeds obtained from resale (Civ. Code, § 3311).

Under Civ. Code, § 3311, the measure of damages for breach of contract to purchase personal property, when title is not vested in buyer, may properly be the excess of the contract price over the net proceeds obtained from a resale of the property.

2. Sales 🔑340—Seller, on buyer's refusal to accept goods, may sue for purchase price, treat property as his own, and sue for difference between market price and market value, or sell property as buyer's agent and sue for difference between contract price and proceeds (Civ. Code, § 3049).

On buyer's breach of contract to buy personal property, seller may stand on contract, retain property for benefit of buyer and sue for purchase price, or may retain and treat property as his own and sue for the difference between the contract price and the market value of the property at time and place of agreed delivery, or may, under Civ. Code, § 3049, sell the property as buyer's agent and sue for the difference between the price and the net proceeds of resale.

3. Sales 🔑208—Title to eggs, to be procured by seller after contract was entered into, did not pass at time contract was made (Civ. Code, § 1140).

Where seller of processed eggs did not have possession of the eggs at time of contract, but subsequently received, candled, and packed the eggs for the buyer, and the contract did not specifically nor impliedly provide for immediate transfer of title, the title did not pass at the time the contract was entered into, under Civ. Code, § 1140.

4. Sales 🔑199—Time of transfer of title depends on intent ascertained from contract.

The question of the immediate transfer of title to personal property depends on the intent of the parties, which is to be ascertained from the contract.

5. Sales 🔑333—Notice to buyer of time and place of resale by seller as buyer's agent held unnecessary.

Seller, reselling eggs as buyer's agent on buyer's refusal to accept eggs, to recover difference between contract price and net proceeds of resale, was not required to give buyer notice of specific time and place of sale.

6. Sales 🔑68—"Processed eggs" within contract for sale thereof meant dipping the egg or glazing the shell with solution to prevent fermentation or deterioration.

The term "processed eggs" in a contract for sale thereof meant that the egg was to be dipped or the shell glazed with a solution intended to fill the pores of the shell to prevent penetration of air or bacteria, and to thereby deter fermentation or deterioration, in view of the meaning of the term "in poultry industry."

7. Sales 🔑168(3)—Candling held adequate method of determining soundness of eggs.

Candling eggs held adequate method of determining their soundness in action for buyer's refusal to accept processed eggs.

8. Sales 🔑266, 272—Implied warranty that eggs were sound and merchantable became part of contract of sale (Civ. Code, §§ 1771, 1775).

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1771, 1775, implied warranty that processed eggs were sound and merchantable become part of the contract for sale thereof.

9. Trial 🔑404(1)—Findings will be liberally construed to uphold judgment.

Every presumption of law favors a liberal construction of the findings so as to uphold the judgment rather than defeat it.

10. Sales 🔑279—Warranty as to recognized grade of commodity must be accepted in light of meaning known to trade.

When a warranty is made as to a recognized grade of a commodity, it must be accepted in the light of the meaning of that term as it is known to the trade.

11. Sales 🔑284(1, 2)—One or two defective eggs in case of processed eggs is not breach of implied warranty.

A defective egg or two in a case of processed eggs does not constitute breach of implied warranty that eggs are sound and merchantable.

12. Sales 🔑177—Buyer's refusal to accept 750 cases of processed eggs was not warranted by a small number of defective eggs.

A small number of defective eggs did not warrant buyer of 750 cases of processed eggs to refuse to accept eggs.

13. Appeal and error 🔑1170(10)—Defective findings held not ground for reversal (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, the mere fact that findings contained negative pregnants held not ground for reversal, where the judgment was sustained by the evidence.

14. Sales 🔑180(4)—Buyer, after acceptance of substantial portion, could not cancel contract as to undelivered portion, in absence of evidence that undelivered part was defective.

Buyer having accepted and paid for 128 cases of processed eggs under an entire contract for 750 cases held not warranted in canceling contract as to undelivered cases, in the absence of evidence that eggs to be delivered would be defective.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by Nye & Nisson against the Weed Lumber Company, also doing business under the firm name of Weed Mercantile Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Taylor & Tebbe, of Yreka, and Frank Thunen, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Smith & Jacobson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment for damages secured pursuant to section 3311, Civil Code, for breach of a contract to purchase processed eggs.

Respondent is engaged in the commission poultry and eggs business at San Francisco, Cal. The appellant is a holding corporation for the Weed Mercantile Company, and operates a store at Weed, Cal., in connection with its lumber industry. In April, 1923, appellant contracted with respondent for the purchase of 750 cases of special processed eggs at 34 cents per dozen, to be delivered upon request, f. o. b. at San Francisco. The contract for these eggs was entered into through correspondence between the parties. April 5, 1923, appellant sent the following telegram to the respondent:

> "Would like to contract for 1000 cases of processed specials for fall delivery. Advise immediately terms of contract for this season."

To which message respondent replied:

> "Answering—terms same as last year; price 34¢."

These messages were followed April 10th by this letter from appellant:

> "Gentlemen, you might write us confirming sale to the Weed Mercantile Company of 750 cases processed eggs to be delivered as needed between the dates of October 1st, and February 1st, at a price of 34¢ per dozen, f. o. b. San Francisco."

To which letter the respondent replied April 12th:

> "This is to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th inst., and confirm sale to the Weed Mercantile Company of 750 cases processed eggs, specials, to be delivered as needed between the dates of October 1st, 1923, and February 1st, 1924, at a price of 34¢ per dozen, f. o. b. San Francisco, Cal."

Pursuant to this contract 128 cases of processed eggs were shipped, accepted, and paid for by appellant, leaving undelivered 622 cases, containing 18,660 dozens of eggs, which appellant refused to accept and attempted to cancel the contract upon the ground that the eggs which had been received were unfit for use.

Several shipments of eggs were made to appellant prior to October 1st, which it insisted should not be charged against the contract for 750 cases above mentioned. The inference is that these eggs were entirely satisfactory and that the appellant was anxious to preserve the full benefit of its contract for 750 cases to be supplied at 34 cents per dozen between October 1st and the following February. By the middle of November the price of eggs had slumped. William Russell, a dairy produce broker, testified:

> "* * * The decline (in the price of eggs) started about the middle of October, but in * * * November and December it commenced to show itself strongly. In January it became very strong. Up to and including February 1, 1924, the market on processed pullet (eggs) went as low as 16 cents. I would consider a price of 20 cents * * * between January 23, and January 31, 1924, to be a fair market value of the eggs."

The 622 cases of rejected eggs were in fact sold on the open market the latter part of January for 20 cents to 22 cents per dozen.

By December 5th, 128 cases of eggs had been shipped, accepted, and paid for by appellant. November 2d it began to complain of the quality of eggs received, saying in a letter of that date:

> "We have had several complaints from our steward that the eggs we were getting from you were not satisfactory. * * * In several cases we find we have lost quite a few eggs from each case. * * * Advise us if you will be in a position to fill contract for storage eggs stored in months of May and June? * * *"

On December 14th appellant wrote respondent again, as follows:

> "* * * It is with regret that we will be compelled to request that you cancel our contract for processed eggs, as our steward has positively refused to use further shipments of storage eggs from you. * * * We will not be in a position to favor you with further orders this year on storage eggs."

On December 18th respondent wrote appellant declining to cancel the contract for eggs which were undelivered, saying that the price of eggs had dropped materially since the execution of the contract, and that in the absence of instructions to the contrary respondent would sell the 622 cases of undelivered eggs on the market for the benefit of appellant and credit its account with the proceeds of sale. December 31st appellant replied, saying:

> "* * * We cannot use those eggs and will be compelled to insist that you cancel the contract as requested."

Following this notice of intention to sell the eggs, the respondent did in fact sell the remaining 622 cases of eggs for the highest market price, receiving $3,906.60 therefor. The contract price of the undelivered eggs amounted to the sum of $6,344.40. The excess of the contract price, over the proceeds of resale therefore, was the sum of $2,437.80. Respondent thereupon brought suit for damages for this sum, for breach of contract.

Judgment and findings were entered accordingly.

Appellant contends that: (1) The evidence does not support the findings; that (2) the findings do not support the judgment; and that (3) there was a breach of warranty, as to the soundness of the eggs, required by section 1768 of the Civil Code.

[1, 2] The measure of damages for the breach of a contract to purchase personal property, when the title is not vested in the buyer, may properly be the excess of the contract price over the net proceeds obtained from a resale of the property. Secton 3311, Civ. Code; Burner v. American Bar Q. Min. Co., 76 Cal. App. 767, 246 P. 74; Garcia & Maggini v. Washington Dehydrated Food Co. (C. C. A.) 294 F. 765. However, in the event of a breach of contract to purchase personal property, the seller may have an option to stand upon the terms of his contract, retain the property for the benefit of the buyer and sue for the purchase price, or the seller may retain and treat the property as his own, suing for the difference between the contract price and the market value of the property at the time and place of the agreed delivery thereof, or, as was done in the present case, the seller, acting as an agent for the buyer, may sell the property pursuant to section 3049, Civil Code, and sue for the difference between the contract price and the net proceeds of the resale. Burner v. American Bar Q. Min. Co., supra. Section 3311, Civil Code, provides:

> "The detriment caused by the breach of a buyer's agreement to accept and pay for personal property, the title to which is not vested in him, is deemed to be: (1) If the property has been resold, * * * the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer, under the contract, over the net proceeds of the resale. * * *"

[3-5] In the present case the title to the undelivered eggs had not passed to the buyer for the reason that they were not in the possession of the seller at the time of the execution of the contract, but were received, candled and packed for the appellant subsequent to that time. The terms of the contract do not specify nor imply that the parties intended an immediate transfer of title, which, indeed, under the circumstances was impossible because the produce involved in the contract was then neither ascertained, selected, accepted, nor stored with the seller. Title therefore did not then pass. Sections 1140, 1141, Civ. Code; 1 Williston on Sales, (2d Ed.) 520, § 258. The question of the immediate transfer of title to personal property depends upon the intent of the parties, which is to be ascertained from the contract. 1 Williston on Sales, supra, 525, § 261; Turner, Kuhn & Fraser, Inc., v. Jones, 61 Cal. App. 732, 735, 215 P. 1033. Nor was it necessary that the seller should first give the buyer notice of the specific time and place of sale of the property. Garcia & Maggini v. Washington Dehydrated Food Co., supra. The method of measuring damages in the present case was therefore proper.

[6, 7] We are of the opinion that the evidence is ample to support the findings and the judgment. It appears from the record that a sufficient number of eggs of the quality and character specified to fulfill the contract were always on hand in the possession of the respondent, stored and subject to the appellant's order when desired. They were what were termed "special processed eggs," all of which were candled before they were packed and shipped to the purchaser. The term "special" was understood by the parties to refer to a selected grade of pullet's eggs. They were not purchased as fresh eggs, but the contract called only for "processed eggs." There is no controversy as to whether they were properly processed. This term, as it is used in the poultry industry, merely means that the egg is dipped, or the shell glazed with a solution which is intended to fill the pores of the shell to prevent the penetration of air or bacteria and to thereby deter fermentation or deterioration. 9 American Ency. 727. Manifestly, the effect of processing eggs will not indefinitely preserve their wholesomeness. It is argued by appellant that the system of candling eggs is inadequate to determine their soundness. But the system of candling eggs is the universal modern method employed by poultrymen to ascertain the quality and condition of eggs. We are referred to no other or better means of determining the age or condition of an egg. Webster's New International Dictionary, at page 319, defines the term "candling" as follows:

> "To test or examine by holding (the egg) between the eye and a candle, or other light. Eggs of unknown age are so tested, those unclouded and almost translucent being classed as candled eggs, and next in grade to fresh-laid eggs." King v. C. C. Bendell Commission Co., 7 Colo. App. 507, 44 P. 377.

Appellant contends that findings numbered 7, 8, 11, 12, 13, and 14 are unsupported by the evidence. The first three of these findings are general, specifying the terms of the contract entered into between the parties, the readiness and ability of the respondent to fulfill the agreement on its part, and the refusal to comply therewith on the part of appellant; the decrease of the market value of eggs subsequent to the execution of the contract; respondent's sale of the 622 cases of eggs which appellant refused to accept, and the amount of damages sustained by the breach of the contract. There is substantial evidence to support each of these findings. The contract appears in the correspondence heretofore quoted, and the terms are practically undisputed. From a fair reading of the record, it appears that respondent always held in store in its warehouse sufficient "special processed eggs," candled, sound, and merchantable, which it was able and willing to ship to appellant upon request In behalf of respondent, Mr. Whitmore testified:

> "We had 750 cases contracted for by the Weed Lumber Company. The orders we got were set aside against the Weed Lumber Company, not as our open stock."

Mr. Moncharsh testified:

> "We set away every case of eggs that we have sold on this contract.
> "Q. At the time that this contract was repudiated in December, 1923, was the balance of the eggs then due on the contract set aside for the Weed Lumber Company? A. They were still in the warehouse waiting to be withdrawn on order."

Respecting the soundness and quality of the eggs, this last-mentioned witness further testified:

> "When we received an order from Weed Lumber Company, we candled every egg to see whether there were any bad ones.
> "Q. And suppose you did find half a dozen cases of bad ones; what would you do with them? A. Throw them away; that would be the loss of Nye & Nisson."

Mr. Roberts testified:

> "* * * Every egg must be candled before it goes out to the customer, so it will be good. We know that it is good if it is candled. * * * I filled orders for Weed Mercantile Company for processed eggs. I candled practically all of them. The condition of the eggs at the time they were shipped under this contract, * * * I would consider very fancy. That is, what we call a fancy egg, is an egg that will keep up anywhere. * * * I never mixed the eggs up. As far as I know there was nothing shipped to Weed Mercantile Company that did not conform to the word 'processed specials.'
> "Q. You say you candled all these eggs? A. The only one that ever helped me was Mr. Whitmore. At times he would candle four or five cases."

Respecting the quality of the rejected eggs, which were sold on the open market, Mr. Smith, who purchased 250 cases of these eggs for Fred L. Hilmer Company, testified:

> "They were processed storage eggs fit for human consumption. There are always a few cracked or bloody eggs that are unfit. * * * These eggs were sample average."

There is some controversy over the question as to whether appellant received "special processed eggs," as the contract required, or another grade of eggs termed "processed pullet eggs." Mr. Moncharsh, however, testified that both of these terms referred to precisely the same grade of eggs. He said:

> "We use the word 'special,' 'processed special,' in a wholesale way to a jobber; we use the word 'processed pullets' which were the same egg—simply changed to 'specials' in a retail way. * * * We put up eggs other than pullets last year, and called them extras."

It is true, as contended by the appellant, that findings Nos. 13 and 14 contain negative pregnant statements, which in form are defective, and leave the inference that while it is found that respondent did not ship 20 cases of eggs to appellant which were mixed in quality and grade, and containing a large quantity of eggs which were old, stale, and decayed, that these cases might have contained a number of bad eggs, although not necessarily a "large quantity" thereof. This is followed by finding No. 14, which states in part:

> "It is not true that any shipment of eggs was not of the kind and quality contemplated in the contract entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant. * * *"

Finding No. 12 contains the following statement:

> "Plaintiff was at all times herein mentioned, ready and willing to carry out, on its part, the terms and provisions embodied in said contract; * * * and that, at all times subsequent to the 14th day of December, 1923 (defendant) refused to accept any further delivery of processed eggs as agreed upon in said contract, and refused to live up to the terms and conditions of said contract on its part."

The fifteenth finding is to the effect that all of the allegations of the answer in conflict with the findings of the court are untrue.

[8-13] The chief issue in the present case is whether the respondent was able to furnish the appellant with sound and merchantable eggs pursuant to the contract. The implied warranty that the eggs were sound and merchantable became a part of the contract by the provisions of sections 1771 and 1775, Civil Code, as completely as though that warranty had been incorporated therein. 22 Cal. Jur. 992, § 66. The probative fact to be determined by the court therefore was the question as to whether the undelivered eggs were sound and merchantable. The specific findings that "plaintiff was at all times * * * ready and willing to carry out * * * the terms and provisions embodied in the contract," and that "it is not true that any shipment of eggs was not of the kind and quality contemplated in the contract," necessarily implies that all shipments of eggs complied with the contract, and that, except for a minimum number, they were all sound and merchantable. The mere fact that the court inadvertently found, by the adoption of a negative pregnant, that some of the eggs which had been supplied were "old, stale, and decayed," will not require a reversal of the case for the reason that every presumption of the law favors a liberal construction of the findings so as to uphold the judgment rather than to defeat it. 2 Cal. Jur. 871, § 511. Following these well-established rules of law, it must be assumed that merely a minimum number of eggs were defective. There is a recognized distinction between the trade terms of "fresh eggs" and "processed eggs." It is a well-known fact that processed eggs are not presumed to have the high degree of quality possessed by fresh eggs. When a warranty is made as to a recognized grade of a commodity, it must be accepted in the light of the meaning of that term as it is known to the trade. It cannot reasonably be said that there is a breach of warranty as to the quality of processed eggs, merely because a case may contain a defective egg or two. To permit the cancellation of a contract for 750 cases of processed eggs merely because a minimum number thereof arrived at their destination unfit for use would violate the spirit of the legal maxim de minimis non curat lex. A technical defect in the form of the findings will not suffice to reverse a cause. Particularly is this true since the enactment of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. In spite of the negative pregnant contained in the findings, we are of the opinion that they sufficiently support the judgment, and that the judgment is sustained by the evidence.

[14] After a partial performance and acceptance of a large number of eggs, the appellant is estopped from canceling his contract, in the absence of evidence that future shipments are likely to be in the same defective condition. Appellant had accepted and paid for 128 cases of eggs from an entire contract for 750 cases before he undertook to cancel his contract. The record is devoid of evidence showing that the undelivered 622 cases of eggs were in quality below the standard of processed eggs. Unless there is evidence that an entire order for a large number of eggs, to be shipped in installments as required over a long period of time, is of the same pack, character, and quality, the fact that shipments received contain a minimum of defective eggs will not warrant the conclusion that future shipments will also contain like defective eggs. In the absence of evidence as to the condition of future shipments of undelivered eggs, one may not accept and pay for a considerable portion of the commodity, and then cancel the contract because of the presence of a small percentage of defective eggs among those which have been accepted. The case of Baer Grocer Co. v. Barber Milling Co. (C. C. A.) 223 F. 969, 972, which is in accordance with the weight of authority, states the rule applicable to the circumstances of the present case. In that case the defendant contracted for 5000 barrels of "White Satin Flour" to be delivered as called for by him. Shipments aggregating 1650 barrels were made between September, 1910, and the following March. As in the present case, there had been a sharp slump in the market value of flour. The defendant then declined to accept further shipments on the ground that the flour did not comply with the contract. The court said:

> "The defendant, after thus ordering the flour under its contract, and continuously for some months receiving the same thereunder, ought not in good faith and fair dealing, having partly performed the contract, to be permitted to rescind the same at its option, because of the alleged defect in the quality of some of the flour furnished. Its remedy, if any, under such circumstances, would be by way of offset or recoupment from the purchase money, or a suit for damages for breach of the contract." Guernsey v. West Coast Lumber Co., 87 Cal. 249, 25 P. 414; Scott v. Kittanning Coal Co., 89 Pa. St. 231, 33 Am. Rep. 753; Cahen v. Platt, et al., 69 N. Y. 348, 25 Am. Rep. 203; Clark v. Wheeling Steel Works (C. C. A.) 53 F. 494; 2 A. L. R. 663, note; 29 A. L. R. 1517, note.

In opposition to the foregoing general rule of law, appellant relies on the cases of Coburn v. California, etc., Co., 144 Cal. 81, 86, 77 P. 771, and Bobrick Chem. Co. v. Prest-O-Lite Co., 160 Cal. 209, 116 P. 747. Neither of these cases conflicts with the foregoing rule. In the Coburn Case, supra, the plaintiff contracted to purchase clay which was "suitable for the manufacture of cement." For a period of time he accepted shipments of clay, and attempted to use it by mixing it with clay of another quality, which was procured elsewhere. But the undelivered clay which was contracted for came from the same pit, and was of the same defective quality as that which had been delivered. None of the clay from defendant's pit was suitable for the manufacture of cement. Defendant was therefore utterly unable to comply with his contract. It was therefore properly held that in spite of an acceptance of a quantity of this clay, the plaintiff was entitled to rescind his contract. In the Bobrick Chemical Co. Case, supra, the defendant contracted to purchase a device guaranteed to properly inflate tires, which he agreed to sell as an agent for a period of three years. After accepting and paying for a considerable number of these contrivances, the defendant discovered that they were inherently defective and would not perform the service for which they were purchased. The undelivered devices were as inherently defective and useless as those which had been accepted. Moreover, it appeared that while the plaintiff had received some complaints as to their deficiency, he did not know until after his acceptance of a number of the devices how utterly unsatisfactory and useless they really were.

There is a clear distinction between the acceptance and partial performance of a contract for a commodity containing only a minimum percentage of defective articles when no such defect is shown to exist in the undelivered portion and a contract for a device or commodity which is inherently and wholly defective and useless for the purpose for which it is purchased.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF PASADENA v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 6017.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 13, 1928.

1. Prohibition ⚷5(1)—Action of judicial tribunal having jurisdiction may not be interfered with by prohibition.

Appellate court may not interfere by writ of prohibition with exercise of jurisdiction actually possessed by judicial tribunal, whose conduct is sought to be controlled.

2. Prohibition ⚷3(5), 10(1)—Court is not deprived of jurisdiction by fact that issue is res judicata, but may dispose of case accordingly; remedy by appeal being adequate.

Fact that question arising in suit is res judicata does not deprive court of jurisdiction, but court may pass on that issue and dispose of case accordingly, and in case of error remedy by appeal is available and adequate.

3. Prohibition ⚷9—Prohibition does not lie to prevent erroneous decision or control procedure, where former judgment is relied on as bar.

Where former judgment is relied on as a bar, writ of prohibition may not be utilized for the purpose of preventing the court from deciding the case erroneously, or for the purpose of regulating or controlling its procedure.

4. Prohibition ⚷5(3)—Prohibition held not to lie to prevent proceedings for trial of condemnation suit, notwithstanding previous judgment enjoining proposed improvement.

Where property owner in condemnation suit obtained injunction against city and subsequently moved to set the condemnation case for trial, city was not entitled to writ of prohibition to prevent trial court from taking further steps for the trial of the condemnation case, notwithstanding judgment in the injunction suit was res judicata of right of city to proceed with improvement.

Application by the City of Pasadena for writ of prohibition to be directed to the Superior Court in and for Los Angeles County, Hon. Victor R. McLucas, Presiding Judge. Peremptory writ denied.

R. C. McAllaster, City Atty., and Frederick G. Stoehr, Asst. City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and Gordon Boller, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Warren E. Libby, of Los Angeles, amicus curiæ.

THOMPSON, J. In August of 1924 the petitioner herein commenced an action in the superior court of Los Angeles county, in which it sought to condemn certain property in the city of Pasadena for the purpose of widening Marengo avenue in that city. Thereafter, and on the 1st day of September, 1926, one of the defendants in the condemnation suit instituted an action against the city, wherein she sought to enjoin it from proceeding with the condemnation of her land, or levying any assessment against her property for the improvement contemplated by the ordinance of intention, in pursuance of which the complaint for condemnation was filed. After answer was filed and trial had in this latter action, the court rendered its judgment restraining and enjoining the city of Pasadena, its board of directors, city attorney, and city engineer from paying out any money for the widening of Marengo avenue under the ordinance of intention already mentioned, and from paying out any money in connection with the condemnation of land for that purpose, and from making and collecting or attempting to collect any assessment against plaintiff's property for the improvement contemplated by the ordinance of intention, and from taking any steps in pursuance of the ordinance. This permanent injunction was issued on December 30, 1926. Nothing further was done until February 3, 1928, when Linn A. J. Hutchinson, the defendant in the condemnation action and the plaintiff in the injunction suit, made a motion to set the first-mentioned cause on the trial calendar, stating to the court that she was entitled to have it placed upon the calendar for disposal in view of the refusal of the city to dismiss it. The trial court granted the motion and set the action for trial. This proceeding seeks to prohibit the respondent court from taking any further steps in connection with the motion to set or the order setting the case for trial.

[1-4] Our inquiry is directed by legal instincts to the question of whether the respondent court is without jurisdiction to do the things sought to be prohibited. The rule is so well understood that we may not interfere by prohibition with the exercise of jurisdiction actually possessed by a judicial tribunal that it requires no citation of authority to support it. spondent court had jurisdiction of the condemnation action at the time it was filed and until December 30, 1926, when the permanent injunction was issued. Was it either divested of or did it exhaust its jurisdiction by this judgment? It may be assumed that the judgment entered in the injunction action is a complete bar to the further prosecution of the condemnation suit, in so far at least that it was there found that the initial proceedings were null and void, and yet the inquiry is not ended. As this question ordinarily arises, the trial court is not necessarily divested of jurisdiction of an action by a judgment which is res adjudicata. It has jurisdiction in the first instance to pass upon that very question and make disposition of the cause accordingly. If it determines the matter erroneously the injured party has his remedy by an appeal, which has been uniformly held is an available and adequate remedy. Burge v. Justice Court, 11 Cal. App. 213, 104 P. 581; Conlan v. Superior Court, 12 Cal. App. 420, 107 P. 577; So. Pac. M. Co. v. Superior Court, 14 Cal. App. 240, 111 P. 625. In the ordinary case where a judgment is relied upon as a bar, the prohibitive writ could not be utilized for the purpose of preventing the court from deciding erroneously or for the purpose of regulating or controlling its procedure. Van Hoosear v. Railroad Com., 189 Cal. 228, 207 P. 903; Apartment, etc., Financing Co. v. Will, 69 Cal. App. 276, 231 P. 349, and cases there cited. In this regard we find nothing to distinguish this from the ordinary case. Undoubtedly, if the respondent court determines that the judgment rendered is a bar to the pending case, it will enter the proper judgment, but until it shall have rendered some judgment we are not free to interfere.

Peremptory writ denied.

BOMAR et al. v. MT. OLIVE MISSIONARY BAPTIST CHURCH et al. (Civ. 3539.) ★

Rehearing Denied July 19, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 16, 1928.

1. Religious societies 🔑25—Finding that unincorporated religious association never authorized formation of corporation held sustained by evidence in suit to compel reconveyance of church property.

In suit by trustees of unincorporated religious association to obtain reconveyance of property from corporation, finding that the association never authorized the formation of a corporation held sustained by evidence.

2. Fraud 🔑50—Actual fraud is presumed, where one takes advantage of trust at expense of confiding party.

Though testimony may state actual fraud, actual fraud will nevertheless be presumed, where one in whom confidence has been reposed has benefited himself by the trust at the expense of the trusting or confiding party.

3. Religious societies 🔑25—Where unincorporated religious association never authorized incorporation or transfer of church property to corporation secretly organized, church trustees could compel reconveyance on ground of actual fraud.

Where unincorporated church association never authorized incorporation or transfer of church property to corporation by trustees holding title for church's benefit, trustees had right to compel reconveyance of the property, on ground that the church property had been acquired by the corporation by actual fraud, where grant was made without knowledge of church's incorporation.

4. Religious societies 🔑18—Individual members of unincorporated religious association could hold title for church as trustees.

Trustees holding title to property of unincorporated religious association for the benefit of the church were not required to convey to church corporation to protect title, since unincorporated religious association may take title to property in names of individual members as trustees.

5. Religious societies 🔑24—Suit by trustees of unincorporated religious association to compel reconveyance of property from corporation secretly organized held not outside court's jurisdiction, as attack on corporate entity.

Suit by trustees of unincorporated religious association to compel reconveyance of property obtained after secret incorporation by minority held not outside jurisdiction of court, as an attack on corporation as a corporate entity.

6. Religious societies 🔑24—Suit by trustees to compel reconveyance of church property from secretly organized corporation held not outside court's jurisdiction, as attempted interference with church's control over members.

Suit by trustees of unincorporated religious association to compel reconveyance of property from corporation secretly organized by minority held not outside jurisdiction of court, as attempt to interfere with control of church over its members.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Finding of capacity of plaintiffs to sue, though based on testimony of single witness, held conclusive.

In suit to compel reconveyance to trustees of unincorporated religious association of property conveyed to secretly organized corporation, court's finding that plaintiffs were entitled to sue as duly elected, qualified, and acting trustees, though based on testimony of single witness, held conclusive.

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Action by Philip Bomar and others, as trustees of the Mt. Olive Missionary Baptist Church, an unincorporated religious association, against the Mt. Olive Missionary Baptist Church, Incorporated, and W. R. Hutchinson and others, as directors. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hugh E. Macbeth, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

I. Henry Harris, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. The second amended complaint filed in this cause sets forth that the plaintiffs are the duly elected, qualified, and acting trustees of the Mt. Olive Missionary Baptist Church, an unincorporated religious association having its principal place of worship at No. 3064 East First street, in the city and county of Los Angeles; that the membership of said church consists of 92 persons, of whom 71 are adults; that the association was organized and founded on or about the year 1909; that at the time of its organization it was agreed that Hiscox's Guide and Directory for Baptist Churches should be, and the same was, adopted as the rules by which the temporal affairs of the church should be guided; that since the organization of the church herein referred to, it has been governed as an unincorporated religious association in conformity with the rules and regulations set forth in Hiscox's Guide; that the rules and regulations set forth in said guide provide that the property of the church shall be held in the name of trustees, for the uses and benefit of the church; that on or about the 11th day of April, 1916, said unincorporated religious association acquired title to lot 8 in a certain tract known as the Corcoran tract in Los Angeles county, and thereafter, and on or about the 17th day of May, 1923, acquired title to lot 7 in said Corcoran tract, and thereafter, and on or about the 17th day of November, 1923, lot 9 in said Corcoran tract was purchased by said unincorporated religious association; that the title to lot 8 was taken in the names of H. T. Baucum, Charles Reed, and J. Buchanan; that the title to lots 7 and 9 was taken in the names of R. W. Willis, W. L. Bell, and Charles Reed, as trustees, for said unincorporated religious association; that the value of said lots was about $15,000; that the building in which the unincorporated religious association held its services was and is situated upon lot 8 of said Corcoran tract; that according to Hiscox's Guide and Directory the annual meeting of the church for the appointment of a pastor, the election of trustees, and the consideration of church affairs, was appointed to be held on the Friday next preceding the first Sunday in December of each year, and the installation of the pastor and the officers was appointed to take place on the first Friday preceding the first Sunday in January following the election, as just stated.

The complaint then sets forth the manner in which the right hand of fellowship may be withdrawn from a member and the members dismissed from such unincorporated religious association by the presentation of charges and the giving of an opportunity to be heard and a majority vote of a quorum of the church members required to effect a dismissal. The complaint then alleges that in the month of June, 1924, the defendants, in order to gain possession of the property owned by the unincorporated religious association, formed a religious corporation, and then and there represented to the Secretary of State of the State of California that they were authorized by said unincorporated association to incorporate under the laws of the state of California; that such statement was false; that no notice was given to a majority of the members of said association of any intention to form a religious corporation; that no meeting of the church was ever held which authorized the incorporation of said church; that said incorporation was brought about by said defendants and their families, including in all not over 18 or 20 persons; that said persons met and agreed to form a corporation, and that upon the representations of the defendants Willis, Bell, and Hutchinson a charter was granted by the state of California to the defendant the Mt. Olive Missionary Baptist Church, Incorporated; that thereafter, and in the month of June, 1924, the said defendants Willis, Bell, and Charles Reed, without any authority of said church or of a majority of the members thereof, conveyed lots 7 and 9 of said Corcoran tract to the defendant corporation; that thereafter the defendants represented to H. T. Baucum, J. Buchanan, and Charles Reed that it was the wish of the unincorporated association that lot 8 of said Corcoran tract should be deeded to said corporation, and said lot was thereupon so deeded; that at the time of the execution of said deed the said H. T. Baucum and J. Buchanan were unaware that there was any corporation, or that they were conveying said lot 8 to any corporation; that thereafter the corporation so organized adopted by-laws, and, purporting to follow the by-laws so adopted, purported to expel 18 members from said church, no notice thereof being given and no opportunity being had by the defendants for any hearing. The complaint then sets forth in detail that the proceedings herein referred to were all taken and had by the defendants for the purpose of wrongfully securing possession of the property of said unincorporated religious association. The prayer of the complaint asks that the property referred to herein be reconveyed to the trustees of said unincorporated religious association; that it be decreed that the plaintiffs are the duly elected, qualified, and acting trustees of the Mt.

Olive Missionary Baptist Church, an unincorporated religious association; that defendants be required to account for all moneys received and disbursed by them; that W. L. Hutchinson be restrained from acting as pastor of said church; that the defendants be required to turn over to the plaintiffs all the books and registers belonging to the Mt. Olive Missionary Baptist Church as an unincorporated religious association. The answer denies seriatim all the allegations of the complaint.

The court found all the allegations contained in specifications A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I, and J of paragraph 10 of the amended complaint to be true, which includes all the allegations by which the complaint sets forth that the defendants conspired, contrived, and wrongfully and fraudulently transmuted the title of the property belonging to the unincorporated Mt. Olive Missionary Baptist Church to the corporation organized by them, as herein referred to. The second finding of the court is to the effect that it was stipulated that the accounting of moneys asked for might be withdrawn without prejudice to the institution of another action. The third finding of the court is to the effect that it was admitted at the trial that the attempted expulsion of members was without authority and was void. The fourth finding is to the effect that at all the times mentioned in the complaint the plaintiffs owned the real property mentioned therein, and that the building situate thereon was occupied by and used as the place of worship first by the Mt. Olive Missionary Baptist Church, an unincorporated religious association, and, then, after the acts herein referred to and at the time of the trial, was in the possession of the defendant Mt. Olive Missionary Baptist Church, a corporation. The fifth finding is also to the effect that the records of said church belonged to the Mt. Olive Missionary Baptist Church as an unincorporated religious association. As a result of said findings and the conclusions of law based thereon, reconveyance of the real property herein referred to was ordered, and the plaintiff Mt. Olive Missionary Baptist Church, as an unincorporated association, awarded possession of the property. From this judgment the defendants appealed and assigned five different reasons why the judgment should be reversed, to wit: First, that the trial court had no jurisdiction, at the suit of private individuals, to determine whether the incorporation was legal or illegal; second, that the plaintiffs were estopped to deny the incorporation of the church; third, that the court erred in finding that the plaintiffs were the duly elected, qualified, and acting trustees of said religious society as an unincorporated religious association; fourth, that the findings from the first to the ninth, with the exception of the fifth, are unsupported by the evidence; fifth, that there was a fatal variance between the material allegations of plaintiffs' complaint and the proofs.

[1] As we read the record, it does not seem to us necessary to follow the argument of the appellants or the authorities cited to sustain the objection that the court had no jurisdiction to inquire as to whether the incorporation was legal or illegal. This case does not present for adjudication the legality or illegality of the alleged incorporation. The only question involved is whether a corporation formed under the circumstances disclosed by the record and as found by the court, by a small minority of the members of the association, without the authorization of a majority of the unincorporated religious association and the obtaining of conveyances to the real property held in trust by certain individuals for the benefit of the unincorporated religious association, without any previous authorization for such transfer, may be compelled to reconvey the property to the duly elected, qualified, and acting trustees of the unincorporated religious association, found by the court to be the beneficial owner thereof. The complaint sets forth that the forming of the corporation was simply a device or expedient for obtaining possession of the property by a few members thereof, to the intent and purpose that the pastor and a few members thereof might control the temporal affairs of the church, and the findings of the court are to the effect that the allegations setting forth these facts contained in the complaint are true and correct.

The record shows that at the time of the occurrences referred to in the complaint there were 71 adult members; that out of that number 54 went on the stand and testified that no notice of any meeting to consider the question of incorporation was ever given as required by Hiscox's Guide and Directory for Baptist Churches. This guide required public notice to be given by announcement from the pulpit by the pastor at the time public services were being held by the church. The record discloses the names of 10 persons only who were present at the time the incorporation was decided upon. The defendants called some 10 or a dozen witnesses, who testified that notice was given and that other persons were present than the names of those stated at the time the decision was had by those who assembled on or about the 2d day of June, 1924, to consider the question of incorporation. Thus the finding of the court to the effect that the Mt. Olive Missionary Baptist Church, an unincorporated religious association, never authorized the formation of the corporation, is amply sustained by the evidence. Fifty-four of the adult 71 members testified that they had no notice and were not present. The transcript shows that the record of the members of the unincorporated association is evidenced by signed cards, so that it was a very easy matter to ascertain and present in the testimony the names of all of those who were present at the gathering when incorporation was decided upon, and also to present testimony as to who were present, if any others were actually present, than the 10 names set forth in the testimony of one of the witnesses called by the defendants. Our attention has not been called to any testimony showing that the Mt. Olive Missionary Baptist Church, as an unincorporated religious association, ever authorized the transfer of the properties of the church from the trustees, who held the title thereto, to the incorporation.

There is also testimony in the record to the effect that no regular meeting was held on the 2d day of June, 1924, as is purported to have been done; that only a few persons were present; and that there was no truth in the recital of the certificate attached to the articles of incorporation that a regular meeting was held and directors elected; and it would appear that no regular business meeting of the church could be held, other than the annual meeting provided for, without giving notice thereof by announcement from the pulpit of the time and place of such meeting. The rules of the church provided for the holding of an annual meeting on the Friday next preceding the first Sunday in December of each year. The complaint so alleges, and there is no denial of this allegation in the answer. The meeting to which we have referred, at which the incorporation of the defendant was considered, was held in the month of June, and not at a time provided in the rules of the church for the holding of an annual business meeting, or for the holding of any meeting other than that which, in ordinary language, would be called a special meeting.

[2-5] We do not deem it necessary to set forth herein the testimony in the transcript indicating a fraudulent purpose on the part of the defendants, for the simple reason that, though the testimony may show actual fraud, actual fraud will nevertheless be presumed from the fact that one in whom confidence has been reposed has availed himself or benefited himself of the trust at the expense of the trusting or confiding party. Lezinsky v. Mason, 185 Cal. 240, 196 P. 884; Williams v. Lockwood, 175 Cal. 598, 166 P. 587. As we have shown from the record the church, as a church, never authorized either the incorporation or the transfer of the property by the trustees who held title thereto for the benefit of the church, and, the property having been transferred without any such authorization, it amounted to an actual fraud upon the church and laid the basis for an action to compel reconveyance. The contention of the appellants that it was necessary for the trustees holding the title to the property for the benefit of the church to convey the same to the incorporation to protect the title is wholly unfounded. The case of Brittenbaker v. Buck, 58 Cal. App. 738, 209 P. 264, settles the question as to the power of an unincorporated religious association to take title to property in the name of individual members as trustees. Nor do we find any merit in the contention of the appellant that the trial court had no jurisdiction of the cause presented to it for determination. The attack is not made upon the corporation as a corporation. So far as the judgment of the court is concerned, the persons associated in the scheme of bringing the corporation into existence may go on with their corporation unhindered. The complaint is founded upon the wrongful acts of such persons in creating a corporation in whom the property of the church might be vested and the control of the temporal affairs of the church lodged, in such a manner as to deprive the body of the church of any voice or control in its management and to dispossess the church of its property. The gravamen of the charge is that all of these acts were performed by a very small minority of the church, and that the church, as an unincorporated religious association, never authorized or consented to any of them. To regain possession of the property thus taken away from the unincorporated religious association is not an attack upon the corporation as a corporate entity, but only seeks to undo the wrong found by the court to have been perpetrated. Under such circumstances quo warranto proceedings instituted by permission of the Attorney General were and are wholly unnecessary. The plaintiffs have no interest in the existence of the corporation; they seek only the restoration of what the court has found to be their own.

The case of Hendryx v. People's United Church Co., 42 Wash. 336, 84 P. 1123, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1154, 7 Ann. Cas. 764, is directly in point. In the Hendryx Case there was involved an intent or purpose to wrongfully obtain possession of church property. It was there held that an action to cancel a deed would lie, and that no question as to ecclesiastical matters was presented for consideration. A number of cases are there cited which we do not need to review. In one of the cases we find the following pertinent language:

> "The bald question here is, Can a man or set of men, or a majority of the church organization, by chicanery, deceit and fraud, divert the property of a church organization to a purpose entirely foreign to the purposes of the organization, for their own selfish benefit, whether by the expulsion of members or in any other fraudulent manner? Neither the law nor public policy will sustain such a rule. Fraud vitiates all transactions and, if members are expelled for a fraudulent purpose to carry out a fraudulent scheme, the expulsion is a void act, and of no force or effect whatever. Equity will compel fair dealing, disregarding all forms and subterfuges, and looking only to the substance of things." Nance v. Busby, 91 Tenn. 303, 18 S. W. 874, 15 L. R. A. 801.

In the instant case the court has found that the persons who contrived to secure possession of the church property constituted only a small minority of the membership.

[6] Another case relied upon by the appellants, but which we think supports the action of the court in the instant case, is that of Hatfield v. De Long, 156 Ind. 207, 59 N. E. 483, 51 L. R. A. 751, 83 Am. St. Rep. 194. The citations found in the opinion of this case are exceedingly numerous and show that the assertion of jurisdiction in such a case as the one at bar is not an interference with the control of the church over its members, and is a matter dealing purely with property and property rights. The findings show a stipulation in open court to the effect that the attempted expulsion of 18 members was absolutely void, and therefore we pass this question by. No question of estoppel was pleaded, nor is there anything in the record showing that the church, as a church, until shortly before the institution of this action, became aware that any incorporation had ever been formed, or that conveyances had been made of the property.

[7] There does not seem to be any merit in the appellant's contention that the plaintiffs have no capacity to sue. This alleged defect in the pleadings was not raised by demurrer, but the facts which we have hereinbefore referred to in this opinion, we think, established the capacity of the plaintiffs to maintain this action. The court found, upon sufficient evidence, that the plaintiffs were the duly elected, qualified, and acting trustees of the Mt. Olive Missionary Baptist Church, an unincorporated religious association; that they were elected at the regular meeting of the church held at the church at the time and place provided for in the rules and regulations governing the church. The appellants contend that this finding was based upon the testimony of only one witness. This statement is controverted by the respondents, but, if the necessary facts were testified to in this respect only by one witness, it would place it beyond the power of this court to disturb such finding. While not cited as determinative of any questions involved herein, we think the following taken from the opinion of the court in the case of Wheelock v. First Presbyterian Church, 119 Cal. 477, 51 P. 841, pertinent:

> "Notwithstanding incorporation the ecclesiastical body is still all-important. The corporation is a subordinate factor in the life and purposes of the church proper."

In any event, as held in that case, the corporation would be only the agent or instrument for holding title to property and managing its temporal affairs. The ecclesiastical body would still remain the real church. Under the circumstances disclosed, we think, in the present case, the unincorporated religious association known as the Mt. Olive Missionary Baptist Church at all times constituted the body entitled to control both its ecclesiastical and temporal affairs, and that the incorporation never acquired any legal or ecclesiastical right to the control of either of them.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

GOODRICH v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 6442.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 22, 1928.

1. Contempt 🔑67—Petitioner for certiorari to review order adjudging him in contempt must see that return is filed and complete record made up.

Petitioner for certiorari to review order adjudging him guilty of contempt must see that return is filed and a complete record made up, since he is the party interested in having action of lower court reviewed.

2. Contempt 🔑67—Certiorari proceeding to review judgment of contempt should contain affidavits on which order to show cause was issued, and order and judgment sought to be reviewed properly certified.

In proceeding for certiorari to review order adjudging petitioner in contempt for refusal to obey writ of possession, return should contain the affidavits upon which the order to show cause was issued, the order and judgment sought to be reviewed, which should be certified by the clerk of the tribunal to which the writ has been directed.

3. Contempt 🔑67—Certiorari to review order adjudging petitioner in contempt would be denied in view of incomplete record.

Writ of certiorari to review order adjudging petitioner in contempt for refusal to obey writ of possession would be denied, where only paper purporting to be return to writ was transcript of court reporter's notes of what transpired at time of hearing, not certified by clerk or judge, and affidavit and order attached to petition not being certified by any person competent to make certification, and it not appearing whether affidavit was used at the hearing.

4. Contempt 🔑67—On certiorari to review order adjudging petitioner in contempt, court is limited to review of properly authenticated record of proceedings (Code Civ. Proc. § 1075).

On certiorari to review order adjudging petitioner in contempt for refusal to obey writ of possession, court is limited to a review of the properly authenticated record of the proceedings themselves under Code Civ. Proc. § 1075, and cannot rest its review upon any allegations of the petition which becomes "functus officio" upon issuance of the writ.

5. Contempt ⚷67—On certiorari to review order of contempt, presumption is that court proceeded with due regard for parties' rights.

On certiorari to review order adjudging petitioner in contempt in absence of showing to contrary, court must presume that court adjudging petitioner in contempt proceeded with due regard for rights of parties within its jurisdiction.

Application by Gregory M. Goodrich, individually and as administrator of the estate of Alice V. Auth, deceased, for certiorari directed to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco and another, to review an order adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt for refusal to obey writ of possession. Writ denied.

Reisner & Deming, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Thomas M. Foley and Kington & Cunningham, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Petitioner seeks a review of the order of the superior court adjudging him guilty of contempt for his refusal to obey a writ of possession issued pursuant to a judgment entered in the action entitled Whittier v. Auth, pending in the superior court in the city and county of San Francisco. The theory of the petition is that the court was without jurisdiction to try or adjudge petitioner for contempt because he was not a party to the proceeding in which the judgment was entered, but took possession of the premises under an independent claim of title. On behalf of the respondent it is argued that the petitioner, who is employed by Auth as janitor of the premises involved in the other action, is claiming possession in bad faith and in collusion with Auth.

[1] The record before us is incomplete in many particulars. Each party complains of the other's fault in not preparing a return, and counsel for both parties carry in their briefs more statements of fact than appear in the record upon which our review must rest. The petitioner is the party interested in having the action of the lower court reviewed, and it is his duty to see that the return is filed and a complete record made up, just as it is the duty of an appellant to perfect his record on appeal. 4 Cal. Jur. p. 1100; I. X. L. Lime Co. v. Superior Court, 143 Cal. 170, 175, 76 P. 973.

[2-5] In a proceeding of this kind the return should contain the affidavits upon which the order to show cause was issued, the order and the judgment, or order sought to be reviewed. These should be certified by the clerk of the tribunal to which the writ has been directed. 4 Cal. Jur. p. 1100. Here the only paper purporting to be a return to the writ is a transcript of the court reporter's notes of what transpired at the time of the hearing. This is not certified by the clerk of the court or by the judge of the court, respondent herein. An affidavit and order are attached to the petition herein, but these are not certified by any person competent to make certification, and it does not appear whether this affidavit was used at the hearing. The petition having become "functus officio" upon the issuance of the writ herein, we cannot rest our review upon any of the allegations found therein (Donovan v. Police Comm., 32 Cal. App. 392, 397, 163 P. 69), but we are limited to a review of the properly authenticated record of the proceedings themselves. (Borchard v. Board of Supervisors of Ventura County, 144 Cal. 10, 14, 77 P. 708; 4 Cal. Jur. 1107). If there should be any doubt upon this question, it is settled by section 1075, Code of Civil Procedure, which authorizes a reviewing court to conduct a review of the proceedings below "when a full return has been made." Manifestly, if the trial court found that the claim of title made by petitioner was fictitious and that he was acting solely as the agent, or tool, of the defendant Auth for the purpose of defeating the judgment, it has not exceeded its jurisdiction in adjudging him guilty of contempt. In the absence of a showing to the contrary, we must presume that the court proceeded with due regard for the rights of the parties within its jurisdiction.

The writ is discharged, the temporary restraining order heretofore issued herein is dissolved, and the proceedings are dismissed.

period six months from date of last payment, as constituting payment of compensation for injuries.

2. Master and servant ⇐391¼—Award of interest held error, without finding of unreasonable delay in paying compensation.

In the absence of any finding by the Industrial Accident Commission that there had been unreasonable delay on part of insurance carrier in paying compensation, part of award imposing payment of interest constitutes error.

Original application by the London Guarantee & Accident Company, Limited, for certiorari to annul an award by the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of Maurice G. Read. Award modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

R. P. Wisecarver, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. This is a proceeding in certiorari to have annulled an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of respondent Maurice G. Read and against the petitioner London Guarantee & Accident Company, Limited.

Read was employed as a soda fountain clerk by the Associated Students of the University of California, while attending the university as a student, and on August 17, 1926, in helping to lift a barrel weighing about 300 pounds, bruised his left knee. He considered the injury slight, just a bruise, and did nothing about it; but on September 15, 1926, the condition of the knee had not improved, and at that time he applied to the university infirmary, as a student of the university, for medical treatment. He was treated there two or three times a week until January 30, 1927, on which date it was ascertained that the bruise had started a growth on the knee, which appeared to be infected, and upon consultation the doctors connected with the university determined that an operation and possibly an amputation of the leg would be necessary. When Read learned it would be necessary to operate, he so notified his superior, who already knew of Read's injury and of the medical treatment he had been receiving at the infirmary, and they notified the insurance carrier, petitioner herein.

On February 2, 1927, the doctors operated, an amputation being unnecessary, but the bone was scraped, and Read was not discharged from the hospital until February 23d, at which time he returned to work. As stated, before entering the hospital notice of Read's injury and of his intention to undergo an operation at the hospital was given to the insurance carrier, and a few days afterwards the latter's representative conferred with Read and took his statement, but apparently did nothing further about the matter. Shortly after his discharge from the hospital, and on March 3d, Read inquired of the insurance company what it was going to do regarding his case, and was told that it would do nothing; that the company did not believe that the condition of his knee was the result of the injury; that it had not received a report thereof until January 24th, and in any event was relieved from all liability, because Read had not filed his claim within the period fixed by the statute of limitations. Thereupon, and on March 12th Read filed an application with the commission for an adjustment of his claim, and the matter came on for hearing on March 30th, at which time petitioner stipulated that it was the insurance carrier for Read's employer, and that if there was any liability it would assume the same. The evidence adduced at the hearing shows that Read's treatment at the infirmary was furnished to him as a student of the university without cost, but that the operations, X-rays, consultations, etc., amounting to $259, were charged for, and the award was applied for to cover the payment of these expenses. No claim was made for loss of time, because Read's wages were being constantly paid, even while he was totally disabled in the hospital. Subsequently, and on May 26th, Read's employer also paid $10 on the medical bills incurred by Read as a result of the operation.

The decision of the commission was rendered on October 22, 1927, it being found, among other things, that "the application herein was filed on March 12, 1927, more than six months after the date of the said injury, but on or about May 26, 1927, the said employer assumed and paid the sum of $10 on account of the medical expense incurred by the applicant, thereby assuming liability therefor, and the claim herein is not barred by the provisions of section 11 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4749, § 11)," and an award was made in the sum of $249.

Petitioner contends that having stipulated at the hearing that it was the insurance carrier for the employer subrogated it to all of the rights of the employer, and that consequently the employer could not bind it by any payment afterwards made by the employer on the bill for medical attention, citing the case of Beverly v. Fairmont Hotel (Cal. App.) 259 P. 955, which holds that:

> "Benefits furnished by an employer, after an insurance carrier has assumed liability and the employee has accepted the benefits paid by it by reason of such assumption, * * * are not effectual to prevent the running of the statute of limitations against any claim which the employee might have against the insurance carrier."

⇐For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

[1] However, aside from the merits of the foregoing contention, there are other grounds upon which we think the granting of the award must be sustained. Under the provisions of section 11 (c) of the Workmen's Compensation Act the payment of compensation shall have the effect of extending the period within which proceedings for its collection may be commenced, six months from the date of the last payment, and, as stated, the evidence here shows without dispute that, while Read was totally disabled in the hospital, his wages were being constantly paid by his employer. We are of the opinion that the payment of such wages, under the circumstances above related, constituted the payment of compensation for the injury, and that therefore, since Read's application was filed within six months after the last payment of such compensation, his claim was not barred by the statute of limitations.

There appears to be no case adjudicated by the courts upon this particular point, but it has long been the rule of the commission that where, as here, an employee is totally disabled, and his employer continues to pay him full wages during the period of his disability, such payments do not constitute wages or gratuities, but are payments of compensation which operate to toll the statute during their continuance (27 Cal. Jur. p. 458; Oders v. Great Western Electro Chemical Co., 6 I. A. C. 95); and we find nothing unreasonable in the construction thus placed upon the terms of the act.

The application of the foregoing rule depends, of course, upon the particular circumstances under which the wages are paid. For instance in the case of Hunt v. Industrial Accident Commission, 43 Cal. App. 373, 185 P. 215, the injured employee returned to work and was paid regular wages therefor, but he claimed before the commission that he was still suffering from his injuries and was not fully able to perform the duties of his position, and he sought to have the statute of limitations tolled upon the ground that the payment of such wages constituted the payment of compensation. In deciding the point adversely, the court stated that the applicant failed to show the existence of any agreement between himself and the employer to the effect that the pay he was receiving was to be in the nature of compensation for injuries; nor did he show that the work was unsatisfactory or that the compensation was more than his services were actually worth, and that therefore, "in the absence of such showing, it cannot be held that the mere fact that the employer permitted the employee to return to his old position at full pay and to continue therein for several months could give rise to a claim that a portion of the pay which he thus received was in the nature of compensation for his previous injuries." Here, however, the employee was totally disabled in the hospital, and performed no work whatever for which the sums paid him might be deemed wages.

[2] In the absence of any finding by the commission that there has been unreasonable delay in paying compensation, it would seem that that part of the award imposing the payment of interest cannot be sustained. Pacific Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 261 P. 987. Respondents stipulate, however, that the order for the payment of interest may be annulled without further proceedings being had before the commission.

Therefore, as thus modified, by striking out the order for the payment of interest, the award is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. REMSBERG. (Cr. 1599.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 19, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑1159(2)—Intent to commit forgery is for jury, whose verdict cannot be disturbed on appeal if evidence warranted inference of guilty intent.

The question of intent to commit crime of forgery is one for jury, and, if evidence is such that jury could reasonably draw therefrom the inference of guilty intent, its verdict cannot be disturbed by the appellate tribunal.

2. Forgery 🔑44(1)—Evidence held to show existence of intent to commit forgery by signing fictitious and fraudulent conditional sales contract.

Evidence in forgery prosecution held sufficient to show existence of intent to commit crime of forgery by filling in fraudulent and fictitious conditional sales contract of automobile for purpose of obtaining loan thereon.

3. Forgery 🔑7(1)—Fraudulent and fictitious conditional sales contract of automobile used to obtain loan held sufficient contract to be subject of forgery.

Where defendant signed a fraudulent and fictitious conditional sales contract of automobile for purpose of obtaining loan on contract, fact that contract was used to defraud one acting upon it as though it were genuine was sufficient to show that it was a contract which could be the subject of forgery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

J. Walker Remsberg was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur C. Verge and Harold F. Collins, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

THOMPSON, J. The defendant was convicted of the offense of forgery, and appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

In support of his appeal, the appellant asserts that the evidence was insufficient to warrant the jury in saying that the intent to commit the crime of forgery was present, and also that no forgery was committed because there was no contract which could be the subject of forgery.

The testimony discloses that the appellant and his father-in-law were engaged in the automobile business as partners at Santa Monica, doing business under the name of Smith Motors. They had in their employ as a salesman one Earl L. Crane. On March 29, 1927, Earl Crane signed a conditional sales contract in blank; i. e., at the time he signed the paper it did not contain a description of the automobile nor a statement of the terms. He signed the name of Earl Lewis to the paper, and said that he had some deals pending which would enable him to pay $600 down. The appellant signed the contract on behalf of the partnership, filled in the description of a 70 Chrysler sedan and the terms of $600 down and 12 monthly payments of $109.37, took the contract to one Claude Haworth, who was in the automobile finance business, and discounted it for $1,325. No part of the $600 was in fact paid by Crane, nor was delivery of the automobile made to him. Crane testified that he signed the name of Lewis to the paper, as he had on a former occasion, because he had some creditors around the bay and did not want an attachment run. He also testified that nothing was said about filling in the blank portions of the contract. Edward I. Bruck, an inspector for the motor vehicle department, testified that he called on appellant about April 19, 1927, and asked appellant why the department had received duplicate registration upon automobiles sold by Smith Motors, and that appellant, after consulting his auditor and their records, furnished him with a list of automobiles, in which was included a 70 Chrysler coupé, the motor number of which was G–167,371, which was the motor number given in the contract in question. The list further showed that "Haworth and Fredericks" had contracts on this machine. The witness further testified that "the question was asked Mr. Remsberg whether that was all the cars that were involved in the double financing, and he stated, 'Yes;'" and that appellant stated "that he had sold the cars for cash." Fred Zimmerman, another inspector, testified substantially to the same effect, clarifying it a bit by saying that "Mr. Remsberg stated that the cars had been sold for cash, that he owed Mr. Haworth the money for the cars, and that he had never paid for them to him; in other words, had never taken up the contracts and had not made any clearance to the purchasers of the cars." The appellant testified that the motor number inserted in the contract was a mistake; that they "didn't have a 70 sedan with that motor number."

[1, 2] It cannot be denied that the question of intent is one for the jury, and that, if the evidence is such that the jury could reasonably draw therefrom the inference of guilty intent, its verdict cannot be disturbed by the appellate tribunal. People v. Swalm, 80 Cal. 49, 22 P. 67, 13 Am. St. Rep. 96; People v. Rushing, 130 Cal. 449, 62 P. 742, 80 Am. St. Rep. 141. It is obvious from the circumstances of this case and the testimony which has been recited that the jury were reasonably justified in drawing the inference that the entire transaction with Crane, who signed as Lewis, was fraudulent and fictitious and took place for the sole purpose of enabling the appellant, on the strength of an apparently bona fide sale, to secure the sum of $1,325. In fact, no other suggested explanation rationally explains the sale or discount of the contract to Haworth without delivery of the automobile or the payment of any portion of the initial payment named in the writing.

[3] Appellant's second contention that there was no contract the subject of forgery is based upon the testimony that there was no such automobile as that described by motor number in the writing. However, the infirmity of the contract is not apparent on its face. It could be used and was in fact used to defraud one acting upon it as though it were genuine. This is the test as announced in the following authorities: People v. Gayle (Cal. Sup.) 259 P. 750; People v. Munroe, 100 Cal. 664, 35 P. 326, 24 L. R. A. 33, 38 Am. St. Rep. 323; and People v. James, 110 Cal. 155, 42 P. 479; People v. McGlade, 139 Cal. 66, 72 P. 600. These cases effectually conclude appellant's argument in this particular.

Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DAVIS. (Cr. 1033.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 15, 1928.

1. Forgery ⇨44(1)—Defendant's guilty knowledge and intent to defraud held shown in prosecution for making and uttering fictitious check.

In prosecution for making, uttering, publishing, and passing a fictitious check, defendant's guilty knowledge and intent to defraud as part of corpus delicti held shown by his conduct in connection with fraudulent transaction.

2. Criminal law ⇨1036(1), 1044—Involuntary character of confession held not available on appeal, in absence of objection and motion during trial.

Error cannot be predicated on involuntary character of confession admitted in evidence, where there was no objection during trial on ground that confession was involuntary or motion to strike confession on such ground.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. R. Hughes, Judge.

Douglas Davis was convicted of uttering, making, publishing, and passing a fictitious check, and from a judgment of conviction and the order denying a new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

J. S. Daly, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The information herein charges that the defendant "made, uttered, and published and passed a fictitious check," drawn on the Sacramento branch of the Bank of Italy. He was convicted, and his motion for a new trial was denied. This appeal is from the judgment of conviction and the order denying a new trial. In appellant's opening brief it is said:

> "Ernest Clink testified that defendant had called at his home at Sacramento and represented himself to be a steam shovel engineer and asked the witness if he wanted a job as fireman on the shovel at some place in Arizona. The defendant offered to pay the expenses of transportation, and after some discussion it was agreed that defendant and Clink should leave next morning for Arizona. In the morning defendant called for Clink and there was some talk about expenses. During this conversation Clink produced a Canadian bank note for $10, saying he would exchange it for American money and use it on the trip. Defendant said that would be unnecessary, and asked Clink to give it to him as 'a souvenir.' Thereupon Clink gave defendant the $10 note, and defendant indorsed the check set forth in the information, which purports to have been drawn in favor of John W. Wilkins by Charles Munn, and handed the check to Mrs. Clink in order to provide for the needs of the Clink family until Mr. Clink should obtain wages for work on the steam shovel. Soon after, defendant and Clink went toward the Southern Pacific depot in Sacramento, and on the way defendant told Clink that he had to stop at the Union Stage depot at Fifth and I streets for some baggage. Clink waited in the stage depot for about 15 minutes, and then, concluding that defendant had deserted him, went home, and obtained the check and endeavored to cash it at the bank, where he was told there was no such account. An employee of the bank testified that no such person as Charles Munn had an account at the Bank of Italy in either of its branches at Sacramento. A directory was allowed to be introduced in evidence to show there was no such person named therein."

During the examination by Mr. Johnson, deputy district attorney, of a police officer relative to a conversation between the officer and the defendant concerning the check in question, the following occurred:

> "Mr. Johnson: Q. What was said regarding the check?
> "Mr. Daly (Attorney for Defendant): That is objected to on the ground that it is incompetent at this time; it is hearsay; the proper foundation has not been laid.
> "The Court: Objection sustained.
> "Mr. Johnson: * * * When you are proving by affirmative testimony, unless it is used for the purpose of impeachment, you don't have to show the time and place, or persons present. * * *
> "The Court: Very well; let the objection be overruled then. * * *
> "Q. What, if anything, did the defendant say? A. He said Mr. Clink had told him he had this $10 Canadian bill, and he thought he would slip the check on him."

[1] Appellant contends that "guilty knowledge and intent to defraud are of the corpus delicti" and "cannot be established by extrajudicial admissions or confessions of the defendant" alone. Defendant's guilty knowledge and intent to defraud are clearly shown by his conduct in connection with the fraudulent transaction, without reference to his admissions or confession.

[2] No evidence was introduced to show that the defendant's confession was free and voluntary. Neither did the defendant even suggest at the trial that the confession was not voluntary. The objection quoted, under the circumstances shown, was insufficient. There was nothing in the question to which the objection was made to indicate that a confession was sought to be proved. The argument addressed to the court by the district attorney clearly shows that he understood the objection to relate to the time, place, and persons present when defendant's statement was made, a foundation which need not be laid for the proof of an admission not amounting to a confession, and the court evidently so understood, as indicated by the immediate change of the ruling. Under such circumstances, counsel for defendant should have made his objection specific, or should have moved the court to strike out the answer on the specific ground that the confession was not shown to be voluntary. People v. Smith, 151 Cal. 619, 624, 91 P. 511; People v. Costa (Cal. App.) 253 P. 940, 941; People v. Willis, 70 Cal. App. 465, 469, 233 P. 812. Having failed to make such objection or motion, and having failed to suggest to the trial court that the confession was not voluntary, no error can be predicated on the ruling in question. No evidence whatever was offered by the defendant, and that introduced by the prosecution points unerringly to his guilt.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

GRAY v. WOHLMAN MFG. CO. et al. (Civ. 5189.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 19, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Judgment on findings sustained by evidence will not be disturbed for insufficiency of evidence.

Where there is substantial evidence to support findings, judgment following findings will not be disturbed on appeal on the ground that evidence was insufficient.

2. Master and servant 🔑80(8)—Evidence as to reasonable value of services held inadmissible in action on contract specifying compensation.

Exclusion of evidence as to reasonable value of services performed under contract specifying compensation to be received therefor held proper in action for services based on contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Chalmers Gray against the Wohlman Manufacturing Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. Earl Crandall, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Irvin C. Taplin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment rendered against them in favor of plaintiff for unpaid salary and commission earned by plaintiff under a contract of employment of plaintiff by the defendants.

[1] The principal point on appeal is based upon the contention that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the findings of the court and its judgment thereon. That there was substantial evidence in support of the findings and that the judgment follows the findings is admitted by appellants. In such circumstances, the rule is unvarying that this court is unauthorized to disturb the judgment.

[2] Appellants also complain of alleged error committed by the trial court in its refusal to admit evidence offered by the defendants as to the reasonable value of the services performed by plaintiff. As, according to all the evidence in the case, including that of the witnesses for the defendants, the action was based on a contract which specifically provided for the amount of salary and commission to be paid to plaintiff for his services, the question of the reasonable value of such services was wholly immaterial.

The judgment is affirmed.

MATTHIESSEN v. GRAND et al. (Civ. 6315.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 13, 1928.

1. Easements 🔑5—Open, continuous, uninterrupted, adverse, and exclusive use of private right of way over another's land with his knowledge and acquiescence for five years creates "easement."

Open, continuous, uninterrupted, adverse, and exclusive use of private right of way over land of another with knowledge and acquiescence of owner for five years creates presumption of grant, and entitles one to "easement" in roadway by prescription.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Easement.]

2. Easements 🔑8(2, 3)—Permissive use will not support claim to easement over right of way by prescription.

Mere permissive use is not sufficient on which to base claim to easement over right of way by prescription, and, if use is consistent with rights of owner, no presumption of adverse possession is created.

3. Easements 🔑36(1)—One claiming easement by prescription must prove all essential elements.

Burden is on party claiming easement by prescription in right of way over another's land to prove all elements essential to establish such title.

4. Easements 🔑36(1)—Where one claiming easement by prescription shows essential elements, burden of proving use was permissive shifts to owner of land.

When necessary elements have been satisfactorily shown by one claiming easement in right of way over another's land by prescription, burden of proving that use of roadway was merely permissive shifts to owner of land.

5. Easements 🔑36(3)—Refusal to permit claimant of easement in right of way to alter traveled road, and maintenance of locked gates across way is persuasive evidence of permissive use.

Consistent refusal to permit claimant of easement of right of way to construct, repair, or alter traveled road, and persistent maintenance of gates across way which were always kept locked by owner, is persuasive evidence of mere permissive use.

6. Easements 🔑36(3)—Question whether use of roadway establishes easement by prescription, or is permissive, may be determined from relationship between parties in light of circumstances.

Question whether use of roadway establishes easement by prescription, or is proof of mere permissive use as neighborly accommodation, may be determined from relationship existing between parties in light of surrounding circumstances.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Findings as to whether use of roadway established easement by prescription, if supported by substantial evidence, will not be disturbed.

Where findings of court, relative to whether use of roadway established easement by prescription, or was permissive use by neighborly accommodation, are supported by substantial evidence, judgment will not be disturbed on appeal.

8. Easements 🔑36(3)—To establish easement to right of way by prescription, evidence of adverse possession should be clear and positive, and requirements strictly construed.

In order to establish easement to right of way by prescription, evidence of adverse possession must be clear and positive, and requirements should be strictly construed.

9. Easements 🔑6—Line of travel over roadway claimed by prescription must be certain and definite.

Line of travel over roadway which is claimed by prescription may not be shifting course, but must be certain and definite, and, while slight deviations from accustomed route will not defeat easement, substantial changes which break continuity of course of travel will destroy claim to prescriptive rights.

10. Easements 🔑36(3)—Evidence held insufficient to show prescriptive easement in right of way over plaintiff's land.

In action to enjoin trespass across plaintiff's land, evidence held insufficient to support findings establishing prescriptive title to easement in right of way over plaintiff's land.

11. Easements 🔑61(9½,12)—Findings and judgment quieting title in defendants to private roadway across plaintiff's land held at variance with evidence as to location of roadway.

In action to enjoin trespass acress plaintiff's land, findings and judgment quieting title in defendants to private roadway "in the Santa Cruz Canyon" across plaintiff's land held at variance with evidence as to location of roadway, which showed roadway did not follow canyon.

12. Easements 🔑61(9½)—Where defendants in action for trespass claimed right of way by prescription, plaintiff was entitled to have court determine issues as to definite description and location of roadway.

Definite description of roadway and location, particularly where alleged departures from old route existed, were issues which plaintiff was entitled to have court determine in action to enjoin trespass in which defendants claimed right of way by prescription.

13. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)—Failure to find on material issues authorizes reversal of judgment.

A judgment will be reversed for failure to find on material issues.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Thomas A. Norton, Judge.

Action by F. W. Matthiessen against Maria Grand and others to enjoin a trespass. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Charles F. Blackstock, of Oxnard, and E. S. Gardner, of Ventura, for appellant.

Coleman E. Stewart, of Santa Barbara, for respondents.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendants and cross-complainants, quieting title to a private roadway across plaintiff's land, and enjoining the maintenance of obstructions thereon.

Plaintiff brought an action to enjoin defendants from trespassing on his land. The defendants filed a cross-complaint claiming an easement by prescription to a twelve-foot roadway some ten miles in length across the premises of plaintiff from their adjoining ranch to a public highway beyond, and alleging that plaintiff had obstructed said right of way by constructing and maintaining a barrier across the roadway. The trial court found that plaintiff was the owner of the San Marcos rancho consisting of a 47,000-acre tract of land in Santa Barbara county, Cal., including sections 1 and 12 in township 6, north of range 29 west, and section 6 in township 6, north of range 28 west, and sections 29, 30, and 31 in township 7, north of range 28 west; that the defendants were the owners of 160 acres of land situated on the north and adjacent to the premises of plaintiff; and that—

"Defendants * * * are the owners, in possession and entitled to the possession of a private right of way over the lands of plaintiff, * * * from the lands of defendant * * * to the San Marcos road, said right of way being a well-defined and marked roadway approximately twelve feet in width, commencing at a point on the northeasterly line of said San Marcos road directly opposite the juncture of the Santa Ynes river and Santa Cruz creek (said river and said creek being nonnavigable streams flowing over the lands of plaintiff, * * * and said juncture being approximately 300 yards due west from said San Marcos road), and running thence in a northwesterly direction in the Santa Cruz Canyon over said sections 1, 12, 6, 29, 30, and 31 of plaintiff's lands to the northeasterly line of defendants' lands."

The court further found that defendants and their predecessors had used and claimed said private roadway adversely to plaintiff for more than five years preceding the commencement of this action; that the plaintiff had obstructed said road by erecting and maintaining a barrier across it. Thereupon the court denied relief to the plaintiff and enjoined him from interfering with the defendants' use and enjoyment of said roadway. From this judgment the plaintiff appealed.

The appellant contends (1) that the evidence fails to support the findings to the effect that the defendants acquired an easement by prescription in said private roadway; (2) that the description of the right of way is void for uncertainty and indefiniteness; (3) that the right of way was materially changed from the former course of travel; and (4) that the findings do not support the judgment.

The appellant's property is a large stock ranch ten miles in length, which is mountainous, rough, and adapted chiefly to grazing purposes, through the center of which flows the Santa Cruz creek. The evidence is undisputed to the effect that the San Marcos rancho was inclosed and cross-fenced to control the ranging of stock. For many years seven gates were maintained on the premises, two of which, at least, crossed the roadway in question. These gates were always closed with padlocks and chains, the keys to which were voluntarily supplied by appellant to the respondents and other neighbors. More than half a century ago the road began as a mere pack trail used by hunters and cowboys in search of stray stock. Like the ordinary mountain trail, it developed with the needs of the residents of that vicinity. Some years age it assumed the dignity of a dim, rough mountain road, over which wood sleds and carts passed with difficulty. Later it was improved to the extent that even an automobile has been known to have traveled its course. During all this time the owner of the ranch has maintained dominion and control over the roadway, permitting it to be used, however, without hindrance for the accommodation of the neighbors.

There is no conflict of evidence over the fact that the father of defendants and their predecessor in interest on several occasions either applied to the owner of appellant's ranch for permission to improve, reconstruct, or more permanently build the roadway in question, or they proceeded to do so, and, upon refusal to permit the same, abandoned and desisted from their plans and operations; that whatever substantial improvements or alterations of said roadway which do exist were made within five years preceding the commencement of the present action; that the roadway does not always follow the "course of the Santa Cruz Canyon," which alone is authorized by the findings, but sometimes traverses the adjoining hills, bluffs, or convenient mesa. The only evidence furnished, of the actual specific course of the roadway, appears from a blueprint map offered by appellant, which was drawn and testified to by a civil engineer. This map exhibits parallel lines indicating the course of the old, permanent roadway, while red lines show substantial departures from the original road at ten different points, varying from the former roadway distances of from 70 to 430 feet. These points of departure from the original road are corroborated by several of appellant's witnesses, and in one particular by at least one of respondents' witnesses, and are not contradicted by any of the witnesses, except two of the respondents themselves.

However, these numerous and radical changes are denied by the two defendants, and this furnishes substantial evidence which precludes this court from interfering with the trial court's findings on this particular issue, provided the evidence can be said to support a finding of adverse possession which is sufficiently definite to identify the termini and course of the roadway to which the respondents are awarded an easement by prescription. The appellant asserts that he has never objected to the permissive use of this roadway along its former course, and claims that the present controversy arose over an obstruction which he placed across a new grade established by the respondents outside of the former line of travel near the Santa Cruz cabin.

[1-7] The open, continuous, uninterrupted, adverse, and exclusive use and enjoyment of a private right of way over the land of another with the knowledge and acquiescence of the owner for a period of five years creates a presumption of a grant, and entitles one to an easement in the roadway by prescription. Kripp v. Curtis, 71 Cal. 62, 66, 11 P. 879; Thomas v. England, 71 Cal. 456, 12 P. 491; Clarke v. Clarke, 133 Cal. 667, 66 P. 10; 9 R. C. L. 772, § 33. Mere permissive use is not sufficient upon which to base a claim to an easement over a right of way by prescription. If the use of the roadway is consistent with the rights of the owner, no presumption of adverse possession is created. It is essential that there should be such an invasion of the rights of the owner in the claimant's use of the road, as to create grounds for an action against the intruder, in order to create a presumption of prescriptive rights. Franz v. Mendonca, 131 Cal. 205, 63 P. 361; 9 R. C. L. 777, § 36. The permissive use of a way over the land of another will never ripen into an easement by prescription, regardless of how long the privilege may have been enjoyed. 1 Cal. Jur. 599, § 72; 19 C. J. 897, § 74. The burden is upon the party claiming the easement to prove all the elements essential to establish such a title. Costello v. Sharp, 65 Cal. App. 152, 157, 223 P. 567. When the necessary elements have been satisfactorily shown, however, the burden of proving that the use of the roadway was merely permissive as a neighborly accommodation shifts to the owner of the land. Pacific Gas & E. Co. v. Crockett L. & C. Co., 70 Cal. App. 283, 291, 233 P. 370; Costello v. Sharp, supra. Consistent refusal to permit a claimant of an easement in a right of way to construct, repair, or alter a traveled road, and persistent maintenance of gates across the way, which are always kept locked by the owner, is persuasive evidence of mere permissive use. 19 C. J. 898, § 75; Heenan v. Bevans, 51 Cal. App. 277, 288, 196 P. 802. It has been held that the question as to whether the use of a roadway establishes an easement by prescription, or is proof of mere permissive use as a neighborly accommodation, may be determined from the relationship existing between the parties in the light of surrounding circumstances, and, if the findings of the court are supported by substantial evidence, the judgment will not be disturbed on appeal. Wells v. Dias, 57 Cal. App. 670, 207 P. 913; Fleming v. Howard, 150 Cal. 28, 87 P. 908; Yuba Cons. Goldfields v. Hilton, 16 Cal. App. 228, 116 P. 712, 715; Costello v. Sharp, supra.

[8-10] Yet in view of the uncertainty of the location or course of this ancient trail ten miles in length, which meanders aimlessly through the midst of a large cattle ranch, running over hills and down dales, sometimes following a river canyon, clambering along an adjacent bluff, or skirting across a convenient mesa, with no attempt to definitely describe its course by measurements or survey; with convincing evidence of numerous substantial changes in the course, in spite of the defendants' contradiction of these changes; with proof of continuous maintenance by the owner of locked gates across the way, the evidence in the present case scarcely measures up to the specific requirements of the law with respect to the establishment of an easement by prescription. Upon the contrary, such circumstances strongly rebut the presumption created by the mere use of the roadway. The right to the unhampered use and enjoyment of one's own property, which is not in conflict with the rights acquired by others, may not be thus recklessly destroyed. To establish an easement to a right of way by prescription, the evidence of adverse possession should be clear and positive, and the requirements should be strictly construed. 9 R. C. L. 782, § 40.

The line of travel over a roadway which is claimed by prescription may not be a shifting course, but must be certain and definite. Slight deviations from the accustomed route will not defeat an easement, but substantial changes which break the continuity of the course of travel will destroy the claim to prescriptive rights. Vestal v. Young, 147 Cal. 721, 82 P. 383; Allen v. San Jose Land & W. Co., 92 Cal. 138, 28 P. 215, 15 L. R. A. 93; Oliver v. Agasse, 132 Cal. 297, 64 P. 401; 19 C. J. 899, § 77. A change of 20 feet in the location of a ditch has been held to defeat an easement. Vestal v. Young, supra; Felsenthal v. Warring, 40 Cal. App. 119, 180 P. 67. Although manifestly the distance to which a roadway may be changed without destroying an easement will be determined somewhat by the character of the land over which it passes, together with the value, improvements, and purposes to which the land is adapted. The maintenance of gates by the owner, across the roadway, when such gates are always kept locked, even though keys may be supplied to the neighbors as a matter of accommodation, is substantial proof of permissive use. Quinn v. Anderson, 70 Cal. 454, 11 P. 746; Heenan v. Bevans, 51 Cal. App. 277, 196 P. 802; Schulenbarger v. Johnstone, 64 Wash. 202, 116 P. 843, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 941, note. We are of the opinion that the evidence in the present case is insufficient to support the findings establishing prescriptive title, in view of the foregoing well-established rules of law. It therefore becomes necessary to reverse the judgment for lack of evidence in that regard.

[11] The appellant claims that the findings in the present case are too indefinite and uncertain as to the location of the right of way to support the judgment. Neither the cross-complaint, the findings, nor the judgment pretend to definitely describe the course of the roadway in which the respondents are awarded an easement by prescription. The chief issue in this case was confined to appellant's contention that respondents had made numerous material changes in the traveled route which destroyed the easement, if, indeed, they ever possessed one. The obstruction complained of by respondents, the maintenance of which was enjoined by the court, was placed across one of these departures from the old roadway, which change was claimed to have been made in 1922, two years before the action was commenced. The only evidence of the course of travel, the distances, or termini, or location of the alleged changes, was furnished by a surveyor's map which was offered by appellant. Neither this map nor the data furnished thereby is referred to in the findings or judgment. The only indication of the location or description of the disputed roadway to which the court awarded respondents an easement by prescription is:

The "well-defined and marked roadway approximately twelve feet wide, commencing at a point on the northeasterly line of said San Marcos road directly opposite the juncture of the Santa Cruz creek, * * * and running thence in a northwesterly direction in the Santa Cruz Canyon over said sections 1, 12, 6, 29, 30, and 31 of plaintiff's lands to the northeasterly line of defendants' lands."

It will be observed that the easement in the awarded right of way is confined strictly to the "Santa Cruz Canyon." The evidence indicates, without dispute, that this roadway was not confined to the canyon, but in part traversed the adjoining hills and bluffs. Mr. Haslam testified:

> "The old road follows around a hillside, and the change just simply takes it around the other side of the hill, with apparently no object in view. There is a hill—the old road goes around one side, and the new road on the other.
> "Q. Where on the map does the road go up the grade from the Santa Cruz Valley to the table land above it, known as the mesa? A. That is right here (pointing). * * *
> "Q. Describe the nature and character of the land (where the road is located). * * * A. It is a flat hillside. * * * The old road goes in a straight line up there, and the new road" * * * cuts off to one side and back to the road again. * * * It is a flat hill over which it runs.

Mr. Garrett testified:

> "We put a barrier across * * * that first change in the road.
> "Q. Where the road ascends the hill? A. Yes; where it leaves the valley and goes up the hill. * * * The old road went up a very steep incline * * * to the top of the next mesa, and the new road starts way back and makes an easy grade of it."

Speaking of this same grade, the defendant Pasqual Grand said:

> "There is a big bluff—very steep; and gradually they have filled that road up and made it higher, and kind of back up a little more. That gave me a grade so I could go up with my machine—but before, it was too steep. * * * Lifting this road up gradually, threw me away to one side, maybe a few feet. There is a big bluff there. That is the only change I made there. * * *
> "Q. Describe the position of the roadway? A. It comes along this way up here. Here is a tree. This is a very steep grade. Pretty near on top is a big sycamore tree. Pretty near to that tree, the road makes a turn, and there is a big bluff on this side."

[12, 13] The findings and judgment are therefore at variance with the evidence as to the location of the roadway, as it is apparent that the road does not traverse throughout its course the canyon of the Santa Cruz creek. The definite description of the roadway, and the location, particularly where the alleged departures from the old route existed, were issues which the appellant was entitled to have the court determine. This the court failed to do. A judgment will be reversed for failure to find upon material issues. 2 Hyatt on Trials, 1929, § 1984; Pon v. Wittman, 147 Cal. 280, 297, 81 P. 984, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 683. In 2 Hyatt, supra, at page 1930, it is said:

> "The parties are entitled to specific findings on all matters in issue as to which there is a reasonable controversy."

In the case of Crosier v. Brown, 66 W. Va. 273, 66 S. E. 326, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 174, which was an action to establish a private right of way by means of prescriptive easement, it was held that the line of travel must be particularly described. A statement that "Crosier is the owner of a right of way as appurtenant to his said tract of land over a portion of the land of the defendant Brown, about 500 yards in length, passing from near the western line of said tract through the western portion of said Brown's tract of land to the public road," was held to be too indefinite and uncertain upon which to base a claim of an easement by prescription in a private roadway.

It follows in the present case that the findings are inadequate with respect to the description of the right of way, and, for this additional reason, are insufficient to support the judgment.

The judgment is therefore reversed.

92 Cal. App. 537

ROGERS v. SPRINGFIELD FIRE & MARINE INS. CO. (Civ. 6255.) ★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 15, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 13, 1928.

1. Interest ⟹22(5)—Where execution was issued on judgment entered on stipulation, objection that judgment was not due or interest bearing held untenable (Code Civ. Proc. § 577; Usury Law).

Where judgment was entered on stipulation of parties which made no mention of interest, and judgment made no provision for stay of execution, held, that since, under Code Civ. Proc. § 577, judgment is final determination of rights of parties, and, under Usury Law (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii), bears interest, to construe judgment entered to be not due or to be noninterest bearing would be to amend or to modify it in manner not authorized by law.

2. Judgment ⟹253(2)—It is not essential in contested case that, in order that judgment bear interest, interest be prayed for in complaint.

It is not essential in contested case that, in order that judgment bear interest, interest be prayed for in complaint.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

3. Courts 🔑89—Decisions based on statute subsequently repealed, but in substance restored by initiative measure, did not lose force by reason of repeal (Civ. Code, § 1920; Usury Law).

Decisions based on Civ. Code, § 1920, subsequently repealed, but in substance restored by initiative measure known as Usury Law (St. 1919, p. *l*xxxiii), did not lose force by reason of repeal of Code section.

4. Interest 🔑22(5)—Interest held allowable on judgment based on stipulation which contained no mention of interest (Code Civ. Proc. § 682, subd. 1).

Where objection was made to order issuing execution on ground that interest was allowed on judgment which had been entered on stipulation of parties which did not provide for interest, held, that interest was allowable, under Code Civ. Proc. § 682, subd. 1, providing that, if execution be against property of judgment debtor it must require sheriff to satisfy judgment with interest.

5. Judgment 🔑91—There is no distinction in effect between judgment entered on trial of fact and one entered by stipulation or consent (Code Civ. Proc. § 577).

There is no distinction in effect between judgment entered on trial of fact and one entered by stipulation or consent, and in either case judgment is final determination of rights of parties in action or proceeding, by virtue of Code Civ. Proc. § 577.

6. Constitutional law 🔑70(3)—Appellate court must uphold provision in law declaring judgment bears interest, even though it inflict hardship (Usury Law).

As Usury Law (St. 1919, p. *l*xxxiii) declares that judgment bears interest, appellate court must uphold such provision, even though it might in some instances inflict a hardship, as such matters are for the Legislature, or for the people, by initiative measure to determine, and not for the courts.

7. Interest 🔑22(1)—Defendant, who could have avoided paying interest on judgment by depositing money in court, could not complain when compelled to pay interest thereon (Usury Law).

Defendant, who could have avoided paying interest on judgment, as provided by Usury Law (St. 1919, p. *l*xxxiii) by depositing money in court and letting different claimants adjudicate differences between themselves, could not complain that it was penalized by being compelled to pay interest.

8. Interest 🔑22(5)—Defendant held not entitled to complain of execution for amount, due with interest, on judgment based on stipulation.

Defendant, who objected to issuance of execution on judgment based on stipulation which provided that execution on whole of said judgment shall be stayed until such time as the correct amount of money now under attachment and assignments is ascertained, could not complain, where liabilities were ascertained, and execution was merely for amount due, together with interest, on judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Denver S. Church, Judge.

Action by N. G. Rogers against the Springfield Fire & Marine Insurance Company on policies of fire insurance. From on order directing issuance of execution, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

G. L. Aynesworth, of Fresno, for appellant.

M. K. Harris and James A. Burns, both of Fresno, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff filed an action to recover the sum of $5,000 from defendant, such being the amount claimed to be owing on two policies of fire insurance. Defendant appeared and filed an answer. On June 5, 1922, the cause came on for trial, at which time plaintiff and defendant entered into a stipulation as follows:

> "It is hereby stipulated that the above-entitled action be and the same is compromised as follows: That plaintiff shall have judgment for the sum of $2,200.00, lawful money of the United States without costs; that execution on the whole of said judgment shall be stayed until such time as the correct amount of moneys now under attachment by garnishments and a certain assignment to T. M. Crum served on the defendant is ascertained, and when said sums are ascertained, and the liability of the defendant under said garnishments and said assignment is definitely ascertained, then the said defendant will pay over to plaintiff to be applied on said judgment all moneys now due upon said judgment over and above the amount of defendant's liability under said garnishments and said assignment, and the execution shall be further stayed on the remainder of said judgment, as to such amount of defendant's liability under said garnishments and said assignment until the plaintiff shall procure a release of said defendant from all liability under said garnishments and assignment, and then and in that event the said defendant will pay over to the plaintiff the remainder due upon said judgment, and said judgment shall be fully satisfied, and as each attachment is settled by plaintiff, defendant will pay over to plaintiff the amount of such attachment, if the same is paid directly by plaintiff."

The court, pursuant to the stipulation, entered its judgment and likewise entered its order staying execution. On June 16, 1922, plaintiff gave notice of intention to move the court for an order directing the issuance of an execution. The motion came on regularly for hearing on July 16, 1922, and was by the court denied without prejudice. Three subsequent and similar notices and motions were made, which were likewise denied.

The assignment and garnishments referred to in the stipulation had been served on the defendant prior to the making of the stipulation upon which judgment was entered. Thereafter plaintiff engaged in a test case to determine the validity of the garnishments, and their validity was sustained. On May 4, 1826, plaintiff gave notice of intention to move for an order directing the issuance of an execution, and on June 18, 1926, the court made an order that an execution issue against the property of defendant in favor of W. M. Grady, the judgment creditor, for the sum of $1,217.13, the balance of principal and interest due—the court having found that the judgment as entered for $2,200 was subject to the liens of three attachments or executions aggregating $1,579.30.

After the commencement of the action plaintiff, N. G. Rogers, duly assigned all his right, title, and interest in and to his claim against defendant to W. D. Grady, who thereafter duly assigned all his right, title, and interest in and to the judgment to W. M. Grady, and the assignees have continued the cause in the name of the original plaintiff.

Appellant urges that the court erred in ordering the execution to issue for the following reasons: (1) That, since the garnishments levied on the appellant have not been paid as provided in the said stipulation, the said judgment is not due or enforceable; (2) that, since said judgment is not due or enforceable, the same does not bear interest; (3) that an execution for a portion of a judgment is unauthorized and erroneous.

[1, 2] It will be noted that the stipulation makes no mention of interest, and the judgment makes no provision for a stay of execution.

> "A judgment is the final determination of the rights of the parties in an action or proceeding." Code Civ. Proc. § 577.

To construe the judgment entered to be not due or to be noninterest bearing would be to amend or modify the judgment in a manner not authorized by law. Takekawa v. Hole, 170 Cal. 323, 149 P. 593; Benning v. Superior Court, 34 Cal. App. 296, 167 P. 291; Forrester v. Lawler, 14 Cal. App. 171, 111 P. 284. In Glenn v. Rice, 174 Cal. 269, 276, 162 P. 1020, 1023, it is held:

> "In entering a judgment, it is not necessary to declare therein that it shall bear interest. It bears interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from its date by force of the law, and not by reason of any declaration it may contain to that effect. (Civ. Code, § 1920; Code Civ. Proc. § 682."

In Sea v. Lorden, 37 Cal. App. 444, 174 P. 85, the court says:

> "The respondent is entitled to interest only from the date of the judgment, and he is allowed that by operation of law."

Nor is it essential in a contested case in order that a judgment shall bear interest that interest be prayed for in the complaint. Durbin v. Hillman, 50 Cal. App. 377, 382, 195 P. 274.

[3, 4] The decisions cited were based on section 1920 of the Civil Code in force when the decisions were rendered, which read:

> "Interest is payable on judgments recovered in the courts of this state, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, and no greater rate, but such interest must not be compounded in any manner or form."

Subsequently in 1918, section 1920 of the Code referred to was repealed, but in substance was restored by the initiative measure adopted at the general election of November, 1918, known as the Usury Law (Stats. 1919, lxxxiii), the first section of which provides that the rate of interest upon judgments rendered in any court of this state shall be $7 upon the $100 for one year and at that rate for a greater or less sum or for a longer or a shorter time. The substance of section 1920 of the Civil Code being adopted in the Usury Law, the authorities cited lose none of their force by reason of the repeal of the Code section. Moreover, section 682 of the Code of Civil Procedure, subdiv. 1, provides:

> "If it [execution] be against the property of the judgment debtor, it must require the sheriff to satisfy the judgment, with interest. * * *"

[5] Appellant urges that the judgment was not entered upon a trial of fact, but by virtue of a stipulation, the express terms of which purport to limit and control the rights of the parties in the judgment. We can see no distinction in the effect of a judgment entered upon a trial of fact and one entered by stipulation or consent. In either case the judgment is a final determination of the rights of the parties in the action or proceeding. Code Civ. Proc. § 577.

[6, 7] Our attention has been directed by appellant to several cases to support its contention that, in view of the fact that it was compelled to withhold the payment to plaintiff because of garnishments served upon it, plaintiff is not entitled to interest. Stimson v. Dunham, Carrigan, Hayden Co., 146 Cal. 281, 79 P. 968, cited, is a case in which the court was considering the claim of a contractor, where filed liens prevented the owner from making direct payment. The court denied the demand of defendant Gardiner, the contractor, for a foreclosure of his lien, for attorney's fees, for interest, and for costs. In that case the court said:

> "If, for the purposes of this case, it be conceded that appellant can raise the question, we hold that plaintiffs were not liable for interest."

Neither in that case, however, nor in any of the cases cited by appellant, is the question of interest on a judgment discussed or passed upon, and, as the law declares that a judgment bears interest, we must uphold such provision, even though it might in some instances inflict a hardship, as such matters are for the Legislature, or for the people, by initiative measure to determine, and not for the courts. It cannot, however, be said, as claimed, that appellant will be penalized by being compelled to pay interest. Appellant could have avoided paying interest or paying more than once by depositing the money in court, as it did not deny owing it, and interpleaded and let the different claimants adjudicate their differences between themselves.

[8] As to appellant's other point that it was the duty of respondent to have discharged the garnishments before requiring payment to him by appellant, it may he said that the stipulation on which the judgment is based provides:

> "That execution on the whole of said judgment shall be stayed until such time as the correct amount of money now under attachment by garnishments and a certain assignment to T. M. Crum served on defendant is ascertained, and when said sums are ascertained and the liability of the defendant under said garnishments and said assignment is definitely ascertained, then the said defendant will pay over to plaintiff to be applied on said judgment all moneys now due upon said judgment over and above the amount of defendant's liability under said garnishments and said assignment," etc.

It is admitted that the liabilities of defendant were ascertained at the time the last motion for execution was made, and the execution was issued merely for the amount due over and above the amount to be paid to satisfy the garnishments and assignments, together with interest on the judgment.

The only real question presented is whether the judgment as rendered, or that portion over and above the amount of the garnishments and assignment, should bear interest. This question we have disposed of, and from such disposition it follows that the order appealed from should be, and it is, affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

KEELE v. CLOUSER et al. (Civ. 5445.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 14, 1928.

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨299(3)—Vendor's complaint held to state causes of action to quiet title, to recover possession, and to foreclose purchaser's rights under contract, as against demurrer.

Complaint alleging that defendants defaulted in paying monthly installments, that plaintiff notified tthem that she would declare contract forfeited if payment was not paid in three days, that thereafter she declared contract forfeited, that defendants denied liability under contract and asserted ownership, and praying for decree declaring forfeiture of contract, quieting plaintiff's title, and for possession, and specified sum as damages for the withholding thereof, held to state causes of action to quiet title, to recover possession and damages for withholding, and to foreclose defendant's rights under contract of sale, as against demurrer, notwithstanding complaint was entitled as being in unlawful detainer, nature of complaint being determined from its allegations; not from its caption.

2. Pleading ⇨18—Complaint alleging causes of action to quiet title, to recover possession, damages for withholding, and to foreclose purchasers' rights held not demurrable for uncertainty.

That complaint stated causes of action to quiet title to realty, to recover possession thereof with damages for withholding, and to foreclose defendant's rights under land contract, held not to render complaint demurrable as ambiguous and uncertain, where it clearly showed that plaintiff intended to assert all causes of action stated therein.

3. Action ⇨48(1)—Complaint stating causes of action to quiet title to realty, for possession, and for damages for withholding, and to foreclose rights under contract, held not demurrable for misjoinder of causes (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 380, 427, subd. 2).

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 380, 427, subd. 2, demand for relief by way of declaration of forfeiture of purchaser's rights under land contract, to recover possession, and for withholding property, were merely incidents to cause of action to quiet title and could be joined with it.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1040(10)—Any error in overruling demurrer for misjoinder of causes of action would not be reversible, where no miscarriage of justice resulted.

Any error in overruling demurrer to complaint for misjoinder of causes of action would not be ground for reversal, where no miscarriage of justice resulted therefrom.

5. Quieting title ⇨10(1)—Plaintiff suing to quiet title must prove title in herself.

In action to quiet title plaintiff must prove title in herself in order to recover.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⇨189—Vendee in possession under land contract cannot dispute vendor's title.

The general rule is that a vendee in possession under a contract of sale cannot dispute his vendor's title.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⇨299(3)—Vendee's acceptance and retention of possession is sufficient acknowledgment of vendor's title to support finding thereof in action between them (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 11, 12).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 11, 12, action of vendee in accepting possession from his vendor and subsequently withholding possession is sufficient acknowedgment of vendor's title to support a finding thereof in action between them, at least in cases where vendee makes no claim or showing of title in any person other than his vendor.

8. Deeds 🔑54—Deed does not pass title unless delivered.

Deed is not effective to pass title unless delivered.

9. Deeds 🔑194(2)—Prima facie evidence of delivery of deed created by grantee's possession thereof or recording is not conclusive.

Though possession of deed by grantee or recording thereof is prima facie evidence of delivery, it is not conclusive and may be disputed.

10. Brokers 🔑94—Broker employed to find purchaser has no authority to deliver deed.

Broker employed to find purchaser for realty has no authority to make contract or conveyance in behalf of his principal unless special power is conferred on him for that purpose, and hence can have no authority to take any one of essential steps toward conveyance, such as delivery of deed.

11. Brokers 🔑94—Delivery of deed to broker to be put in escrow does not confer ostensible authority to deliver it to grantee; broker being "special agent" (Civ. Code, § 2297).

Delivery of deed to broker employed to find purchaser and for limited purpose of putting deed in escrow does not confer on him authority to convert deed into a conveyance by delivering it to grantee, unless there is some further act on grantor's part reasonably indicating to grantee that broker has such authority; broker in such case being special agent under Civ. Code, § 2297.

[Ed Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Special Agency or Agent.]

12. Vendor and purchaser 🔑299(3)—Purchaser's cross-complaint setting up vendor's fraud but not alleging damage or offer to restore property held not to state cause of action (Civ. Code, § 1691).

Purchaser's cross-complaint setting up vendor's fraudulent misrepresentations when sale was made held not to state cause of action, in absence of allegation that purchasers restored or offered to restore property to vendor or that they suffered any damage by reason of the fraud, as required by Civ. Code, § 1691, and evidence of such fraud was therefore properly excluded.

13. Appeal and error 🔑757(1)—Judgment will be affirmed if appellant fails to print in brief sufficient of record to justify reversal (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, if appellant fails to print in his brief or supplement sufficient of record to justify reversal of judgment, it will be affirmed on ground that record fails to show error.

14. Vendor and purchaser 🔑299(1)—Where vendor's complaint for unlawful withholding of possession by purchasers alleged date when withholding began, she could not recover for withholding before such date.

Where vendor's complaint in action to quiet title to realty, and to recover possession thereof and damages for withholding possession, alleged that vendor exercised her option to declare contract forfeited on certain date and that defendant's withholding began as of such date, she could not recover damages on account of withholding previous to such date, since until she exercised option to declare contract forfeited defendant's possession was not wrongful.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action by Mary V. Keele, formerly Mary V. Haas, against Eugene Clouser and wife and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Clouser and wife appeal. Affirmed.

William A. Spill, of Pasadena, for appellants.

Simpson & Simpson, and Leon U. Everhart, all of Pasadena, for respondent.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. [1] This is an appeal by the defendants Clouser, hereinafter referred to simply as the defendants, from a judgment in favor of plaintiff. The first point made in support of the appeal is that the court erred in overruling their demurrer to the complaint. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff and the defendants on November 3, 1920, entered into a contract by which plaintiff agreed to sell and defendants agreed to buy a parcel of real property, defendants agreeing to pay the price in monthly installments; that the contract contained a provision making time of its essence; that defendants on and since March 3, 1925, have defaulted in payment of monthly installments of the price, "amounting at this time to the sum of $175"; that on June 26, 1925, plaintiff notified them of their default and that if the amount then due, $140, was not paid in three days, she would elect to declare the contract forfeited; and that on July 1, 1925, the plaintiff further notified the defendants that she declared the contract forfeited and canceled by reason of their said default. The complaint further alleges that the defendants have denied any liability under the contract and asserted title and ownership of the property in themselves; that "ever since July 1, 1925, plaintiff has been and now is the owner and entitled to the possession of said premises; that the defendants ever since said date have been and now are unlawfully withholding from plaintiff the possession of said premises"; that the value of the rents and profits is $40 per month, and plaintiff has been deprived thereof since July 1, 1925, by the detention of the property by defendants. The prayer is for a decree declaring a forfeiture of the contract and quieting plaintiff's title to the property, for possession of the premises, and for $340 damages for the withholding thereof. This complaint is entitled in its caption, "Complaint—Unlawful Detainer," and defendants' first objection to it is that a vendor of land cannot maintain an unlawful detainer proceeding against his vendee on account of the latter's default in payment of the price. This is no doubt true, but to determine the nature of the complaint we look not so much at its caption as at its allegations, and from the latter it clearly appears that this complaint is not one in unlawful detainer. It states a cause of action to quiet title to real property and to recover possession thereof with damages for the withholding, and also a cause of action to foreclose defendants' rights under the contract of sale. The general demurrer was therefore properly overruled.

[2-4] Further grounds of the demurrer are that the complaint is ambiguous and uncertain because it does not disclose upon which of the above-mentioned causes of action it is based, and that these several causes of action are improperly united. There is nothing in the claim of uncertainty. It is clear from the complaint that the plaintiff intends to assert all of the causes of action stated therein. The demand for relief by way of a declaration of the forfeiture of the contract is merely an incident to the cause of action to quiet title and may be joined with it. Bishop v. Barndt, 43 Cal. App. 149, 184 P. 901. Relief by way of recovery of possession is also incidental to an execution issued on a judgment quieting title to real property in favor of a plaintiff who is out of possession. Code Civ. Proc., § 380. Consequently an action to quiet title to real property, brought by one who alleges that he is out of possession, is in effect an action to recover possession of the property, and in an action of the latter character a recovery of damages for the withholding of the property may also be sought. Code Civ. Proc. § 427, subd. 2. We think all of the various kinds of relief sought by the plaintiff may be obtained in a single action, and hence the demurrer for misjoinder of causes of action was properly overruled. But even if there were error in this respect we cannot see that any miscarriage of justice resulted from it, and hence it would not be ground for a reversal.

[5-7] Defendants' next point is that, the action being in substance one to quiet title, the plaintiff must prove title in herself in order to recover and that she failed to do so. The rule referred to is well established, but there is not an entire failure of proof of title in plaintiff. There is no evidence or claim of title in any one else. In giving her testimony the plaintiff referred to the property as "my property." The evidence showed that at the date of the contract of sale she was in possession of the property. From this fact a presumption would arise that she was then the owner. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 11 and 12; Davis v. Crump, 162 Cal. 513, 123 P. 294. Upon the making of the contract she delivered the possession of the property to the defendants, who went into possession under the contract. The general rule is that a vendee in possession under a contract of sale cannot dispute his vendor's title. Gervaise v. Brookins, 156 Cal. 103, 103 P. 329; Garvey v. Lashells, 151 Cal. 526, 91 P. 498. In Garvey v. Lashells the court said:

> "This rule is in full accord with the well-recognized doctrine that no one who goes into possession of land under another will be heard to dispute the title of that other during the continuance of the relation."

All the cases on this point which we have examined were actions of ejectment, but the language above quoted from Garvey v. Lashells would apply as well to an action to quiet title. There may be some ground for limiting the application of the rule in an action of the latter class, but the action of the vendee in accepting the possession from his vendor and subsequently holding that possession is a sufficient acknowledgment of his vendor's title to support a finding thereof in an action between them, at least in cases where the vendee makes no claim or showing of title in any person other than the vendor.

[8-11] The defendants allege in their answer that the plaintiff executed and delivered to them a deed of the property. It is claimed that such a deed was turned over to them and recorded, but the evidence showing this to be the fact is not printed in defendants' brief. The plaintiff testified that she signed this deed and intrusted it to a broker who had acted for her in procuring defendants to purchase the property, with instructions to put it in escrow with a bank, to be delivered to defendants when the payments on the contract had been completed. The complaint alleges that the payments have not been completed, and no denial of this allegation is called to our attention. The court refused to admit the deed in evidence, and found that it had never been delivered to defendants. They complain that this ruling was error and that the finding was not supported by the evidence. A deed is not effective to pass title unless delivered. While the possession of a deed by the grantee, or the recording thereof, is prima facie evidence of a delivery, it is not conclusive and may be disputed. Black v. Sharkey, 104 Cal. 279, 37 P. 939; Klose v. Hillenbrand, 88 Cal. 473, 26 P. 352. The plaintiff's testimony showed that her broker had no authority to make such delivery. His authority extended only to a deposit of the deed with the bank, there to remain in escrow, and hence if he gave possession of it to the defendants his act was not binding upon the plaintiff and did not constitute a delivery of the deed. Klose v. Hillenbrand, supra. A broker employed to find a purchaser for real property has no authority to make a contract or a conveyance in behalf of his principal, unless special power is conferred upon him for that purpose (4 Cal. Jur. 564, 565), and hence can have no authority to take one of the essential steps toward a conveyance, such as the delivery of the deed. The delivery here cannot be held good under the doctrine of ostensible agency. The broker was a special agent (Civ. Code, § 2297), and it was therefore incumbent on the defendants to inquire as to the extent of his authority (1 Cal. Jur. 715, 744). The delivery of a deed to an agent for the limited purpose of putting it in escrow does not confer on the agent ostensible authority to convert it into a conveyance by delivering it to the grantee, unless there is some further conduct on the grantor's part reasonably indicating to the grantee that the agent has such authority. MacDonald v. Cool, 134 Cal. 502, 66 P. 727. The ruling excluding the deed from evidence and the finding that it had not been executed were therefore right.

[12, 13] The defendants filed a cross-complaint in which they attempted to set up fraudulent misrepresentations made to them by or in behalf of the plaintiff when the sale was made. The court refused to permit the defendants to make proof in regard to any of these representations but one, and they now assign this ruling as error. The record on appeal is in typewritten form, and it was therefore the duty of the defendants to print in their briefs, or in a supplement thereto, such parts of the record as they desired to call to the attention of the court. Code Civ. Proc. § 953c. Defendants' brief contains a short extract from their cross-complaint, including only its allegations that certain representations were made and that they were untrue, known to plaintiff to be untrue, and relied upon by defendants. Some of these representations related to matters of fact. The objection to the evidence proffered by the defendants seems to have been that the cross-complaint was insufficient to show fraud. If fraud was practiced upon the defendants in the sale it might afford ground for a rescission of the contract or be the basis of an action for damages. If they elected to rescind they must restore or offer to restore the property to the plaintiff. Civ. Code, § 1691. If they elected to sue for damages, they must show that they sustained damages by reason of the fraud. The portions of the cross-complaint printed in the defendants' brief contain no allegation that they restored or offered to restore the property to the plaintiff, or that they suffered any damage by reason of the fraud. Without one of these allegations the cross-complaint stated no cause of action, and the ruling excluding evidence of fraud was proper. If such allegations were in fact made, the defendants should have printed them. This court is not required to search the typewritten record in order to discover possible grounds for a reversal. If the appellant fails to print in his brief or supplement sufficient of the record to justify a reversal of the judgment, it will be affirmed on the ground that the record fails to show error. Estate of Berry, 195 Cal. 354, 358, 233 P. 330; Steineck v. Coleman, 72 Cal. App. 244, 236 P. 962.

[14] Finally, the defendants complain that the judgment for damages is excessive. The court found that since July 1, 1925, the plaintiff has been the owner and entitled to the possession of the premises and defendants have withheld the same from her since that date; that the value of the rents and profits is $20 per month; and that by reason of the said detention of the premises by the defendants the plaintiff has been deprived of the rents and profits "from July 1, 1925, to date hereof, amounting to the sum of $340." The date of the findings is May 14, 1926. Judgment was given in plaintiff's favor for $340. The finding that the value of the rents and profits is $20 per month is based on an admission in the answer, there being no evidence upon the subject. The concluding statement that they amounted to $340 at the date of the findings is under the circumstances a mere conclusion from the other facts stated, and is not supported by those facts. The plaintiff attempts to justify this amount on the ground that she is entitled to recover damages from the time when the defendants first made default in their payments under the contract, but such a judgment is beyond the issues. The complaint fixes the time when defendants' withholding began as July 1, 1925. The plaintiff exercised her option to declare the contract forfeited on that date, and until she did so defendants' possession was not wrongful, and hence she could not recover damages on account thereof. The amount of damages accruing at the rate of $20 per month from July 1, 1925, to May 14, 1926, would be $209.03.

The judgment is modified by reducing the amount of money thereby recovered by the plaintiff from $340 to $209.03, and as so modified it is affirmed; appellants to recover their costs of appeal.

REDMAN et al. v. WARDEN et al. ★
(Civ. 6171.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 21, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 20, 1928.

Schools and school districts ⟹108(3)—When high school tax was levied on only part of district, tax was invalid and tax sale passed no title.

Where, in levy and assessment of tax for union high school district, one of the elementary school districts comprising the high school district was omitted and full tax levied and assessed on rest of the district, the tax was invalid and tax sale passed no title.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. M. Jamison, Judge.

Action by E. C. Redman and another against Grace P. Warden and others to quiet title. From a judgment for the defendant named, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Frank H. Snyder, of Glendale, for appellants.

U. S. Fitzpatrick, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action to quiet title. The pleadings are in the usual form, plaintiffs alleging title and possession in themselves and an asserted claim of estate or interest in the property by defendants adverse to them without right, and defendants denying the allegations of the complaint and setting up ownership in defendant Grace P. Warden by virtue of tax-title deeds from the tax collector of the county of Los Angeles.

At the trial plaintiffs in support of their claim introduced the deed from their grantor in evidence, proved possession, and also proved that plaintiff Pearl H. Jarrett held a mortgage lien against the property. Plaintiffs rested and defendant's tax deeds were then considered in evidence. Defendants introduced no other evidence in support of their claim in title, relying solely upon the prima facie case made by these deeds, which recite that the property in question was sold for taxes levied in the year 1916. Plaintiffs, for the purpose of rebutting the prima facie case arising upon the tax deeds, introduced certain evidence going to show the illegality of part of the tax for which the property was sold. They proved by uncontradicted evidence that the property in controversy is situated in what is known as Redman Elementary school district; that it was assessed for taxation in the year 1916; that among the taxes so assessed for that year was included a tax for the support of the county free library; that at the time of the assessment the Redman school district was not a branch of the free county library, this evidence being offered on the theory that such district, by virtue of the maintenance by it of a free library, was exempt from the tax assessed against it in 1916 for support of the county free library (1 Gen. Laws [Deering] 1923, p. 982). They also proved that in the levy and assessment of a tax for the redemption of a bonded indebtedness created by the Antelope Union high school district one of the elementary school districts which comprised it, to wit, the Esperanza school district, was either inadvertently or designedly omitted, and the whole tax was levied and assessed upon the remainder of said high school district, of which the Redman school district was a part, the effect of which omission being to increase the proportion of such high school district tax assessed against the plaintiff's property.

Notwithstanding this condition of the record, the trial court made findings in favor of defendant Grace P. Warden and entered judgment quieting her title and awarding her possession of the property.

From this judgment the plaintiffs appeal, and they urge that the findings and judgment are unsupported by the evidence, inasmuch as the prima facie showing of title in said defendant made by her tax deeds was overcome by proof that the tax upon which it was founded was invalid for lack of equality and uniformity in its levy and assessment.

We think this contention must be sustained if not by reason of the inclusion of the Redman school district in the levy and assessment of the county free library tax, certainly for the exclusion of the Esperanza school district from the tax levied on the Antelope Union high school district for the payment of an installment due on its bonds.

The act to provide for the establishment and maintenance of county free libraries (Stats. 1911, p. 80; 1 Gen. Laws [Deering] 1923, p. 982) authorizes the levy and collection of taxes upon all property in the county "outside of incorporated cities and towns maintaining free public libraries, and library districts maintaining district libraries, and upon all property within incorporated cities, towns and library districts which have elected to become a part of such county free library system." Section 1 of "An act to allow unincorporated towns and villages to establish, equip and maintain public libraries," etc. (Stats. 1909, p. 815), authorizes the establishment of public libraries by a course of procedure prescribed by the act, the expense of maintenance of which is met by taxes levied upon the property within the district for which the library is established. Sections 1712–1717 of the Political Code provides for the organization of libraries in school districts, which must be open to the use of the teachers, pupils and residents of the district. The Redman school district library belongs to this last-mentioned class. As noted, the exemption of property in a county from the county free library tax seems by the terms of the act above cited to be confined to cities, towns and library districts maintaining district libraries. But whether or not a school district maintaining a library is comprehended in the term "library district," used in the act mentioned, is not necessary to decide for the purposes of this case, since the contention of the appellants that the tax levied on the property of plaintiffs was invalid may be sustained because of the omission to include the Esperanza school district in the levy of the Antelope Union high school tax above mentioned. As said in 1 Cooley on Taxation (4th Ed.) § 317:

> "The constitutional requirement of equality and uniformity is violated by imposing a tax on one portion of the state for the benefit of the whole state, or on one portion of a county for the benefit of the whole county, or one part only of any taxing district for the benefit of the whole taxing district."

This is what seems to have been done in the present case, rendering the tax invalid. It follows that the defendant Grace P. Warden acquired no title to the plaintiff's property through her tax deed which had for its foundation a sale of the property for nonpayment of said tax.

The judgment is therefore reversed.

PEOPLE v. HUDSON. (Cr. 1642.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 18, 1928.

1. Criminal law ⇒1189—Reversal of order denying new trial is equivalent to order of new trial.

Judgment of the appellate court reversing and denying a motion for a new trial is, in effect, the ordering of a new trial.

2. Criminal law ⇒292(1)—Plea of former jeopardy must specify date, place, and court wherein defendant was subjected to former jeopardy (Pen. Code, § 1017).

A plea of once in jeopardy which does not specify the time, place, or court wherein defendant has been subjected to any former jeopardy for the offense charged is insufficient, under Pen. Code, § 1017.

3. Criminal law ⇒1159(2)—Appellate court should not interfere with jury's finding of guilt supported by evidence.

Appellate court should not interfere with jury's finding of guilt based on sufficient evidence.

4. Criminal law ⇒1175—Defendant, convicted of second degree robbery, cannot complain that offense, if any, was first degree robbery.

A defendant convicted of second degree robbery cannot complain that, if guilty of any offense, it was robbery in the first degree.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Chas. L. Allison, Judge.

F. J. Hudson was convicted of robbery, and, from judgment and order denying a motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph Rensch and A. S. Maloney, both of San Bernardino, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Warner I. Praul, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CONREY, P. J. On a former appeal in this action, the court reversed the judgment, and also reversed an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. People v. Hudson (Cal. App.) 260 P. 887. The defendant having been convicted a second time, he now appeals from the second judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The points on appeal are: (a) That this court on the former appeal did not remand the cause to the lower court for a new trial, and that therefore the court erred in proceeding with the trial of the action a second time; (b) that the defendant entered a plea of once in jeopardy, and that the jury did not pass upon that plea; (c) that defendant was erroneously convicted of second degree robbery, in this, that the information disclosed a charge of first degree robbery, and that the evidence proved that the guilty parties were armed with rifles, and that therefore they could not have been guilty of any offense other than first degree robbery; (d) that the evidence is not sufficient to justify the verdict.

[1] There is no merit in any of these contentions of appellant. A judgment of this court reversing an order denying a motion for a new trial is, in effect, the ordering of a new trial. People v. Lee Look, 143 Cal. 216, 220, 76 P. 1028.

[2] The plea of once in jeopardy as made by appellant did not specify the time, place, or court wherein appellant had been subjected to any former jeopardy for the offense charged. Pen. Code, § 1017; People v. Moronati, 70 Cal. App. 17, 232 P. 991; People v. O'Leary, 77 Cal. 30, 18 P. 856.

[3] We are satisfied that the evidence is legally sufficient to identify appellant as one of the two persons who committed the alleged robbery. While the identification of appellant by the complaining witness was on cross-examination deprived of some of its force, nevertheless that testimony, together with the circumstantial evidence connecting appellant with possession of one of the stolen bills, is enough to establish the fact, and, since the jury believed the evidence thus produced by the prosecution, this court should not interfere.

[4] Appellant has no substantial ground of complaint that he was convicted of second degree robbery upon evidence which would have justified the jury in finding him guilty of the more serious offense of first degree robbery. People v. Muhlner, 115 Cal. 303, 47 P. 128; People v. Tugwell, 32 Cal. App. 520, 529, 163 P. 508.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

HELLMAN COMMERCIAL TRUST & SAVINGS BANK v. ALDEN et al. ★

(Civ. 6167.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 31, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court July 30, 1928.

1. Insane persons ⟹99—Ordinarily finding that one is unable unassisted to care for himself or property because of weakness of mind will not warrant conclusions that specific contract is void for lack of mental capacity.

Ordinarily finding to effect that one is unable unassisted to properly care for himself or his property, by reasons of old age or weakness of mind, will not warrant conclusion that specific contract is therefore void for lack of mental capacity, and, in absence of adjudication of incompetency, it is necessary to allege and prove that transaction was void for lack of understanding of its nature and effect.

2. Insane persons ⟹1—Term "unsound mind" is equivalent to non compos mentis.

Term "unsound mind" is equivalent to term "non compos mentis," which includes all degrees of mental incompetency known to law.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Unsound Mind.]

3. Insane persons ⟹72—One regularly adjudged incompetent becomes incapable of making valid contract, because decree is notice to world of incapacity.

When court has regularly adjudged one incompetent, he thereby becomes incapable of making valid contract, and it is deemed to be void, not because he is unable unassisted to properly care for property or lacks understanding of nature and effect of particular transaction, but because decree of incompetency is notice to world of his incapacity to make valid contract.

4. Insane persons ⟹26—Adjudication of mental incapacity applies to both insane and "incompetent" persons, regardless of character or degree of derangement, and is sufficient evidence of incapacity (Civ. Code, §§ 38, 40; Code Civ. Proc. § 1764).

Adjudication of mental incapacity applies to both insane and incompetent persons, regardless of character or degree of mental derangement, and is sufficient evidence of incapacity under Civ. Code, § 40, providing that, after incapacity has been judicially determined, person of unsound mind can make no contract, and section 38, providing that person entirely without understanding has no power to contract, by virtue of Code Civ. Proc. § 1764, authorizing appointment of guardian of person in state of insane person and also of one who is merely incompetent; "incompetent" including insane and those less seriously afflicted.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Incompetent—Incompetency.]

5. Insane persons ⟹99—Finding that cashier's check was indorsed by indorser adjudicated incompetent held tantamount to finding transaction was void for incapacity.

Where court found that cashier's check was indorsed while indorser was laboring under adjudication of incompetency, held effect of this finding was tantamount to determination that transaction was void for incapacity.

6. Insane persons ⟹77—Rescission held not exclusive remedy for avoiding effect of indorsement and transfer of cashier's check by one adjudicated incompetent (Civ. Code, § 39).

Where indorser, under adjudication for incompetency, transferred cashier's check to indorsee, who deposited it in bank and secured funds, rescission provided by Civ. Code, § 39, held not only remedy, since, where affirmative relief is not sought, defense to action on contract may be made by setting up fraud or undue influence or mental incapacity.

7. Insane persons ⟹77—Restoration of money paid by bank to indorsee held not necessary to rescission, where court found indorser was incompetent and received nothing of value for indorsement (Civ. Code, § 1691).

Where court found that indorser of cashier's check, who had been adjudicated incompetent, received nothing of value for indorsement, it was not necessary for administratrix of indorser's estate to restore money paid indorsee, since, where no consideration is received as indorsement for execution of contract, no offer to restore is necessary, under Civ. Code, § 1691.

8. Bills and notes ⟹366—Bank, accepting cashier's check from indorsee who had received it from indorser who had been adjudicated incompetent, held not bona fide "holder in due course"; "capacity" (Civ. Code, §§ 3133, 3138, 3142).

Bank, receiving cashier's check from indorsee who had received it from indorser who had been adjudicated incompetent was not bona fide "holder in due course" pursuant to provisions of Civ. Code, § 3133, and entitled to be reimbursed under section 3138 and section 3142, providing drawer admits existence of payee and the then "capacity to indorsee" and engages he will pay amount thereof to holder, since language must be construed to mean that drawer admits mental capacity of payee at time instrument was drawn, not subsequent thereto, and holder means legal holder.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Capacity; Holder; Holder in Due Course.]

9. Bills and notes 🔑366—Holder obtaining check by transfer, void because indorser lacked capacity to indorse, has constructive notice, and cannot enforce payment.

Where transfer of check is void for lack of capacity to indorse instrument, holder is deemed to have acquired it with constructive notice of its infirmity, and is seized with no title upon which he may demand payment.

10. Contracts 🔑92—Mental ability to understand and consent to contract is necessary to its validity.

Mental ability to understand and consent to contract is absolutely necessary to its validity.

11. Interpleader 🔑10—Drawer of cashier's check paying money into court held relieved from liability and executrix of payee properly substituted, where check had been obtained by indorsement from payee adjudged incompetent (Code Civ. Proc. § 386).

Where cashier's check was indorsed by one who had been adjudged incompetent to indorsee who deposited it with bank obtaining money thereon, and drawer had paid money into court in compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 386, held real controversy lay between payee indorser, the depositors and holder thereof; hence executrix of payee indorser was properly substituted for drawer, who was entitled to be relieved from further liability by payment of money into court.

12. Insane persons 🔑73—Indorsement by incompetent held not binding on estate, although at time appeal from adjudication of incompetency was pending (Civ. Code, § 40; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1049, 1908, 1911).

Transfer by indorsement of cashier's check by one adjudicated incompetent held not valid and binding on estate of indorser because at time of transfer appeal from adjudication of incompetency was pending under Civ. Code, § 40, providing after incapacity has been judicially determined person of unsound mind can make no contract by virtue of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1908, 1911, 1049, and 1765; rule being that judgment is not competent as evidence to prove facts therein recited, but that such rule does not affect inherent effect of judgment.

13. Insane persons 🔑26—Decree adjudicating indorser incompetent, affirmed on appeal before action was brought on indorsed check, held competent evidence of indorser's incapacity.

Where decree adjudging indorser to be incompetent was affirmed on appeal and became final before offered in evidence in action on indorsed cashier's check, held that it was competent evidence of indorser's incapacity.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank against Greeley Kolts and others, in which the Security Trust & Savings Bank, a party defendant in a petition of interpleader pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 386, procured the substitution of Lena Alden, administratrix of the estate of W. L. Bundy, deceased, as a party defendant. From the judgment, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Page, Nolan, Rohe & Hurt, of Los Angeles (Henry S. Dottenheim, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Thomas B. Leeper, of Sacramento, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff appealed from a judgment in this case relieving the estate of an incompetent person from liability on account of indorsing and transferring a cashier's check. The transferee deposited the check, thereby securing credit at the plaintiff's bank, and drew upon the account the sum of $5,000. On presentation of the check for payment, it was dishonored. The appeal is from the judgment roll. The evidence is not before this court for consideration.

January 15, 1919, a petition for the appointment of a guardian of the person and estate of William L. Bundy was filed in the superior court of the county of Sacramento, upon the ground that the alleged incompetent was unable to care for himself or his property on account of extreme age, disease, and weakness of mind, causing him to become susceptible to imposition by designing persons. March 6, 1919, a decree was rendered declaring him to have been incompetent from the date of the filing of the petition. March 18, 1919, the guardian duly qualified. On appeal, this judgment was affirmed November 28, 1919 (In re Bundy, 44 Cal. App. 466, 186 P. 811), and the remittitur was filed January 27, 1920. Pending the determination of the petition for guardianship, the Security Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles, on March 7, 1919, issued and delivered to William L. Bundy its cashier's check for the sum of $10,000, which was indorsed and transferred August 5, 1919, to the defendants Kolts & Stearns, who immediately presented and deposited the check for credit with the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles, which banking institution thereby became the purchaser of said check in good faith, for value, in the regular course of business. The depositors then drew upon said account for the sum of $5,000, which was paid in good faith by the appellant. The following day, during banking hours, this check was presented for payment to the Security Trust & Savings Bank, which, having been previously notified of the adjudication of incompetency of Mr. Bundy, refused payment. August 7, 1919, notice of the dishonor of this check was served. The incompetent died February 8, 1920, and upon proper proceedings the respondent was appointed and qualified as administratrix of the estate of said deceased. Subsequently a creditor's claim for the amount in controversy was presented and filed. This action was then commenced. The Security Trust & Savings Bank was made a party defendant, and, in a petition of interpleader pursuant to section 386, Code of Civil Procedure, procured the substitution of the respondent as a party defendant, and paid the money in controversy into court. Judgment was rendered in favor of the respondent for the recovery of the money tendered. Appellant was given judgment against the defendants Kolts & Stearns, but was denied relief against both the Security Trust & Savings Bank and the administratrix of the estate of said deceased. From this judgment the plaintiff appealed.

The appellant contends that (1) the judgment is not supported by the findings, for the reason that the court failed to determine that Bundy was incompetent, or that he did not comprehend the nature or effect of the indorsement and transfer of the check, or that the transaction was void. The court merely found that a decree had been rendered adjudging the alleged incompetent to be unable, unassisted, to properly manage or care for himself or his property; that (2) the transaction was presumed to be valid, since the court found that it was performed during the pendency of the appeal and while the effect of the judgment was thereby suspended; that (3) the privity of contract between the Security Trust & Savings Bank, which was the drawer of the check, and the appellant as the holder thereof in due course, for value, without knowledge of the alleged infirmity, was bound under section 3142, Civil Code, to reimburse the holder of the check for the amount of money paid thereon; and that (4) the administratrix of the estate of Bundy was erroneously substituted as a party defendant in the place of the drawer of the check.

[1] These questions are squarely presented by the record. The court failed to specifically find that the incompetent lacked understanding of the nature or effect of the indorsement and transfer of the check in question, or that the transaction was void. But the court did find that "W. L. Bundy received nothing of value for his indorsement of said check," and that, "about the 6th day of March, 1919, said court made and entered its judgment, adjudging that the said W. L. Bundy was, on the 15th day of January, 1919, and for a long time prior thereto had been, and was at the time of said hearing, by reason of old age and weakness of mind, unable, unassisted, to properly care for himself or his property, and by reason thereof was likely to be imposed upon by designing and artful persons." The court further found that a guardian of the person and estate of said incompetent was thereupon appointed and duly qualified, that an appeal from said adjudication of incompetency was perfected, and that the judgment was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal on January 26, 1920. The respondent elected to rest her claim of the invalidity of the indorsement and transfer of the check in question solely upon a finding that an adjudication of incompetency had been duly made and was in force at the time of the transfer of the check. Ordinarily a finding to the effect that one is unable, unassisted, to properly care for himself or his property, by reason of old age or weakness of mind, will not warrant the conclusion that a specific contract is therefore void for lack of mental capacity. In the absence of an adjudication of incompetency, it is necessary to allege and prove that the transaction was void for lack of understanding of its nature and effect. In the case of Carr v. Sacramento C. P. Co., 35 Cal. App. 439, 442, 170 P. 446, the late Justice Burnett said:

> "* * * The test is: Was the party mentally competent to deal with the subject before him with a full understanding of his rights? Union Pacific R. Co. v. Harris, 158 U. S. 326, 15 S. Ct. 843, 39 L. Ed. 1003. Did he actually understand the nature, purpose, and effect of the contract?"

[2] One may be incompetent to some extent and yet have sufficient mentality to comprehend the nature and effect of a transaction and therefore execute a valid contract. An "unsound mind" has been defined by the Standard Dictionary to include one which is weak, diseased, abnormal, or defective. It is equivalent to the term "non compos mentis," which includes all degrees of mental incompetency known to the law. Jacks v. Estee, 139 Cal. 507, 73 P. 247. A contract which is challenged on the ground of incompetency is ordinarily not void, but merely voidable. Ripperdan v. Weldy, 149 Cal. 667, 87 P. 276; 6 Cal. Jur. 33, § 14; 9 Cal. Jur. 117, § 21; 1 Black on Rescission, 672, § 254. The author of Norton on Bills and Notes (4th Ed.) p. 295, says:

> "A man of weak mind, if not a lunatic or fool, can contract. An epileptic or imbecile mind has been held competent to convey property, * * * and no mere want of business capacity or even monomania will, in the absence of fraud, prevent a party from being bound upon a bill, note, or indorsement. The mental incapacity to avoid such a contract must amount to an inability to understand the nature of the contract and to appreciate its probable consequences."

[3, 4] It is the settled law of California that an adjudication of the incompetency of a testator is merely prima facie evidence of his incapacity to make a valid will. 1 Alexander on Wills, 449, § 335; Estate of Johnson, 57 Cal. 529; Estate of Johnson, 200 Cal. 299, 252 P. 1049. Section 1767, Code of Civil Procedure, defines "incompetent," "mentally incompetent," and "incapable" to mean "any person who, though not insane, is, by reason of old age, disease, weakness of mind, or from any other cause, unable, unassisted, to properly manage and care for himself or his property, and by reason thereof would be likely to be deceived or imposed upon by artful or designing persons." When, however, a court has regularly adjudged one to be incompetent, he thereby becomes incapable of making a valid contract, and it is deemed to be void, not because he is unable, unassisted, to properly care for his property, or lacked understanding of the nature and effect of the particular transaction, but because the decree of incompetency is notice to the world of his incapacity to make a valid contract. Section 40, Civil Code, provides that:

> "After his incapacity has been judicially determined, a person of unsound mind can make no conveyance or other contract, nor delegate any power or waive any right, until his restoration to capacity. * * *"

Likewise, it is provided in section 38, Civil Code, that:

> "A person entirely without understanding has no power to make a contract of any kind, * * *."

[5] It is contended that section 40, Civil Code, supra, applies only to insane persons since the latter portion of the section permits the discharge and restoration to competency by means of a certificate from the medical superintendent of the asylum to which the patient has been committed. But evidently this section of the Code was not intended to be so restricted. Section 1764, Code of Civil Procedure, authorizes the appointment of a guardian of the person and estate of an insane person, and also of one who is merely incompetent. It seems evident that the term "incompetent" is intended to include not only the insane, but also those who are afflicted with less serious derangements of the mind. The adjudication of mental incapacity therefore applies to both the insane and the incompetent, regardless of the character or degree of the mental derangement. No further evidence of mental incapacity is required under our statute while such a decree remains in full force and effect. The proof of the adjudication of incompetency presupposes a lack of mental capacity to understand the nature and effect of a contract. While the court has not specifically found that the indorsement and transfer of the cashier's check which is involved in the present case was void for lack of understanding, it did find that the act was performed while Bundy was laboring under an adjudication of incompetency. The effect of this finding was tantamount to a determination that the transaction was void for incapacity.

[6] The appellant contends that the indorsement and transfer of the check in question could be avoided only by means of a proceeding for rescission, and that the transaction could not be rescinded without first offering to restore the money which it expended. Rescission is a proper remedy by means of which to avoid a contract which is the product of an unsound mind. Section 39, Civil Code, provides that:

> "A conveyance or other contract of a person of unsound mind, but not entirely without understanding, made before his incapacity has been judicially determined, is subject to rescission. * * *"

[7] But this is not the only remedy. Where affirmative relief is not sought, a defense to an action on a contract may be made by setting up fraud, undue influence, or mental incapacity, without the necessity of resorting to the equitable action of rescission. Simon Newman Co. v. Lassing, 141 Cal. 174, 74 P. 761; California Packing Corp. v. Larsen, 187 Cal. 610, 203 P. 102; Mundorff v. Ramm, 66 Cal. App. 553, 567, 226 P. 820; 12 Cal. Jur. 786, § 52. When the remedy of rescission is resorted to, it is necessary to show reasonable diligence, and, except where one is subject to duress or mental disability, it is necessary to offer to restore everything of value which has been received. Section 1691, Civ. Code. But in the present case it was not necessary for the respondent to offer to restore the money paid by appellant. The court found that "W. L. Bundy received nothing of value for his indorsement of the check." Where no consideration is received as an inducement for the execution of a contract, no offer to restore is necessary. McNeese v. McNeese, 190 Cal. 402, 405, 213 P. 36; Simmons v. Briggs, 69 Cal. App. 447, 231 P. 604; Mundorff v. Ramm, supra; Anglo-Californian Bank v. Ames (C. C.) 27 F. 727, 730.

[8-11] The appellant also contends that the court erred in permitting the substitution of the respondent in the place of the Security Trust & Savings Bank, which was the drawer of the check, and in releasing that bank from all responsibility to the holder of the check, asserting that, persuant to the provisions of section 3133, Civil Code, it was a bona fide holder, in due course, for value, and was therefore entitled to be reimbursed. Section 3138, Civil Code, provides that:

> "A holder in due course holds the instrument free from any defect of title of prior parties, and free from defenses available to prior parties among themselves, and may enforce payment of the instrument for the full amount thereof against all parties liable thereon."

And section 3142, Civil Code, provides that:

> "The drawer by drawing the instrument admits the existence of the payee and his then capacity to indorse; and engages that on due presentment the instrument will be accepted or paid, or both, according to its tenor, and that of it be dishonored, * * * he will pay the amount thereof to the holder. * * *"

It will be observed that by the terms of section 3142, supra, the drawer admits only the "then capacity (of the payee) to indorse." This language must be construed to mean that the drawer admits the mental capacity of the payee at the time the instrument was drawn, and not subsequent thereto. And, where the same section provides that the drawer engages, if the instrument should be dishonored, upon presentment, to "pay the amount thereof to the holder," this must be construed to mean that under such circumstances he will pay the amount due to the legal owner or holder. Where the transfer is void for lack of capacity to indorse the instrument, the holder is deemed to have acquired it with constructive notice of its infirmity, and the holder is seized with no title upon which he may demand payment. The foregoing rules with respect to commercial paper do not obtain, when the instrument is absolutely void for lack of mental capacity to execute it. In 1 Joyce on Defenses to Commercial Paper, § 150, it is said:

> "It is a general rule that an idiot or insane person is not bound by his contract. And in an action on a bill or note the defendant may show that he was non compos mentis at the time of its execution. Nor as a general rule is a bona fide holder protected against this defense, as one who purchases such paper takes it charged with constructive notice of the legal disability of the maker. The rule of commercial law which protects commercial paper in the hands of a bona fide holder who has acquired it before its maturity, for value, does not apply to the case of paper signed by persons non compos mentis."

The mental ability to understand and consent to a contract is absolutely necessary to its validity. Jacks v. Estee, 139 Cal. 507, 73 P. 247; 6 Cal. Jur. 32, § 14. Section 151 of 1 Joyce on Defenses to Commercial Paper, supra, also says:

> "The indorsement of a certificate of deposit by an insane person creates no valid contract of indorsement, and an innocent purchaser is not protected against the defense of incapacity. * * * An indorsement of a promissory note by a payee is a contract which an insane person cannot make because he has not the power to give that consent which the law requires, and in an action by an indorsee against the maker the insanity of the payee and indorser at the time of the indorsement and transfer, is held to be a valid defense."

In the case of Anglo-Californian Bank v. Ames, supra, it is held that the indorsement of a certificate of deposit by an insane person in whose favor it was drawn, carries no title to the instrument, even in the hands of an innocent purchaser. The court says:

> "This was an action on a certificate of deposit. * * * The plaintiff claims as a bona fide purchaser of the paper. The bank, maker of the certificate, brought the money into court, and left the issues to be tried between the plaintiff and the defendant, Ames, the payee and indorser of the certificate. The jury found that Ames at the time of the indorsement was of unsound mind, and did not know what he was doing; that the indorsement was obtained by fraud and deception; and that Ames received no consideration therefor. Of these facts the bank was ignorant when it purchased. The question, therefore, is between a lunatic and an innocent purchaser of his paper. * * * Obviously, on principle, any promise of such a person lacks the essential element of a contract, to wit, assent. * * * Doubtless, it [the holder] is entitled to all the protection given to such a purchaser of negotiable paper; but such protection does not extend to an indorsement like this. There was no valid contract of indorsement created by defendant's signature on the back of the paper. It was no better than a signature written in a state of somnambulism, or even than a forgery. * * * While, in favor of a bona fide purchaser, inquiry is denied as to equities between prior parties, yet such protection does not cut off inquiry into the contractual capacity of those parties. Such, at least, is the better doctrine. * * *"

The last-mentioned authority quotes with approval from the case of McClain v. Davis, 77 Ind. 419, as follows:

> "There was nothing received in consideration of the contract under consideration, of which it can be said that restitution should be made before a disaffirmance should be permitted; and it is no objection that the note had passed, before maturity, into the hands of an indorsee. Commercial paper is not an exception to the rule which permits a disaffirmance by any one who was of unsound mind at the time of becoming a party thereto. The purchaser of such paper takes with constructive notice of all legal disabilities of the parties, * * * 1 Parsons on Notes and Bills, 149, 150; Edwards on Bills, 63, 69."

In 1 Daniel on Negotiable Instruments (6th Ed.) § 210, the author says:

> "No matter how perfect the note may be in form, it would be void in the hands of every person, however innocent, as against the imbecile or lunatic."

In the case of Shipman Banking Co. v. Douglas, 206 Ill. App. 586, it was held that the interest of an insane person who had indorsed and assigned a note to a third person without consideration, would be protected even in the hands of an innocent holder thereof for value. And in the case of Brumley v. Chattanooga S. & M. Co., 138 Tenn. 534, 198 S. W. 775, 777, it was held that an imbecile who had indorsed and transferred a certificate of deposit, which was held by an innocent purchaser for a valuable consideration, thereby conveyed no title to the instrument, and that it could be recovered on the theory that the holder was not a bona fide purchaser as against one who lacked capacity to negotiate it. From the foregoing authorities it appears that the appellant in the present case is deemed to have had constructive notice of the incapacity of the payee of the cashier's check in question; that the holder therefore had no legal title to the check, and that the drawer was a mere stakeholder of the money represented by the check, holding it for the real owner. The money due upon the check from the drawer thereof having been paid into court, the real controversy lay between the payee and endorser of the check, the depositors and the holder thereof. It necessarily follows that the respondent was properly substituted for the drawer, who upon payment of the full amount of money represented by the check, was entitled to be relieved from further liability under section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[12] Finally, the appellant contends that the transfer of the check by Bundy was valid and binding upon his estate, because at the time of the transfer, an appeal from the adjudication of incompetency was pending and the judgment was therefore not final. In other words, it is asserted that the appeal suspended the effect of the decree of incompetency, and that Bundy was presumed to be capable of executing a valid contract until the judgment was affirmed on appeal. This presents the question as to whether section 40, Civil Code, which provides that, "after his incapacity has been judicially determined, a person of unsound mind can make no conveyance or other contract," refers only to a final adjudication of incompetency.

Section 1908, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that a judgment or decree is conclusive with respect to the personal relation or condition of an individual. The rule is that a judgment is conclusive as to all issues which appear upon its face to have been determined, or which were actually and necessarily included therein. Section 1911, Code Civ. Proc. While it is true that "an action is deemed to be pending from the time of its commencement until the final determination upon appeal" (section 1049, Code Civ. Proc.), this does not mean that a decree which directly passes upon the personal status of an individual and determines him to be non compos mentis is suspended and nullified in its effect pending an appeal therefrom. The general rule regarding the effect of an appeal upon a judgment is expressed in 2 Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.), § 722, as follows:

> "The effect of an appeal, with proper bond to stay proceedings, is merely that it suspends the right to execution, but leaves the judgment, until annulled or reversed, binding upon the parties as to every question directly decided."

[13] This rule is modified in the jurisdiction of California, to the extent that a judgment is not competent as evidence to prove the facts therein recited until it has become final. But this is a mere rule of evidence, and does not change the inherent effect of the judgment. It is the undisputed rule in California that a judgment is not admissible in evidence to prove incompetency, or any other facts therein recited, until it has become final. Fry v. Baltimore Hotel Co., 80 Cal. App. 415, 424, 252 P. 752; Baker v. Eilers Music Co., 175 Cal. 652, 166 P. 1006; 2 Cal. Jur. 412, § 177. But in the present case this rule of evidence is not involved, for the decree adjudging Bundy to be incompetent was affirmed on appeal and became final January 26, 1920, when the remittitur was filed, and this judgment was not offered in evidence until the time of the trial in the present case on December 2, 1924. It was therefore competent evidence of his incapacity. Where a decree has been duly rendered in a proceeding instituted for the express purpose of determining the mental capacity or legal status of a person, it becomes constructive notice to the world of his incapacity, and he is thereafter incapable of making a valid contract or conveyance of property under the provisions of section 40, Civil Code, even pending an appeal from the judgment, at least if the judgment eventually proves to have been a valid one. In 2 Freeman on Judgments, supra, § 902, it is said courts regard a "* * * statutory proceeding for the appointment of a guardian for the person and property of a lunatic or mentally incompetent person as a proceeding in rem, designed to determine the legal capacity of the alleged incompetent to make contracts and to manage and dispose of his estate; * * * the appointment of a guardian determines his status in this respect as against the whole world, and is ordinarily conclusive. * * *" Kellogg v. Cochran, 87 Cal. 192, 196, 25 P. 677, 12 L. R. A. 104. In the case of Dulin v. Pacific W. & C. Co., 98 Cal. 304, 307, 33 P. 123, 124, discussing the office of the writ of supersedeas, the court says:

> "There are many judgments, however, which are self-executing, or which have an intrinsic effect, upon which there are no proceedings to be stayed, and which will not be affected by an appeal therefrom. A judgment * * * determining the status of an individual, etc., * * * are instances of such judgments. In Walls v. Palmer, 64 Ind. 496, a judgment had been rendered suspending the petitioner from practicing as an attorney, and it was urged that an appeal therefrom had the effect of restoring him to his right to practice during the pendency of the appeal. The court, however, held that to give that effect to the appeal would be to reverse the judgment of the suspension before the appeal was judicially decided. * * * The only effect of an appeal to a court of error, when perfected and while pending, is to stay execution upon the judgment from which it is taken. * * * The appeal suspends its force as a conclusive determination of the rights of the parties, but the stay of proceedings consequent upon the appeal is limited to the enforcement of the judgment itself, and does not destroy or impair its character."

In support of its contention that an appeal from an adjudication of incompetency has the effect of restoring the incompetent to normal capacity and validating his contracts and acts pending the appeal, the appellant relies chiefly upon the case of Coburn v. Hynes, 161 Cal. 685, 120 P. 26. That case involved an application for a writ of supersedeas to prevent a guardian who had been appointed by the court from taking charge of the property of the ward pending an appeal from the decree. The question of suspending the effect of the adjudication of incompetency was not involved in that case. The court merely held that, since the statute did not authorize a guardian to take charge of the estate pending an appeal, he had no such power. But the powers of a guardian as a trustee appointed by law are purely statutory, while the status of an individual with respect to his legal capacity to execute a valid contract is quite another thing, and depends upon the formal adjudication of a court. The suspending of the effect of such a decree pending an appeal would be likely to result in great damage and injustice to the incompetent and his estate. Recognizing this fact, and the necessity for statutory authorization for a guardian to take charge of an estate pending an appeal, section 1765, Code of Civil Procedure, which defines the powers of a guardian, was amended to authorize him, in the discretion of the court, to take charge of both the person and estate of an incompetent person, pending an appeal from the order appointing the guardian. We are of the opinion that the indorsement and transfer of the cashier's check after the adjudication of incompetency and pending the appeal was therefore void, and that the court's finding of the existence of this adjudication of incompetency was equivalent to holding that the transaction was void for lack of capacity.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

HEWITT v. KLAGES et al. (Civ. 3543.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 18, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 16, 1928.

1. Exchange of property 🔑3(1)—Exchange may be rescinded for fraud, though defendant did not know representation was false at time it was made (Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 2).

In suit for rescission of exchange contract on ground that plaintiff was induced to convey property by defendant's false representations, it was unnecessary to prove that defendant knew that representation was false at time it was made, since positive assertion in manner not warranted by information of person making it of that which is not true, though he believes it to be true, by party to contract, with intent to induce another to enter into contract, is actual fraud, under Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 2.

2. Exchange of property 🔑3(1)—To rescind exchange for fraud, false statement need not have been sole inducement.

In suit for rescission of exchange contract for fraudulent representations, it is sufficient to show that false statement was inducement to make exchange of property, without showing that it was sole inducement.

3. Exchange of property 🔑3(1)—That additional lien could have been discovered by examining record did not preclude rescinding exchange for misrepresentations as to incumbrances.

Plaintiff held not precluded from maintaining action for rescission of exchange contract on ground defendant's false representations that property was clear of all incumbrances, except certain amount, by fact that existence of additional lien could have been discovered by examination of record in office of county recorder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Suit for rescission of contract by Nettie F. Hewitt against Minnie Klages and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. J. Bledsoe, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Irvin C. Taplin and Clifford Crail, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. March 12, 1924, the plaintiff conveyed real property in the city of Los Angeles to the defendant Minnie Klages in exchange for a leasehold interest in an apartment house and the furniture and household goods therein. The bill of sale of such personal property provides that it is "to be free and clear of all incumbrance, except a mortgage of $1,875, which the party of the second part agrees to assume and pay." It was stipulated at the trial that Mrs. Klages, prior to and at the time of the exchange, "represented that it was clear of all incumbrance, except $1,875." There was at the time another mortgage lien on the property for a large amount, of which the plaintiff had no knowledge. Early in May, 1924, the plaintiff discovered the existence of this other lien. She immediately informed Mrs. Klages thereof and the latter indignantly denied that there was such a lien. On the 20th of that month Mrs. Klages executed a deed of gift of the real property in question to her daughter, defendant Agnes Jarvis, and conveyed all other property owned by her to her sons. On the 28th of the month the plaintiff served notice of rescission on the ground of the false representation mentioned and offered to restore all that she had received under the contract of exchange. Mrs. Klages refused to rescind and this suit followed. The court found that the plaintiff was induced to convey the real property to Mrs. Klages by the latter's false representation and that the deed from Mrs. Klages to her daughter was fraudulent and void. Judgment was entered accordingly in favor of the plaintiff, canceling the deed executed by her, and restoring her to possession. Mrs. Klages has appealed from the judgment, but Agnes Jarvis has not appealed. Appellant's contentions will be considered in the order stated in her opening brief, without expressly enumerating them.

[1] The court found that the appellant knew that the alleged false representation was false at the time it was made. The proof of such knowledge on her part is not strong, but such proof was unnecessary. "The positive assertion, in a manner not warranted by the information of the person making it, of that which is not true, though he believes it to be true," by a party to a contract, with intent to induce another party thereto to enter into the contract, is actual fraud. Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 2; Lombardi v. Sinanides, 71 Cal. App. 272, 278, 235 P. 455.

[2] A real estate agent acted for both parties and received a commission from both for his services in bringing about the exchange of properties. The plaintiff testified that she relied on the agent "to look up everything," and also that she relied upon the representation made by the appellant. She testified: "I relied on her as much as him." In a case such as this it is sufficient to show that the false statement was an inducement to make the exchange, without showing that it was the sole inducement. Macdonald v. De Fremery, 168 Cal. 189, 201, 142 P. 43.

[3] The fact that the plaintiff could have discovered the existence of the additional lien in question by an examination of the record thereof in the office of the county recorder does not preclude her from maintaining this action. Lillis v. Silver Creek, etc., Water Co., 21 Cal. App. 234, 241, 131 P. 344; Teague v. Hall, 171 Cal. 668, 670, 154 P. 851.

The judgment is affirmed.

DAHLBERG v. DAHLBERG. (Civ. 6089.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 21, 1928.

Judgment ⚷303—Where court's intention appeared on face of decree, but was not clearly expressed, court could amend decree to remove uncertainty.

Where intention of court regarding fees awarded for services of counsel and referees in partition suit appeared on face of decree, but was not clearly expressed, court could amend decree to remove uncertainty.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Partition suit by Emma Dahlberg against Andrew Dahlberg. From an order amending the final decree with reference to fees of counsel and referees, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Herbert Chamberlin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Gerald C. Halsey and Frederic T. Leo, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from an order amending a final decree of partition in so far as it related to fees awarded for services of counsel and referees employed in the litigation.

The interlocutory decree found that both plaintiff and defendant had incurred and expended reasonable counsel fees for the common benefit and recited that the matter of fixing the costs of partition, including counsel fees, should be reserved for the final decree. When the final decree was made, the reasonable value of the services of counsel and of the referees was determined, but the trial court, through inadvertence, ordered such fees to be paid directly to the counsel and referees rather than to the parties to the litigation. Thereafter the decree was amended in so far only as the decree purported to award fees directly to the counsel and referees. Thereafter, on motion of plaintiff, the decree was again amended to read that these awards should be to the parties alone—$1,250 to the plaintiff, with a lien for one-half thereof on the property partitioned to the defendant; $1,000 to the defendant, with a lien for one-half thereof on property partitioned to the plaintiff; and $300 to plaintiff to cover fees of the referees, with a lien for one-half thereof on property partitioned to the defendant. The appeal is taken from this last order.

The interlocutory decree properly found and recited that the allowance for counsel and referee fees should go to the respective parties, but the final decree inadvertently made the award to the counsel and referees directly. The first amendment merely modified this decree in so far as it gave a direct award to counsel and referees. The second amendment, the order appealed from, merely cleared the uncertainty arising from the decree as amended and made the decree speak the true intention of the court. Such an amendment is not a correction of judicial error, but is one coming within the rule of Estate of Willard, 139 Cal. 501, 504, 73 P. 240, 64 L. R. A. 554, where it was held that, where the intention of the court appears on the face of the decree, but is not clearly expressed, the court may amend the decree to remove the uncertainty.

Before appellant had taken his appeal from the order he and the respondent had paid in full the fees awarded to the referees, and the appellant had paid to the respondent one-half of the fees awarded her counsel. There is nothing involved in this appeal but the award of $1,000 to appellant to reimburse him for the fees of his own counsel. He is not a party aggrieved by the order appealed from.

The order is affirmed.

COTTER v. COTTER et al. (Civ. 5662.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 25, 1928.

Deeds ⟹208(2)—Finding that deed among grantor's papers in bank at his death was never delivered held sustained by evidence.

Finding that deed to grantee's son, which at time of grantor's death, with his will and bonds belonging to him, was held by a bank as depository, was never delivered though at time it was signed and acknowledged grantee and others had it in their hands, held sustained by the evidence, deceased having stated to his attorney that he did not want to part with the title in his lifetime, there being no evidence that he made any manual delivery or gave any direction that the deed should be taken possession of by any one, and it having been deposited in the bank and placed with his other papers very soon after its execution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphey, Judge.

Action by Delia M. Cotter against Stephen A. Cotter and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant Cotter appeals. Affirmed.

Louis J. Trabucco, of Mariposa, and James C. Walsh, of Oakland, for appellant.

H. Raymond Hall, of Oakland, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an action to quiet title. Delia M. Cotter, the surviving wife, commenced the action against Mary McKeever, as executrix of the estate of the deceased husband, David Cotter, and also against Stephen A. Cotter and certain fictitious defendants. In her complaint the plaintiff claimed an undivided one-half interest in the property in dispute. Mary McKeever appeared and answered. She set forth denials of all the allegations in the plaintiff's complaint, and she alleged affirmatively that the property described in the plaintiff's complaint was the separate property of the decedent and from the date of the purchase in 1875 remained his property down to the date of his death. Stephen A. Cotter appeared and answered, and in his answer he set forth the same denials and alleged affirmatively that he was the owner in fee of the property. A trial was had in the trial court before the court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff and against Mary McKeever. In doing so it found that the property was community property, that the surviving wife was the owner of one-half thereof, and that Mary McKeever, as executrix, had no right, title, or interest in or to said one-half interest. From a judgment entered on the said findings Mary McKeever has not appealed. The trial court also found that Stephen Cotter had no right, title, or interest in the said undivided one-half interest so found to be vested in the plaintiff, and it also found that a purported deed by David Cotter to Stephen A. Cotter was never delivered and that Stephen A. Cotter was never the owner of the property described or any part thereof. From a judgment entered on said findings Stephen A. Cotter has appealed.

On this appeal Stephen A. Cotter presents several points, one of which is that the finding that the deed above mentioned was never delivered is not sustained by the evidence. If he is mistaken in this contention it becomes unnecessary to discuss the other points presented in his brief. We have carefully examined the transcript. The facts regarding delivery or nondelivery may be stated briefly. On the 12th day of February, 1922, David Cotter was a patient in a hospital at Hayward. Pursuant to appointment there met in his room in the hospital on that day Frank H. Arb, Mary McKeever, William T. Knightly, and Stephen A. Cotter. Frank H. Arb was an attorney at law and notary public. Mary McKeever was a lifelong friend of the decedent and Stephen A. Cotter. William T. Knightly was a representative of the Bank of Italy, with which institution the decedent transacted business, and he was a friend of the decedent and of Stephen A. Cotter. The person last mentioned is a son of the plaintiff and the decedent, and at the time of the trial was an adult of the age of 44 years or thereabouts. Each one of those persons was examined and cross-examined regarding the execution of the deed and what was thereafter done with it. There was no dispute but what the decedent signed and acknowledged it. There was no dispute but what the decedent stated to his attorney that he did not want to part with the title during his lifetime. There was no evidence produced to the effect that the decedent made any manual delivery or that he gave any direction to the effect that the deed should be taken possession of by any one. There was some evidence to the effect that care should be taken of it. There was some evidence to the effect that Stephen A. Cotter had the deed in his hands, and the same may be said regarding Mary McKeever, Frank H. Arb and William T. Knightly. From the moment of its execution, or very soon thereafter, the deed was deposited with William T. Knightly of the Bank of Italy and was by him placed with other papers, including decedent's will and some bonds which the Bank of Italy held as the gratuitous depositary of the decedent. All of those papers, including the deed, were so held till after the death of David Cotter. Under these facts the finding that there was no delivery to Stephen A. Cotter was entirely correct. As no deed was delivered to him, no estate vested in Stephen A. Cotter. It is therefore immaterial, so far as this appeal is concerned, whether the property was community or separate property.

The judgment is affirmed.

BLEDSOE v. PACIFIC READY CUT HOMES, Inc., et al.

PACIFIC READY CUT HOMES, Inc., v. BLEDSOE et al.

(Civ. 6325.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 21, 1928.

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑187—Permanent waiver of payment under contract for sale of realty must be supported by consideration.

Permanent waiver of payment required by contract for sale of realty must be supported by consideration, as in such case there would be a novation.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑82—New contract altering written contract for sale of realty must be authorized, written, and supported by consideration.

Where original contract for sale of realty is in writing, any new contract purporting to alter it must be authorized, written, and supported by consideration.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑101—Vendor denying waiver of payment was not bound to notify purchaser of termination thereof.

To avoid waiver of payment, required by contract for sale of realty, vendor was bound to give notice before proceeding to foreclose, make formal demand therefor, and wait a reasonable time for purchaser to comply with contract, but was not bound to admit waiver, which it contended had never occurred, by notifying purchaser of termination of such waiver.

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑187—Vendor giving numerous notices and making numerous demands for overdue payment held not to have permanently waived payment.

Vendor giving purchaser numerous notices and making numerous demands for payment of amount due before starting to foreclose contract, without reply other than letter from purchaser's agent over year after due date disclaiming liability on ground that payment had been waived, held not to have permanently waived such payment, though never seeking to create default because of mere delays in making payments.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Action by Marie E. Bledsoe against the Pacific Ready Cut Homes, Inc., and another, and action by the Pacific Ready Cut Homes, Inc., against Marie E. Bledsoe and husband, in which defendants filed a cross-complaint. From the judgments for Marie E. Bledsoe and husband, the Pacific Ready Cut Homes, Inc., appeals. Reversed.

Andrew J. Copp, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. J. Bledsoe, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. Marie E. Bledsoe commenced an action against the defendant to obtain a decree setting aside a sale made by a trustee under a deed of trust. The defendant appeared and answered. A trial was had before the trial court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings of fact in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant has appealed.

The defendant commenced an action in ejectment against the plaintiff and her husband. The plaintiff and her husband appeared and answered and filed a cross-complaint. The latter pleading appears to plead the same facts in the same manner which are set forth by the plaintiff in the action first designated. The defendant answered the cross-complaint and by stipulation of the parties the latter action was tried with the action first designated. The trial court made findings in favor of Marie E. Bledsoe and her husband, and from a judgment entered thereon, the Pacific Ready Cut Homes, Inc., has appealed.

Both appeals are contained in one set of transcripts and one set of briefs. In deciding the appeals it will not be necessary to confuse the subject-matter by numerous repetitions of capacity. We will refer to Marie E. Bledsoe as the plaintiff and to Pacific Ready Cut Homes, Inc., as defendant.

The plaintiff purchased from the defendant on an executory contract a house and lot in Beverly Hills for $9,000. She paid down $400. She executed a mortgage on the house and lot in the sum of $3,600. She executed a trust deed to secure the payment of a promissory note in the sum of $4,600. The installment note for which the deed of trust was executed as security required the payment by the plaintiff of $69 on the first of each and every month. It also required the payment of $500 on November 1, 1924, and every six months thereafter. The $69 payments were made June 2, 1924, and March 11, 1925, and the record presents no question regarding them. The $500 payable November 1, 1924, was never paid and the failure to pay it constitutes the sole question presented in the litigation. In the trial court and in this court it was the contention of the plaintiff that the payment of $500 was waived. That contention the defendant at all times controverted. The trial court made a finding to the effect that the payment had been waived. If that finding is supported by the evidence, the judgment in each case should be affirmed. If it is not supported by the evidence, the judgment in each case should be reversed.

The plaintiff's husband sent his secretary, Mrs. Berg, to make payments for the plaintiff. In doing so Mrs. Berg went to the office of the defendant. She was directed to go to the desk of Mr. Norridge. He was the auditor. Whenever she called, Mr. Norridge accepted the payment and executed a receipt therefor, and delivered it to Mrs. Berg. On October 6, 1924, a payment in the sum of $69 was due. Taking a check for that amount Mrs. Berg made a call on Mr. Norridge as usual. Before making the payment to him she testified that she stated to him that there would be a $500 payment due November 1, 1924, and that Mrs. Bledsoe would not be able to make it, and Mr. Norridge said the defendant would be satisfied if she kept up the monthly payments and made the interest payments on the mortgage. Thereafter the plaintiff paid $69 on each of the following dates: November 7, 1924; December 13, 1924; January 1, 1925; February 2, 1925; March 11, 1925. Each payment was accepted and Mrs. Berg states that no objection to the acceptance was made to her.

The defendant replies that Mr. Norridge never made the statement testified to by Mrs. Berg; that it did receive and was entitled to receive under the terms of the contract each monthly payment of $69 which was made between October 6, 1924, and March 11, 1925; and the defendant asserts that on December 12, 1924, it wrote the plaintiff asking that the $500 be paid "at once," but the plaintiff did not answer the notice; that thereafter other written notices were sent to the plaintiff on January 6, 1925, January 8, 1925, January 17, 1925, January 24, 1925, January 28, 1925, February 3, 1925, and February 21, 1925. The plaintiff admits that she received all of said notices, but contends that the defendant had waived the payment, and she cites and relies on Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 110 P. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126. The defendant concedes the rule there announced, but contends that it has no application to the facts of this case. It claims that there was no waiver because Mr. Norridge had no authority to waive, and, whether he had or did not have such authority, the life of the waiver was terminated by the written notices sent by the defendant to the plaintiff.

[1-3] The defendant further contends that there was no consideration supporting the waiver. The plaintiff replies that none was necessary. That reply is too broad. In so far as a temporary waiver in making payments, it may be conceded that no consideration therefor was necessary. But if the plaintiff claims that by the word of mouth uttered by Mr. Norridge there was a permanent waiver, the claim may not be sustained, for in that event there would be a novation. There would have been a new and different contract created as between the parties. As the original contract was in writing, any new contract purporting to alter it must have been authorized, it must have been in writing, and there must have been a consideration supporting it. Both in the trial court and in this court the plaintiff contended that it was, under the facts, incumbent on the defendant to plead and prove that after November 1, 1925, it gave the plaintiff a notice, in substance:

> "That on October 6, 1924, it waived the payment of $500 due every six months and in particular on November 1, 1924; that such waiver is hereby terminated; and that plaintiff will have ——— days within which to make said payment."

Such is not the law. Hoppin v. Munsey, 185 Cal. 678, 198 P. 398. To avoid being charged with a waiver, the defendant was bound to give notice before proceeding to foreclose. As the defendant did not collect the $500 payable November 1, 1924, it was bound to make a formal demand therefor. It was bound to stay its hand a reasonable length of time so that the plaintiff could comply with the terms of the contract. But it was not bound to admit as a fact things which it contended had never taken place.

[4] The first notice given to the plaintiff was given December 12, 1924. Acting under the terms of the deed of trust, it did not declare a default until March 14, 1925—over three months thereafter. The trustee's sale was not had until August 8, 1925. The plaintiff claimed that she was absent from Los Angeles county between July 8, 1925, and August 8, 1925. No other excuse was tendered. The record shows that the defendant never at any time sought to create a default because of any mere delays in making payments. But it did seek to recover payments expressly designated in the contract. Before starting to foreclose it gave numerous notices and made numerous demands. All notices and demands were ignored by the plaintiff and, furthermore, through her agent on January 7, 1925, she wrote a letter in which she flatly disclaimed any liability to pay $500 every six months, claiming that such payments had been wholly waived. In this legal conclusion she was mistaken. There was no evidence of a permanent waiver. In so far as the language of the findings may be construed as holding that there had been a permanent waiver, the findings are wholly unsupported by the evidence.

In her pleadings the plaintiff alleges that between the 11th day of March, 1925, and the 15th day of March, 1925, the defendant did not serve any notice or demand on her. The allegation is admitted. However, the fact appears to be wholly immaterial. Our attention has not been called to any provision contained in the trust deed or in any other paper which called upon the defendant to give any notice during that particular period.

The judgments are reversed.

LAGUNA LAND & WATER CO. v. GREENWOOD et al. (Civ. 6317.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 16, 1928.

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑214(2)—Under contract prohibiting erection of house costing less than $1,500 and requiring grantor's consent to assignment, compliance with covenant was condition precedent to consent to assignment.

Where contract for sale of realty provided that no house should be erected thereon, except for temporary purposes costing less than $1,500, and that contract could be assigned only with written consent of grantor, grantor had right to insist upon compliance with such covenant as condition precedent to consenting to assignment of contract.

2. Specific performance 🔑115—Cross-complaint praying for specific performance of land contract held fatally defective because adequacy of consideration was not pleaded or proved; "adequate consideration."

Where cross-complaint prayed for specific performance of land contract, but failed to allege value of property or adequacy of consideration, held that specific performance of contract could not be enforced, in absence of pleading and proof that it is founded upon "adequate consideration," which means that it shall be reasonably just and equitable.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Adequate Consideration.]

3. Courts 🔑89—Where cross-complaint sought specific performance and adequacy of consideration was not referred to, cases cited determining such issue furnished no precedent.

Where cross-complaint prayed for specific performance of contract to sell realty, and adequacy of consideration or fairness of contract was not referred to in evidence or mentioned in findings, such matters were not in issue, and cases cited determining such issues furnished no precedent upon which to support present judgment.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1170(3)—Constitution did not furnish remedy for absence of pleading or proof of adequacy of consideration in cross-complaint praying for specific performance (Const. art. 6, § 4½; Civ. Code, § 3391).

Where cross-complaint prayed for specific performance of contract to sell real property, but did not allege that consideration was adequate as required by Civ. Code, § 3391, Const. art. 6, § 4½, furnished no remedy for failure to plead and prove such element.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. M. Jamison, Judge.

Action by the Laguna Land & Water Company against Emery Greenwood and another. Cross-complaint by Anna Westminster. From a judgment upon the cross-complaint awarding specific performance of a contract to sell real property, the plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John E. Biby and Harry C. Biby, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Marshall A. Stutsman, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment upon a cross-complaint awarding specific performance of a contract to sell real property. The appellant filed its complaint to quiet title to the east 30 feet of lot 836 of plat 3398, recorded in Book 37 of Maps, p. 43, Los Angeles Records. To this complaint the respondent filed an answer and cross-complaint, alleging that four years prior to the commencement of this action appellant executed a written contract of sale of said lot to the defendant Emery Greenwood for the sum of $635, to be paid in equal monthly installments of $6.25; that the defendant Greenwood thereupon entered into possession of the premises and constructed a dwelling house thereon at a cost of $1,000; and that he performed all of the covenants of said contract on his part. The contract was made a part of the cross-complaint, and among other covenants which it contained was a provision prohibiting the buyer from erecting or maintaining a dwelling house on the property which would cost less than $1,500, except for temporary purposes, in which event it was necessary to obtain the written consent of the grantor. The contract also provided that it could be assigned only by the written consent of the grantor. Time was made the essence of the contract, and a forfeiture was declared for the breach of any of its covenants. The value of the land was not alleged in the cross-complaint, and nowhere in the pleadings does it appear that the consideration for the sale of the property was adequate, or that the contract was just and reasonable. It was further alleged that on June 9, 1923, the respondent agreed to purchase said lot, together with the improvements thereon, for the sum of $1,100, upon which the sum of $525 was paid to the defendant Greenwood. On July 25, 1923, the respondent tendered to appellant the sum of $300, which was the balance unpaid upon the purchase price, which the appellant refused to accept until the respondent agreed in writing to conform to the contract and erect a dwelling house on said premises at a cost of at least $1,500. This was at first declined, and six months later this action to quiet title was commenced.

[1] The evidence shows that the contract between appellant and the defendant Greenwood was made as alleged, and that substantially $300 of the purchase price remained unpaid; that Greenwood was a poor old soldier; and that while appellant frequently urged him to comply with the covenant not to build a house upon the premises of less value than $1,500, this requirement was not enforced against him. A memorandum of agreement to sell the premises to respondent for $1,100 was signed by defendant Greenwood, and he acknowledged the receipt of the sum of $525 as part payment, but he never executed an assignment of the contract or a conveyance of the property. Both the respondent and Greenwood did, however, call upon appellant, notifying it of the proposed transfer, and requesting its written consent to the same. Appellant refused to consent to the assignment until respondent agreed in writing to remove the house and construct one which complied with the requirements of the contract. This was never done, the consent to transfer was never given and the assignment was never executed. Soon afterward the defendant Greenwood disappeared. His whereabouts were unknown, and summons was published against him. Neither the value of the property nor an averment of adequacy of consideration was mentioned in the pleadings, the evidence, or the findings. Appellant's demurrer to the cross-complaint was overruled.

[2] The appellant had a right to insist upon compliance with the specific provision of the contract prohibiting the construction or maintenance of a dwelling house of a value less than $1,500, and it was entitled to insist upon the fulfillment of this covenant as a condition precedent to the granting of its consent to an assignment of the contract. Moreover, the cross-complaint is fatally defective for failure to allege the value of the property or the adequacy of consideration. The judgment is not supported by findings or evidence of such value or adequacy of consideration.

Specific performance of a contract may not be enforced in the absence of pleadings and proof that it is founded upon adequate consideration and that it is just and reasonable. Section 3391, Civ. Code; Windsor v. Miner, 124 Cal. 492, 57 P. 386; Bishop v. Barndt, 43 Cal. App. 149, 157, 184 P. 901; Valentine v. Streeton, 9 Cal. App. 640, 643, 99 P. 1107; 5 Bancroft's Code Pl. 4225, § 2328; 23 Standard Ency. of Proc. 1046. By the term "adequate consideration" it is not meant that the price shall necessarily measure up to the full market value of the property, but merely that it shall be reasonably just and equitable to the party against whom the contract is sought to be enforced. Schader v. White, 173 Cal. 441, 160 P. 557; Estate of Brix, 181 Cal. 667, 675, 186 P. 135; 23 Cal. Jur. 442, § 17. In the case of Bishop v. Barndt, supra, which was quite similar to the present case, specific performance was decreed upon the answer of the defendant in a suit to quiet title. The judgment was reversed for failure to allege or prove an adequate consideration. Mr. Justice Waste, writing the opinion, says:

> "Specific performance in this case was decreed upon the answer of defendant Coward. Even though she were in position to seek such relief, her answer does not state sufficient facts, for it is not alleged therein that the consideration to be paid plaintiff for the land is adequate, or that the Barndt contract is just and reasonable. White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 613, 614, 87 P. 193. No evidence was received upon this subject, and there is no finding in regard to it. A decree for specific performance cannot be supported in the absence of allegation and finding that the contract was just and reasonable, and the consideration adequate. Civ. Code, § 3391; Gibbons v. Yosemite Lumber Co., 172 Cal. 714, 716, 158 P. 196."

To avoid the application of this well-settled rule the respondent relies upon the case of Baker v. Miller, 190 Cal. 263, 212 P. 11, where, in spite of an allegation in the complaint that "at or about the date of the contract the estate of said deceased was of the appraised value of $22,753, and said contract was in all respects just and fair and liberal in its provisions in favor of said defendant," the court held that the complaint was insufficient, saying:

> "Viewed as a whole, we feel there is no escape from the conclusion that the complaint is insufficient and the general demurrer interposed by the defendant should have been sustained."

Yet the court upheld the judgment in that case upon the ground that after the demurrer was overruled an answer was filed "denying generally and specifically the averment of the complaint attempting to allege the adequacy of the consideration and the fairness of the contract," and added:

> "The greater part of the testimony was directed in support of her contention that the consideration was inadequate and that as to her the contract was unjust."

[3, 4] But in the present case there was no attempt to allege an adequacy of consideration or fairness of the contract. Nor was the subject of adequacy of consideration or fairness of contract referred to in the evidence or mentioned in the findings. These matters were not an issue in the present case, and the case last cited therefore furnishes no precedent upon which to support this judgment. Nor can it be said that article 6, § 4½ of the Constitution furnishes a remedy for an absolute absence of pleadings or proof of a necessary element required in a particular cause of action. This constitutional provision is intended to supply the omission in imperfect or defective pleadings, or error in the rejecting or admission of evidence, so as to prevent a miscarriage of justice. Any other construction would convert this provision into an engine for the accomplishment of a miscarriage of justice, and destroy the rules of pleading and evidence which are the crystallization of ages of judicial wisdom. J. I. Case T. M. Co. v. Copren Bros., 32 Cal. App. 194, 162 P. 647; Evans v. Wixom, 38 Cal. App. 542, 176 P. 873; People v. Schiaffino, 73 Cal. App. 357, 360, 238 P. 725; Podrat v. Oberndorff (Cal. App.) 267 P. 750.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

R. A. Khan was convicted of simple assault, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Luke Howe and O. F. Meldon, both of Sacramento, and H. K. Landram, of Merced, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was charged with the crime of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder. He was convicted of simple assault and his motion for a new trial was denied. This appeal is from the judgment of conviction and the order denying a new trial.

[1] The evidence is sufficient to justify the conviction. The prosecuting witness testified that while he was running away from the defendant the latter fired three shots at the former, the second shot taking effect. Another witness testified that shortly after the shooting he found the prosecuting witness lying in the road; that "he was shot in the right shoulder"; and that he said: "Khan shot; Khan shot." This witness notified the sheriff, who reached the scene of the shooting a few minutes later. The sheriff testified that the prosecuting witness "had been shot."

ing, the shooting taking place in the evening. For the purpose of showing motive, the prosecution introduced in evidence, over the defendant's objections, the complaint, summons, and answer in that action. The complaint, among other allegations, averred that at various times the defendant had sexual intercourse with complainant's wife. The answer denied all allegations of wrongful conduct. The prosecuting witness testified that immediately prior to the shooting he was approached by the defendant, who said: "You know who I am; you take me in court." This testimony tends to show that the defendant's desire to injure the prosecuting witness was aroused by the prosecution of the civil action against him. It was material for the prosecution to show the nature of the civil action and the seriousness of the charges made therein against the defendant, not for the purpose of establishing the truth of the facts charged, but of proving that the charges were made and the consequent ill feeling probably engendered thereby in the mind of the defendant. People v. Colvin, 118 Cal. 349, 351, 50 P. 539; People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 59, 130 P. 1042; People v. Argentos, 156 Cal. 720, 724, 106 P. 65; People v. Gibson, 106 Cal. 458, 475, 39 P. 864; People v. Holloway, 28 Cal. App. 214, 217, 151 P. 975. See, also, People v. Soeder, 150 Cal. 12, 15, 87 P. 1016; People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 334, 339, 83 P. 43; People v. Brown, 130 Cal. 591, 594, 62 P. 1072; People v. Botkin, 9 Cal. App. 244, 253, 98 P. 861. The rule admitting such testimony is not unlike that applicable to the impeachment of a witness on account of ill feeling against a party or interest in the result of the trial. In such cases the extent of the difficulty causing the ill feeling or the extent of the interest of the witness may be shown. Wigmore on Evidence, § 951; People v. Fleming, 166 Cal. 357, 383, 136 P. 291, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 881. Doubtless the court would have instructed the jury, had the defendant so requested, that the pleadings in the civil action were not to be considered as evidence of the facts therein alleged. It must be presumed that the jurors were men of ordinary intelligence, and, if they were, they knew that such pleadings were not to be so considered.

[3-5] Appellant complains of the court's refusal to give three instructions requested by him. The first singles out the prosecuting witness and lays down rules for determining his credibility. The second states that the law presumes the defendant to be of good character. However, no testimony bearing on his good character was offered. The third singles out the defendant and states rules for weighing his testimony. It has been held so often that it is not error to refuse to give instructions to the effect stated, under the circumstances shown, that it is deemed sufficient to call attention to the text and cases cited in 8 California Jurisprudence, pp. 294, 344, and 356.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Edward Espalian was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph R. Marquette, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of burglary, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The principal contention of appellant is that the evidence was insufficient to prove the corpus delicti. In brief, the evidence showed the presence of defendant in one of the corridors on the second floor of a lodging house at the hour of 4:30 o'clock a. m. One of the witnesses testified that: "He (defendant) ran around the corner (of the corridor), and I knew he didn't belong in the house, and I stopped him and wanted to know what he was doing in the house." At the time defendant was discovered, he was standing within two feet of the door of one of the rooms in the lodging house, which door was then slowly closing. On being questioned, defendant stated that he was a roomer in the lodging house, and that he was "looking for a toilet." He was not a roomer there; nor did it appear that he used the toilet after his discovery. On the trial he admitted that before the time in question he had never been inside the lodging house and had no personal knowledge of the location of any of the toilets therein. It was shown that in order to arrive at the place at which defendant was discovered it would have been necessary that he pass at least four different toilets. Following his arrest defendant made conflicting statements regarding the place of his residence. More particularly, with reference to the room in the lodging house which defendant claimed to occupy, one of the witnesses testified:

> "Well, then I questioned him, and he said, 'I live there;' and I says, 'Where?' And we went to the end of the hallway, and there is a stairway there, and then he took a look and sneaked down the stairs as fast as he could run, and we went right after him. * * * Why, I was going to question him, and all of a sudden he went down the back stairs and we went after him. He went out the door and slammed the door."

The court ordered stricken from the record the words "as fast as he could run" and "sneaked." The witness continued:

> "Mr. Watt and myself were right behind him, and finally Mr. Watt caught up to him at Second and Bunker Hill, and he turned around and flashed a big knife right about like that (indicating). I don't know just how long, but, oh, a two or three inch blade, and he said, 'You come near me and I will kill you.' He was going to stick me, and I picked up a big garbage can—I had nothing else—and I hit him right in the head with it, and he finally gave in."

On being searched, a passkey of the kind known as a "pick" was found on defendant's person, and it appeared in evidence that the lock on the door which was closing at the time defendant was first discovered in the lodging house was one which could have been readily unlocked with the key in defendant's possession. Over the objection of defendant, one of the witnesses for the prosecution testified in substance that she occupied a room "on the other side of the hall" from the door which she was closing at the time defendant was first discovered in the lodging house, and that at about 4 o'clock in the morning of that day "first my door was tried. Then I heard the door tried across the hall. * * * I heard the door tried across the hall from me. Then I heard a voice come through the hall and say, 'What are you doing here?'"

[1] The final determination of whether the corpus delicti was proved depends upon the motive which actuated defendant in entering the lodging house. If, as defendant claimed, his only purpose was to visit a toilet, no crime would have been committed. On the other hand, if defendant entered the lodging house with the intention of committing either grand or petit larceny he was guilty of the crime of burglary. Section 459, Pen. Code. From the circumstances of the case, it would appear that evidence tending to establish the corpus delicti, as well as evidence of the fact that defendant was the person, if any, who committed the crime of burglary, was so interwoven that evidence to the effect that the crime of burglary had been committed would also point to defendant's guilt.

[2] It is manifest that, notwithstanding the denial of defendant of any intention on his part to steal anything while he was in the lodging house, the question of what was his intent was one to be solved by the jury from the evidence in the case; and while other than defendant himself no one could testify regarding his intention in the premises, the jury had the right from the conduct of defendant and the surrounding circumstances to draw the inference that his intention on entering the lodging house was to commit the crime of grand or petit larceny, which, by the terms of the statute, constituted the crime of burglary. Considering the facts as portrayed by the evidence, this court is of the opinion that the corpus delicti was sufficiently established.

[3] Appellant also complains of the admission in evidence, over his objection, of the testimony of the witness to the effect that at about 4 o'clock in the morning, immediately preceding the discovery of defendant in the lodging house, first her door was "tried" and then she "heard the door tried across the hall." Taking into consideration the early hour at which the door of each of the two rooms was "tried," as well as the surrounding circumstances, it would seem clear that evidence of the character in question had a tendency to prove that some one was attempting surreptitiously to enter one or the other, or possibly both, of such rooms. But conceding (without deciding) the point with reference to the inadmissibility of the statement that "first my door was tried," we think the alleged error could have had no effect on the conclusion reached by the jury. In other words, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, this court is of the opinion that the error of which complaint is made did not result in a miscarriage of justice. Section 4½, art. 6, Const.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

BUSCH PIPE & SUPPLY CO. v. KEMBLE et al.

BUSCH PIPE & SUPPLY CO. v. ARROWHEAD LAKE CO. et al.

(Civ. No. 3546.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 21, 1928.

Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence as to whether plaintiff sold materials to certain company held conclusive in action to foreclose materialman's lien.

In action to foreclose materialman's lien, finding of trial court on issue as to whether materials involved were sold to certain company held conclusive on appeal, where evidence was in substantial and irreconcilable conflict.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Jesse Olney, Judge.

Actions to foreclose materialman's liens, brought by the Busch Pipe & Supply Company against W. H. Kemble, also known as William H. Kemble, and others, and against the Arrowhead Lake Company and others. Judgments for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Musick, Burr & Pinney and Bicksler, Smith & Parke, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Young & Young, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff brought the above-entitled actions to foreclose liens claimed by it for materials alleged to have been sold to the defendant Comstock & Howard and used by that corporation, as contractor, in the construction of buildings at Arrowhead Lake for the defendants Kemble and Arrowhead Lake Company, respectively. The two cases were tried together on the same evidence, and separate judgments were entered in favor of the plaintiff as prayed for. Separate appeals have been taken from the judgments, the defendants Arrowhead Lake Company and Title Insurance & Trust Company being the appellants in both cases. The record on appeal is contained in a single transcript and both appeals have been argued together.

Comstock & Howard was a corporation. All of its capital stock except one share was owned by C. G. Comstock, F. W. Howard, and MacNeal Swasey. Prior to the sale of the materials for which the plaintiff claims a lien, Comstock & Howard had entered into contracts with Kemble and Arrowhead Lake Company, respectively, for the construction of the buildings in question, which involved large expenditures of money. "They handled the jobs on a percentage contract." Howard testified that in order to make a profit on materials furnished for the buildings and to have a "supply that would be available in quantity," the stockholders of Comstock & Howard organized the defendant Lakewood Lumber Company, a corporation. The stockholders in the two corporations were the same, except that one share of stock in the latter corporation was held by a person who was not a stockholder in the former, the purpose evidently being to qualify such person to act as a director. The connection between the two corporations was so close that Howard testified that he could not say for which corporation he was acting in ordering plumbing materials from the plaintiff, "because, as we all know, the interests of these two corporations were combined so closely I never considered who I was acting for." The two corporations kept separate books of account, however, and the Lakewood Lumber Company sold some materials to other contractors than Comstock & Howard. A director of the Lakewood Lumber Company testified that "99% of the business done by the Lakewood Lumber Company was with Comstock & Howard." The former company made a profit of from 25 per cent. to 40 per cent. on the materials furnished to the latter.

The court found that the two corporations were "identical and possessed practically the same officers, the same stockholders, and had the same corporate purposes, and that all the acts of the defendant Lakewood Lumber Company in connection with the purchase of the materials mentioned in plaintiff's complaint from plaintiff were done and performed by it as a dummy for the defendant Comstock & Howard," and that such materials were purchased from plaintiff by Comstock & Howard. The only ground urged by appellants for a reversal of the judgments is that these findings are not supported by the evidence. If such materials were in fact sold by the plaintiff to Comstock & Howard, the contractors, for use in the buildings in question, then plaintiff's liens are valid, whether the two corporations mentioned are separate or identical entities; it being admitted that the materials were used in such buildings.

Van Buren Jarvis, secretary and sales manager of the plaintiff, testified positively that—

> The materials were sold directly to Comstock & Howard for use in the buildings mentioned; that the plaintiff "was requested (by Comstock & Howard) to invoice this material to the Lakewood Lumber Company. * * * They told me * * * the Lakewood Lumber Company was to be a receiving depot for Comstock & Howard's use to store material that they were to use at Lake Arrowhead. * * * They (the materials) were all ordered by Comstock & Howard, * * * all the orders being verbal and being made in person or over the telephone. * * * The name of Lakewood Lumber Company * * * was never mentioned to me in connection with any purchasing or ordering of goods except at the second conversation when I was requested to have all invoices made out in the name of and sent to the Lakewood Lumber Company. * * * The invoices were mailed in care of the office of Comstock & Howard. * * * All merchandise * * * was first ordered verbally by either Mr. Robinson (who was general plumbing superintendent of Comstock & Howard and was not an employee of Lakewood Lumber Company) or Mr. Howard, and then several days later a writing purporting to confirm the verbal order was received from the Lakewood Lumber Company. In every instance that a confirming order was received, the merchandise described therein had been theretofore verbally ordered. My dealings on behalf of the plaintiff were entirely with Comstock & Howard. * * * The plaintiff is a wholesale plumbing and supply house and does not sell direct to the retail trade. We have no cut and dried policy, however, and sell sometimes direct to large corporations, but, generally speaking, do not sell to customers. * * * In a great many instances the merchandise was shipped long before this so-called confirmation was received at our office. * * * There was never any ledger sheet kept by the plaintiff corporation (with?) Comstock & Howard. * * * We have sold merchandise to Comstock & Howard where Comstock & Howard paid us for it with their own check. * * * That would not be carried on a ledger sheet. * * * No ledger sheet is ever made for any material for which we receive cash or checks."

A ledger sheet of the plaintiff, designating Lakewood Lumber Company as debtor, marked "special account," was introduced in evidence by the defendants. It specifies the buildings which Comstock & Howard were constructing as those in which the materials were to be used. Jarvis testified that the notation, "special account," was to call "attention to the fact that the actual merchandise was not sold to the Lakewood Lumber Company."

Howard testified that the Lakewood Lumber Company had "a contract with Comstock & Howard * * * to furnish all lumber and other building materials which were needed by Comstock & Howard for its various contracts at Lake Arrowhead"; that the materials involved herein "were being bought for the use of Comstock & Howard"; that they were not bought "for general stock purposes for the Lakewood Lumber Company. * * * The fixtures that went into these two jobs were bought for those particular jobs."

A witness for the defendant testified that the materials in question were not sold to Comstock & Howard, but to Lakewood Lumber Company. The invoices for such materials were made out to Lakewood Lumber Company, but they specify the particular buildings for which the materials were furnished.

Subsequent to the purchase of the materials, both Comstock & Howard and Lakewood Lumber Company were adjudged bankrupts. Thereafter the plaintiff filed a claim in the bankruptcy proceedings against Lakewood Lumber Company for the same materials involved herein. In the claim it is stated that such materials "were sold to the Lakewood Lumber Company * * * and to Comstock & Howard"; that liens had been filed against the property on which the materials were used; that the claims of lien were about to be litigated; and that any recovery thereon would be credited on the claim filed in the proceeding in bankruptcy. It does not appear whether or not a similar claim was filed in the bankruptcy proceeding against Comstock & Howard. While this testimony tends to weaken the case made by the plaintiff, it goes only to the weight of the evidence and does not necessarily require a finding in favor of the defendants. There is other testimony tending to support or to discredit the claims of the respective parties, but enough has been stated to show that the evidence is in substantial and irreconcilable conflict as to whether the materials involved were sold to Comstock & Howard or to Lakewood Lumber Company. The finding of the trial court on that issue, therefore, is conclusive on appeal, and it is unnecessary to determine whether the finding that the two corporations were identical has sufficient support in the evidence.

The judgments in both cases are affirmed.

JENNINGS et al. v. WEIBEL et al. (Sac. 4013.)

Supreme Court of California. July 6, 1928.

Negligence 🔑134(4)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that defendant negligently permitted fire on his premises to spread to and destroy plaintiffs' property.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that defendant negligently suffered a fire burning on his premises to spread into inflammable weeds and grass on his lands, and thence to lands of plaintiffs, resulting in destruction of plaintiffs' poultry and poultry raising equipment.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by James D. Jennings and another against F. H. Weibel and another. Judgment for plaintiffs against named defendant, and said defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Butler, Van Dyke & Desmond, of Sacramento, for appellant.

White, Miller, Needham & Harber, of Sacramento, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. Plaintiffs had judgment in the court below against defendant F. H. Weibel for the sum of $1,900, which sum the court found to be the value of certain poultry and poultry raising equipment destroyed by a fire found by the court to have been negligently permitted to escape by said defendant Weibel from premises owned and occupied by him and his wife, Mary Weibel, to the adjoining property of plaintiffs. The sole inquiry upon this appeal is confined to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding to the effect that appellant negligently suffered a fire burning on his premises to spread into inflammable weeds and grass on his lands and onto lands of plaintiffs. The court, it would appear, was of the opinion that no satisfactory evidence was introduced in support of the allegation of the complaint that defendant negligently set fire to the rubbish pile, and it made no finding as to the latter allegation.

Appellant Weibel and respondents owned adjoining tracts of land situate near the town of Roseville in the county of Sacramento. The conflagration occurred on August 6, 1925, at a time when grasses and grain fields are dry and highly inflammable. The fire originated in a rubbish pile on appellant's ranch at a distance of 175 to 200 feet from his poultry house.

Said rubbish pile consisted of three months' accumulation of dry waste and other refuse, such as papers, rags, strings, and boxes raked into a heap. Appellant testified that he was working on the premises throughout the day; that he first discovered the fire in the rubbish pile between 2:30 and 3 o'clock in the afternoon; that the entire pile was then on fire; he called to his son, and together they attached a hose to a nearby hydrant and wet the ground around the pile to prevent the fire from spreading. A water drain ran past the pile a few feet to the south. Due to seepage from said drain, a strip of ground about two and one-half feet in width was covered with a high, dense growth of green grass, and, according to appellant, the dry grass between the rubbish pile and the green grass had entirely burned over when he discovered the fire. Immediately south of the drain was plowed ground and a green alfalfa field. After having wet the ground around the pile, appellant did not deem further assistance from his son necessary, and he remained alone to guard the blaze.

Appellant soon noticed that a new fire had broken out at a distance of fifteen or twenty feet from the edge of the wet ground around the pile, and beyond the range of the hose. He immediately called his family, consisting of his wife, son, and daughter, and they used wet sacks in their attempts to quench the fire, but their efforts were unavailing. The fire got beyond their control, and spread to respondents' premises, causing the damage complained of.

Appellant and his son stated by way of surmise and conjecture that they were of the opinion that there must have been dry foxtail intermixed with the green growth about the drain, through which the fire crept to the point where it later broke out. Appellant did not apprehend a spread of the fire in the direction of the drain, as he believed the ground there more or less damp from seepage from the drain, and the wind was not blowing in the direction of the drain. He had not wet the ground south of the rubbish heap in the direction of the drain, nor had he extinguished the fire in the pile. He was fearful of the spread of the fire to several empty gasoline tanks in another direction and to some dry bushes 15 or 20 feet from the pile which he was wetting when he noticed the second outbreak of fire.

Witnesses on respondents' behalf united in testifying that the day was hot and very windy, and stated that they had noticed heavy smoke coming from the direction of the Weibel place at a point back of Weibel's poultry house before the hour of 2:30 o'clock, the time Weibel claims he first saw it. Mrs. Neilsen testified that she observed it between 12 and 12:30, and the witness A. C. Neilsen testified that he first observed the smoke about 10:30 or 11 o'clock in the morning.

The court below was the judge of the credibility of the witnesses and of the weight, effect, and sufficiency of the evidence. From the testimony briefly outlined above, the trial court may have concluded that the fire was burning in the rubbish heap before the hour of 2:30, when appellant claims to have discovered it, under such circumstances that appellant and the members of his family, in the exercise of a due concern for their own interests and those of others, should have been aware of it, and, had they used due diligence and care, would have extinguished it. Or the court may have concluded that Weibel's lack of due care lay in failing to further investigate the condition of the grass surrounding the drain, which proved to contain dry grasses, with a view to ascertaining the possibility of the fire passing through it. It appears that he did not water the grass around the drain nor the ground between the pile and the drain south of the pile. Although the wind may not have been blowing in that general direction, the presence of a wind, which is frequently variable, blowing to the north should have prompted the exercise of the utmost vigilance to cut off all avenues of escape. Neither did Weibel extinguish the smoldering fire in the rubbish pile. A spark from the rubbish heap may have caused the second outbreak. We have read the evidence as set forth in the transcript, and are of the opinion that it furnishes a sufficient basis for the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

HARRIS v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.

(S. F. 12867.)

Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1928.

1. Master and servant 🔑398—Plea of limitations, filed on day to which workman's compensation hearing was continued before time to answer expired, held timely (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11).

Plea, filed on day to which further hearing of compensation proceeding was continued on date of original hearing before expiration of time to answer, that application was barred by limitation prescribed in Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11 (St. 1917, p. 841), held timely and hence not waived.

2. Master and servant 🔑398—Time for compensation proceeding is tolled while employee is totally disabled and bedridden as result of injury (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11; Code Civ. Proc. § 328).

Period within which injured employee must begin proceedings for compensation under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11 (St. 1917, p. 841), is tolled during time that he is totally disabled and bedridden as result of injury, where immediate or not, especially in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 328, tolling general statutes of limitations while exceptions are in operation, though prolonged for as much as 20 years.

3. Courts 🔑92—Court's comment on statutory exception, tolling period for commencing compensation proceeding while employee is totally disabled and bedridden, in case involving applicant not so disabled, held obiter dictum (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11).

Appellate court's comment on meaning of exception in Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11 (St. 1917, p. 841), tolling period within which proceedings for compensation must be commenced while applicant is totally disabled and bedridden, in case wherein applicant was never so disabled for any prolonged time during such period, was obiter dictum, which courts are not required to follow nor Legislature to regard.

In Bank.

Proceedings for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Joseph A. Harris, employee, opposed by the San Francisco Bridge Company, employer, and the Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Company, insurance carrier. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission denying compensation, the employee applies for certiorari. Order set aside, and cause remanded.

F. W. Sawyer and Sawyer & Sawyer, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner and R. P. Wisecarver, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioner for a writ of review herein was at the time of the injuries for which he sought an award an employee of the respondent San Francisco Bridge Company, of which its correspondent, Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Company, was at said time the insurance carrier. The petitioner's injuries were caused by his being struck by a plank on the head while in the course of his employment on or about the 31st day of March, 1927. No immediate disability followed, and he continued in his usual employment until June 2, 1927, when he became paralyzed and bedridden and totally disabled, and so continued thenceforth and down to and including the hearing of his cause before the commission. The undisputed evidence presented at such hearing showed that his paralyzed and bedridden and totally disabled condition was the direct result of his injuries received as aforesaid.

[1] The claim of the applicant for an award was not filed before the commission until November 1, 1927, and not within six months after the date of his injury, and the main defense of the respondents, his employer, and its insurance carrier, upon the hearing before the commission, consisted in the plea that the belated application of the petitioner for an award was barred by the limitation prescribed by section 11 of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The commission in denying the applicant relief based its findings and order solely upon that ground, and also denied the application of the petitioner for a rehearing presumably upon the same ground. In his said application for a rehearing said petitioner urged, and also urges in his application for this writ, that the respondents have waived their right to plead the bar of the limitation prescribed in section 11 of said act by their failure to present said plea upon the first hearing before the commission, the basis of his said contention being that according to the record of said hearing before the commission his application for compensation was filed on November 1, 1927; that notice of the hearing thereon was given on November 7, 1927, wherein the date of November 23, 1927, was the day fixed for said hearing. The record, however, discloses that at the date of such hearing the time of the respondents to answer had not expired, and that while the respondents appeared at such hearing and some rather informal proceedings were had upon that day, the further hearing was continued until December 6, 1927, at which time the written answer of the respondents containing their plea to the effect that the applicant's claim was barred by the aforesaid provision of the statute was filed. In this state of the record we are of the opinion that under a liberal interpretation of the Workmen's Compensation Act the respondents' plea of the bar of the statute was timely, and that there is therefore no merit in the petitioner's first contention.

[2] The second contention upon which the petitioner strongly relies is that the commission was wholly in error in holding that the claim of the applicant for an award was filed too late and in denying him relief upon that sole ground. Section 11 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Stats. 1917, pp. 831–841) provides as follows:

> "(b) The periods within which proceedings for the collection of compensation may be commenced are as follows:
> "(1) Proceedings for the collection of the benefit provided by subsection (a) of section nine or for the collection of the disability payment provided by subsection (b) of said section nine must be commenced within six months from the date of the injury, except as otherwise provided in this act. * * *
> "(c) * * * Provided further, that the provisions of this section shall not apply to an employee who is totally disabled and bedridden as a result of his injury, during the continuance of such condition or until the expiration of six months thereafter."

It is the contention of the respondents herein that the foregoing provision of section 11 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, embodying as it does a period of limitation within which proceedings for the collection of the benefits provided for in said act must be commenced, is to be given the same interpretation that has been uniformly applied to similar statutes of limitation from the time of the ingrafting of such statutes upon the common law of England down to the present time, and which interpretation is to the effect that when the prescribed period of a statute of limitation begins to run it continues to run, with certain specified and limited exceptions, during the prescribed period of limitation, and that unless the party entitled to commence an action or proceeding does so within the period so prescribed his right of action, unless it can be brought within the aforesaid exceptions, is forever barred. There can, of course, be no question as to the correctness of the respondents' position and of the authorities which are cited to sustain it as applicable generally to those statutes of limitation which we have inherited from the laws of England and which may be found embodied in the various provisions relating thereto in our Code of Civil Procedure. But notwithstanding that fact a very serious question arises as to whether the Legislature intended that the foregoing rigid rule of interpretation applied generally to the limitation of actions should be given application to the particular provision of the Workmen's Compensation Act which is here under review. That the Legislature intended that the Workmen's Compensation Act as to any part or portion thereof which it should come within the province of the court to interpret should be liberally construed by such court for the purpose of extending the benefits of the act for the protection of the persons injured in the course of their employment is made plain by section 69a of said act, which so expressly provides. With this admonition in mind we now turn to section 11 of the Workmen's Compensation Act with a view to determining its real intent and meaning.

We note at the very outset a marked distinction between the terms of the limitation embraced therein and those employed in the various provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure which relate to the limitations of actions and proceedings thereunder. The Code provisions relating generally to the time within which civil actions and proceedings must be commenced are embraced in part 2, tit. 2 of said Code, and in each instance wherein a period of limitation is prescribed for the commencement of a particular action or proceeding such action or proceeding can only, with certain exceptions, be commenced within the periods prescribed in said title "after the cause of action shall have accrued." The provisions of said title which embody the exceptions to the general rule also expressly refer and relate to the time "when the cause of action accrues." Had the Legislature intended, in the adoption of the Workmen's Compensation Act, to provide in the period of limitation embodied therein that as to the exceptions thereto the rigid rule of the general law relating to the running of limitations should be given application, it could most easily and effectively have done so by adopting the language of the general law above referred to or words of similar import. When, however, we turn to the provision of the Workmen's Compensation Act as contained in section 11 thereof, we find that the Legislature not only did not adopt the provisions of the general law relating to the exceptions to the period of limitation therein prescribed, but, on the contrary, carefully avoided so doing. By reference to the portions of section 11 of said act above quoted it will be seen that when the time is fixed within which proceedings for the collection of the benefit provided for in said act are to be commenced it is stated that such proceeding "must be commenced within six months from the date of the injury"; but when in the later portion of said section the exception to said limitation is set forth it is provided "that the provisions of this section shall not apply to an employee who is totally disabled and bedridden as a result of his injury."

The difference in statement between the limitation and the exception to it is marked and plain, since, had the lawmakers intended that the totally disabled and bedridden condition of the employee resulting from his injuries was to have its inception at the date of his injury in order to operate to toll the limitation, it would have employed in the exception the same phraseology which it used in fixing the time when the limitation would commence to run; i. e., "from the date of the injury." To interpret the clause in the exception to mean that the totally disabled and bedridden condition which would entitle the employee to the benefit of the exception must be the immediate consequence of his injury is not only to do violence to its terms, but is to give the section itself a meaning wholly contrary to the spirit of the act, and particularly to that portion thereof above quoted which enjoins liberality of interpretation in the interest of and for the benefit of the employee. But in addition to this it may be stated that while it is true that in fixing a comparatively brief period of limitation within which proceedings for the collection of the benefits provided for in the Workmen's Compensation Act must be begun, the Legislature had in mind the general principle underlying statutes of limitation, it may not be said that in the insertion of the exception here under review the Legislature was confronted with a situation either identical or similar to that provided for in the law regulating generally the limitation of actions, since in such laws a totally disabled or bedridden condition of a litigant has never been held to furnish a reason for tolling the period of limitation applicable to his cause of action.

In dealing with the rights and benefits accruing to injured employees under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act the lawmakers were dealing with a unique situation wherein the parties to the proceedings provided for in said act do not stand in the position of dealing at arm's length with each other as in the case of ordinary litigants, but, on the contrary, occupy the relation of employer and employee wherein during the existence of that relation the employee has been to a greater or less degree incapacitated by reason of injuries received in the course of his employment; and while for such injuries it is entirely fitting that a brief period of limitation should be fixed upon as the time within which he must commence the proceedings before the commission through which he is to receive, if entitled thereto, the benefits to which in consequence of such injuries he is entitled, it would be altogether unreasonable and out of accord with the spirit of the act to hold that unless the employee's injury was so severe as to place him immediately in a totally disabled and bedridden condition he could derive no benefit from the exception here under review. The phrase in the exception, "as a result of his injury," is not qualified by the condition, either expressed or implied, that such result shall be immediate, and the instant case would seem to furnish a most apt and striking reason why the exception in question should not be given any such strained and narrow interpretation.

It is our conclusion, therefore, that a liberal interpretation of section 11 of said act requires us to hold that whenever it is made to appear that if at any time during the period of limitation provided for in said act the injured employee has become "totally disabled and bedridden as a result of his injury," the period of limitation within which he must begin proceedings before the commission for the collection of the benefit to which he is entitled under said act is tolled during the continuance of such condition.

It is argued by the respondents herein that such an interpretation would have the effect of prolonging unreasonably the period within which such proceedings must be begun. We see little force, however, in this suggestion, for the twofold reason that traumatic injuries as a result of which persons become totally disabled and bedridden are not in ordinary circumstances followed by any great prolongation of such conditions, and for the further reason that with regard to statutes of limitation generally the tolling of the statute continues during the period when the exceptions to it are in operation even though that period may be prolonged for as much as 20 years. Code Civ. Proc, § 328.

[3] The respondents herein have relied strongly upon the case of Rose v. Petaluma & Santa Rosa Railway Co., 64 Cal. App. 214, 221 P. 406, as not only sustaining their contention herein, but as having been decided in the year 1923, since which time several state Legislatures have convened and wherein the Workmen's Compensation Act, while amended in other respects, has not been changed in respect to the provision of section 11 thereof so as to alter the interpretation of said section imputed to it in that case. An examination of the record, however, in that case discloses a state of facts the existence of which would have debarred the injured employee from the benefit of the exception to section 11, which the court in that case undertook to interpret and apply. Upon the facts as stated in said opinion the applicant for an award was never at any time during the period of limitation in any or at most any prolonged situation which could be described as a "totally disabled and bedridden condition." This being so, the exception provided for in section 11 of said act could have had no application to the applicant's case, and hence whatever comment the court in that case made upon the meaning to be accorded to the language of said exception was obiter dictum, which the courts were not required to follow nor the Legislature to regard. A fuller consideration of the subject leads us to the conclusions above set forth, from which it follows that the rule of interpretation adopted by the appellate tribunal in the case last above cited must be disapproved.

It follows from the foregoing that the decision of the commission denying the petitioner a hearing and award for the reasons therein stated must be set aside and the cause remanded to said commission for further proceedings in accord with the views expressed in this opinion.

It is so ordered.

HILBERT v. KUNDICOFF. (L. A. 9477.)

Supreme Court of California. July 5, 1928.

1. Breach of marriage promise ⚷3—There can be no recovery for breach of marriage promise, if promisee knew of promisor's pre-existing marriage when promise made.

There can be no recovery for breach of promise to marry when, at the time the promise was made, promisee knew of promisor's pre-existing marriage.

2. Breach of marriage promise ⚷3—Promisor's pre-existing marriage, unknown to promisee, is no defense to action for breach of marriage promise.

Where fact of promisor's pre-existing marriage is unknown to promisee when promise of marriage is made, it furnishes no defense to action for breach of promise.

3. Breach of marriage promise ⚷3—Where plaintiff had no doubt of defendant's ability to marry when he promised, subsequent doubt did not defeat right to recover for breach of promise.

Where, when defendant originally promised to marry plaintiff, latter had no doubts as to defendant's ability to marry her, defendant's subsequent statement suggesting delay of ceremony until he could definitely ascertain his marital status did not defeat plaintiff's right to recover for breach of marriage promise, in view of defendant's subsequent renewal of promise after doubt was removed.

4. Appeal and error ⚩969—Trial ⚩22—Necessity of interpreter is question for judicial determination of court, whose ruling will not be disturbed except for clear abuse of discretion (Code Civ. Proc. § 1884).

Question of necessity of appointing interpreter under Code Civ. Proc. § 1884, is one for the judicial determination of the court, and its ruling will not be disturbed, unless the record clearly discloses an abuse of discretion.

Action by Fannie Hilbert against John Kundicoff. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Royal S. Riddle, of San Pedro, and Halverson & Price, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clement L. Shinn, Walter J. Little, and William B. Gilroy, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TYLER, Justice pro tem. [1] Action for damages for breach of promise to marry. Trial was had by jury, which resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $5,000. Motion for new trial was made and denied. This appeal is prosecuted from the judgment and order. It is claimed as ground for reversal that the evidence shows the alleged promise to be void because of the fact that plaintiff knew at the time it was made that defendant was a married man. It is further urged that the trial court erred in not granting appellant's request for an interpreter, and that it likewise erred in denying his motion for a new trial. There is no merit in any of these contentions. It is true that there can be no recovery for breach of a promise to marry when at the time the promise was made, the promisee knew of the pre-existing marriage of the promisor. This principle is a salutary one, and courts should not, in the slightest degree, modify it. Smith v. McPherson, 176 Cal. 144, 167 P. 875, L. R. A. 1918E, 66.

[2, 3] It is equally true, however, that, where the fact of the marriage of the promisor is unknown to the promisee at the time the promise is made, it furnishes no defense to an action for breach of the promise. 9 C. J. 325. Here so much of the evidence as is necessary to support the judgment shows that the parties hereto had entertained more or less intimate relations toward each other from the time that they first became acquainted. Defendant was a boarder in plaintiff's family when she was living with her husband. Plaintiff subsequently secured a decree of divorce, and plaintiff and defendant thereafter continued their intimate relations. During this period they discussed the question of marriage, and defendant entered into the alleged agreement. Plaintiff was advised to ascertain if defendant was a single person, and she thereupon questioned him concerning his marital status, and was assured that, while he had contracted a marriage in Russia some years previously, his former wife had been married for about eight years, and that he was free to marry. After this promise was made, and at a time when the parties were contemplating immediate marriage, defendant suggested that the ceremony be delayed until he could definitely ascertain his marital status. He subsequently learned that he was no longer a married man, and he again promised plaintiff that he would marry her. Several witnesses testified as to defendant's promise. Even if we assume that the statement of defendant as to his doubt concerning his status be true, and was sufficient to raise a question in plaintiff's mind at that time as to defendant's ability to marry, it can here have no controlling effect, for, when the promise was originally made, plaintiff had no doubts upon the question, and, when all doubt was removed, defendant again made the promise relied on. A renewal of such a promise after removal of the disability, if one exists, will support an action for a breach. Pyle v. Piercy, 122 Cal. 383, 55 P. 141; 9 Corpus Jur. 325.

[4] Where a single woman receives the addresses of a married man who for good reasons she believes to be single, and an engagement follows, the man cannot set up against her his wrong in making the marriage promise. Here there is evidence to show that plaintiff at all times when the different promises were made had no reason to believe defendant was a married man, and she had the right to expect a fulfillment of his promise, and a right to recover for the disappointment when, as here, he failed to keep his promise, and married another. Nor was there any irregularity, as claimed in the proceedings of the trial, because of the circumstances surrounding the use of an interpreter to aid appellant in giving his testimony. After the trial had proceeded, an interpreter was had, but during the examination it became evident to the court that appellant understood and spoke the English language, whereupon the services of the interpreter were dispensed with. Under section 1884, Code of Civil Procedure, the court is required to appoint an interpreter in those cases only where the witness does not understand or speak the English language. The question is one for the judicial determination of the court, and its ruling will not be disturbed, unless the record clearly discloses an abuse of discretion, and here there is no such showing. People v. Morine, 138 Cal. 626, 72 P. 166. There is no merit in the appeal.

UNITED BANK & TRUST CO. v. FIDELITY & DEPOSIT CO. OF MARYLAND et al.

(Sac. 4044.)

Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1928.

1. Pleading ⇨37—Failure of pleader to allege compliance with statute requiring order of court for suit on receiver's bond authorized inference that he did not conform thereto (Pol. Code, § 982).

Failure of plaintiff to allege compliance with Pol. Code, § 982, requiring receivers' bonds to be payable to the state of California and authorizing suits thereon upon order of court, authorized inference that he did not conform to its requirements.

2. Mortgages ⇨471—Complaint against receiver in mortgage foreclosure proceeding because receiver permitted owner of cattle subject to agister's lien to remove them from premises held demurrable as not showing duty to mortgagor's assignee (Pol. Code, § 982).

Complaint, brought against receiver appointed at instance of mortgagee for damages because he permitted owner of cattle, without discharging lien for pasturage, to remove them from premises, contrary to court's instructions, held not to state a cause of action under Pol. Code, § 982, because not showing that receiver was officially chargeable with any duty with respect to lien claimed by assignee.

3. Limitation of actions ⇨180(2)—Complaint held to show action against receiver of mortgaged realty on theory that he permitted owner of cattle on which plaintiff claimed agister's lien to remove them barred by three-year limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 1).

Complaint, in assignee's action for damages against receiver appointed at instance of judgment creditor holding mortgage on realty, on theory that receiver was liable on his bond because he permitted owner of cattle on which lien was claimed to remove them from premises, held to show on its face that action was barred by Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 1, creating a three-year period of limitations.

4. Pleading ⇨34(3)—Fact may appear by inference in pleading.

A fact may appear by inference as well as by direct allegation in pleading.

5. Pleading ⇨72—Prayer of complaint may be resorted to in determining amount plaintiff seeks to recover.

Prayer of a complaint may be resorted to to determine the amount which plaintiff seeks to recover.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by the United Bank & Trust Company against the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Everts, Ewing, Wild & Everts and L. W. Young, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, and Sherwood Green, of Berkeley, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. This appeal is taken from a judgment entered against appellant after an order made sustaining a demurrer to appellant's complaint without leave to amend.

The facts herein considered are taken from the complaint, it being the only record by which the question of the sufficiency of the facts as stating a cause of action may be judged. The plaintiff and appellant herein asserts the right to maintain this action and appeal by reason of successive assignments of claim of agister's lien, which, it is claimed, originally accrued to the owners of the real property, to wit, San Joaquin Agricultural Corporation, on account of cattle which were pastured upon the lands of the latter corporation, and which claim was assigned first to the Union National Bank, a corporation, and latterly to the appellant, United Bank & Trust Company, a corporation.

On April 18, 1922, there was due and owing from one Charles F. Silva to said San Joaquin Agricultural Corporation, on account of pasturage of cattle, the sum of $11,166.33. Said cattle were held and possessed on said day by said corporation under an agister's claim of lien. Upon the application of the Mercantile Trust Company of California, the holders of a mortgage and deed of trust upon said real property upon which said cattle were and had theretofore been pastured—pending a foreclosure proceeding theretofore commenced by said Mercantile Trust Company of California against said San Joaquin Agricultural Corporation—the superior court appointed one Walter P. Coombs receiver in said foreclosure proceeding and he duly qualified and filed a bond for the faithful performance of his duties as receiver, which bond was made and executed by respondent Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, a corporation. Said undertaking provided that said Coombs would obey all orders of court made in said matter of receivership. Said Coombs, as such receiver, thereafter took possession of said real property, and, under order of court, took possession of all cattle upon which said San Joaquin Agricultural Corporation had its lien for pasturage. On or about July 17, 1922, upon the petition of the Union National Bank, a corporation, the assignor of appellant, said superior court, by its written order duly made and served upon said receiver, instructed him to refuse permission to said Charles F. Silva, or any of his agents or other persons, to remove from said real property cattle belonging to said Silva, upon which said San Joaquin Agricultural Corporation had a lien for pasturage, until the sum of $11,166.33, as for the pasturage of said cattle, had been paid and the lien thereby released. It is alleged that thereafter and without permission of the court or of appellant or any of its assignors, the said receiver, Walter P. Coombs, permitted said Charles F. Silva to withdraw from the possession of said receiver said cattle, contrary to the order of the court theretofore made, to the loss and damage of appellant in the sum of $11,166.33. The insolvency of Charles F. Silva, who is not made a party, is alleged on information and belief.

A number of objections were made to the sufficiency of the complaint in the court below, one or more of which must have been deemed by the trial court as well placed. The most important of said objections was aimed at the failure of the complaint to allege that an order of court was made in the original proceeding in which the receiver was appointed, authorizing the action to be prosecuted for the benefit of appellant's assignor. Section 982, Political Code, provides:

> "All bonds or undertakings given by trustees, receivers, assignees, or officers of a court in an action or proceeding for the faithful discharge of their duties, where it is not otherwise provided, must be in the name of and payable to the state of California; and upon the order of the court where such action or proceeding is pending, may be prosecuted for the benefit of any and all persons interested therein."

[1] The obligee named in the bond in the instant case is the state of California. The language of the statute is clear and explicit. It must be taken as true, by reason of the failure of the pleader to allege compliance with the statutory provision, that he did not conform to its requirements. Because of appellant's failure to allege compliance with said statute, respondents take the position that the trial court was warranted in refusing to entertain the cause. There is much force in respondents' position, but we think it is not necessary to pass upon this question nor upon the kindred question of whether or not the instant case presents facts which constitute an exception to the rule of equitable remedies to the effect that in cases where a suit is brought against a receiver in his official capacity, as is the fact in the instant case, leave should be obtained by the court by which he was appointed in the absence of statutes authorizing suits without such leave. 5 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (3d Ed.) p. 329; High on Receivers (4th Ed.) p. 293.

[2] The action was brought upon the theory that the receiver was liable upon his bond as such officer because he permitted Silva, the owner of said cattle, to remove them from said premises belonging to the San Joaquin Agricultural Corporation pending a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage upon and sell said premises, contrary to the instruction of the court that said receiver refuse permission to said Silva to remove said cattle from said real property until he paid to said receiver the amount of said pasturage indebtedness, to-wit, $11,166.33. The receiver was appointed at the instance of the judgment creditor to protect its rights in all property appurtenant to the mortgaged real property, and no claim or pretense is made that ambulatory personal property which chanced to be upon the premises was included in the foreclosure action. The complaint contains no allegation which tends to show that the trial court had any power to make an order affecting the ownership or rights in or to personal property which was in no sense related to the subject-matter of the action in which the receiver was appointed. The lien which existed in favor of appellant's assignor as an agister of said cattle was not extinguished by the appointment of said receiver in the foreclosure proceeding, and the right to enforce said lien was not affected thereby. The lien claimant made no effort to enforce its lien either before or since the cattle were taken by Silva, nor did it attempt by any possessory action to repossess them. If Silva, the owner, came into possession of said cattle by fraud or by mistake, the lien claimant could have recovered and held them as against him.

The complaint does not state a cause of action against the receiver and his bond, for the reason that it does not appear from the face thereof that the receiver was officially chargeable with any duty with respect to the lien claimed by appellant as the assignee of the San Joaquin Agricultural Corporation. The receiver, as such, could not be charged by order of court, or otherwise, as a keeper of personal property not included within the issues of the action in which he was appointed, nor in any manner related thereto. Neither was an action brought in replevin or in claim and delivery against Coombs, who acted without authority of law and was therefore a trespasser, nor a petition presented to the superior court for leave to maintain any sort of action.

[3-5] A number of other points are made by respondents in substantiation of their claim of insufficiency of the complaint, one of which is that the action is upon a liability created by statute and is barred by the provisions of section 338, subd. 1, Code of Civil Procedure, citing County of Sonoma v. Hall, 132 Cal. 589, 62 P. 257, 312, 65 P. 12, 459; Norton v. Title Guaranty, etc., Co., 176 Cal. 212, 168 P. 16; Hellwig v. Title Guaranty, etc., Co., 39 Cal. App. 422, 179 P. 222. Such being the law, the specific question before us is whether it appears from the face of the complaint that the action is barred by the three-year period. It is alleged by the complaint that on April 18, 1922, the receiver was appointed and qualified and filed his bond; that on July 17, 1922, the court made its order instructing said receiver to refuse delivery of said cattle to said Silva until he paid said sum of $11,166.33, etc.; that thereafter, and without permission of plaintiff, said receiver permitted said Silva to withdraw said cattle from said premises, etc. Upon the face of the complaint no specific allegation is made as to the time said receiver permitted Silva to gain possession of the cattle. The prayer of the complaint, however, indicates that the act or omission complained of occurred on April 18, 1922, the day the receiver qualified, as it prays for interest on the amount of damages claimed dating from April 18, 1922. We think it would not be indulging in a strict construction against the pleader to hold that the natural and only reasonable inference that may be drawn from the pleading is that the act complained of occurred April 18, 1922, and is therefore barred by the statute. A fact may appear by inference as well as by direct allegation. The prayer of a complaint may be resorted to under certain circumstances, one of which is to determine the amount which the plaintiff seeks to recover. The amount prayed for is estimated, on the injury complained of, as having been sustained on April 18, 1922. The complaint was filed October 20, 1925. The only reference made by the complaint as to the date of the alleged wrongful act of the receiver is found in the prayer, which fixes it as of April 18, 1922. This being so, the action would be barred by section 338, subd. 1, Code of Civil Procedure.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HICKMAN. (Cr. 3116.) ★

Supreme Court of California. July 5, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 2, 1928.

1. Jury 🔑21(1)—Trial under law relating to plea of not guilty by reason of insanity held not in violation of constitutional provision guaranteeing jury trial (Pen. Code, § 1016, et seq.; Const. art. 1, § 7).

Requiring defendant to plead and go to trial under form of procedure prescribed by Pen. Code, § 1016 et seq., authorizing, in addition to other pleas, the plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, held not in violation of Const. art. 1, § 7, guaranteeing right of trial by jury, since jury trial is accorded on only issue tendered relative to sanity at time of commission of crime and such plea may be joined with plea of not guilty if desired.

2. Jury 🔑10—Constitutional right of jury trial is only for opportunity therefor in cases in which it is exercised according to common law (Const. art. 1, § 7).

Right guaranteed by Const. art. 1, § 7, providing that right of trial by jury shall be secured to all persons and shall remain inviolate, is only that citizens of the states shall have an opportunity to be tried by a jury in cases in which it is exercised in administration of justice according to common law.

3. Jury 🔑31(1)—Making reasonable regulations as to right of trial by jury is not denial or impairment of such right (Const. art. 1, § 7).

Making of reasonable regulation as to mode of enjoyment of right to trial by jury is not denial or impairment of right to jury trial as guaranteed by Const. art. 1, § 7.

4. Criminal law 🔑737(1)—Essence of jury trial is that controverted facts shall be decided by jury.

The essence of trial by jury is that controverted facts shall be decided, since unless facts are controverted there is no issue for submission.

5. Criminal law 🔑311—Person charged with crime is presumed sane until contrary is established.

A person charged with crime is presumed to be sane until the contrary is established by preponderance of the evidence.

6. Criminal law 🔑331—Requiring defendant to prove insanity does not shift burden of proof, but only burden of introducing evidence.

Requiring defendant, where insanity is interposed, to prove it by preponderance of the evidence, held not to shift burden of proof from people to defendant, but only to shift burden of introducing evidence and declaring amount or quantum of evidence which he must produce to overcome presumption of sanity.

7. Constitutional law 🔑250, 257—Criminal law 🔑286—Law providing for plea of not guilty by reason of insanity held not in violation of "due process" and equal protection clause of federal Constitution (Const. U. S. Amend. 14; Pen. Code, § 1016 et seq.)

Pen. Code, § 1016 et seq., relating to pleas which may be entered on indictment or information and providing for plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, held not in violation of due process and equal protection clause and Const. U. S. Amend. 14; there being nothing in such amendment to prevent a state from adopting a reasonable regulation or procedure in regulation of jury trials, the term "due process" as used therein referring to law of land which derives its authority from inherent and reserved powers of states.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Due Process of Law.]

★Rehearing denied.

8. Constitutional law ⟹251—Any legal proceeding enforced by public authority, which regards and preserves principles of liberty and justice, constitutes "due process of law."

Power to legislate must not be exercised in arbitrary or despotic manner, by any legal proceeding enforced by public authority, whether sanctioned by age and custom or newly devised in discretion of legislative power in furtherance of general public good, which regards and preserves principles of liberty and justice, must be held to be due process of law.

9. Constitutional law ⟹250, 257—State may make different procedure for trials of even same class of offenses (Const. U. S. Amend. 14).

A state may make different procedure for trials in even the same class of offenses; Const. U. S. Amend. 14, merely requiring that all persons subjected to such legislation shall be tried alike under like circumstances and conditions both in privileges conferred and in liabilities imposed.

10. Judges ⟹51(1)—Presiding judge properly ordered trial to proceed before another judge, after trial judge consented to retire on objection on ground of bias and prejudice (Const. art. 6, § 7; Code Civ. Proc. § 170).

Where trial judge, after objection on ground of bias and prejudice against defendant, consented to retire from case, presiding judge having authority under Const. art. 6, § 7, to distribute business of court among judges and prescribe order of business, properly ordered that trial proceed before another judge of superior court within district in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 170.

11. Jury ⟹138(2)—Allowing prosecution to exercise peremptory challenge after defendant had exhausted challenges held merely irregularity.

Trial court's allowance of right of prosecution to exercise a peremptory challenge, after defendant had exhausted all of peremptory challenges allowed by law, held, under circumstances, merely an irregularity not affecting any substantial right of defendant nor to require reversal.

12. Jury ⟹138(3)—Refusal to grant peremptory challenge to defendant, after allowing state to exercise such challenge after defendant had exhausted challenges, held not error.

Refusal to allow defendant, having used all of peremptory challenges, to exercise a peremptory challenge after first permitting state to do so after defendant had exhausted all such challenges, held not error, in absence of showing of prejudice by reason of such action.

13. Criminal law ⟹286—Instruction, after plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, that only issue was determination of defendant's insanity, held proper (Pen. Code, § 1016 et seq.).

In prosecution for kidnapping and murder, wherein defendant interposed a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity in accordance with provision of Pen. Code, § 1016 et seq., instruction that sole issue for jury to determine was whether defendant was sane or insane at time of alleged commission of acts charged in indictment held proper.

14. Criminal law ⟹977(1)—Trial court, after plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, had jurisdiction to determine degree of murder and fix penalty (Pen. Code, §§ 190, 1157).

Under Pen. Code, § 190, trial court, after plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, had right to determine degree of murder committed by defendant and fix penalty therefor; section 1157 having no application.

15. Criminal law ⟹645—Defendant interposing plea of not guilty by reason of insanity was not by reason thereof entitled to open and close argument (Pen. Code, § 1016 et seq., and §§ 1093, 1369).

Defendant, after plea of not guilty by reason of insanity in accordance with provision of Pen. Code, § 1016 et seq., was not entitled by reason of such plea to open and close argument to jury on ground that burden of establishing insanity rested on defendant, since under section 1093, jury having been impaneled and sworn, trial must proceed in order therein prescribed, unless otherwise directed by court; section 1367 relating only to procedure to be followed in inquiry into insanity of defendant before trial or after conviction.

16. Criminal law ⟹977(1)—Judgments of conviction and sentence, after plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, held not void because reciting defendant duly pleaded guilty (Pen. Code, § 1016).

Judgments of conviction and sentence for kidnapping and murder, after plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, held not void because reciting that defendant duly pleaded guilty of crime charged, though technically not in strict accordance with procedure followed, since, though defendant did not actually in separate and distinct plea plead guilty as provided by Pen. Code, § 1016, result of action of plea of not guilty by reason of insanity was an admission that he committed offenses charged.

17. Criminal law ⟹741(1), 742(1)—Credibility of witnesses and weight of evidence is for jury.

Jurors have responsibility of determining credibility of various witnesses and weight to be given to the evidence.

18. Criminal law ⟹1160—Finding of court and jury as to defendant's sanity held conclusive when supported by evidence.

Finding of court and jury on question of defendant's sanity at time of commission of alleged offense held conclusive when supported by evidence.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., W. F. Cleary, and John W. Maltman, Deputy Attys. Gen., Asa Keyes, Dist. Atty., and Tracy Chatfield Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

WASTE, C. J. The defendant was charged with having kidnapped and murdered Marion Parker, a twelve year old Los Angeles school girl. He confessed to the commission of the offenses charged, and, the only defense in the case being that he committed the acts while insane, he entered a plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity" to both counts of the indictment. When the cause came on for trial, the prosecution rested its case upon the reading of the indictment and the pleas of the defendant thereto. The defendant and the prosecution thereupon introduced evidence bearing on the subject, and there was submitted to the jury the sole question whether the defendant was sane or insane at the time the offenses were committed. The jury returned its verdicts, finding the defendant was sane. Motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment were denied, and the court found and determined the crime of murder committed by the defendant to be "murder of the first degree without extenuating circumstances." Defendant was thereupon sentenced to be imprisoned in the state's prison for the term prescribed by law for the crime of kidnapping, and sentenced to pay the extreme penalty for the murder committed. He appeals from the judgments and from the orders denying the motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment.

[1] The important question presented by the appeal, and the one to be first considered, is raised by the contention of the defendant that, when he was forced to plead and to go to trial under the form of procedure now prescribed by the Penal Code of this state (sections 1016 et seq.), relating to the kinds of pleas which may be entered to an indictment or information, and the procedure to be followed after the plea, he was deprived of his constitutional right to a trial by jury. He contends that by entering the plea on which he elected to stand, he denied his guilt as effectively as if he had entered a plea of "not guilty," and was therefore entitled to the trial guaranteed by the state Constitution upon all the issues involved in the case, as well as upon the issue of his sanity. That, he contends, he was denied.

Appellant fails to grasp the full import of the present statute. Prior to 1927, there were four kinds of pleas open to a defendant, to wit: A plea of (1) guilty; (2) not guilty; (3) a former judgment of conviction or acquittal; and (4) once in jeopardy. Pen. Code, 1016. The Legislature, in 1927, added another, viz., "(5) not guilty by reason of insanity," and further amended the Code section by providing that—

> "A defendant who does not plead guilty may enter one or more of the other pleas. A defendant who does not plead not guilty by reason of insanity shall be conclusively presumed to have been sane at the time of the commission of the offense charged, provided that the court may for good cause shown allow a change of plea at any time before the commencement of the trial. A defendant who pleads not guilty by reason of insanity, without also pleading not guilty, thereby admits the commission of the offense charged."

Section 1017 of the Code was amended to provide that if the defendant plead "not guilty by reason of insanity," such plea shall be entered upon the minutes of the trial court substantially in the following form:

> "The defendant pleads that he is not guilty of the offense charged because he was insane at the time that he is alleged to have committed the unlawful act."

At the same time, there was added a new section (section 1026) to the Penal Code, in part reading as follows:

> "When a defendant pleads not guilty by reason of insanity, and also joins with it another plea or pleas, he shall first be tried as if he had entered such other plea or pleas only, and in such trial he shall be conclusively presumed to have been sane at the time the offense is alleged to have been committed. If the jury shall find the defendant guilty, or if the defendant pleads only not guilty by reason of insanity, then the question whether the defendant was sane or insane at the time the offense was committed shall be promptly tried, either before the same jury or before a new jury, in the discretion of the court. In such trial the jury shall return a verdict either that the defendant was sane at the time the offense was committed or that he was insane at the time the offense was committed. If the verdict or finding be that the defendant was sane at the time the offense was committed, the court shall sentence the defendant as provided by law."

Then follow provisions, not now material to this discussion, as to the procedure to be followed if the verdict or finding of the jury be that the defendant was insane at the time the offense was committed. Stats. 1927, pp. 1148–1150.

[2-4] While the Constitution of the state of California provides that the right of trial by jury shall be secured to all persons and shall remain inviolate (Const. art. 1, § 7), the only right which it guarantees is that the citizens of the state shall have an opportunity to be tried by a jury, in cases in which it is exercised in the administration of justice according to the common law, as that law is understood in the several states of the Union. People v. King, 28 Cal. 265, 271; People v. Powell, 87 Cal. 348, 356, 25 P. 481, 11 L. R. A. 75. It does not purport to direct what procedure is to be followed in the exercise of the right. The authorities in this and in other jurisdictions bear out the proposition that the making of a reasonable regulation of the mode of enjoyment of the right of trial by jury is not a denial or an impairment of that right. Conneau v. Geis, 73 Cal. 176, 178, 14 P. 580, 2 Am. St. Rep. 785; Frank v. Mangum, 237 U. S. 309, 339, 340, 35 S. Ct. 582, 59 L. Ed. 969. The essence of trial by jury is that controverted facts shall be decided by a jury. Unless the facts are controverted, there is no issue to submit to a jury. It has never been doubted in this state that, while a defendant charged with crime amounting to a felony cannot expressly waive a trial by jury, he may enter a plea of guilty to the indictment or information, instead of having a jury trial, even though charged with a crime which carries the death penalty upon conviction. The statute has always provided for such a plea. People v. Delany, 49 Cal. 394. Yet a confession of the offense by the party charged, by a plea of guilty, is the highest kind of conviction which the case admits, and submits him to precisely the same punishment as if he were tried and found guilty by a jury. State v. Almy, 67 N. H. 274, 28 A. 372, 22 L. R. A. 744. See, also, West v. Gammon, 39 C. C. A. 271, 98 F. 426. It was held, very early in our history, that there was no provision of the state Constitution, or of any statute, which prevented a defendant charged with murder from pleading guilty instead of having a trial by jury, and that if he elects to plead guilty to the indictment, the provision of the statute for determining the degree of guilt, for the purpose of fixing the punishment, does not deprive him of any right of trial by jury. People v. Noll, 20 Cal. 164; People v. Lennox, 67 Cal. 113, 7 P. 260, and People v. Chew Lan Ong, 141 Cal. 550, 75 P. 186, 99 Am. St. Rep. 88, are to the same effect. By a parity of reasoning, we are of the view that a statute which, in addition to the usual pleas, merely permits a defendant in a criminal case, if he is so advised, to plead guilty, in effect, by failing to deny the commission of the offense charged, but which preserves to him the right to submit to a jury the issue that he should not be punished because he was insane at the time he committed the act, in no way deprives him of his constitutional right to a jury trial.

[5, 6] The present statute was passed by the Legislature on the recommendation of the commission for the reform of criminal procedure, created by the Legislature in 1925 to make a study of the methods of criminal procedure, and to recommend such new system, or such amendments to the then existing system, as would in its opinion tend to provide for this state the most efficient system for the swift and certain administration of criminal justice. The purpose of the statute is to overcome some of the abuses which have crept into the administration of justice by reason of the frequent interposition of the defense of insanity in criminal prosecutions. Its provisions are plain, and we deem it unnecessary to enter into a critical analysis or restatement of its various features to show that every essential right of one charged with crime by indictment or information has been safeguarded, and that a defendant, by availing himself of its various provisions, and entering the proper plea or pleas, may interpose and submit to the consideration of the jury every issue and every defense that has heretofore been open to him. Under proper pleas he may still submit all the evidence he could submit before the effective date of the amended statute. It has always been the law in this jurisdiction, for instance, that upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed amounts only to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justified or excused. Crim. Prac. Act 1850; Stats. 1850, p. 232, par. 37; Pen. Code, § 1105. A person charged with crime is presumed to be sane until the contrary is established by a preponderance of evidence. People v. Williams, 184 Cal. 590, 593, 194 P. 1019.) The rule requiring the defendant, where insanity is interposed as a defense, to prove it by a preponderance of the evidence, does not affect the other rule that the burden of proving sanity is on the prosecution. That burden has always been on it and is met in the first instance by the presumption of sanity which the law raises and which must prevail until it is overcome. The rule relating to the defense of insanity does not shift the burden of proof from the people to the defendant, but only shifts the burden of introducing evidence and declares the amount or quantum of evidence which he must produce to overcome the presumption and show his insanity. People v. Harris, 169 Cal. 53, 68, 145 P. 520. The present statute does not take away the defense of insanity, and the procedure followed in no way changed or affected the rule respecting the burden which rested on the prosecution and on the defense in this case.

We are firmly convinced that no right of the defendant guaranteed by the state Constitution was injuriously or at all affected by his being compelled to proceed to trial under the sections of the Code as recently amended. The statute gives, and he was accorded, a jury trial on the sole issue he desired to tender—in fact, the only issue, under the evidence including his confession, which he could tender to the counts of the indictment. In concluding this phase of the discussion, it may be said that the appellant thoroughly understood that in electing to stand upon the one plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity" he admitted the commission of the offenses charged against him. He was at the time of the arraignment, and at all times, represented by able counsel. Before permitting the pleas to be entered, the trial court assured itself that the defendant himself was well aware of the nature and effect of his voluntary action.

[7, 8] Appellant further contends that the law under which he was tried violates the provisions of section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States (the "due process" and "equal protection" clause), relating to the powers of the several states. No federal question is here involved. A state has full control over the procedure in its courts, both in civil and criminal cases, subject only to the qualification that such procedure must not work a denial of fundamental rights or conflict with specific and applicable provisions of the federal Constitution. It is not tied down by any provision of the federal Constitution to the practice and procedure which existed at common law. Subject to the limitations noted, it may avail itself of the wisdom gathered by experience to make such changes as may be necessary. Brown v. New Jersey, 175 U. S. 172, 175, 20 S. Ct. 77, 44 L. Ed. 119. There is nothing in the Fourteenth Amendment to prevent a state from adopting a reasonable regulation of procedure in relation to jury trials. Frank v. Mangum, supra. As used therein, the term "due process" refers to the law of the land which derives its authority from the inherent and reserved powers of the states, exercised within the limitations of those fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions, the greatest security of which resides in the right of the people to make their own laws and alter them at pleasure. It does not follow that merely because something has been the actual law of the land from time out of mind, it is therefore "due process." Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 529, 4 S. Ct. 111, 28 L. Ed. 232. The common law is only one of the forms of law and is no more sacred than any other. As a rule of conduct, it may be changed at the will of the Legislature, unless prevented by constitutional limitations. The great office of statutes is to remedy defects in the common law as they are developed, and to adapt it to the changes of time and circumstances. Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 134, 24 L. Ed. 77. The power to legislate must not be exercised in an arbitrary or despotic manner, but any legal proceeding enforced by public authority, whether sanctioned by age and custom, or newly devised in the discretion of the legislative power in the furtherance of the general public good, which regards and preserves the principles of liberty and justice, must be held to be due process of law. Hurtado v. California, supra, page 537 (4 S. Ct. 121, 122). Accordingly, it has been held that a statutory provision of a state, such as that already referred to, conferring power on the court, under a plea of "guilty," to determine the degree of crime in an indictment for murder, is constitutional and valid and violates no provision of the United States Constitution. Hallinger v. Davis, 146 U. S. 314, 13 S. Ct. 105, 36 L. Ed. 986.

[9] The fact that the new law and procedure of the state of California may appear to mark a departure from the law and procedure relating to the same subject in other states has no place in this consideration. The "equal protection" provision of the federal Constitution does not secure to all persons in the United States the benefit of the same laws and the same remedies. Great diversities in these respects may exist in states separated only by imaginary lines. On one side of the line there may be a right to trial by jury, and on the other side, under like circumstances, there may be no such right. Missouri v. Lewis, 101 U. S. 22, 31, 25 L. Ed. 989. A state may make different procedure for trials of even the same class of offenses. The Fourteenth Amendment merely requires that all persons subjected to such legislation shall be treated alike, under like circumstances and conditions, both in the privileges conferred and in the liabilities imposed. Hayes v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 68, 7 S. Ct. 350, 30 L. Ed. 578; Brown v. New Jersey, supra, page 177 (20 S. Ct. 79).

Measured by these standards, we are satisfied that the statute under which the appellant was tried and convicted violates no provision of the federal Constitution.

[10] Another contention of the appellant is that the trial below was conducted by a judge of the superior court who had no jurisdiction in the premises. The contention is without merit. The superior court of Los Angeles county is composed of 38 regular and a number of extra sessions departments. It is therefore required by the Constitution to have a presiding judge who, subject to the regulations of the judicial council, "shall distribute the business of the court among the judges, and prescribe the order of business." Const. art. 6, § 7. When this cause came on for trial, objection was made to proceeding before the judge who had taken and entered the pleas, upon the ground that he was biased and prejudiced against the defendant. The judge filed a denial of bias or prejudice, but, upon the ground that he desired to avoid arresting the trial by a protracted hearing with reference to his qualifications, and in order that the cause might be heard and determined with the least possible delay, consented to retire from the case. The presiding judge thereupon made and caused to be entered an order that the trial proceed before another judge of the superior court, then sitting in the Los Angeles court under assignment by the chairman of the judicial council. The procedure followed was in strict accord with the terms of the constitutional provision, supra, and with section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[11, 12] It is next contended that the trial court erred in permitting the prosecution to exercise a peremptory challenge to a juror after the defendant had exhausted all of his peremptory challenges, and after challenge had been waived by him, and the prosecution was satisfied. It is also contended that further error was committed when the court refused to allow the defendant to exercise a peremptory challenge after permitting the state to do so, but after he had exhausted the number of peremptory challenges allowed by law. It does not appear that the prosecution was actually satisfied when 12 jurors had been passed before being sworn, or that it actually waived the right to exercise its peremptory challenges, even though the defendant might have been satisfied. The jurors had not been sworn, and the trial court was of the opinion—and the record supports its view—that the prosecution had not finally announced its satisfaction with the jurors, but had temporarily passed the challenge. Its allowance of the right of the prosecution to exercise a peremptory challenge under the circumstances was, therefore, at most but an irregularity not affecting, so far as we can ascertain from the record, any substantial right of the defendant. People v. Majors, 65 Cal. 138, 148, 3 P. 597, 52 Am. Rep. 295. As to the second contention, the defendant, having used all of his peremptory challenges, had no legal right to any more challenges of that nature. Further than asking to have the record show that it was not satisfied with the jury, the defense disclosed no reason to the trial court why it demanded the right to exercise a peremptory challenge after exhausting the statutory number, and has not made any showing here from which we can say that the defendant was prejudiced, or that the action of the court actually affected any of his substantial rights. The defense was not excluded nor prevented in any way from examining or reexamining, if that were deemed necessary, any or all of the jurors as to their qualifications, or from challenging the jurors for cause, if any existed. The record discloses that the defendant was tried by a fair and impartial jury, and the contention now made appears to be based on a technical ground, rather than on substance.

[13] Complaint is made of the giving and refusing of certain instructions. After the jury was sworn to try the cause, the trial court instructed the jurors that the sole issue for them to determine was the issue of whether the defendant was sane or insane at the time of the alleged commission of the acts charged in the indictment, and that further instructions would be given them later, after the testimony had been submitted, as to what is meant by the term "insanity" and as to the burden of proof in reference thereto. Under the present statute, the instruction was properly given. At the conclusion of the evidence, the defense submitted certain instructions which it requested the court to include in its final charge. They were refused. We have carefully considered the specifications of error (VI to XII, inclusive) dealing with that subject, and are convinced that the action of the court was proper. Certain of the rejected instructions relating to the insanity, or state of mind, of the defendant were sufficiently covered by the charge of the court to render their being given unnecessary. Other instructions as to what the defendant did or did not admit, in entering the plea "not guilty by reason of insanity," were contrary to the express provisions of the Code sections (Pen. Code, § 1016 et seq., supra). Others, applicable if a plea of "not guilty" had also been joined, were not pertinent to the issue submitted to the jury. In view of what we have said concerning the other contentions raised by appellant, we are of opinion that the trial court properly and sufficiently instructed the jury on the issue of insanity tendered by the defendant's plea.

[14] The contention that the trial court had no right to determine the degree of the murder committed by the defendant, or fix the penalty therefor, is without merit. Section 1157 of the Penal Code, which provides that whenever a crime is distinguishable into degrees the jury, if it convict the defendant, must find the degree of the crime of which he is guilty, has no application to the present situation. Section 190 of the same Code alone applies.

[15] We find no error or abuse of discretion in the action of the trial court in refusing the request of counsel for the defense that it should be permitted to open and close the argument to the jury because the burden of establishing the insanity of the defendant rested upon him. The Penal Code provides (section 1093) that, a jury having been impaneled and sworn, the trial must proceed in the order therein prescribed, unless otherwise directed by the court. One of the provisions of the section is that, unless the case is submitted to the jury on either side, or on both sides, without argument, the district attorney, or other counsel for the people, and counsel for the defendant, may argue the case; the district attorney, or other counsel for the people, opening the argument and having the right to close. Section 1369 of the Penal Code, which might imply a different view, relates only to the procedure to be followed in an inquiry into the insanity of a defendant, before trial or after conviction, and has no reference to the actual trial of the issues tendered by the plea or pleas entered by the accused.

[16] Lastly, it is contended that the two judgments of conviction and sentence are void for the reason that each recites that the defendant "duly pleaded guilty" of the crime charged in the respective counts of the indictment. While, technically, the recitals are not in strict accord with the procedure followed, since the defendant did not actually enter the separate and distinct plea "guilty" as provided by the statute (Pen. Code, § 1016), the result of his action was an admission that he committed the offenses charged. In legal effect, therefore, the recitals state what actually took place. In any event, the objection goes to a mere irregularity which in no sense affects the substantial rights of the defendant. Each judgment refers to the crime with which the defendant was charged, and the appropriate count of the indictment under which he was arraigned, and convicted by his own plea and the verdict of the jury as to his sanity. The penalty or sentence in each judgment is clearly and concisely stated. The judgments are therefore not void, and the situation is not one calling for a reversal.

[17, 18] No good purpose will be served by stating the substance of the evidence interposed by the defense, and met by the prosecution, on the question of the sanity of the defendant at the time he committed the offenses charged. A number of witnesses testified, and much expert testimony was given on both sides of the question. The defendant did not offer himself as a witness, but the law which required his presence in court during his trial submitted him to the observation and scrutiny of the court and jury. People v. Cornell (Cal. Sup.) 134, 263 P. 216. The jurors, with whom rested the responsibility of determining the credibility of the various witnesses who testified in the case, and the weight to be given to the evidence, found that the defendant was sane at the time he committed the acts. The finding of the jury was approved by the trial court when he denied the motion for a new trial. The finding of court and jury is conclusive upon the subject and upon this court, for there is ample evidence to support it.

By agreement of counsel, subject to objections on constitutional grounds reserved by the defendant, the testimony received and taken on the trial of the issue of insanity was considered with other evidence for the purpose of ascertaining and determining the degree of the murder committed by the defendant. It sustains to the fullest extent the finding of the trial court that the crime was murder of the first degree without extenuating circumstances.

The judgments of the trial court, and its orders denying the motion for a new trial and the motion in arrest of judgment are, and each is, affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FERELLO. (Cr. 1437.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 22, 1928.

1. Infants 🔑20—Evidence of mother's instructions to daughter to sell liquor sustained conviction for contributing to minor's delinquency (Juvenile Court Law, § 21).

Evidence that defendant was bootlegger, and that she instructed 15 year old daughter to take care of customers in mother's absence, held sufficient to sustain conviction of mother for contributing to minor's delinquency, under Juvenile Court Law, § 21 (St. 1915, p. 1246).

2. Infants 🔑20—Witnesses 🔑378—Matters relating to motives of witness are exclusively for jury, and jury's determination as to testimony is conclusive on appeal, unless testimony is inherently improbable.

Matters relating to the motives of a witness are determined exclusively by the jury, and jury's determination will not be disturbed on appeal, unless testimony of witness is inherently improbable or impossible of belief.

3. Infants 🔑20—In prosecution for contributing to daughter's delinquency by requiring her to sell liquor, state was not required to prove daughter knew sale was wrongful and violated law, where daughter was put in danger of "immoral life" (Juvenile Court Law, § 1, subds. 11, 13, and § 21; Wright Act).

In prosecution under Juvenile Court Law, § 21 (St. 1915, p. 1246), for contributing to minor's delinquency by inducing and requiring daughter to sell liquor to defendant's customers in defendant's absence, state was not required to prove that the girl knew that the sale of liquor was wrongful, or that she actually violated the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), where evidence was sufficient to sustain conviction on ground that defendant had persuaded and compelled her daughter to commit an act putting her in danger of leading an immoral life within meaning of Juvenile Court Law, § 1, subds. 11, 13 (St. 1915, p. 1225).

4. Infants 🔑20—Testimony that defendant, accused of contributing to daughter's delinquency by inducing her to sell liquor, was bootlegging held admissible (Juvenile Court Law, § 1, subds. 11, 13, and § 21).

In prosecution under Juvenile Court Law, §§ 1, 21 (St. 1915, pp. 1225, 1246), for contributing to daughter's delinquency by inducing her to sell liquor, admission of testimony that the defendant was bootlegging held not error, though involving different offense, since prosecution could show general surroundings in which liquor was sold for the purpose of determining whether the girl was in danger of becoming a delinquent, under section 1, subds. 11, 13.

5. Criminal law 🔑693—Where no objection was made to question or to testimony showing reasons for answer, defendant could not complain answer was inadmissible.

Where answer of which defendant complained was given in response to a question to which no objection was made, and witness was thereafter permitted without objection to relate facts on which answer was based, defendant could not on appeal complain that the witness' answer was inadmissible.

6. Criminal law ⚷1170(2)—Sustaining objection to question held not prejudicial, where fact sought to be established was subsequently shown.

Ruling of trial court in sustaining objection held not prejudicial, where fact sought to be established was shown by question and answer immediately following the question objected to.

7. Witnesses ⚷269(2)—Cross-examination as to witness' knowledge whether defendant induced daughter to sell liquor held improper, where witness merely testified daughter had delivered bottle.

In prosecution for contributing to minor's delinquency, under Juvenile Court Law, § 21 (St. 1915, p. 1246), cross-examination of witness as to whether she knew about defendant's having induced daughter to sell liquor held improper, where witness merely testified on direct examination as to having seen the daughter deliver the bottle to a man, and there was no claim that the witness had any knowledge of the mother's influence over the daughter.

8. Criminal law ⚷1170(2)—Exclusion of testimony relative to witness' desire for revenge held not prejudicial, where witness' motives were fully developed.

Exclusion of evidence concerning daughter's motives of revenge in prosecution of mother under Juvenile Court Law, § 21 (St. 1915, p. 1246), for contributing to daughter's delinquency, held not prejudicial, where matter of the motives of the girl who testified as witness was fully developed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Delphina Ferello was convicted of contributing to the delinquency of a minor, and she appeals. Affirmed.

Harris & Sullivan, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel B. Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KNIGHT, J. Defendant was charged by information containing two counts with having contributed to the delinquency of her minor daughter, Nellie Ferello, in violation of section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law (St. 1915, p. 1246); the specific accusations against her being that on or about June 11, 1927, she persuaded, induced, and compelled her daughter, who was 15 years of age, to serve and sell intoxicating liquor to various persons, and that on or about June 1, 1927, she served, sold, and gave wine to her daughter, which caused and manifestly tended to cause and encourage the girl to become delinquent. Upon trial the jury found defendant guilty on the first count and acquitted her on the second, and from the judgment of conviction she has appealed, urging as grounds for reversal insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict and that the court erred in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence and in giving to the jury certain instructions.

[1, 2] The evidence, briefly stated, was as follows: Some time prior to the commission of the offenses charged in the information appellant's husband died, and following his death appellant continued to occupy the family home with her son and daughter. She kept considerable liquor on the premises mostly wine, and while testifying as a witness in her own behalf admitted that prior to her husband's death she had been "bootlegging" and as a consequence thereof had been arrested two or three times, but claimed that since her husband's death she had been obeying the law. On June 11, 1927, she went to town, leaving her daughter in the house alone, and during her absence several men called at the house and the girl served them with wine from her mother's stock, and collected the money therefor. Appellant testified that the actions of the girl in selling the wine were unauthorized by her; but the girl testified to the contrary, claiming that her mother upon leaving that morning instructed her "to clean up the house and take care of the customers," and that, accordingly, when the men called to purchase liquor, she served them with wine, and accepted the money therefor, which she turned over to her mother upon the latter's return home. The girl further testified that during the first two weeks in June, which was subsequent to her father's death, her mother served and sold both wine and whisky to various persons calling at the house; and in this connection the evidence further shows that on one occasion appellant's daughter and a girl friend were present while two men were there drinking, and that the men requested appellant to pour a drink for each of the girls, which appellant did, but that the girls declined to drink. Testimony was also given by a third girl to the effect that between June 1 and 11 she had seen appellant and her daughter serve men with liquor at their home.

The foregoing testimony is legally sufficient in our opinion to sustain the verdict of the jury finding appellant guilty on the first count. True it was shown on the part of appellant that, when the girl first made the disclosures against her mother as to liquor violations, the girl was an inmate of the detention home, having been placed there at the instance of her mother on account of the girl's conduct with a young man with whom her mother had forbidden her to associate, and it may be reasonably inferred from such circumstances that the girl first made the accusations against her mother in a spirit of revenge; but as has been repeatedly held, matters relating to the motives of a witness are to be dealt with and determined exclusively by the jury, and on appeal, unless it be shown that the testimony of the witness is inherently improbable or impossible of belief, the jury's determination will not be disturbed. People v. Fleming, 166 Cal. 357, 136 P. 291, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 881; People v. Tom Woo, 181 Cal. 315, 184 P. 389. In the present case, by finding appellant guilty, the jury evidently accepted the girl's testimony as being true, despite her motives, and there is nothing in the record upon which we can fairly base the conclusion that her testimony is inherently false; consequently the facts established thereby must be taken in support of the verdict.

[3] One point stressed by appellant regarding the asserted insufficiency of the evidence is based upon an instruction given to the jury to the effect that "it is a violation of the law of this state commonly known as the Wright Act [St. 1921, p. 79] for a girl of 15 years, if she knows it to be wrongful, to sell wine as a beverage" (italics ours), and that therefore, if the jury found that as a result of appellant's persuasion and inducement the girl sold the wine as charged, "knowing it to be wrongful at the time," appellant should be found guilty on the first count. Appellant contends that there is no proof whatever of such knowledge on the part of the girl.

In order to establish appellant's guilt under the charge involving the girl's alleged violation of the Wright Act, we do not agree, as the foregoing instruction implies, that it was essential for the prosecution to prove the element embodied in those portions of the instruction above italicized and quoted; but even though it were, the question of whether or not the Wright Act has been violated is not material to a determination of this appeal for the following reasons: One of the main purposes sought to be accomplished by the Juvenile Court Law is to prevent children from becoming delinquent as a result of inducement, persuasion, encouragement, or compulsion exercised on the part of others seeking to impose upon their immature minds; and to this end section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law was enacted, denouncing as a crime the commission of any act or omission to perform any duty on the part of another which shall cause or tend to cause or encourage a juvenile "to come within the provisions of any subdivisions 1 to 13, inclusive, of section 1" [St. 1915, p. 1225] of said law; and subdivisions 11 and 13 of said section respectively provide that a juvenile shall be deemed subject to the provisions of said act "who is leading, or from any cause is in danger of leading an idle, dissolute, lewd or immoral life," or "who violates any law of this state or any ordinance of any town, city, county, or city and county of this state defining crime." Count 1 of the information upon which appellant was convicted was drawn in such form as to cover each of the foregoing subdivisions, the two elements of the charge being that appellant's act in persuading and compelling her daughter to sell wine caused and manifestly tended to cause the girl to lead, and that she was in danger of leading, an immoral life, and that in thus persuading and compelling her daughter to sell wine appellant caused the former to violate the Wright Act.

The instruction in question, as will be observed from its terms, pertains exclusively to the element of the charge involving the alleged violation of the Wright Act; but, as indicated, that phase of the case need not be inquired into on this appeal, because, irrespective of whether or not the girl did commit a violation of said act, the evidence is legally sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury finding appellant guilty on the other element involved in the charge, to wit, that appellant had persuaded and compelled her daughter to commit an act which in itself may not have amounted to the commission of a crime, but which had caused her to lead, and that by reason thereof she was in danger of leading, an immoral life, and, clearly, under this latter charge it is immaterial, so far as the question of appellant's guilt is concerned, whether or not the evidence is sufficient to show that the girl knew that the act she was committing was wrongful.

[4] The first assignment of error relating to the trial court's rulings on the admissibility of evidence is based upon certain preliminary questions asked of Nellie Ferello on direct examination, which were as follows:

> "Q. (by Mr. St. Sure, deputy district attorney): What did she (appellant) do for a living?
> "Mr. Maurice (counsel for appellant): I object to that as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.
> "The Court: What particular time are you asking about?
> "Mr. St. Sure: At the time between the 1st of June and the 15th of June of this year.
> "Mr. Maurice: Objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and has no bearing on the case.
> "The Court: Objection overruled.
> "Mr. St. Sure: Q. What did your mother do at that particular time and place? A. She was bootlegging.
> "Q. During the time particularly referred to, the first two weeks in June of this year, and while living at the address you have given of your mother and brother, did you ever see your mother selling or giving away intoxicating liquors to persons who came to the house? A. Yes.
> "Q. On more than one occasion? A. Yes."

Appellant contends that the admission of the answer, "She was bootlegging," was in effect allowing the prosecution to prove an offense for which appellant was not on trial, and was therefore in violation of the rules adhered to in the cases of People v. Dial, 28 Cal. App. 704, 153 P. 970, and People v. Morales, 45 Cal. App. 553, 188 P. 58.

The cases cited are not in point, however, for the charges there were that the defendants themselves unlawfully sold alcoholic liquors on specified dates, in certain designated territory, to particular persons, and testimony was admitted to show that they had disposed of the liquor at times, in places, and to persons other than as charged in the information; consequently the admission of such testimony was held to be error. Here appellant was not charged with having illegally sold liquor, but with having contributed to the delinquency of her daughter, on or about the 11th day of June, by inducing and compelling her "to sell and serve to various persons whose names are * * * unknown certain intoxicating liquors, * * *" which tended to cause the girl to become a delinquent within the meaning of the Juvenile Court Law. It was therefore permissible, we think, for the prosecution to show the general surroundings under which the liquor was sold for the purpose of allowing the jury to determine whether under such circumstances the girl was in danger of becoming a delinquent within the meaning of the Juvenile Court Law.

[5] Furthermore the record shows that the particular question to which appellant objected was not answered, and that the answer, "She was bootlegging," of which she now complains, was given in response to a question to which appellant did not object at all, and that, following the giving of said answer, appellant, without objection, allowed the witness to continue on and relate the facts upon which the answer was based. It would appear, therefore, that appellant is not in a position now for the first time to complain of the effect of the answer given.

[6] Appellant next assigns as error the ruling of the court sustaining an objection to the following question propounded to Nellie Ferello on cross-examination: "These three men who came there, she (appellant) knew nothing about that?" The evident purpose of the question was to show that appellant, being absent at the time, knew nothing about the sale of the liquor on the day in question; but since the record shows that this fact was established by the question and answer immediately following the question objected to, we think appellant was not harmed by the ruling.

[7] A witness for the prosecution named Lillian Aikens was asked the following question on cross-examination: "You do not know about the mother of Nellie inducing or allowing her to sell any liquor, do you?"—and an objection thereto by the district attorney was sustained. The ruling was proper for the reason that on direct examination the witness had testified only as to having seen Nellie Ferello deliver a bottle to a man, and there was no claim made by the witness or by the prosecution that the witness had any knowledge of any influence being exercised over the girl by her mother.

[8] For the purpose of showing that her daughter was actuated by a feeling of revenge in making the accusations against her, appellant sought to prove the circumstances under which her daughter was sent to the detention home, and during the course of the examination of various witnesses on this subject a number of objections made by the prosecution were sustained. It appears, however, from an inspection of the entire evidence, that before the testimony on this subject was finished the matter of the motives of the girl was fully developed, and therefore it would seem that none of the rulings complained of could have operated to appellant's prejudice.

Appellant also complains of an instruction embodying the substance of subdivision 3 of section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which prescribes one of the rules to be used by the jury in weighing the testimony of witnesses, it being claimed that the word "falsely" was omitted from the instruction and that thereby the meaning of the instruction was destroyed. The original record before us shows, however, that the word was not omitted. It is our conclusion that the record discloses no error justifying a reversal.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

CHADWICK v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY. ★

(Civ. 6049.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 21, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Aug. 20, 1928.

1. Mandamus ⚷48, 52—Lower court will not be required to amend findings, conclusions, and judgment when motion for same relief was properly denied on showing made.

Appellate court will not by mandamus compel superior court to amend findings, conclusions, and judgment where, on the showing made, it was justified in refusing such relief on motion.

2. Judgment ⚷324—Motion to amend findings, conclusions, and judgment on ground of clerical error held properly denied on showing made.

Motion to amend findings, conclusions, and judgment in condemnation suit for clerical error as to value of property was properly denied, where evidence consisted only of affidavit asserting that such error was made and judgment roll showing judgment consistent with findings.

★Superseded by opinion of Supreme Court, 270 P. 192.

Application by Elizabeth K. Chadwick for a peremptory writ of mandamus directed to the Superior Court in and for the County of Los Angeles, directing it to amend its findings of fact, conclusions of law, and interlocutory judgment in a certain condemnation suit. Writ denied.

J. Allan Frankel, Sidney A. Wilson, and A. V. Kaufman, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Herman Mohr and E. H. Delorey, Deputy City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. This proceeding is one seeking the issuance of a peremptory writ of mandamus directing that the above-entitled superior court amend the findings of fact, conclusions of law, and interlocutory judgment entered in a certain condemnation suit. The action in question was entitled City of Los Angeles v. George T. Gower et al. Elizabeth K. Chadwick was one of the defendants. Upon the oral presentation of the matter before this court, the averments contained in the affidavit of J. Allan Frankel were stipulated to be true. This affidavit states that the referees in their report filed in said action awarded Elizabeth K. Chadwick $1,190 for the value of land taken and $1,746 for the value of the improvements; that at the hearing before the superior court upon the referee's report the court approved "the said award of $2,936 to the defendant Elizabeth K. Chadwick as set forth on pages 25 and 26 of the referee's report," etc. It further appears from said affidavit that in the formal findings the value of the property of the petitioner and the improvements thereon was placed at $1,190, instead of $2,936, as set forth in the referee's report; that this seems to have been due to an error in computation "on the part of the clerk or stenographer who transcribed such findings of fact and conclusions of law; and that the judgment of this court, based upon such referee's report, was actually for the sum of $2,936."

Thereafter the defendant in the condemnation action, Elizabeth K. Chadwick, moved the respondent court to amend the findings of fact, conclusions of law, and interlocutory judgment in the same particulars as those whose correction is sought in this proceeding. The motion was denied.

It is the theory of petitioner that a clerical mistake only was made, and that where this is the case a party aggrieved has a right to have the judgment erroneously made so corrected as to conform to the judgment actually ordered. It may be conceded that if, upon the hearing of petitioner's motion to amend, facts had clearly appeared, as contended by her in this proceeding, the relief prayed for then and now would not only have been justified, but have been hers as a matter of right. Boust v. Superior Court, 162 Cal. 343, 122 P. 956.

Respondent, in resisting the petition, contends that there was no evidence before the superior court to show that a clerical error or any error had been committed, or to indicate that the difference between the referee's report and the findings and interlocutory judgment in the particulars in question did not result from a deliberate judicial determination, as declared in such findings and judgment. To this the principal reply of the petitioner is that the stipulation as to correctness of the facts set forth in the affidavit of J. Allan Frankel precludes the respondent from disputing such facts and, therefore, of advancing the argument just stated; but it has been shown above that the affidavit merely shows that there appears to have been a clerical error.

[1, 2] The outcome of this proceeding does not hinge upon a determination of what the facts were as to whether or not an error was actually committed, as contended by petitioner, and, if so, whether its nature was clerical or judicial. The deciding factor here is found in the facts before the trial court upon the hearing of the motion for amendment and correction of the findings, conclusions of law and interlocutory judgment. The proceeding in this court cannot be converted into a hearing de novo upon the application just mentioned. A reviewing court will not compel an inferior tribunal to do that which the latter upon the hearing before it was justified in refusing to do. To do so would violate every principle bearing upon the determination of justice involved in the proceeding in question. It would be unfair to the trial court and inequitable to respondent, and it would ignore all rules requiring diligence in the presentation of his case by one who would secure remedial relief through a court's decree. The affidavit in question does not represent that any proof was produced upon the hearing of the motion of Elizabeth K. Chadwick before the superior court except the affidavit of petitioner's attorney and the judgment roll. The gist of that affidavit was to assert that a clerical error had been made and that the judgment of the court was for $2,936, but the judgment roll showed that the judgment was for only $1,190, and that the findings of fact, actually signed by the court, were consistent with the rendition of that judgment and none other. The judge who presided upon the hearing of the referee's report was not made a witness; the stenographer and the clerk were not sworn nor questioned. The proceeding involved the determination of a question of fact, and, as we have said, in so far as the record before us shows, nothing was presented to the trial court except the judgment roll and the affidavit above mentioned. Without some further proof it is doubtful if an order amending the judgment would have been justified. It is certain that an order denying the application cannot be disturbed. The showing certainly warranted the conclusion that if any error had been committed it was judicial and not clerical. Under such circumstances, the only remedy of the aggrieved party is by appeal, and no summary proceeding can be maintained. The authorities to this effect are numerous. Two of those in which the subject is given full consideration are McKannay v. McKannay, 68 Cal. App. 709, 230 P. 218, and County of Los Angeles v. Rindge Co., 69 Cal. App. 72, 230 P. 468.

The writ is denied.

CONTINENTAL INS. CO. et al. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES. (Civ. 4893.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2. California. June 16, 1928.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑1021, 1022—Provision of city charter that action for money or damages should not be brought against city until demand therefor had been rejected held valid.

Provision of charter of Los Angeles providing that no suit shall be brought upon any claim for money or damages against city until demand for it has been presented and rejected in whole or in part held reasonable and valid.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑1021, 1022—Action held not maintainable against city for negligent maintenance of electric wires without presentation of claim to board of public service commissioners (Los Angeles Charter, § 222, as amended by St. 1903, p. 568).

Action cannot be maintained against city of Los Angeles for loss due to negligent construction and maintenance of electric wires until demand has been presented to board of public service commissioners and rejected by them, presentation of demand to city council being insufficient under Los Angeles Charter (St. 1889, p. 510) § 222, as amended by St. 1903, p. 568, art. 18, § 192, as amended by St. 1911, p. 2135, art. 18, § 209, as amended by St. 1903, p. 567, art. 21, §§ 216, 222g, as amended by St. 1911, p. 2152, in view of Los Angeles Charter, §§ 208–216, art. 18, § 192, as amended by St. 1903, p. 563, and § 213¾ added by St. 1907, p. 1167.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑1021, 1022—Charter provision providing for presentation of claim as prerequisite to action against city includes claims not based on contract (Los Angeles Charter, § 217, as amended by St. 1911, p. 2152).

Los Angeles Charter (St. 1889, p. 510) § 217, as amended by St. 1911, p. 2152, relative to presentation of claim as prerequisite to action against city for money or damages, includes other claims than those based on contract, in view of use of word "expenditures" rather than "indebtedness."

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Action by the Continental Insurance Company and others against the City of Los Angeles to recover money on a policy of insurance to cover loss by fire alleged to have been caused by negligent construction and maintenance of electric wires. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

John Everson, of Glendale, for appellants.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., W. B. Mathews, Sp. Counsel, and James G. Leovy, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

VALENTINE, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal upon the judgment roll from a judgment of the superior court rendered upon plaintiffs' refusal to amend their third amended complaint in an action to recover the amount of insurance paid by them for a loss by fire alleged to have been caused by the negligent construction and maintenance of electric wires in the city of Los Angeles.

A general demurrer to the third amended complaint was sustained on the ground that plaintiffs' claim should have been presented to the board of public service commissioners of the city of Los Angeles before suit was begun, and upon the ground that suit should have been brought against the said board. Appellants contend that under the provisions of the charter of the city of Los Angeles the board of public service commissioners is a special agency, only, of the city. Respondent contends that the board has complete authority over the city's electric system and is made solely responsible for the management of the same, and that the department of public service, under the provisions of the charter, a municipal organization of independent functions; that it is a legal entity and is to be conducted as a distinct and separate business enterprise of the city, under the management and control of the board of public service commissioners; and that suit must be brought against it and not against the city.

[1] Under the view we entertain it is unnecessary for us to determine whether the city may be sued for the acts or omissions of the board, for the reason that the other point raised by respondent on this appeal is that under the provisions of the charter no suit may be brought for money or damages on account of a wrongful act or omission in the department of public service unless and until a demand therefor has been made on the board of public service commissioners, and has been rejected in whole or in part as provided in the charter, and that such a demand is a prerequisite to the bringing of such a suit against either the city or such board.

> "A presentation of a demand as a condition precedent to the beginning of an action against a municipal corporation, and a special provision limiting the time thereafter in which such action may be brought, are measures which, without doubt, the Legislature may ordain. Thus the provision of the Los Angeles charter, which, in slightly varying form, is common to most charters, is a reasonable and valid provision as a condition precedent. That charter provides (section 222): 'No suit shall be brought upon any claim for money or damages against the city of Los Angeles * * * until a demand for the same has been presented as herein provided and rejected in whole or in part.' Bank v. Los Angeles, 151 Cal. 655, 91 P. 795." Geimann v. Board of Police Commissioners, 158 Cal. 748, 112 P. 553.

It seems well settled, and for sound reasons, and is not denied by appellants, that the presentation of a demand in the manner prescribed by law is a necessary prerequisite to the beginning of such actions as the present one, and it follows that if the complaint failed to allege that this was done it failed to state a cause of action and the demurrer was properly sustained on this ground alone. The complaint contains an allegation that the demand in this case was presented to the city council and by them rejected before this action was begun. This squarely presents the question of whether the presentation of the demand to the city council was a compliance with the law and the provisions of the charter, as contended by appellants, or whether the demand under those provisions should have been presented to the board of public service commissioners, as contended by respondent.

The department of public service under the management and control of the board of public service commissioners was created by an amendment to article 18 of the Charter in 1911. Stats. 1911, p. 2135. A careful examination of the Charter of 1889 and the subsequent amendments discloses a consistent evolution or development of the ideas and intentions of the people and the Legislature as to this question of preliminary demand before suit brought. It is to be regretted that limitations of space prevent more than brief quotations from the provisions, for some of them, apparently unrelated to the subject of claim and demand, are collaterally significant as to the development of the general plan.

Section 222 of article 21 of the 1889 charter (Laws of 1889, p. 510) provides as follows:

> "No suit shall be brought upon any claim for money or damages against the city of Los Angeles, its board of education, or the board of directors of the Los Angeles public library, until a demand for the same has been presented as herein provided, and rejected in whole or in part. If rejected in part, suit may be brought to recover the whole. Nor shall suit be brought against said city upon any such claim or demand, if the same shall be in whole approved and audited as provided herein; provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to deprive the holder of any demand of his right to resort to a writ of mandate, or other proceeding, against the said council or any board or officer of said city, to compel it or him to act upon such claim or demand, or to pay the same when so audited."

The provision, "until a demand for the same has been presented as herein provided," relates to preceding section of article 21. Section 208 provides:

> "All claims and demands whatever against the city of Los Angeles, except interest coupons on bonds and bonds of the funded debt, shall be paid only on demands as herein provided for."

Section 209 provides:

> "Said demands except demands payable out of the school fund and library funds shall be presented to the council," etc.

The balance of section 209 and sections 210 and 211 relate to approval by the mayor, and procedural matters. But section 212 provides:

> "All demands payable out of the school fund must, before they can be approved by the city auditor or paid, be previously approved by the board of education."

And section 213 provides:

> "All demands payable out of the library fund must, before they can be approved by the city auditor or paid must be previously approved by the board of directors of the Los Angeles public library."

The balance of sections 212 and 213 and sections 214 and 215 relate to details of procedure. Section 216 provides, among other things:

> "No payment can be made from the city treasury, or out of the public funds of said city, unless the same be specially authorized by law or this charter, nor unless the demand which is paid be duly audited as in this chapter provided."

The term "audited as used in this charter with reference to demands upon the treasury, is to be understood to mean that said demands have been presented to, passed upon and approved by every officer and board of officers as required by this charter." At the December, 1902, election, various amendments to the charter were adopted by the voters and approved by the Legislature in January, 1903. Article 18 of the charter had provided for the rights and duties of the city as to "water and water rights," and section 192 prescribed certain rights and powers of the corporation (the city) as to construction, maintenance and operation of waterworks, etc., but section 192 of article 18 as amended in 1903 (Stats. 1903, p. 563) created the water board, in the following language:

> "Section 192. There is hereby created, for the purpose of managing and controlling all wa> ters and water rights that are now, or may be hereafter, owned by the city of Los Angeles, a department of said city to be known as the 'water department,' which shall be under the management and control of a board of water commissioners."

The section then prescribes the details of the organization of the board and its powers, among them to sue and be sued, and providing for the conveyance to the board "as special trustee for the city" all real and personal property belonging to the city and providing for the creation of the water revenue fund, from which moneys shall only be withdrawn "upon demands authenticated by the signatures of the president and secretary of the board, or in the absence of the president, by the signatures of two members and the secretary."

Section 209 of the charter is amended to read as follows (Laws of 1903, p. 567): "Said demands, except demands payable out of the school fund, the library fund, or water revenue fund, shall be presented to the" city "council," and adds a new section to the charter to be known as section 213½ as follows: "All demands payable out of the water revenue fund must be presented to the board of water commissioners, and, before they can be approved by the city auditor or paid, must be previously approved by the board of water commissioners," and prescribes the procedure and, further, "provided, that in case that the city auditor shall reject any such demand, or if, in his opinion, said demand should be paid only in part, he shall return the same to the board of water commissioners, instead of to the council"—and if such demand be again considered and approved by the board the objections of the auditor shall be thereby overruled.

Section 222 is also amended (Laws of 1903, p. 568), and the changes are significant as showing the consistent development of the plan and intention as new boards were created to impose upon them the original duty of approving or rejecting demands, and reads as follows:

> "No suit shall be brought on any claim for money or damages against the city of Los Angeles, its board of education, board of directors of the Los Angeles public library, or the board of water commissioners, until a demand for the same has been presented as herein provided, and rejected in whole or in part. If rejected in part, suit may be brought to recover the whole. Nor shall suit be brought against said city, or said board of education, board of directors of the Los Angeles public library, or board of water commissioners, upon any claim or demand that has been in whole approved and audited as provided herein; provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to deprive the holder of any demand of his right to resort to a writ of mandamus or other proceeding against the city council, or any board or officer of said city, to compel it or him to act upon such claim or demand, or to pay the same when so audited."

In 1907 the charter was again amended by adding another new section to be known as section 213¾ (Stats. 1907, p. 1167), providing that certain demands must be presented to the board of public works and providing as in the case of the water board, under section 213½, that if the city auditor rejects the demand, he shall return the same to the board of public works "instead of to the city council." And section 209 was amended (Stats. 1907, p. 1166) by adding another class of demands (i. e., those payable out of funds derived from bonds of the city and referred to in the new section 213¾ above), which shall not be presented to the council in the first instance, but to the board of public works. And sections 214 and 222 were amended so as to be consistent with the above new provisions.

In 1911 article 21 was amended so as to include certain sections not previously included. The sections relating to claims and demands were included in sections 216 and 222g, inclusive (Stats. 1911, p. 2152). We find that section 217 is the same as section 208 in the original charter, and provides as follows:

> "Every claim and demand against the city of Los Angeles, except as provided in the preceding section, shall be first presented to and approved by the board, commission or officer authorized by this charter to incur the expenditure or liability represented thereby; if such approval be made by a board or commission the same shall be evidenced by a vote of two-thirds of the members thereof, taken with the ayes and noes and spread upon the minutes, and the action of such board or commission, and the date thereof, must be endorsed on such demand, and signed in writing by the president or by two members thereof, and the secretary or clerk thereof; and if such approval be made by an officer he, or his chief deputy, shall endorse the same by his signature in writing. In all cases the date of such approval shall be given."

Section 218 provides, among other things, that at the end of each month the "board, commission or officer having the management or control of any department or office" shall cause a pay roll of employees to be made out, which pay roll shall be certified "as herein provided in the case of demands against the city."

Section 219 provides for approval by the city auditor of all demands approved by any board or commission, but only "provided, that such approval by the city auditor shall be valid only for such amount as shall have been approved by the board [or] commission." There is a change in the procedure here from that provided in the new section 213½ added in 1903 referred to above, where the city auditor was directed to return the claim to the board if he rejected it in whole or in part. By section 219 (Stats. 1911, p. 2153) the auditor is directed to transmit the claim to the finance committee of the council, and section 220 provides the procedure by the finance committee. This would seem to be a change in the manner of "checking" rather than indicating any change in policy or principle. Sections 221 and 222 regulate procedure and are not material to the question of demand. The next material section is section 222g. This is the original 222 as amended in 1903 and 1907, but the change in the amendment of 1911 (sec. 222g) is significant in view of the creation of the new boards and commissions since the adoption of the charter in 1889. This section 222g was again amended in 1921 and as it was in force as so amended when the instant case was begun by the filing of the complaint, November 22, 1923, the section as so amended is here quoted in full (Stats. 1921, p. 1817):

> "Sec. 222g. No suit shall be brought on any claim for money or damages against the city of Los Angeles, its board of education, board of directors of the Los Angeles public library, board of public works, or the board of public service commissioners, or any officer or board or commission of the city until a demand for the same has been presented as herein provided, and rejected in whole or in part. If rejected in part, suit may be brought to recover the whole, Except in those cases where a shorter period of time is otherwise provided by law, all claims for damages against the city must be presented within six (6) months after the occurrence from which the damages arose, and all other claims or demands shall be presented within six (6) months after the last item of the account or claim accrued. Nor shall suit be brought against said city, or any board, officer or commission thereof, upon any claim or demand that has been in whole approved and audited as provided herein; provided that nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to deprive the holder of any demand of his right to resort to writ of mandamus or other proceeding against the City Council, or any board, commission or officer of said city, to compel it or him to act upon such claim or demand, or to pay the same when so audited."

[2, 3] So that it is apparent that the general plan or scheme and intention of the framers of the charter and of the Legislature was first to provide for the presentation of a demand as a necessary prerequisite to the maintenance of a suit to the end that the city should always be given an opportunity to pay before being subjected to litigation, and second, as its business and administrative responsibility increased to create new boards and commissions with the object and to the end of relieving the council of many of its responsibilities and enabling it to function, more especially as a distinctive legislative body. After the adoption of the charter as new boards and commissions were created, and broad powers and duties and independent functions were given to them, so, consistently, was the charter amended from time to time to make its provisions harmonize with this main purpose, and in this connection to provide that before paying any demand it must first be presented to and approved by the board or commission authorized by the charter to incur the expenditure or liability represented. The entire plan and scheme of approving and auditing every demand disclosed by the provisions of the charter quoted and referred to above makes it apparent that the prerequisite presentation of a demand in accordance with the provisions of the charter requires that that demand be first presented to the board or commission without whose approval the council may not order it paid, and this without reference to whether a suit is subsequently brought against the city or against the board. Appellants in quoting the language of the charter (section 217, above) substituted the word "indebtedness" for "expenditure," and argue that the section indicates that claims based upon contract only are intended. If the word were "indebtedness" the point might merit consideration, but the word is "expenditure." The demand should first be presented to the board, so that if it approved the demand it could recommend the "expenditure." Geimann v. Board of Police Comm., supra.

In the instant case the demand should have first been presented to the board of public service commissioners before action was brought. This was not done, and no allegation that it had been done was contained in the complaint, and the demurrer was properly sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

92 Cal. App. 628

PEOPLE v. STAIGERS. (Cr. 1627.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 20, 1928.

1. Forgery 🔑26—Information alleging that defendant counterfeited written instrument and passed it as true by suing thereon charged forgery (Pen. Code, §§ 134, 470).

Information alleging that defendant made, forged, and counterfeited certain written instrument, and fraudulently uttered, published, and passed as true such instrument by filing action to enforce it, charged forgery, as defined by common law and Pen. Code, § 470, not preparation of false instrument with intent to produce it as genuine or true in legal proceeding, contrary to section 134.

2. Criminal law 🔑1159(3)—Appellate court will not determine issue, on which evidence was directly conflicting.

Where there was direct conflict of evidence in forgery trial as to whether purported employment contract, on which defendant based civil action, was executed before date alleged, appellate court will not pass on such issue.

3. Criminal law 🔑553—Judge need not believe every uncontradicted assertion of witness or affiant.

Trial judge is not compelled to accept as true every assertion of a witness or affiant, merely because it is not directly contradicted.

4. Criminal law 🔑938(1)—New trial will be granted only on strictest showing of diligence and tender of new evidence not merely cumulative or unlikely to change result.

The claim of newly discovered evidence is viewed with distrust and disfavor, and new trial therefor will be denied, in absence of strictest showing of diligence or on tender of merely cumulative evidence or evidence which would not strongly tend to produce different result.

5. Criminal law 🔑938(1), 1156(3)—Diligence to procure cumulative effect of, and likelihood of different result on, new evidence tendered, are questions for trial court, whose action will not be disturbed, unless discretion was manifestly abused.

Questions whether sufficient diligence to procure alleged newly discovered evidence was shown, and whether such evidence is merely cumulative or would not strongly tend to produce different result, are addressed to sound legal discretion of trial court, whose action in denying new trial will not be disturbed on appeal, except on showing of manifest abuse of such discretion.

6. Criminal law 🔑945(1)—Denial of new trial for new evidence of seeing contract, alleged to have been forged, before alleged date of signature, held not abuse of discretion.

Denial of new trial for newly discovered evidence that typewritten employment contract, alleged to have been forged, was seen by affiants before date on which defendant was alleged to have obtained employers' signatures to pencil written letter, for which contract was alleged to have been substituted, held not abuse of discretion, in view of defendant's testimony as to same fact, contradictory testimony of state's witnesses, and defendant's asserted loss of memory as to such affiants.

7. Forgery 🔑12(½)—Employment contract, alleged to have been forged, held not nudum pactum, though not mentioning corporation officers signing it individually and authorizing cancellation by employee at any time (Pen. Code, § 470).

Purported contract of employment at stated salary and commissions held not a nudum pactum, not subject of forgery, in violation of Pen. Code, § 470, by substitution thereof for letter, signed by corporation officers, without signing corporation name, though signers were not mentioned in body of instrument and it provided for cancellation by employee at any time on forfeiture of commissions due him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles W. Fricke, Judge.

J. D. Staigers was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. B. Ross, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The appellant was charged and convicted of the crime of forgery, thereafter moved for a new trial, which was denied, and appeals from the judgment and from the order denying such motion. The specific acts upon which appellant was charged with having committed the offense mentioned, consisted of the alleged preparation in pencil of a letter, to which he obtained the signatures of his employers on April 23, 1927, which writing he later erased, writing in lieu thereof with typewriter, upon the same paper and over said signatures, a contract of employment at a stated salary and commission, and which such contract Staigers subsequently attempted to enforce by an action in the superior court.

[1] It is first contended upon this appeal, and was urged as a ground of motion for arrest of judgment, that appellant was erroneously prosecuted for forgery under the provisions of section 470 of the Penal Code, and that the offense, if any, should have been charged under section 134 thereof. It is provided by section 470 that:

> "Every person who, with intent to defraud, signs the name of another person, * * * or falsely makes, alters, forges, or counterfeits, any * * * writing obligatory, * * * contract, * * * or counterfeits or forges the seal or handwriting of another; or utters, publishes, passes, or attempts to pass, as true and genuine, any of the above-named false, altered, forged, or counterfeited matters, as above specified and described, knowing the same to be false, altered, forged, or counterfeited, with intent to prejudice, damage, or defraud any person, * * * is guilty of forgery."

Section 134 of the Penal Code reads as follows:

> "Every person guilty of preparing any false or antedated book, paper, record, instrument in writing, or other matter or thing, with intent to produce it, or allow it to be produced for any fraudulent or deceitful purpose, as genuine or true, upon any trial, proceeding, or inquiry whatever, authorized by law, is guilty of felony."

It is to be observed at a glance that appellant was not charged with having prepared a false paper or instrument in writing with intent to produce it as genuine or true, upon any trial, proceeding or inquiry authorized by law. The information alleged that J. D. Staigers did "make, forge and counterfeit a certain instrument in writing (setting forth the contract in full) * * * well knowing that the said instrument in writing was false, altered, forged, and counterfeited, as aforesaid, and with intent then and there to defraud * * * did * * * wilfully, unlawfully, falsely, fraudulently and feloniously utter, publish, and pass as true and genuine the instrument aforesaid, by filing an action in the superior court * * * to enforce the said false and forged instrument in writing." It was not the theory or contention of the prosecution that appellant at any time intended to produce upon a trial, proceeding, or inquiry the original letter which he prepared and caused to be signed, or to make any use of it whatever. If he erased the writing to which his employers appended their signatures and in its place and stead wrote something different, or so altered the existing instrument as to give it a different effect, such act constituted forgery under section 470 of the Penal Code. People v. Brotherton, 47 Cal. 388, 401. The instrument which appellant did in fact produce and seek to enforce was therefore a counterfeit in its entirety, and fell within all three of the definitions embraced in the information; and, being "altered, forged and counterfeited," with intent to defraud, such offense, if committed, was within neither the terms nor the spirit of section 134 of the Penal Code, but it embodied all of the elements of forgery as defined both by the common law and by the statutes of this state, and was properly so designated by the information. People v. Bendit, 111 Cal. 274, 43 P. 901, 31 L. R. A. 831, 52 Am. St. Rep. 186; People v. McPherson, 6 Cal. App. 266, 91 P. 1098.

[2-6] The defendant swore, and insisted throughout the trial, that he did not write said letter, in lead pencil or otherwise, but that the contract of employment upon which he based his civil action, and which was introduced in evidence in this case, was made and executed by all parties long prior to April 23, 1927. There is a direct conflict of evidence upon this issue, and so this court will not pass upon it. The principal ground upon which appellant seeks a reversal of the judgment consists of asserted errors of the trial court in denying his motion in arrest of judgment and for a new trial, which were founded upon certain affidavits setting forth alleged newly discovered evidence. It is strongly urged that if said contract was in fact executed as asserted by appellant and was in existence for some months prior to the date of the alleged forgery thereof, he was not guilty of the offense charged in the information. It is claimed that after his conviction and while confined in the county jail awaiting sentence, appellant's counsel interviewed J. A. Marshall, a deputy labor commissioner, and then for the first time was informed by the latter that Staigers had exhibited to him the contract in question early in March, 1927; that Marshall positively identified the contract marked People's Exhibit No. 1 in this case as the document which he had seen on the date last mentioned. The deputy commissioner's affidavit to the foregoing facts, and, further, that he was not acquainted with nor interested in the defendant, was presented to the trial court upon said motions, and is a part of the record herein. L. S. Driggs also made an affidavit that he had known the defendant about three years, but had not known of the criminal action until January, 1928; that upon inspection of People's Exhibit No. 1 he identified the same, and distinctly remembered having seen it prior to April 23, 1927, and "perhaps as early as 1926"; that he "distinctly recalled that the contract was peculiar in form in that certain of the signatures subscribed thereto overlapped the typewritten portion of the contract." Affidavits of the defendant and his counsel averred that during the preparation for trial of this case one of his attorneys persistently urged him to try and remember as to whether or not some one or more persons had been shown the contract before April, 1927, but that he had entirely forgotten these incidents and did not in fact know at the time of trial that such evidence could be obtained or that it existed. While, as we have observed, the defendant positively testified that said contract was genuine, that he did not write any letter and cause it to be signed, nor erase or alter any such document, the people's witnesses Palmer, Colmeraues, and Grau just as positively testified upon the trial that appellant did write said letter with a "soft lead pencil," and that when questioned he gave various reasons for so doing. A statement in writing, signed by Staigers and the three persons last mentioned, dated April 25, 1927, also appears in the record as People's Exhibit No. 2 wherein the defendant admitted having so written said letter, and that:

> "The entire letter was written in soft lead pencil except the signature of Grau, Colmeraues and Palmer which were in ink and on the lower left hand corner of the sheet. Their signatures appeared as below. This statement is made and notorized as a guarantee against the above mentioned sheet again turning up with any written matter other than the above appearing over said signatures."

A handwriting expert testified that a minute examination of the contract before the jury disclosed beyond question that certain typewritten words had been written on top of portions of the signatures; that he found parts of small pencil markings, and evidences of erasures in various places on the exhibit. Another expert testifying for the defendant admitted that he discovered marks or specks which might have been pigments of a pencil. All that either affidavit presented on behalf of the defendant in support of his motion for a new trial tended to show was that the contract in controversy existed previously to the date of the alleged forgery by alteration. To this fact the defendant himself had testified, and hence the offered new testimony was but cumulative in this respect, and tending to contradict four witnesses produced by the prosecution. Appellant's memory and some of his testimony from the witness stand were not entirely consistent nor at all in accord with that of other witnesses which the jury apparently accepted as true, which may properly have been considered by the trial court in passing upon the motion for new trial. Among other inconsistencies, he could not remember when he wrote People's Exhibit No. 1, and although he testified as to where it was written, he admitted that in giving a deposition some time previously in the civil action he then claimed that he did not know where it was written. He swore that no one was present when he wrote it, but almost in the same breath he accounts for the discovery of the place by saying that shortly after being called to the district attorney's office in June or July, 1927, he "began to dig out all the facts"; that he visited various offices where he had called when he prepared the contract, and "by having the weight of a forgery charge hanging over my head, I went to all of my friends," and finally says he found he had written it in the offices of the California Petroleum Company; that he then took the document to a bank some three miles distant, and signed it there, when no one was present. A trial judge is not compelled to accept as true every assertion of a witness or of an affiant merely because it is not directly contradicted. It may well have been the conclusion of the trial court that appellant's asserted loss of memory as to the witnesses Marshall and Driggs until after the trial, weighed in the light of his other testimony during the trial, did not indicate the exercise of that degree of good faith or diligence which the statute requires, and also that in any event the new evidence was not such as would, when traversed by strong contradictory testimony, render a different result probable in the minds of another jury. The claim of newly discovered evidence is viewed with distrust and disfavor, and in the absence of the strictest showing of diligence, or upon the tender of merely cumulative evidence, or evidence which would not strongly tend to produce a different result, a new trial will be denied. People v. Freeman, 92 Cal. 359, 28 P. 261; People v. Gonzales, 143 Cal. 605, 77 P. 448; People v. Lapique, 136 Cal. 503, 69 P. 226. These questions are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and except upon a showing of manifest abuse of such discretion, its action will not be disturbed on appeal. People v. Weber, 149 Cal. 325, 86 P. 671; People v. Byrne, 160 Cal. 217, 116 P. 521; People v. Canfield, 173 Cal. 309, 159 P. 1046; People v. Kilfoil, 27 Cal. App. 29, 148 P. 812. We cannot say that such an abuse of discretion is shown here.

[7] Finally, it is argued that while the purported contract was apparently an agreement in writing between the Watson Perforating Company, Inc., a corporation, and J. D. Staigers, it was not signed by the corporation, but was in fact signed by Grau, Colmeraues, and Palmer, who were not mentioned in the body of the instrument; and, further, that the contract provided for cancellation by Staigers at any time upon a forfeiture of any commissions which might be due him, and that since he was at liberty to repudiate it, it had no legal binding force upon the parties. Hence, it is urged that the instrument was a mere nudum pactum, and that since such documents are not subjects of forgery, no offense could be or was committed. The contract is set forth in full in the information, and by its provisions the corporation agrees to pay Staigers $150 per month to start, said salary to be increased to $175 per month "when both parties concerned have agreed"; and it further provides for a commission of 15 per cent. upon all business done by the corporation. True, the corporate name is not signed thereto, but the three signers appear from the record before us to have been the president, secretary and treasurer, respectively, of said institution. It is dated January 20, 1926, at Torrance, Cal., and recites, in part, "This contract entered into * * * between the Watson Perforating Company, Inc., * * * and J. D. Staigers; * * * J. D. Staigers shall receive the following named salary and commission," and is signed, as we have seen, by the officers of the contracting corporation. It has been held that a letter signed by the president of a corporation, individually, without adding his title of office, will bind the corporation if the other party understood that he was dealing with the corporation. Richardson Press v. Vandergrift, 165 App. Div. 180, 150 N. Y. S. 238. Other cases to the same effect are St. Clair v. Rutledge, 115 Wis. 583, 594, 92 N. W. 234, 95 Am. St. Rep. 964; Lewis v. Pulitzer Pub. Co., 77 Mo. App. 434, and Fletcher, Ency. Corp., vol. 3, p. 2460, § 1470. It is conceded that appellant instituted suit upon this identical paper for the collection of moneys which he claimed to have earned thereunder. It was an agreement signed by the three principal officers of the corporation that the latter would compensate appellant for services rendered, and had it been intentionally so executed by the corporate officials and relied upon by all parties, little could have been added to its legal import by the signing of the name under which they were doing business as a corporation. The contract was therefore not a nudum pactum, and the evidence strongly tends to show that by the alterations heretofore mentioned appellant intended to forge an enforceable contract.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MURPHY. (Cr. 1038.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 25, 1928.

1. Robbery ⇨26—Defendant's guilt of robbery held for jury, as against contention there was not sufficient evidence to connect him with crime.

Defendant's guilt of robbery held for jury, against contention that there was not sufficient evidence to connect him with commission of offense.

2. Criminal law ⇨925(1)—Denying accused new trial held not error, where during recess juror and prosecuting witness engaged in conversation, although conduct was improper.

Denying new trial held not error, where during recess one of jurors took seat in courtroom in space reserved for spectators and prosecuting witness seated himself beside juror and engaged in earnest conversation for period of four or five minutes, although such conduct was improper.

3. Criminal law ⇨925(1)—Denial of new trial on ground of jurors' misconduct in telephoning to inform relatives they were delayed held not error.

Court properly denied motion for new trial, for assault with intent to commit robbery, based on ground of misconduct of jurors in using telephone, where explanation by people was that officer in charge permitted jurors to telephone their relatives that they were delayed.

4. Criminal law ⇨829(1)—Refusing instructions covered by instructions given held not error.

Refusing instructions containing statements of law which were included in instructions given held not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Joseph Murphy was convicted of assault with intent to commit robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. R. McHenry and Frank C. Hale, both of Merced, and Howe, Hibbitt & Johnston and O. F. Meldon, all of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of assault with intent to commit robbery, and his motion for a new trial was denied. This appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

[1] Appellant contends that there is not sufficient evidence to connect him with the commission of the offense. The prosecuting witness positively identified the defendant as one of the men who attacked and attempted to rob him. His testimony was corroborated as to the commission of the offense but not as to the identity of the persons who committed it. The defendant testified that he was not at the scene of the crime at the time of its commission. This testimony is corroborated to some extent by that of other witnesses. Clearly, the determination of this conflict in the testimony was a question for the jury and the trial court.

[2] It is urged that some of the jurors were guilty of prejudicial misconduct. At a recess during the trial one of the jurors "took a seat in the courtroom in the space reserved for spectators. * * * Thereupon the prosecuting witness * * * seated himself beside the said juror and engaged in earnest conversation for a period of at least four or five minutes." It does not appear what the subject of the conversation was, and the people offered no explanation of the alleged misconduct. Relative to a similar state of facts it was said:

> "It was a grave impropriety, exposing the juror to suspicion and reflecting upon the administration of the law. It is not going too far to say that his conduct called for explanation. But this was a matter resting in the discretion of the trial court, and, since it does not appear that the conversation related to the case on trial, we cannot hold that there was abuse of discretion." People v. Phelan, 123 Cal. 551, 567, 56 P. 424, 430.

[3] After the case had been submitted to the jury, three jurors were permitted, by the officer having them in custody, to use the telephone. Respondent does not contend that this was not misconduct. The officer in charge of the jury made affidavit that he permitted such jurors "to use the telephone and tell their folks that they would not be home; that at the time said jurors used said telephone affiant was present in the office of the county clerk where said telephone is situated, and the rest of the jurors were also present in said room, or in the doorway of said room which adjoins the hallway; that affiant heard said jurors telephone and in no instance did they refer in any manner whatsoever to the above-entitled case, but were apparently informing relatives that they were delayed and could not return to dinner, or else were seeking some one to come for them later in the evening." The three jurors in question made similar statements in their affidavits, and, in addition thereto, two of them stated that there was no response to their telephone calls, and the third one stated that her conversation was with her 13 year old daughter and related solely to the inability of the juror to go home at that time, and to the feeding of the juror's chickens. The foregoing explanation by the people of the conduct of the jurors was sufficient to warrant the court in denying the motion for a new trial based on the ground of such misconduct. People v. Cord, 157 Cal. 562, 571, 108 P. 511; People v. Page (Cal. App.) 260 P. 591.

LOPES v. BRUNS et al. (Civ. 6297.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 22, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑193(9)—Objection to sufficiency of cross-complaint to state cause of action is of little force, where raised for first time on appeal.

Objection that cross-complaint does not plead facts sufficient to constitute cause of action is of little force, where raised for first time on appeal; parties having gone to trial of issues on assumption that they were properly raised in pleading.

2. Divorce 🔑156—Interlocutory decree in divorce action, providing for division of property became contract between parties.

Interlocutory decree of divorce, providing for division of property, became contract between parties in divorce action.

3. Divorce 🔑254—Husband's deed, executed after interlocutory divorce decree dividing property, from which decree no appeal was taken, held ineffectual to convey interest awarded wife.

Deed of husband, executed ten days after entry of interlocutory decree of divorce providing for division of property, from which decree no appeal was taken, held ineffectual to convey any title in interest awarded to wife under such decree, since decree was final judgment, subject to attack only by appeal or other method authorized by statute, in so far as it determined rights of parties to community property.

4. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑299(11)—Evidence held to support finding that transfer to plaintiff from half-brother was for purpose of defrauding latter's wife and rendering property not subject to execution.

In action to quiet title, evidence held sufficient to support finding that transfer to plaintiff by his half-brother was for purpose of defrauding latter's wife and of placing property where it would not be subject to execution, where plaintiff was familiar with marital troubles of grantor and purported consideration for transfer was much less than value of property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by Manuel S. Lopes against Hatti E. Bruns and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. H. Christian and Ernest S. Leslie, both of Oakland, for appellant.

Rodolph Hatfield and Silverstein, Collier & Silverstein, all of Oakland, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to quiet title to real property situated in Alameda county. Defendant Bruns filed an answer and cross-complaint, charging that defendant Frank Lopes conveyed the property to plaintiff for the purpose of defrauding defendant Bruns, who was a creditor of the two defendants, Frank and Marie Lopes. The last-named defendant filed an answer alleging that she was granted an interlocutory decree of divorce from her codefendant, Frank Lopes, prior to this transfer to plaintiff, and that by the terms of this decree she was awarded an undivided two-thirds interest in the property in suit, and that the husband was awarded an undivided one-third interest therein. Trial was had before the court sitting without a jury, and resulted in findings and a decree awarding plaintiff an undivided one-third of the real property in suit, awarding defendant Marie Lopes an undivided two-thirds thereof, and adjudging that the respective interests of both of these parties were subject to a judgment lien of the defendant Bruns in the sum of $976.15. From this judgment the plaintiff has appealed on a typewritten transcript.

[1] The appellant advances three grounds for a reversal of the judgment which we will consider in order. It is argued that the cross-complaint of respondent Bruns does not plead facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. It does not appear that the point was raised in the trial court. No demurrer to the cross-complaint was interposed, and we are not directed to any portion of the typewritten record showing that any objection to the pleading was made during the course of the trial. If it is true (and nothing is said to the contrary) that the parties went to trial of the issues on the assumption that they were properly raised in the pleadings, the objection is of little force when raised for the first time on appeal. Etienne v. Kendal (Cal. Sup.) 259 P. 752.

[2, 3] It is argued that no title vested in respondent Marie Lopes by virtue of the interlocutory decree of divorce. It is of no importance whether title vested or not. The interlocutory decree became a contract between the parties in the divorce action. London Guarantee & Accident Co., Ltd., v. Industrial Accident Commission, 181 Cal. 460, 466, 184 P. 864; Gould v. Superior Court, 47 Cal. App. 197, 200, 191 P. 56. It was the final determination of the rights of the parties as to the property involved, subject only to the entry of the final decree of divorce. Newell v. Superior Court of Los Angeles County, 27 Cal. App. 343, 344, 149 P. 998. In so far as the decree determined the respective rights of the parties to the community property, it was a final judgment subject to attack only by appeal or other method authorized by statute. Suttman v. Superior Court, 174 Cal. 243, 244, 162 P. 1032.

As this decree was not attacked, but was followed at the end of the year with a final decree of divorce containing the same provisions as to the award of property rights, the interlocutory decree became the final adjudication of these property rights, and the interest of the wife would date back to the time of the entry of the interlocutory decree. Thus, whether we treat the interlocutory decree as creating the statutory lien of an ordinary judgment, or as a temporary restraining order preventing the husband from alienating the property pending the entry of the final decree, or as a contract between the parties, the effect is the same as applied to the facts of this case. Abbott v. Superior Court, 69 Cal. App. 660, 666, 667, 232 P. 154. The deed of the husband to the appellant was executed just ten days after the entry of the interlocutory decree of divorce, and was ineffectual to convey any title to the interest in the property which had been awarded to the wife.

[4] It is argued that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the transfer to appellant was made for the purpose of defrauding the respondent Marie Lopes and of placing the property where it would not be subject to execution. As with the other points raised, the appellant has failed to comply with the terms of section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, which require the printing of such portions of the record and evidence as are under attack. We have, however, examined enough of the record to satisfy us that there has been no miscarriage of justice in the judgment rendered. The appellant is a half-brother of the defendant Frank Lopes; the appellant was familiar with the marital troubles of this defendant and his wife, and appeared in court as a witness in the divorce proceedings; the purported consideration for the transfer was the sum of $800, of which sum $400 was in liquidation of an antecedent debt; the value of the property at the time of the trial was $3,500, but, as the appellant testified, the property had depreciated in value since he took the deed; the conveyance was prepared by counsel for the husband in the divorce proceedings. The transaction was conceived in fraud, and, when the trial court quieted the title of appellant to the one-third interest owned by the husband, it gave him all that he could ask from a court in equity.

Judgment affirmed.

LORD v. SMITH et al. (Civ. 5163.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 26, 1928.

Sales ⚷479(11)—Conditional seller's repossessing of register on notice from purchasers of buyer's business to remove it held not election preventing recovery of price.

Action of conditional seller of cash register in taking possession thereof on notice by purchasers of buyer's business to remove it held not to constitute election of remedies, depriving seller of right to sue on contract for purchase price.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action by W. R. Lord against Charles Smith, Jr., and E. Ranard, doing business under the fictitious name and style of the Windsor Square Grocery. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ben S. Beery, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Brown & Mahon, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. This action was commenced for the recovery of $330 alleged to be due from the defendants to plaintiff (assignee of Remington Cash Register Company) under a contract of conditional sale of a Remington cash register. The original price was $375, $45 was paid, and the balance was payable at the rate of $20 per month. The contract provided that, in case of default "the purchase price of said register, less any actual payments thereon, shall at once become due and payable. * * *" The contract further provided that the Remington Cash Register Company, or its agent, may, if it so elect, "take possession of and remove said register without legal process and retain as rental for the use of said register while in the possession of the undersigned all payments theretofore made." Said contract also provided that "the register shall remain your property until the price, or any judgment for the same is paid in full."

It appears from the record that the cash register in question was delivered to the defendants, who were doing business under the firm name and style of Windsor Square Grocery Company, and that thereafter, upon a sale of the business of the Windsor Square Grocery Company from the defendants to other parties, the Remington Cash Register Company was notified to remove the machine by the purchasers of the business, and they were also notified that, if they did not remove the cash register from the premises, the same would be placed in the alley. Thereupon the Remington Cash Register Company took possession of the cash register, and this action was brought in the name of W. R. Lord, to whom the Remington Cash Register Company had sold and assigned its interest in and to the contract and the payments due thereunder.

Said contract provided that, in case suit should be brought for the collection of the purchase price or the amount due thereon, the defendants would pay a reasonable attorney's fee to be fixed by the court. The only thing that the Remington Cash Register Company could do on such notification that the cash register would be moved into the alley was either to come and take possession of the same to protect it, or to sue on the contract for the money to be paid thereunder and abandon any security that they might obtain by reason of holding possession of the cash register. This latter method they did not have to adopt. The taking under such circumstances is not a rescission of the sale, and cannot act as a bar to the recovery of the purchase price.

As to the objection of appellants to the introduction of the letters in evidence that passed between the Remington Cash Register Company, Inc., and the successors in interest of the defendants herein in the business which they had been conducting, it appears from the entire record that such letters were merely the notification of the Cash Register Company to the successor in the business as to their position and the grounds of taking possession, and were in response to the notification of such successors in interest to remove the cash register, which letter was also properly admissible in evidence to show the necessity for the protection of the cash register.

The findings of the court are sufficient to support the judgment, and there is in the record sufficient evidence to support the findings of the trial court.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

CONREY, P. J. I concur in the judgment. Appellants' principal contention is that the Remington Company, by resuming possession of the cash register, elected to terminate the contract, and thereby lost its right to maintain an action on the contract, to recover the unpaid balance of the purchase price. Even in the event of a completed sale of personal property, where a vendee, to whom title had passed, abandoned the property and exposed it to dangers arising from the absence of protection, it was held that, although the vendor might have left to its fate the property so abandoned, yet he was not required to follow any such hazardous and unreasonable course. Under the stated circumstances, although the vendor took the property into possession, this act did not amount to an election of remedies, and did not deprive the vendor of his right to an action on the contract. Phillips v. Stark, 186 Cal. 369, 374, 199 P. 509. Notwithstanding that the present action arises out of a conditional sale contract, I think that the same rule applies here.

HOUSER, J. I concur in the opinion herein as expressed by Mr. Presiding Justice CONREY.

LEWIS v. SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA GAS CO. (Civ. 3542.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 21, 1928.

1. Gas ⚷18—That gas company turning on gas could have discovered defect in stove by inspection did not make it liable, where it was not its duty to inspect.

That gas company, turning on gas at meter in apartment house, could have discovered defect in adjustment of gas mixture admitting air to burner in oven of gas stove, did not carry with it any liability for damages from explosion, where it was not gas company's duty to make such inspection and discovery.

2. Gas ⚷18—Gas company not having notice of defects, was not liable for injuries from explosion caused by defective stove.

Gas company, turning on gas at meter in apartment house at plaintiff's request, was not liable for injury resulting from explosion caused by defective cooking range over which gas company had no control, where gas company did not have actual notice of defects.

3. Gas ⚷16—That proprietress of apartment house might have been liable where gas from stove exploded did not fix liability on gas company.

That proprietress of apartment house might have been liable, where gas exploded while plaintiff was using gas stove in apartment, did not fix any liability on gas company turning on gas at plaintiff's request but having no control over gas stove.

4. Gas ⚷20(2)—Where gas from stove exploded, rule of res ipsa loquitur did not apply in action against gas company not owning stove.

Where gas exploded while plaintiff was using oven of gas stove in apartment and plaintiff was injured, rule of res ipsa loquitur did not apply in action against gas company, where gas company did not own gas stove.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action for damages for personal injuries by Iva B. Lewis against the Southern California Gas Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Thos. J. Reynolds, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff had judgment in the sum of $1,500, damages alleged to have resulted from an explosion of gas occurring while the plaintiff was using the oven of a gas stove in an apartment occupied by her. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The transcript shows that on or about the 10th day of September, 1924, the plaintiff called at the office of the defendant and made application for gas service in apartment No. 5 at No. 417 West Twenty-Eighth street, in the city of Los Angeles. In response to said request, an employee of the defendant, on the afternoon of said day, went to the apartment house referred to and turned on the gas at the meter belonging to the defendant, and also went in the apartment and tested one or two of the top burners of the stove to see that the gas was coming through the pipes. Thereafter, and prior to the 27th day of October, 1924, the plaintiff twice used the oven of the stove referred to. The stove was an "Occidental" cooking range, installed in apartment No. 5 by persons other than the defendant. The defendant had nothing to do with installing the service pipes leading from the meter to the gas range in apartment No. 5, and, as just stated, had nothing to do with the sale or installation of the cooking range. On the morning of the 27th of October, 1924, the plaintiff lighted the gas in the oven of the cooking range, left the door of the oven open for a few minutes, and proceeded with other duties in which she was engaged. After the gas had been lighted for a few minutes, the plaintiff closed the door and resumed the performance of other duties in and about the apartment. In a short time the plaintiff returned to the gas range, opened the oven door, and the burning gas flashed out and caused the injuries upon which the action against the defendant was based.

The testimony is uncontradicted that neither the plaintiff, nor the owner of the apartment house in which the plaintiff was occupying an apartment, ever requested the defendant to make any adjustment or test of the gas range in question, or of any of its appliances. After the explosion, a representative of the defendant named Andrews went to the apartment house, made an investigation of the cause of the flaring up or explosion of the gas, and came to the conclusion that, when the door of the oven was closed, sufficient air could not be admitted to the burner to enable the gas to burn properly; this defect being due, in the opinion of the witness, to the fact that the air mixer was not sufficiently adjusted to admit of sufficient air to cause the flame to burn properly. This witness was further of the opinion that the adjustment had become defective by reason of the accumulation of rust, corrosion, and dust or dirt which impeded the flow of air through the air mixer. The testimony of this witness was further to the effect that whenever an employée of the defendant goes out to turn on the gas in any apartment, or to install a meter, the employee usually enters the apartment and turns on one or two of the top burners to see that the gas is coming through, and that the company never makes any attempt to adjust or inspect ranges, but merely turns on one or two of the convenient burners for the purpose of seeing that the air is all out of the pipes. There was also testimony to the effect that the vent pipe, which is used for carrying away fumes from the oven, was disconnected, and the testimony is also to the effect that this had nothing to do with the cause of the explosion, and that the vent pipes were not attached or used in connection with "Occidental" gas ranges in the apartment house in which the particular one in question was installed. The theory upon which the trial court rendered judgment for the plaintiff appears to have been that it was the duty of the defendant to inspect the gas range and adjust the air mixers or appliances thereon. This appears from the remarks of the court taken during the introduction of testimony, to wit:

> "Q. Did you, at any time, ask the Southern California Gas Company to adjust this particular 'Occidental' range for you prior to October 27, 1924? A. I did not.
> "The Court: Having paid for the gas, was it up to her to notify them to adjust it? * * * I am asking you, having paid for the gas, was it up to her to notify them to adjust it?
> "Mr. Reynolds: To adjust the stove?
> "The Court: Yes.
> "Mr. Reynolds: If she knew that it was out of order, I think it was up to her.
> "The Court: Well, the court is not agreeing with you."

The plaintiff had testified that the second time she lighted the oven, it burned only with a red flame, and not with a blue flame, which she did not think was right; that she had not seen it burn with a red flame before. The respondent's contention is further to the effect that the defendant had established a custom of inspecting gas stoves after turning on the gas or installing meters, and calls our attention to the following testimony introduced in support thereof:

> "Mrs. Ida Gray Scott, the proprietress of the apartment house, which contained many rooms, among other things testified:
> "Q. Do you know of your own knowledge whether or not the Southern California Gas Company ever inspected this particular range in apartment five? A. They did when they turned the gas on.

"Q. Did you see them inspect it? A. I cannot remember that; I know they always did. Some one of us in the family did see it, but which one of us I cannot remember.

"Q. But you did not see it? A. I cannot remember; maybe I did; I know it is always done.

"Q. By Mr. Stone: You know you placed your order with them and the inspection was made, and you did not place your order with anyone else? A. No, I did not place it with any one else.

"Q. By Mr. Reynolds: Did you ever ask the Southern California Gas Company to inspect the various ranges in your house? A. I don't think I ever did.

"Q. By Mr. Stone: Mrs. Scott, when they turned the gas on there, you do know that some one from that company inspected it at the time they turned it on? A. They did at the time they turned it on; they inspected the stove.

"Q. By Mr. Reynolds: Did you know of your own knowledge or did you see any representative of the Southern California Gas Company inspect this particular 'Occidental' gas range in apartment 5 at the time the gas was turned on for Miss Lewis? A. I cannot remember which one of us went with the man to open the door and let him in and saw him do it. I cannot remember. There is three of us together.

"Q. You do not remember of seeing any man from the Southern California Gas Company adjust that stove? A. No, but they always do.

"Q. By. Mr. Stone: As owner of the apartment house, you had no dealings with anybody but the Southern California Gas Company concerning gas in that apartment? A. No.

"Q. By Mr. Reynolds: Did you ever request the Southern California Gas Company to inspect your ranges in your apartment house. A. I don't think I ever did. They always did it at the time they turned on the gas."

This testimony, however, does not support any such contention. It simply shows that the witness thought such was the case; that she never saw them inspecting the stove; never asked them to inspect the stove. The only reasonable explanation of the witness' testimony, and the only reasonable conclusion that can be drawn therefrom, is that the witness knew that after a meter was installed or gas turned on by the company, the employee of defendant who turned on the gas or installed the meter went into the apartment to which gas had been turned, and lighted a burner or two to see if the gas was coming through, or, as stated by one of the witnesses, to "bleed the air out of the pipes." There is nothing whatever in the record to the effect that any one ever saw any of the employees of the defendant making adjustments of the air mixers or air valves, or doing anything whatever to make certain that the proper quantity of air was being admitted to the burners in order to insure proper combustion. The only testimony in the record showing the acts performed by the employees of the company is to the effect, as we have stated, that after turning on the gas, a burner or two was lighted to make sure that gas was coming through the pipes. The testimony as to whether the improper condition of the air vents leading to the burner in the oven of the gas range could have been ascertained by proper inspection, is wholly irrelevant to any of the issues in this case. If the defendant had no duty to perform in relation thereto, the inquiry is ended.

The statement in the respondent's brief that the plaintiff did not discover anything wrong with the stove between September 10 and October 27, is not borne out by the testimony. As we have just stated, the plaintiff testified that the second time she lighted the oven, it burned with a red flame, which she did not think was right. The respondent then further states in her brief that the defect which caused the explosion could have been discovered if the person turning on the gas in the usual way had made the ordinary inspection. The testimony, however, is directly to the contrary. We here give the following excerpt from the testimony, in answer to respondent's counsel:

"Q. All of which would have been discovered by the man when he went to turn on the gas and did what was the custom of the company for years to do? A. No.

"Q. It would not have been discovered? A. No.

"Q. Are you positive of that? A. Absolutely.

"Q. Now, you have given perhaps two or three reasons why this explosion occurred. Will you please state whether or not, with the usual inspection that it has been the custom of the company to make when turning on gas, the trouble would not have been disclosed that existed then in such a way to cause the explosion? Wouldn't the man have found it out when he lit this stove? A. No."

This is followed by the further statement in respondent's brief, to wit:

"And the same employee further testified that if the usual and customary practice had been followed, this lack of the proper connection for the lighting of the stove would have been discovered by the employee."

The testimony upon which this statement is based relates to the vent by which the fumes are carried away, and not to the adjustment of the air mixer by which the flame is fed with oxygen. This appears when we quote the testimony which eliminates some apparent confusion, to wit:

"Q. Was there any ventilation for this oven? A. It was not connected. There was a place for ventilation to be connected to it.

"Q. But the ventilation had not been connected with the oven? A. No.

"Q. Now, if that were true on the 10th day of September, when your man went out there and turned on the gas, if he had turned it on and lit it, as he said it was the universal custom to do, he would have seen that, would he not? A. If he had lighted it, yes.

"Q. If he had followed the universal custom of turning on the gas and lighting this stove, he would have discovered that there was no vent connected with it? A. Yes.

"Q. You have testified that the flue where the odors from the oven pass off was not connected? A. It was not.

"Q. Is it customary for flues of that nature to be connected? A. It is not customary only in a very few places in Los Angeles.

"Q. In other words, by casual inspection it would show that this flue was not connected, and that is customary in Los Angeles? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. If this flue had been connected with the vent, would that have had anything to do, one way or the other, with this particular explosion? A. I don't think it would."

The testimony further shows that the particular stove in question had been in use for something like one year previous to the explosion. There is no testimony showing that the vent was ever connected, nor is there any testimony in the record showing that the gas company ever installed or connected vents with gas ranges. The testimony further is to the effect that mechanically the air mixture appeared to be all right, but that the fault was in the adjustment, and that the red flame which the plaintiff testified to, was the result of defective adjustment. It does not appear that either the plaintiff or the proprietress of the apartment house gave any directions to the defendant or to anybody else in relation to the adjustment of the gas range, or did anything further than to request that the gas be turned on. There is also testimony to the effect that the defendant did not adjust appliances for gas stoves unless they had an order for that purpose. We find nothing in the record indicating that it was the custom of the defendant either to make adjustments or inspection of adjustments of gas ranges, other than the intimations contained in the language used by respondent's counsel in propounding questions on cross-examination.

[1] As stated herein, the defendant owned the pipe lines and gas fixtures from the street up to and including the gas meter. From there on the defendant had no ownership whatever. The ownership and control of the defendant stopped with the meter. The ownership and control of pipe lines and fixtures, including stoves, vested in the proprietress of the apartment house and her tenants. Whether the defendant, by inspection, could have discovered a defect in the adjustment of the gas mixture admitting air to the burner in the oven of the gas range, does not carry with it any liability, unless it was the duty of the defendant to make such inspection and discovery.

[2-4] Under the circumstances disclosed by the record in this case, is there any liability on the part of the appellant? The general rule in cases like this is aptly stated in 28 C. J., p. 594, § 58d:

> "The general rule requiring the use of ordinary care and diligence on the part of a gas company applies to its delivery of gas into the residence or other building of the consumer. The rule has been laid down, however, that in the absence of any fact upon which to base an inference of duty, the failure of the gas company, on introducing gas into a dwelling, upon application, to inspect pipes or fixtures which were placed there by the owner, and over which the company has no control, is not negligence. The company is warranted in assuming that the interior system of pipes is sufficiently secure to permit the gas to be introduced with safety. To render the company liable in such cases, there must be facts alleged to show notice of defects, or facts from which an inference of duty to inspect arises, either from contract, custom or franchise."

Cases are then cited where gas companies have been held liable when given notice of a defect or leak in the gas system, in not immediately turning off the gas, etc., which cases are not pertinent here. In the case of Okmulgee Gas Co. v. Kelly, 105 Okl. 189, 232 P. 428, the Supreme Court of Oklahoma considers questions identical with those presented here as to liability, and sets forth the law in a carefully prepared opinion, and we can do no better than quote therefrom:

> "The gas company owes the duty to see that the pipe lines and fittings, when first laid in the ground, with reasonable care and skill, will not permit the escape of gas, and a system of inspection is required as will result in reasonable promptness in the discovery of leaks, which may occur from deterioration of the material, or from other causes within contemplation by the company. (Pine Bluff Water Co. v. Schneider, 62 Ark. 109, 34 S. W. 547, 33 L. R. A. 366; Louisville Gas Co. v. Guelat, 150 Ky. 583, 150 S. W. 656, 42 L. R. A. [N. S.] 703; Barrickman v. Marion Oil Co., 45 W. Va. 634, 32 S. E. 327, 44 L. R. A. 92.) But in this case the duty rested with the defendant, only to maintain inspection and make repairs over its line, which ended at the property line of the consumer. The defendant owed no duty to inspect the pipe line and gas fittings of Agard. The defendant would not be liable for injury resulting from explosions, due to defects of pipe line, gas connections, and fittings on the property of Agard, unless it had actual notice of such defects. (See notes to 32 L. R. A. [N. S.] 813, L. R. A. 1915E, 1023; Ann. Cas. 1914C. at page 348.) If the gas pipes and fittings are the property of the consumer, and there is no contractual duty resting on the gas company to inspect, the consumer, by application for gas service, assumes the burden of inspecting and maintaining the pipe and fittings on his property in a manner reasonably suited to meet the required service, and the company has the right to assume that these duties have been performed by the applicant. (Smith v. Pawtucket Gas Co., 24 R. I. 292, 52 A. 1078, 96 Am. St. Rep. 713.) However, the company would be responsible for inspection and the condition of the meter and its connections which it installed on the premises of the consumer."

To the same effect we may cite 12 R. C. L. 909, where it is said:

> "Generally speaking, a gas company which does not install the pipes in a customer's building, and which has no control over them, is in no way responsible for the condition in which they are maintained, and consequently, is not liable for injuries caused by a leak therein, of which it has no knowledge. One who applies for gas has the duty to see that his own pipes, through which the gas is to be used, are in good order, and no general obligation on the part of the company can be inferred to inspect such pipes."

See, also, Ann. Cas. 1914C, p. 348, holding that a gas company owes a duty only to inspect that portion of the gas line and fixtures which it owns and controls.

The authorities relied upon by the respondent refer only to cases where gas companies have been liable on account of negligence in not turning off gas after notification that the pipe lines were leaking. That a gas company is not liable for defects upon the owner's premises, see also note in 25 A. L. R. page 272. That the proprietress of the apartment house might have been liable under the law as laid down in Gobrecht v. Beckwith (N. H.) 135 A. 20, 52 A. L. R. 858, and the annotations appended to that case, does not fix any liability upon the defendant. Nor does the rule of res ipsa loquitur apply. That rule applies only when the appliances and fixtures involved all belong to the gas company. A good case showing when this rule applies is that of Chiles v. Ft. Smith Commission Co., 139 Ark. 489, 216 S. W. 11, 8 A. L. R. 493, and the annotations appended to that case. See, also, Triplett v. Alabama Power Co., 213 Ala. 190, 104 So. at page 248. That the defendant is not liable for defect in fixtures which it did not install is likewise held in Helm v. Manufacturers' Light & Heat Co., 86 W. Va. 628, 104 S. E. p. 59, 25 A. L. R. 240. There, as here, the trouble arose from a defect in appliances not installed by, and not under the control of, the defendant.

Other cases might be cited, but the holding of all of them is to the effect that liability does not extend beyond the property owned and controlled by the defendant unless some defect has been discovered of which the gas company has notice, requiring the company to discontinue its service until the defect is remedied, and it fails so to do. There is also inserted in the record the rule of the railroad commission setting forth that the owner of the premises into which the gas is conducted is liable for all defects from the point where the gas meter connects with the service pipes upon the premises in question. Whether this rule applies to the instant case need not be decided, and whether such a rule would excuse the defendant from negligence need not be determined, as we find nothing in the record upon which a conclusion could be predicated that the defendant has been guilty of the violation of any duty incumbent upon it.

The judgment of the trial court is reversed.

SULLIVAN v. PEOPLE'S ICE CORPORATION et al. (Civ. 6088.) ★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 26, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 23, 1928.

1. Master and servant ⚷329—Complaint against employer for assault by employee held sufficient to plead act within scope of authority.

In action against employer for assault by employee, complaint held sufficient to show that the employee was acting within the scope of his authority.

2. Master and servant ⚷332(2)—Whether defendant's employee in assaulting plaintiff acted within the scope of his authority held for jury.

In action against employer for assault by employee in which there was evidence, either direct or circumstantial, to support every allegation of complaint showing act of employee to have been within the scope of his authority, the question is for the jury.

3. Master and servant ⚷308—Employer's retention of employee with knowledge of assault of plaintiff was some evidence of ratification.

In action against employer for assault by employee, the fact that employer retained employee in his employment with knowledge of the facts was some evidence of ratification of employee's acts.

4. Trial ⚷244(1)—Instruction picking out isolated facts is improper.

It is not proper for the court to pick out isolated facts and either fortify them or belittle them by making them the subject of an instruction.

5. Master and servant ⚷308—Employer's retention of employee with knowledge of assault of plaintiff may be evidence of ratification, though assault constituted crime (Civ. Code, §§ 2338, 2339).

In action against employer for assault by employee, the mere fact that the assault constituted a crime did not, as a matter of law, prevent employer's retention of employee with knowledge of facts from being some evidence of ratification, under Civ. Code, §§ 2338, 2339.

6. Master and servant ⚷308—Employer who ratifies assault by employee is liable therefor.

Employer who ratifies assault by employee, constituting crime committed without knowledge of employer, is liable.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Chas. R. Barnard, Judge.

Action by Sherman Sullivan against the People's Ice Corporation and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Everts, Ewing, Wild & Everts, C. M. Ozias, and L. W. Young, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Cosgrave & Barstow, of Fresno, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff sued for damages suffered because of personal injuries inflicted on him. The defendants appeared and answered separately. The jury returned a verdict against both defendants. People's Ice Corporation made a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. The motion was denied. From a judgment entered on the verdict, People's Ice Corporation has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

In his complaint the plaintiff alleged:

"Plaintiff complains and for cause of action alleges: That defendant, People's Ice Corporation, is now, and at all times hereinafter mentioned was, a corporation duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, and engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling at retail ice in the city of Fresno and elsewhere. That defendant Alfred M. Dupzyk is now, and at all times hereinafter mentioned was, the agent, employee, and servant of the defendant People's Ice Corporation. That said Alfred M. Dupzyk was, at all times herein mentioned, and at and during the time when the acts hereinafter set forth were performed, employed by said People's Ice Corporation to drive a wagon containing ice along a designated route in a designated district in the city of Fresno, to solicit the sale of the ice of the said defendant People's Ice Corporation, to deliver the said ice to purchasers thereof when sold, to observe vendors of ice in the said district so assigned to said defendant Alfred M. Dupzyk, who were in competition with the said defendant People's Ice Corporation, and to eliminate, discourage, and exclude from such district such competing vendors of ice, and to prevent such competing vendors from soliciting the sale of ice along the route or within the district so assigned to said defendant Alfred M. Dupzyk by the said People's Ice Corporation, and to prevent the securing of the trade of the customers of said People's Ice Corporation by competing vendors of ice, and to extend the custom and trade of said People's Ice Corporation, and to secure new customers for the same. That plaintiff is now, and at all times herein mentioned was, an agent of a vendor of ice in competition with the said People's Ice Corporation, in the business of selling ice along the route so assigned to the said defendant Alfred M. Dupzyk, and, at the time the acts herein complained of occurred, plaintiff was engaged in soliciting the sale of ice on behalf of his said employer along the route and in the district assigned to the said defendant Alfred M. Dupzyk by said People's Ice Corporation. That on or about the 28th day of May, 1920, on the southeasterly corner of G and Tulare streets in the city of Fresno, county of Fresno, state of California, said Alfred M. Dupzyk, while in pursuance of his employment, and in performance of his duties, as alleged in paragraph III hereof, did, without the fault of or provocation by plaintiff, wrongfully, unlawfully, and violently and with oppression and malice toward plaintiff assault plaintiff, and violently strike and beat him about the face and head, and, as a result of being so beaten and struck, plaintiff was knocked violently upon the ground. That, by reason of being so struck, beaten and knocked upon the ground, plaintiff has sustained broken facial bones, impaired vision in the right eye, and has been confined to his bed for a period of two weeks, and has been incapacitated from pursuing his ordinary employment for a period of three weeks. That, ever since said injury, plaintiff has suffered, and does still suffer, great pain and inconvenience by reason of said injuries so inflicted by defendants as aforesaid and said injuries are permanent in their nature. That, in the infliction of said injuries upon plaintiff by said defendants as aforesaid, said defendants have been guilty of oppression and malice upon and toward this plaintiff. That immediately upon and after the infliction of said injuries upon plaintiff, as aforesaid, defendant People's Ice Corporation had actual notice thereof and of all of the facts and circumstances under which the said injuries were inflicted, and thereafter and at all times since has retained, and does now retain, the said Dupzyk in its employ, and fully ratified the action of the said defendant Dupzyk in the infliction of said injuries as aforesaid. That, by reason of said injuries so inflicted by defendants upon plaintiff, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $10,000, no part of which has been paid. That, by reason of said injuries, plaintiff was compelled to, and did, go to a hospital for the treatment thereof, and in that behalf has expended the sum of $31.50. That plaintiff was compelled to, and did, hire a physician to treat his said injuries, and in that behalf has expended the sum of $31. That, by reason of his said injuries, plaintiff was unable to pursue his employment of ice salesman for a period of three weeks. That for said period the reasonable value of plaintiff's services is the sum of $105."

[1, 2] The defendant urges that the verdict and judgment are contrary to law, because there is no evidence to show that the defendant Dupzyk was acting within the scope of his authority, express or implied. In presenting the point, the defendant assumes that the case made by the plaintiff is merely a charge that the plaintiff was assaulted by Dupzyk during working hours, and that, after the assault, the defendant did not discharge Dupzyk. A most casual reading of the plaintiff's complaint shows that assumption fails to take into consideration many allegations contained in the complaint. There was evidence, direct or circumstantial, tending to support every allegation contained in the complaint. The weight of the evidence was for the jury.

The defendant called as a witness J. H. Wooden, who was the manager of the People's Ice Corporation at the time of the assault. He testified that he had expressly directed his men not to have any fights with any one on their routes. It cites the testimony and argues that it follows as a matter of law that Dupzyk was acting outside of the scope of his employment. If this were an action sounding in contract between employer and employee, the contention might be sound, but not in an action sounding in tort, and maintained by a third person. Johnson v. Monson, 183 Cal. 149, 150, 151, 190 P. 635.

During the introduction of evidence, the defendant maintained the same opinion as set forth above. Certain rulings were made against it. Those rulings are now assigned as error. However, as we have shown in this decision, the contention of the defendant as to the breadth of this case is too narrow, and fails to take into consideration all of the facts. We have not noted any ruling on the evidence that was prejudicial to the defendant.

Finally the defendant complains of the refusal of the trial court to give certain proposed instructions which defendant asked. They were as follows:

(1) "You are further instructed that evidence has been introduced in this case showing that the defendant herein, Dupzyk, is still in the employ of the defendant, People's Ice Corporation, and you are instructed that such evidence of itself does not amount to or constitute a ratification for the commission of a tort by defendant Dupzyk, and in this case, where the action complained of on the part of the defendant Dupzyk constitutes a crime, under no circumstances could this evidence constitute a ratification of the offense charged.

(2) "You are hereby instructed that it appears from the evidence in this case that the claim for damages against the People's Ice Corporation is founded upon a claim that the defendant Dupzyk herein committed a crime of assault and battery upon the plaintiff in the case, and you are instructed that the defendant People's Ice Corporation cannot by any acts ratify the commission of the criminal assault so as to make itself liable for damages. It is the law that acts committed by a servant which of themselves constitute a crime cannot by any acts of the master be ratified so as to make the master liable in damages. In cases where the acts are not criminal, they may be ratified by actions and course of conduct on part of the master, but even in this class of cases the failure on the part of the master to dispense with the services of a servant is not of itself sufficient to constitute a ratification of servant's act."

[3-5] The instructions were objectionable for many reasons. We will not attempt to state all of them. When defendant, with full knowledge of the facts, retained Dupzyk in his employ after obtaining such knowledge, such fact was some evidence of ratification. It may be conceded that the fact, standing alone, did not necessarily constitute a ratification. But, whether it did or did not, it is not proper for the court to pick out isolated facts, and either fortify them or belittle them by making them the subject of an instruction. Estate of Martin, 170 Cal. 657, 672, 151 P. 138. Again, even though the act of Dupzyk constituted a crime, it could not be said as a matter of law that in this action, as alleged by this plaintiff, there could not be evidence of ratification. Civ. Code, §§ 2338, 2339; Johnson v. Monson, supra.

[6] Defendant avers that the act of Dupzyk was a crime, and that a crime could not legally be authorized, and therefore it could not be "ratified." If this were an action sounding in contract between principal and employer, the argument would have much weight. 21 R. C. L. 925. But it is an action in tort brought by a third party. Our statute says it can be "ratified." Civ. Code, § 2339. In a note appended thereto the Code commissioners stated that the Code section was based on the following authorities:

In Story on Agency, § 456, it is said:

> "For the principal is not liable for the torts or negligence of his agent in any matters beyond the scope of the agency, unless he has expressly authorized them to be done, or he has subsequently adopted them for his own use or benefit."

And in Eastern Counties Railway Co. v. Broom, 6 Ex. 314, at page 327, it is said:

> "With respect to the point, whether the company could ratify the act, if the act can be said to have been done for the use or benefit of the company, there can be no doubt that they could ratify it. The assault and imprisonment of a party liable to the company for not having paid his fare, was an act of a servant of the company, which manifestly might have been for the benefit of the company. Therefore, we are clearly of opinion that there might have been a ratification of that act. The law is well laid down in distinct terms in the passage from the 4 Inst. 317, 'he that receiveth a trespasser, and agreeth to a trespass after it be done, is no trespasser, unless the trespass was done to his use or for his benefit, and then his agreement subsequent amounteth to a commandment.' The question of liability by ratification depends upon this, whether the act was originally intended to be done to the use or for the benefit of the party who is afterwards said to have ratified it. We are with the plaintiff in this case, that the action might lie, and the act, though not done with the knowledge of the company in the first instance, might have been ratified by them; but we are of opinion that there was no evidence of any such ratification, and that the direction of the Lord Chief Baron was wrong in this respect."

The defendant requested, and the trial court refused, an instruction to the effect that, if a servant steps aside from the master's business for however short a time, and commits a wrongful act, the master is not liable. In so doing the trial court did not err. The subject-matter was fully covered by other instructions which were given.

The judgment is affirmed.

YORK, J. The question involved in this action is, which party is entitled to possession of the land in question? The appellant is a corporation, and the respondents comprise a corporation and certain individuals who are stockholders and directors in the respondent corporation. The importance of the question of possession is caused by the fact that the party found to be entitled to the possession in this action will eventually obtain a United States mineral patent on the lode mining claims situated in Death Valley, known as Borax No. 1 and Borax No. 2 lode mining claims in the judgment herein.

Not only does the transcript disclose the fact that the evidence was very voluminous (561 pages of bill of exceptions alone), but the findings of the court comprise 49 pages of the transcript. However, the only question, as we view it, that we are called upon to decide, is whether or not there was evidence sufficient to support all of the material findings of the trial court, as the findings of the trial court are undoubtedly sufficient to support the judgment. It appears to us that the argument of the appellant only shows that there was evidence sufficient for the trial court to have made different and other findings; but an examination of the record discloses the fact that there was sufficient evidence to support each and every finding made by the trial court. None of the questions raised as to errors in rulings is sufficient to show any error of a prejudicial nature in any ruling of the court. In fact, the finding of the trial court in reference to abandonment by appellant is not only supported by the circumstances shown, but the letters of the attorney for appellant in its proceedings for patent before the Land Office, written to the United States Land Office, set forth in full hereinafter, were sufficient to justify the said Land Office in making the order which said Land Office did make canceling the application for patent of appellant, and were sufficient for the trial court to make the finding of abandonment.

Some of the evidence introduced as to the examination of the shafts and development work of appellant on the property in question was that there was no development of or discovery of any ore body by appellant or its predecessors, and that in fact the ore body nearest to the surface was found by respondents about ten feet deeper than the bottom of appellant's deepest shaft.

A complete statement of the facts shown by the record would be too voluminous for this opinion, and seems to us unnecessary. Let it suffice to state that the predecessor of plaintiff entered upon the land and started to do some work to attempt to develop mineral on or about April 30, 1900, and the deed of conveyance from said predecessor to plaintiff was dated February 28, 1901. The plaintiff's application for patent was made about December 14, 1905. About November 21, 1906, the Commissioner of the General Land Office issued an order to the register and receiver of the Independence Land Office, where the application had been received for patent, that under rule 1 of the circular of March 6, 1903 (32 L. D. 39), the state's right attached to said section, if at all, when the township survey was accepted, the letter showing that the township survey was accepted about March 19, 1858. The letter further instructed the register and receiver to notify the claimant company that 60 days would be allowed in which to show cause why the entry should not be canceled as to the portion of the land lying in section 36. Under date of August 20, 1907, the record disclosed that the attorney for appellant, in reply to such notice, wrote to the register of the United States Land Office as follows:

> "Dear Sir: I am in receipt of your letter of August 13th in reference to the Clara lode claim for which the United States Borax Company applied for patent. I do not think that we can make any showing to overcome the presumption in favor of the rights of the state, and will, therefore, not ask to have the matter kept open longer."

Thereafter, and under date of March 25, 1908, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in a letter to the register and receiver at Independence, acknowledged receipt of the letter from the claimant company's attorney, and instructed the said register to notify the claimant company that it would be allowed 60 days from notice within which to show a valid discovery on the portion not canceled and other and sufficient improvements made prior to the expiration of the period of publication, and in the letter stated that any default of such proof, or of an appeal, that the entry would be canceled without any further notice. A copy of the order in accordance with said letter was found by the court on sufficient evidence to have been received by the United States Borax Company, and on April 6, 1908, said company by its attorney in reply sent the following communication to the register of the United States Land Office at Independence, to wit:

> "Dear Sir: I am in receipt of your letter of March 31st, in reference to the Clara lode. No work has been done on the claim since the original application was filed, and it will, therefore, be unnecessary to keep the matter open for any further showing on the part of the applicant."

Thereafter, the Commissioner of the General Land Office canceled the entry of the plaintiff, and instructed the register and receiver at Independence to so notify the claimant. Such notice was thereupon given. No work was done on the land in question by plaintiff, or any one in its behalf, after the year 1904, and no proof of any annual labor thereupon or therefor was filed with the county recorder of Inyo county after the year 1904 by or on behalf of plaintiff. In the year 1919 the defendant W. S. Russell, on behalf of himself and associates, claimed to have made discovery upon the land claimed by the defendants herein, and filed a placer location thereon in the office of the county recorder of Inyo county, and ever since June 1, 1919, the defendants have been in the possession and occupancy of the lands during the portion of the year when it was possible to work the same in that portion of Death Valley. On June 25, 1921, the individual defendants named located the lands now claimed by them under lode claims, filing their copies of location for record with the county recorder of Inyo county about July 11, 1921. Thereafter the individual named defendants transferred to the Death Valley Borax Company, a corporation, their rights in the property, and said company applied for patent on all of the lands in question about April 26, 1922. Within due time thereafter, the plaintiff, United States Borax Company, filed its adverse claim against the issuance of such patent, and this suit to determine the right of possession was brought within the time allowed by law. From the record before us it is apparent that nothing was done by the appellant in connection with pressing its claim or doing anything whatever in connection with the development or patenting of the land from April 6, 1908, up to the date of its said protest against the patenting of the land to the defendants and respondents, except that on or about February 26, 1920, appellant filed in the United States Land Office an application for a reinstatement of its application for patent. The said application was decided against the appellant by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, from which both parties appealed to the Secretary of the Interior, by which office said application for reinstatement was denied by an order and opinion dated July 19, 1921, issued by the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior. Thereafter the United States Borax Company petitioned said Department of the Interior for the exercise of its supervisory powers and requested reversal of its prior ruling, which petition, on a hearing on the merits was denied. The opinion of the said department is set forth in the findings as follows:

> "The department is clearly of the opinion that the said mineral entry was made for land (as to section 36) then belonging prima facie to the state, and that the requirement made by the commissioner was proper. Furthermore, the claimant acquiesced in that ruling and admitted its inability to comply with the requirement. It dd not renew its claim after the state filed selection in lieu of the land involved but submitted without protest to the cancellation of the entry. It is estopped from now disputing the correctness of that action. If it has abandoned its claim so as to permit other bona fide rights to intervene and attach as alleged, it would be manifestly unjust and illegal to reinstate the old entry. The petition is accordingly denied."

It is apparently not necessary to pass upon the interesting questions which the parties herein have attempted to raise as to just when school sections are subject to mineral entry and as to just when the title to school sections containing mineral is transferred to the federal government, or as to whether or not any sections 16 or 36 that were mineral lands at the time of the grant of school sections to the state, or that were later proven to be mineral lands, ever became school lands of the state of California.

The judgment is affirmed.

ADKINS v. MODEL LAUNDRY CO. et al.
(Civ. 6316.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 16, 1928.

1. Pleading 🔑225(1)—In action for breach of contract for commissions for washing clothing, cause to which demurrer was sustained lapsed when plaintiff did not amend it.

In action for breach of contract for commissions for washing clothing, where demurrer was sustained to cause of action set forth in complaint, and plaintiff failed to amend cause, held that it lapsed.

2. Pleading 🔑192(2)—Demurrer to complaint, in action for breach of contract for commissions for washing clothing, should have been sustained, where complaint did not allege contract with certainty.

In action for breach of contract for commissions for washing clothing, where there were no definite allegations in complaint that company had ever agreed orally or in writing to wash clothing brought to it for any specified sum or at all, held that demurrer should have been sustained, since complaint failed to allege contract with sufficient certainty.

3. Action 🔑22—Action at law will not lie for damages for interference with customers of laundry route.

Where plaintiff who purchased laundry route from driver brought action against laundry, assuming that complaint charged laundry company with interference with customers of laundry route, held that plaintiff mistook remedy, since action at law would not lie.

4. Damages 🔑59—Damages for failure to wash clothing at agreed rate held not recoverable, where plaintiff immediately made contract at lower rate (Civ. Code, § 3301).

Where plaintiff who purchased laundry route brought action against laundry, after it had refused to wash clothing for him at agreed rate, although he immediately secured another contract at lower rate, held, under Civ. Code, § 3301, providing that no damages can be recovered for breach of contract which are not clearly ascertainable both in nature and origin, that damages for failure to wash clothing at agreed rate could not be recovered.

5. Contracts 🔑217—Contract to wash clothing held terminable at will of laundry or driver of laundry route, where time was not fixed.

In action for breach of contract for commissions for washing clothing, where neither pleadings nor evidence fixed time during which alleged contract was to continue, held that it could be terminated at will by either laundry or driver of laundry route.

6. Injunction 🔑55—Unlawful interference with benefits of patronage of specific list of customers in definite laundry route may be protected by injunction.

Unlawful interference with property rights in good will of business for benefits of trade or patronage of specific list of customers in definite laundry route may be protected by injunctive relief in court of equity.

7. Trover and conversion 🔑41—Right in patronage of specific list of customers in definite laundry route will not authorize damages in suit for conversion or trover.

There is no such property right in patronage of specific list of customers in definite laundry route which will authorize damages in suit at law for conversion or trover.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1039(13)—After demurrer had been sustained to cause based on loss of prospective sale of laundry route, admission of evidence showing interference with sale held prejudicial.

Despite fact that demurrer had been sustained to cause of action which was based on claim for damages for loss of prospective sale of laundry route through opposition of defendant laundry, evidence showing interference with sale held prejudicial.

9. Damages 🔑120(7)—In action for breach of contract for commissions for washing clothing, damages for appropriating customers are not recoverable.

In action for breach of contract for commissions for washing clothing, where, in instruction, trial court assumed that damages for tort in wrongfully divulging trade secrets and appropriating customers of plaintiff were proper measure of damages, held that remedy for such intangible property rights did not exist in mere suit at law for breach of contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; E. J. Marks, Judge.

Action by Roy V. Adkins against the Model Laundry Company and others for damages for breach of contract for commissions for washing clothing. From a judgment for the plaintiff, the defendant appeals. Reversed.

Roland Thompson, James L. Allen, and James L. Davis, all of Santa Ana, for appellant.

A. E. Koepsel and L. A. West, both of Santa Ana, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from the verdict of a jury and a judgment for damages for $2,000 for an alleged breach of contract with a laundry company for commissions for washing clothing.

The appellant Model Laundry Company, a corporation, was engaged in the laundry business at Santa Ana, Cal. The defendants C. C. Blanchard, Albert Blanchard, and E. W. Walker were directors of the corporation. The complaint alleged that Walker was the personal owner of Model Laundry route No. 1 in Santa Ana, having the exclusive right to collect laundry in that district for said company, with which he had an agreement to wash all laundry collected by him from said route for a commission of 27½ per cent. of their regular list price; that on January 15, 1920, Walker sold to respondent said laundry route, together with one Ford automobile for the sum of $1,000; that, prior to the consummation of this sale, the plaintiff told defendant Albert Blanchard, who was then the president of said corporation, of the proposed purchase, and that Blanchard "acquiesced, consented and approved of said sale"; that with Blanchard's consent the plaintiff purchased said route, and proceeded to "collect and deliver laundry from said route, * * * and took all of said laundry to the defendant Model Laundry Company and had it washed under the above agreement," until November 16, 1923; that the laundry company then placed another driver on said route, to whom it supplied the list of names and addresses of plaintiff's customers, and then attempted to dismiss plaintiff from their employment, addressing letters to his customers advising them of plaintiff's discharge, and requesting the delivery of all packages of washing to one George Clough, who would thenceforth represent the laundry company in said district; that the laundry company thereby enticed plaintiff's customers to desert him, impaired the value of his said laundry district, and decreased his income therefrom to his damage in the sum of $5,000.

[1] A second cause of action was set forth in the complaint to which a demurrer was sustained. The respondent failed to amend this cause, and it therefore lapsed. A general and special demurrer to the first cause of action was also filed, charging that it failed to state adequate facts; that it was uncertain as to how plaintiff became the owner of the laundry route, and that the terms of the alleged contracts between Walker and the laundry company and between plaintiff and the laundry company were uncertain. This demurrer was overruled, and the defendants filed their answer categorically denying each material allegation of the complaint. As a separate defense, the appellant alleged that it was the owner of the laundry route; that the respondent was its agent and employee hired for the purpose of collecting laundry in said district; and that he was discharged for unsatisfactory service on November 17, 1923. At the beginning of the trial, appellant objected to the introduction of evidence on the grounds enumerated in the demurrer. This objection was overruled.

The evidence is conflicting, but it satisfactorily appears that respondent paid Walker $1,000 for a Ford automobile and the exclusive right to gather and deliver laundry to the Model Laundry Company from said route. Before purchasing the route from Walker, the respondent had a conversation with Albert Blanchard, who was then the president of the laundry corporation. All that the evidence discloses respecting the alleged agreement with the laundry company appears in the testimony of respondent, as follows:

> "Q. What was said? * * * A. We asked him (Albert Blanchard) if it was perfectly all right for me * * * to buy the route, and if he was perfectly willing, and he said he was, or words to that effect. * * *
> "Q. In this conversation with Mr. Blanchard, what was said, if anything, in regard to who was to do the washing? A. I don't know as there was anything said as to that. Walker was getting the laundry done there, and that is what he was selling—the Model Laundry to do the washing at 72½ per cent. * * *
> "Q. What did Mr. Blanchard say with reference to doing the washing, if anything? A. He said it was all right with him, to go ahead and make the deal, and he would take care of us the same as he had before."

For nearly three years after the purchase of the route respondent collected laundry from this district, and had it washed at the Model Laundry for 72½ per cent. of its regular rate of charges, collecting from his customers the full list price for such laundry. This left respondent 27½ per cent. of the list price for his own services, which averaged about $75 per week. Difficulties arose between the appellant and the respondent, and on November 16, 1923, the appellant refused to accept or wash any more laundry for respondent, and thereupon employed a driver by the name of Clough to take charge of said district, furnishing him with a list of respondent's customers, to whom letters were mailed notifying them that respondent no longer represented the laundry company, and advised the customers to patronize Clough, who immediately began to canvass the district, and succeeded in procuring patronage from some of respondent's former customers. The respondent continued to regularly solicit and collect laundry from this district, delivering it to the Sanitary Laundry, a competing organization, with which he procured an agreement to retain for his services 30 per cent. of their regular charges. The respondent, however, testified that, owing to the appellant's interference with his laundry route and customers, he lost business, which decreased his commissions on an average of $35 to $40 per week, which loss aggregated from $940 to $960 prior to the filing of the complaint. At the close of plaintiff's case, a motion for nonsuit was made and granted as to the individual defendants, but denied as to the laundry company. The jury rendered a verdict against appellant for $2,000 damages.

[2-4] This case seems to have been tried on the theory that the measure of damages was the loss of commissions sustained by virtue of appellant's wrongfully enticing respondent's customers from him. It is apparent that appellant's refusal to continue to wash respondent's laundry for 72½ per cent. of the regular list prices was not an element of damages, for respondent immediately made a much better bargain with the Sanitary Laundry, which allowed him 30 per cent. of its regular schedule of prices. There are no definite allegations in the complaint that appellant ever agreed orally or in writing to wash respondent's laundry for any specified sum, or at all. Assuming, however, that such an agreement was made, there are neither pleadings nor evidence regarding the term during which this contract was presumed to continue. Evidently the trial court assumed that the damages in this case would be measured by the loss sustained by enticing respondent's customers away from him. But this was not an equitable action for injunctive relief to prohibit interference with the good will of a business, or confidential business relations affecting individual customers of a particular laundry route, under which circumstances damages are merely incidental to the injunctive relief which is sought. Under the pleadings, plaintiff was compelled to rely upon the theory of a breach of contract to wash laundry for an agreed price. But the complaint failed to allege such a contract with sufficient certainty, and the demurrer should have been sustained. If the complaint be deemed to charge appellant with damages for interference with the customers of his laundry route, the respondent has mistaken his remedy, for such an action at law will not lie. If the complaint be deemed to charge damages for breach of a contract to wash laundry at 72½ per cent. of the usual schedule prices, the evidence fails to show that respondent sustained a loss of this nature, for he immediately made a contract with the Sanitary Laundry Company for 70 per cent. of the schedule prices. Section 3301, Civil Code, provides:

> "No damages can be recovered for a breach of contract which are not clearly ascertainable in both their nature and origin."

[5] Moreover, since no time was fixed by either the pleadings or the evidence, during which the alleged contract was to continue, it could be terminated at will by either party. In 1 Williston on Contracts 59, § 38, it is said:

> "A promise which contemplates continuing performance for an indefinite time has been construed as stipulating only for performance terminable at the will of either party." Joliet Bottling Co. v. Joliet Citizens' Brewing Co., 254 Ill. 215, 98 N. E. 263; Gage v. Village of Wilmette, 315 Ill. 328, 146 N. E. 325; Arkansas Valley T. & L. Co. v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry., 49 Okl. 282, 151 P. 1028, 1032; Davis v. Fidelity Fire Ins. Co., 208 Ill. 375, 70 N. E. 359.

If the contract on the part of the laundry company can be said to be an agreement to allow respondent 27½ per cent. of schedule prices for washing laundry, as compensation for collecting and delivering the packages from a certain district, regardless of who owned the territory, the agreement would be indefinite for failure to limit the duration of the contract. In 6 California Jurisprudence 218, § 143, it is said:

> "If the * * * consideration be personal services, the agreement for such services must be definite and certain, not only with reference to their nature and character, but also with reference to the time of their continuance."

Section 1999, Civil Code, provides:

> "An employment, having no specified term, may be terminated at the will of either party, on notice to the other."

Under the circumstances of this case, where absolutely no limitation of time was fixed for the performance of services in washing laundry for a specified price, we are of the opinion that the laundry company was privileged to terminate the contract at will, without becoming liable for damages therefor. In the case of Otten v. Spreckels, 183 Cal. 252, 259, 191 P. 11, 13, which was a suit for damages for breach of contract in discharging an agent employed to take charge of a newspaper route, who was paid commissions upon the newspapers which he sold judgment in favor of the agent was reversed, and the court said:

> "* * * Where the agency is revocable at will, as in this case, he has no interest or right which he can assert against his principal who revokes it, as the basis of damages for such revocation. * * * The agency being terminable at will by the principal and being for an indefinite term and without a valuable consideration, its revocation was not a breach of the contract. The plaintiff has no cause of action and the judgment should have been for the defendant."

The same principle applies to the present case. Regardless of which party was the employer, either had a right to terminate the employment at will. The respondent paid no valuable consideration to the appellant for the contract. Walker was the individual owner who sold the laundry route to the respondent, and the Model Laundry Company was not a party to the contract of sale, and is not bound by the terms thereof. A mere agreement of agency or employment existed between the appellant and the respondent, which was continuing in its nature and failed to specify a limitation of duration. It was therefore terminable at the will of either party.

[6, 7] Regardless of whether the respondent or the laundry company be deemed to be the employer a confidential relationship existed between them in regard to the names and addresses of respondent's customers in his laundry district. The appellant had no lawful right to divulge its knowledge of the names and addresses of respondent's customers, nor use the information secured by virtue of their business relationship to alienate customers from the respondent or acquire them for its own benefit. Unlawful interference with property rights in the good will of a business, or the benefits of trade or patronage of a specific list of customers in a definite laundry route, may be protected by injunctive relief in a court of equity. 14 Cal. Jur. 198, § 17; New Method Laundry Co. v. MacCann, 174 Cal. 26, 161 P. 990, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 1022; Cornish v. Dickey, 172 Cal. 120, 155 P. 629; Empire Steam Laundry v. Lozier, 165 Cal. 95, 102, 130 P. 1180 (44 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1159, Ann Cas. 1914C, 628); Mackechnie Bread Co. v. Huber, 60 Cal. App. 539, 213 P. 285; Olschewski v. Hudson (Cal. App.) 262 P. 43. But there is no such property right in the intangible interest of an exclusive privilege to collect laundry or sell newspapers in a specific district, which will authorize damages in a suit at law for conversion or trover. Olschewski v. Hudson, supra. In the case last cited it is said:

> "Manifestly a laundry route does not consist solely of a specific district or territory, nor does it consist of a vested right to, or monopoly of, the patronage of all the residents of said district. Competing laundry companies may possess independent lists of customers residing in the same house, block or district. * * * No laundry company may have a vested property right to claim, as customers, particular individuals, nor all the residents of a specific district. The field is open for fair competition on the part of any and all who desire to solicit patronage."

If a suit at law for damages for the conversion of a laundry route as a whole will not lie, neither will such a suit at law lie for damages for the conversion of the patronage of individual customers in a specific route. It follows that the measure of damages in the present case cannot be based upon the detriment sustained by the loss of customers through the inducements of appellant.

[8] In spite of the fact that a demurrer had been sustained to the second cause of action which was based upon a claim for damages for the loss of a prospective sale of the laundry route through the opposition of appellant, and that this cause of action was abandoned, the court erroneously permitted evidence of this nature to be received over the objection of the appellant. C. O. Blanchard was permitted to testify:

> "Q. Mr. Blanchard, do you remember * * * you had a talk with Mr. Adkins, relative to buying * * * the route? * * * A. Well, he was given the opportunity to get some one to buy it if he could. * * * Offers were made to him several times. * * * He was offered $1,200."

Mr. Hart was also permitted to testify over objection:

> "Q. What was said by Mr. Blanchard in regard to buying * * * his route? * * * A. He said Mr. Adkins was asking too much. * * * The original price asked for the route by Mr. Adkins was $1,700. I said to Mr. Blanchard, do you consider this fair. And he said I don't. And I said, well, what do you consider a fair price? And he said $1,500."

The alleged defeating of a prospective sale of the laundry route, and consequential damages therefor, was not an issue in the case. This evidence was prejudicial. Riverside Water Co. v. Gage, 108 Cal. 240, 245, 41 P. 299.

[9] The court also erred in giving certain instructions which assumed that damages in this case might be predicated on the detriment sustained by a violation of confidential information on the part of appellant with respect to the names of respondent's customers, and the wrongful means of inducing his customers to patronize the appellant. These acts might have been prohibited by injunction, but they were not an issue in this case, and furnished no proper measure of damages for a mere breach of contract. Among these prejudicial and erroneous instructions, so given, were the following:

> "* * * You may award him such damages * * * arising from the defendant Model Laundry Company writing letters to plaintiff's customers in said route informing them that plaintiff would be succeeded by another person upon said route representing said Model Laundry Company, * * * and by supplying him with a list of names and addresses of the customers whom plaintiff had served, * * * and that plaintiff thereby lost customers in or upon said route, and was deprived of * * * the profits therefrom. (If you find these to be facts) you will find for the plaintiff such damages as you may believe from all the circumstances, he has sustained. * * *"

And the following in part:

> "* * * If you believe from a preponderance of the evidence that Roy V. Adkins purchased said laundry route and list of customers from Walker, and * * * intrusted (the list of customers) to the defendant, * * * and that said defendant * * * used the same against the interest, or to the prejudice of the said Adkins, then you should find for the plaintiff, provided also you find from a preponderance of evidence that damages, if any, proximately resulted therefrom to the plaintiff."

It is apparent that the trial court erroneously assumed that damages for a tort in wrongfully divulging trade secrets and appropriating the customers of respondent were a proper measure of compensation in the present action. But a remedy for such intangible property rights does not exist in a mere suit at law for the breach of a contract.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed.

HAWBER v. RALEY et al. (Civ. 6228.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 23, 1928.

1. Release 🔑7, 29(1)—Agreement not to sue owner of car in which plaintiff rode for injuries in collision constituted full release, barring action against owner of the other car.

Instrument signed by one injured in automobile collision, in which she agreed not to sue owner of car in which she rode, and authorized latter to plead agreement in full satisfaction and release of claim or suit, held to constitute full release and satisfaction, barring action against owner and driver of the other car, notwithstanding that owner of car in which plaintiff rode was not driving it, and that release was obtained before commencement of action, since, where there is single injury, there is but one cause of action, for which there can be but one satisfaction.

2. Release 🔑29(3)—Release by one injured in automobile collision to owner of automobile whose negligence did not cause injury barred action against owner of the other car.

Where plaintiff was injured in automobile collision, release to owner of car in which she rode barred action against owner and driver of the other car, notwithstanding that jury by special verdicts found injuries were not proximately caused by negligence of owner of car in which she rode, since, irrespective of source from which compensation for injury is accepted, payment will operate as satisfaction.

3. Release 🔑29(1)—Release held binding as respects joint tort-feasor, notwithstanding inadequate compensation.

Release executed by one injured in automobile collision to owner of one of colliding cars held to bar action against owner of the other car, notwithstanding that compensation was inadequate, since damages resulting from same wrongful transaction are ordinarily inseparable, and plaintiff could not recover part from one and part from another defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by Mrs. E. W. Hawber against Walter Raley, Sr., and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for appellants.

James C. Espey and J. Hampton Hoge, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries suffered by plaintiff as a result of an automobile collision which occurred in San Jose on January 6, 1924, between an automobile driven by E. L. Emery and owned by his wife, Mrs. Harriet E. Emery, in which plaintiff was riding, and one driven by the defendant Raley, Jr., and belonging to his father. The jury rendered a verdict in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $1,245, and judgment was entered thereon, from which defendants have appealed.

It appears from the evidence that Mrs. Emery, the owner of the automobile in which plaintiff was riding, was covered by a policy of public liability insurance issued by a company represented by one of plaintiff's attorneys, and that shortly after the accident, and while plaintiff was still confined in the hospital, said attorney paid plaintiff $380.27, which payment was evidenced by a written agreement, signed by plaintiff and witnessed by one of the insurance company's agents. These facts were developed by defendants at the trial, during the cross-examination of plaintiff, and thereupon defendants asked and were granted leave to amend their answer so as to plead said payment as a satisfaction for the injuries plaintiff received and as a discharge of these defendants from any liability for the tort sued upon. The cause was submitted to the jury, with instructions to render one general and three special verdicts; the latter being in the following forms: First, was any alleged injury to plaintiff proximately caused by the negligence of Mr. Emery? Second, was any alleged injury to plaintiff proximately caused by the negligence of Mrs. A. L. Emery? Third, was any alleged injury to plaintiff proximately caused by the negligence of the defendant Walter Raley, Jr.? The jury answered the first and second special verdicts in the negative, and the third in the affirmative, and consequently rendered a general verdict against defendants for the sum of $1,245.

It is contended by the defendants here, as it was before the trial court, that the effect of said payment to plaintiff and the execution by her of said agreement was to extinguish the cause of action sued upon; the contention being based upon the rule which declares that payment by, and the release of, one of two or more joint tort-feasors operates as a release of all, and estops the injured party from asserting that the person released was not in fault and not liable for the injury. Tompkins v. Clay Street R. R. Co., 66 Cal. 163, 4 P. 1165; Chetwood v. California Nat. Bank, 113 Cal. 414, 45 P. 704; Flynn v. Manson, 19 Cal. App. 400, 126 P. 181; Urton v. Price, 57 Cal. 270.

Plaintiff does not dispute the legal rule above mentioned, but contends that the present case is exempt therefrom, first, for the reason that the document executed by her did not constitute a release and satisfaction, but was merely a covenant not to sue Mrs. Emery, and therefore did not operate to extinguish the cause of action sued upon. The document reads as follows:

"Agreement Not To Sue.—Whereas, Mrs. E. W. Hawber, on the sixth day of January, 1924, was a passenger in an automobile owned by Mrs. Harriet T. Emery, and whereas, at the intersection of Sixth street with William street, San Jose, California, said automobile collided with another automobile, and whereas, the said Mrs. E. W. Hawber did, on account of said collision, then and there receive personal injuries and damages to property: Now therefore, in consideration of the payment of three hundred eighty and twenty-seven hundredths ($380.27) dollars, to the said Mrs. E. W. Hawber paid by the said Mrs. Harriet E. Emery, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged by the said Mrs. E. W. Hawber, the said Mrs. E. W. Hawber covenants and agrees that she will not institute claim, demand, or suit at law, against the said Mrs. Harriet E. Emery in consequence of said collision. It is further agreed and understood between the parties hereto that the payment of the amount above stated is not to be construed as an admission on the part of said Mrs. Harriet E. Emery of any liability whatever in consequence of said collision. And it is further understood and agreed that, should the said Mrs. E. W. Hawber at any time in the future institute claim, demand, or suit at law, against the said Mrs. Harriet E. Emery, the said Mrs. Harriet E. Emery may plead this agreement in full satisfaction and release of said claim, demand, or suit at law. In witness whereof the said Mrs. E. W. Hawber had hereunto set her hand and seal this twenty-third day of January, 1924.

"[Signed]
"(Mrs.) Elletta W. Hawber. [Seal.]
"Witnesseth: J. A. Stewart."

In dealing with the question of the legal effect of a covenant not to sue as contradistinguished from a release and satisfaction, Ruling Case Law, vol. 23, p. 408, states:

> "The authorities almost uniformly hold that a covenant or agreement not to sue one of several joint tort-feasors made on a sufficient consideration is not a technical release of the damages sustained, and will not be held to release either, but the person with whom the agreement or covenant was made must be left to his action on it." (Italics ours.)

And, upon the same subject, Cyc. vol. 34, p. 1090, declares:

> "An absolute covenant not to sue one or less than all of several joint tort-feasors never operates as a release, and not even the covenantee can plead it as a defense, for such a covenant does not extinguish the cause of action, but he must seek his remedy in an action on his covenant." (Italics ours.)

In other words, as said in City of Chicago v. Babcock, 143 Ill. 358, 32 N. E. 271:

> "The legal effect of such a covenant [not to sue] is not the same as that of a release. A covenant not to sue a sole tort-feasor is, to avoid circuity of action, considered in law a discharge, and a bar to an action against such tort-feasor. But the rule is otherwise where there are two or more tort-feasors, and the covenant is with one of them not to sue him. In such case the covenant does not operate as a release of either the covenantee or the other tort-feasors, but the former must resort to his suit for breach of the covenant, and the latter cannot invoke the covenant as a bar to the action against them."

[1, 2] It would therefore appear to be a rule of construction that, where two or more tort-feasors are involved and the document is such that the covenantee may plead the same in abatement of any action which the covenantor might subsequently commence in breach of the obligation contained in said document, and the remedy thereunder is not restricted to an action on the covenant, the document constitutes a release and satisfaction, and not a mere covenant not to sue. An inspection of the document in question here discloses that by its very terms it was agreed "that, should the said Mrs. E. W. Hawber at any time in the future institute claim, demand, or suit at law against the said Mrs. Harriet E. Emery, the said Mrs. Harriet E. Emery may plead this agreement in full satisfaction and release of said claim, demand, or suit at law"; and it would follow, therefore, under the rule of the authorities above cited, that said document constitutes a full release and satisfaction for the injuries received by plaintiff, and that the same is not merely a covenant not to sue. That being so, the second question to be determined is whether, as plaintiff contends, the case is taken out of the operation of the general rule above mentioned because of the fact that the jury by its special verdicts found that plaintiff's injuries were not proximately caused by the negligence of Mrs. Emery, which in effect was a declaration that she was not a joint tort-feasor.

Upon this latter question the authorities are apparently not agreed, but, whatever may be the law elsewhere, the rule seems to obtain in this state that, irrespective of the source from whom the compensation for the injury is accepted, the payment will operate as a satisfaction, which in equity and good conscience does not permit the party so compensated to recover again for the same injury; the ground of the rule being that the validity of the release is in no way dependant upon the validity of the claim, and that therefore it is immaterial whether the person from whom the satisfaction came was or was not legally liable (Tompkins v. Clay Street R. R. Co., supra; Chetwood v. California Nat. Bank, supra); nor does it make any difference however small the compensation thus paid may have been (Flynn v. Manson, supra; Chetwood v. California Nat. Bank, supra). The bar arises, not from any particular form that the proceeding assumes, but from the fact that the injured party has actually received satisfaction or what the law deems is the equivalent. Urton v. Price, supra. Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) vol. 1, p. 236, states the same proposition in the following language:

> "* * * This rule is held to apply, even though the one released is not in fact liable. 'It does not lie in the mouth of such a plaintiff to say he had no cause of action against one who paid him for his injuries.'"

And in Cyc. vol. 34, p. 1088, the rule is given thus:

> "If the release is given on a consideration received in complete satisfaction of the injury, then of course it is immaterial that the releasee was not a guilty party, not even claimed to be such. In any event, an action against the real tort-feasor is barred, since the person injured is entitled to but one satisfaction."

The above rule finds support also in the federal jurisdiction, for in the case of Lovejoy v. Murray, 3 Wall. 1, 18 L. Ed. 129, it is declared:

> "When the plaintiff has accepted satisfaction in full for the injury done him, from whatever source it may come, he is so far affected in equity and good conscience, that the law will not permit him to recover again for the same damages."

And in dealing with the same question, the case of Kirkland v. Ensign-Bickford Co. (D. C.) 267 F. 472, holds:

> "One who compromises a claim does not necessarily admit that the claim was well founded, but the one who receives the consideration is precluded from denying that it was. So it may be said that, when a pretended claim for a tort has been settled by treaty, and satisfaction rendered the claimant by one so connected with the trespass as to be reasonably subject to an action and possible liability as a joint tort-feasor, the satisfaction rendered will release all who may be liable, whether the one released was liable or not. In such a case it is not necessary that it should appear that the party making the settlement was in fact liable. It will be deemed sufficient if there is an appearance of liability; that is, something in the nature of a claim on the one hand, and a possible liability under the rules of the law on the other."

As the decision just quoted from points out, in many of the cases in which it has been held that the releases there dealt with operated only in favor of the covenantees, the releases related to some liability independent of and separate from the tortious act sued upon. Such was the case of Aigeltinger v. Whelan, 133 Cal. 110, 65 P. 125, upon which plaintiff strongly relies, it being there shown that the release pleaded as a bar was given in favor of certain sureties, and was founded on contractual liability not in any way connected with the tortious act for which their principal was being sued in damages. In the present case there is but the single liability or cause of action growing out of one tortious act.

In further support of her position that the present case is not controlled by the general rule above mentioned, plaintiff points out that in those cases arising in this jurisdiction wherein the rule has been applied the releases were obtained subsequent to the commencement of the actions, whereas in the case at bar no action ever was instituted against Mrs. Emery, on behalf of whom the payment was made. We think this distinction cannot be held to alter the application of the rule, however, for it will be found that in a number of well-considered cases from other jurisdictions the rule has been applied, notwithstanding the party from whom the satisfaction was accepted was not sued or even claimed to be liable. Cleveland, etc., Ry. Co. v. Hilligoss, 171 Ind. 417, 86 N. E. 485, 131 Am. St. Rep. 258; Cormier v. Worcester Consol. St. Ry. Co., 234 Mass. 193, 125 N. E. 549; Carpenter v. McElwain Co., 78 N. H. 118, 97 A. 560; Muse v. De Vito, 243 Mass. 384, 137 N. E. 730.

[3] Nor does it matter, as plaintiff urges, that the settlement was made with Mrs. Emery, the owner of the automobile in which plaintiff was riding, and not with Mr. Emery, who was driving the same, for, as already shown, the application of the rule is based upon the fundamental fact that, where there is a single injury, there is but one cause of action, indivisible and inseparable for which both in law and good conscience there can be but one satisfaction. It is immaterial, therefore, from what source the satisfaction may come. Lovejoy v. Murray, supra; Hunt v. Ziegler (Tex. Civ. App.) 271 S. W. 936. It appears from the testimony of plaintiff in the case before us that the money was paid to her by the insurance company on behalf of Mrs. Emery while she was in the hospital, so that she might be able to meet the expenses for medical services and hospitalization; and the record discloses that these same items of expense were included in her demand for damages against these defendants, which the trial court instructed the jury she was entitled to recover, providing it found that the defendants were negligent. Presumably the jury followed the instructions and included these elements of damage in its verdict. It would seem clear, therefore, that, if the judgment herein is allowed to stand, plaintiff will be twice compensated for the same elements of damage. True, she may have received from Mrs. Emery only a part of the damages accruing from her injuries, but, as said in Tompkins v. Clay Street R. R. Co., supra:

> "Damages resulting from the same wrongful transaction are ordinarily inseparable; she could not recover part from one and part from the other defendant."

And again in Flynn v. Manson, supra, as follows:

> "However conflicting may be the current of authorities in respect to the proper construction of a release of the kind in question, it is a well-settled principle of law that in actions ex delicto plaintiff can recover compensation but once. Where the demand is unliquidated, as in the case here, the court cannot hold that the payment of any sum, however small, in consideration of a release does not or cannot operate as compensation for the alleged injuries."

The same proposition is aptly stated in the case of Abb v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 28 Wash. 428, 68 P. 954, 58 L. R. A. 293, 92 Am. St. Rep. 864, as follows:

> "* * * But, when an injured party makes an estimate of the amount of damages he is willing to receive from one, and accepts such sum with the agreement that it shall fully release and discharge the one making the payment, we think it is more than a mere agreement not to sue. It is a release of his cause of action in consideration of a satisfaction."

Under the authorities and for the reasons hereinabove set forth, the judgment is reversed.

WILLIAMS v. SUTPHEN. (Civ. 6326.) ★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 22, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 20, 1928.

1. Husband and wife ⟹133(1)—Evidence held to sustain finding that certain stocks and bonds claimed by wife's residuary legatee were separate property of deceased wife.

In action for accounting of assets of estate by residuary legatee under will against husband of deceased wife individually and as administrator of her estate, evidence held to sustain finding that certain stocks and bonds claimed as part of residuary estate were separate property of deceased wife at time of her death.

2. Appeal and error ⟹1071(1)—Finding that deceased attempted to make gift to plaintiff held not prejudicial to defendant.

In action for accounting of assets of estate by residuary legatee under will against husband of deceased wife, finding that deceased attempted to make a gift of certain stocks and bonds to plaintiff held not prejudicial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth S. Williams against Perry D. Sutphen, individually and as administrator of the estate of his deceased wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Judgment affirmed, and cause remanded for a new trial on certain issue.

E. E. Morris, Robt. E. Austin, and John N. Helmick, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Chas. C. Montgomery and Earl S. Wakeman, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued the defendant individually and as administrator of the estate of his deceased wife for an accounting of the assets of the estate. Plaintiff had a judgment, from which the defendant has appealed on a bill of exceptions.

The issues raised by the complaint were that plaintiff, a sister of deceased, was the residuary legatee under the will; that defendant, as administrator with the will annexed, made an inventory of said estate which was not complete, but that the defendant concealed and claimed as his own, adversely to the interest of the estate, certain personal property, consisting of stocks and bonds of the value of $15,000. It was also alleged that the deceased had in her possession, as her separate property, at the time of her death, certain jewelry and certain stocks and bonds of the value of $7,100, of which she had made a gift to the plaintiff, but that the defendant claimed the jewelry as a part of the estate. The answer denied that any of the property mentioned in the complaint belonged to the estate and denied specially that the deceased had made any gift to the plaintiff of either the jewelry or the stocks and bonds mentioned.

The trial court found that the stocks and bonds enumerated in finding No. 5 were the separate property of the deceased and a part of the estate; that the jewelry referred to in the complaint was given to the plaintiff by the deceased and was not property of the estate; and that the deceased attempted to make a gift to the plaintiff of the stocks and bonds, valued at $7,100; but it was not found whether this gift was completed or whether these stocks and bonds were separate or community property.

On this appeal the appellant attacks finding No. 5 as not supported by the evidence and, as a separate ground for reversal, assigns the failure of the trial court to find whether the stocks and bonds referred to in finding No. 7, which the deceased attempted to give to the respondent, were the separate property of the deceased, and whether they became the property of the respondent.

[1] In support of finding No. 5 respondent points out that the evidence discloses that the appellant and his wife commenced in 1913 to invest in stocks, bonds, and mortgages, keeping a book of account of all these investments, some of which were entered in his name and some in the name of the deceased; that these investments were made while the parties were residents of Portland, Or., and were continued over a period of eight years and until 1921, when the parties returned to California; that under the laws of the state of Oregon all property acquired there in the name of the wife was deemed to be her separate property; and that at all times prior to the death of deceased this property was recognized and treated by both husband and wife as the separate property of the latter. The evidence, as is usual in cases of this kind, was meager, the husband being the one person who had the most intimate knowledge of the facts and circumstances, and he, being adverse to the interests of the respondent, disclosed no more than he deemed necessary.

We have examined the record, and we are satisfied that the trial court was justified in reaching the conclusion, from the facts proved and the inferences applicable, that the bonds referred to in finding No. 5 were at all times the separate property of the deceased and, accordingly, a part of her estate. We should add, however, that if the direct evidence should be insufficient to support this finding, the inference to be drawn from the fact that all this property was acquired in the wife's name, in a state whose laws favor the separate property of husband and wife and are adverse to the theory of community property (Bosma v. Harder, 94 Or. 219, 185 P. 741, 744, 745), would compel us to affirm in the absence of a satisfactory explanation on the part of the appellant. This witness' testimony was so equivocal and unsatisfactory that the trial court could well have rejected it altogether.

[2] Both parties urge that the cause be remanded for the purpose of retrying the issue relating to the stocks and bonds mentioned in finding No. 7. The trial court merely found that the deceased "attempted" to make a gift of these stocks and bonds to the respondent. This would imply that, though a gift was attempted, it was not consummated. Thus the finding is not prejudicial to the appellant, and, as the judgment is wholly silent on the issue, he is not prejudiced by the judgment. But as the respondent consents that the cause be remanded for a trial on this issue, such will be the order.

The judgment is affirmed, but the cause is remanded for a new trial on the sole issue of the ownership of the $7,100 stocks and bonds, referred to in finding No. 7, each party to bear his own costs on this appeal.

FAIRBANKS et al. v. MACREADY. ★

(Civ. 6273.)

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California. June 20, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 19, 1928.

1. Judgment 🔑198—Absence of finding that building was first-class residence, required by restrictions, did not invalidate judgment refusing to enjoin alleged violation.

Assuming there was no finding on issue as to whether building at time of its completion was first-class residence required by restrictions, judgment refusing to enjoin alleged violation of restrictions was not invalidated thereby, since finding which may invalidate judgment supported by findings made is not ground for reversal unless it is shown that evidence was submitted authorizing finding that would invalidate the judgment.

2. Appeal and error 🔑544(2)—Appellate court could not review evidence and ruling on issue, where appeal was taken on judgment roll alone.

Where appeal was taken on judgment roll alone, court could not review ruling striking out evidence on issue as to whether or not building was first-class residence, since evidence and proceedings were not embodied in record.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Modification of opinion.

For former opinion, see 267 P. 716.

Joe Crider, Jr., and Denis & Griffith, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

F. R. McNamee and Luke J. McNamee, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. It is ordered that the opinion in the above-entitled cause be modified by inserting at the end thereof, and immediately preceding the sentence, "The judgment is therefore affirmed," the following:

[1, 2] The general finding relating to the observance of the building restrictions was that said structure "does not now violate the building restrictions, conditions, and reservations imposed upon said tract No. 3752, but, on the contrary, now conforms thereto." Elsewhere in the trial court's decision, however, wherein it declared that the restriction limiting the use of said lots to "first-class" private residences was indefinite and unenforceable, the statement was added that "all evidence on such subject has been and is stricken out"; and plaintiffs therefore contend that the effect of the latter statement was to qualify the general finding so that as the trial court's decision now stands there is no finding on the issue as to whether or not said building at the time of its completion was deemed to be a "first-class" residence. Even assuming this to be true, the judgment is not invalidated thereby, for it has been repeatedly held that failure to find upon an issue, the finding upon which may have the effect of invalidating a judgment fully supported by the findings made, is not ground for reversal unless it be shown by a statement, bill of exceptions, or substitute therefor, that evidence was submitted in relation to the issue, sufficient to authorize such a finding as would have the effect of invalidating the judgment. Llano Investment Co. v. Minton, 190 Cal. 752, 214 P. 855; Kaiser v. Dalto, 140 Cal. 167, 73 P. 828; John A. Roebling's Sons Co. v. Gray, 139 Cal. 607, 73 P. 422; 24 Cal. Jur. 947; 2 Cal. Jur. 525. And, as already noted, none of the evidence in the present case has been brought before us, the appeal having been taken on the judgment roll alone; therefore we have no way of knowing whether plaintiffs offered any evidence whatever to prove that the building, at the time of its completion, was not a "first-class" private residence; or, if any such evidence was so introduced, of determining whether it would be legally sufficient to support an affirmative finding on that issue; nor in the absence of a record on appeal embodying the evidence and the proceedings had before the trial court are we permitted to review the ruling striking out the evidence on that issue. 2 Cal. CONNELL v. CRAWFORD. (Civ. 6258.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 25, 1928.

Rehearing Denied July 25, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 23, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⟹1058(3)—Rejection of deposition of appraiser as to value held not prejudicial, where testimony of another appraiser, who was duly qualified and appraised property at same price, was admitted.

In suit to rescind exchange of properties, refusal to allow deposition of one of appraisers to be read in evidence on ground that he was not an expert was not prejudicial, where another appraiser was adequately qualified and appraised property at same price and his testimony was admitted.

2. Exchange of property ⟹8(4)—Evidence held to support findings of fraud in suit to rescind exchange of property for false representations of defendant's husband.

In suit to rescind exchange of properties on ground of misrepresentations of defendant's husband, acting as her agent, who stated value of timber lands exchanged was $12,000, where value did not in fact exceed $1,000, evidence held sufficient to support court's findings of fraud and deceit.

3. Evidence ⟹588—Trial court sitting as jury may disregard or reconcile inconsistencies in witness' testimony.

Trial court sitting as a jury is judge of the facts and may disregard or reconcile inconsistencies in the testimony of a witness, and witness' entire testimony need not be disregarded by virtue of fact that it was inconsistent or even false in some particulars.

4. Equity ⟹39(1)—Court of equity can mold decree to suit exigencies of case and determine parties' ultimate rights.

Court of equity may do exact justice between parties, and can mold its decree to suit the exigencies of the case and determine the parties' ultimate rights.

5. Exchange of property ⟹8(1)—Finding as to age and condition of person suing to set aside exchange of properties on ground of fraud was immaterial.

In suit to set aside and rescind exchange of properties on ground of fraud, finding that plaintiff was at the time of the exchange of the age of 64 years and infirm in mind and body was immaterial.

6. Contracts ⟹270(2)—Each case must be determined on its own facts as regards applicability of laches to prevent rescission for fraud.

While doctrine of laches applies equally to all fraud, each case must be considered on its own facts, and actions for rescission must be distinguished from actions for damages, for accounting, recovery of money, and the like.

7. Exchange of property ⟹5—Two months' delay in making demand for restitution of premises, after discovery of fraud in contract for exchange of properties, held not to bar rescission.

Two months' delay of plaintiff in seeking restitution of property exchanged after discovery of false representations of defendant's husband held not to bar plaintiff's rescission suit on ground of laches, since delay under the circumstances was not unreasonable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by Mary A. Connell against Jennie C. Lewis Crawford. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sooy & Heywood, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Lovett K. Fraser, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an action in which plaintiff seeks to rescind an exchange of two flats which belonged to her in the city of Oakland for timber land in Idaho, the property of defendant. The defendant having transferred the Oakland property received from plaintiff to an innocent purchaser for value, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff rescinding the exchange, adjudging that plaintiff return the timber land to defendant, and that plaintiff have judgment against defendant for $7,500, the amount received by defendant from the sale of the two flats.

[1] The following evidence is contained in the record: Plaintiff, a woman, 64 years of age, owned two flats in the city of Oakland of the value of $7,500, which had been renting for $80 per month, and also had $3,000 cash on deposit in an Oakland bank. J. G. Crawford, a real estate agent, had offices and was in the real estate business under the name of Shattuck Realty Company within two blocks of plaintiff's property, and at the time of the transaction in question was the husband of defendant Jennie C. Lewis Crawford. The plaintiff listed her property with Crawford to rent or sell. While the property, was so listed and while Crawford was acting as her agent, he borrowed from plaintiff $3,000 on his unsecured note, which has never been paid. After borrowing this money—all that plaintiff had—he started out to get possession of her flats. He told plaintiff that her two flats would not rent nor sell, but that he had a fine proposition whereby she could exchange her two flats in Oakland for 160 acres of fine timber land in Idaho of the value of $14,000 owned by his wife; that the timber land was insured for $12,000; that an offer of $12,000 had been made for it, but that $12,000 was not enough and had been refused, and that this timber property of his wife was of much greater value than plaintiff's property; that it would be a good thing; that her flats were running down so that the only way she could get money would be in a trade. The plaintiff believed everything Crawford, the agent, told her about the timber land in Idaho and signed a deed exchanging her two flats valued at $7,500 for the Idaho timber land, which the court found to be of a value not to exceed $1,000. Crawford was a notary and took his wife's acknowledgment to the deed from her to plaintiff. Plaintiff made the exchange on the advice of Crawford, the husband of defendant, who told her not to talk to anybody about the deal, and without consulting any other person, as he told her that he was a man of honor and would do the very best for her in this deal. As soon as the exchange was made, Crawford and his wife sold the Oakland flats and took a trip East. Plaintiff did not get her deed to the timber land until September, 1923, after the Crawfords returned from the East. Not being able to collect the interest on the $3,000 Crawford note, plaintiff placed the matter in the hands of her attorney, Lovett K. Fraser, to investigate. After investigation by her attorney, she found the timber property to be of little value. Defendant Jennie C. Lewis Crawford had never seen the timber property herself, although she had owned it since 1914, and she had been trying to sell it, through her husband as her agent, without success since that time. Plaintiff had the Idaho property appraised by S. S. Taylor, one of the appraisers who appraised the estate of Lewis, from which appellant received the property, and also had W. H. Herrick, the county assessor of the county wherein the timber land is located, go out with S. S. Taylor and appraise it. After viewing the property and making investigation, they each appraised the property at $600. The court refused to allow the deposition of Taylor to be read in evidence on the ground that he was not an expert. Respondent contends that his deposition should have been received. The disposition of this question is of no moment, as W. H. Herrick, being county assessor and charged with the duty of appraising the property, is deemed adequately qualified, and his testimony is sufficient to support the finding as to the value of the Idaho land. This appraisement was made July 28, 1924, and was the first time plaintiff knew Crawford's statements were false. There was never any insurance on the timber of $12,000 and there was no option on it for $14,000, as stated by Crawford.

[2] The court found that J. G. Crawford was the agent for his wife in making the exchange; that he made the representations; that the plaintiff relied upon the representations; that such representations were false; that the value of the Idaho timber land did not exceed $1,000; and that the value of the Oakland flats was $7,500.

Appellant assigns several reasons wherein the evidence does not support the findings and, further, "that, notwithstanding the finding of dual agency, it appearing that the fraud was practiced upon plaintiff by her own agent, the defendant neither participating in nor knowing it, and plaintiff's confessed negligence having made it possible, there can be no recovery," and that "a cause of action for rescission being pleaded for one fraud, and a cause of action for cancellation for a different fraud having been proved, the lower court erred in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit."

The facts sufficiently support the finding of fraud and deceit. The fraudulent misstatement of value being sufficient (Scott v. Delta Land and Water Co., 57 Cal. App. 320, 207 P. 389; Harris v. Miller, 196 Cal. 8, 235 P. 981; Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 92 P. 1011), the judgment must therefore be affirmed unless the latter assignments quoted possess sufficient merit to require a reversal.

[3, 4] It is true that plaintiff did testify that she did not agree to take the Idaho property and did not sign any agreement to that effect, that she did not know that she had signed a deed, that she thought that she was signing a paper to the effect that Crawford had given a correct report of this timber land, but plaintiff also testified that she did sign the deed and would not have signed it but for the representations made by Crawford, and that the deed was acknowledged by Crawford. Aside from the testimony of respondent, the testimony of Crawford and the instrument itself in evidence establish the fact that she did sign and deliver the deed for the purpose of exchanging the properties. In determining the questions whether or not the respondent executed the deed to appellant for the purpose of such exchange, and whether or not she relied upon the representations of Crawford, the court was not limited to a consideration of the testimony of respondent, but was at liberty to consider any and all evidence in the record in determining this and all issues in the case. The trial court is the judge of the facts and may disregard or reconcile inconsistencies in the testimony of the party defrauded. The entire testimony of the party need not be disregarded or disbelieved because it may be found to be inconsistent or even false in some particulars. Brandt v. Krogh, 14 Cal. App. 39, 111 P. 275; Lindley v. Blumberg, 7 Cal. App. 140, 93 P. 894. Furthermore, a court of equity may do exact justice between the parties (Wills v. Porter, 32 Cal. 516, 64 P. 896), and can mold its decree to suit the exigencies of the case, and may determine the ultimate rights of the parties (Cal. Farm, etc., Co. v. Schiappa-Pietra, 151 Cal. 732, 91 P. 593).

In view of the circumstances surrounding the transaction, it is difficult to see how counsel for appellant can treat seriously his claim that "plaintiff cannot recover on account of a fraud practiced upon her by her own agent of which defendant had no knowledge, and which was made possible by plaintiff's own negligence." It is true that appellant testified that she had no knowledge of the contemplated exchange, but the court evidently did not believe this testimony, nor is it surprising that it did not. Appellant had owned this Idaho property since 1914, and, as stated by her husband Crawford, had been trying since then to sell it and had it listed for sale with him. Crawford brought respondent to his home during the negotiations leading up to the exchange and during the time he was trying to induce her to trade her property with his wife for her Idaho property and introduced respondent to appellant. According to appellant's testimony, they never mentioned the exchange of properties—the only matter in which they had any common interest, each desiring to dispose of her property—but discussed physical ailments. They met again in Crawford's office, and at that meeting no mention was made of property. Appellant signed the deed conveying the Idaho land to respondent and intrusted it to her husband to exchange for the property of respondent, and also testified that her husband did not handle the exchange—that she never allowed him to handle her property. Appellant did not take the trouble to go and see respondent's flats; all she knew about them was that she had seen them from the street and that respondent had paid $6,300 for the property. She did not know whether the exchange was to be even or whether her husband was going to give anything to boot; that her Idaho land was worth $7,000. In other words, her husband brought respondent—a stranger to appellant—to call on her for no other purpose than a social call; that she deeded property worth $7,000 without knowing whether she was exchanging even or was to give a bonus and without knowing the condition of the property she was to receive in exchange. It is not surprising that the court gave no credence to this testimony, nor that it drew the inference therefrom that appellant had knowledge of the fact that her husband was trading her property, which she unquestionably knew was of little value, to respondent for property greatly in excess of the value of her Idaho land, and also that she had knowledge of his false statements.

[5] As to appellant's contention that the finding "that plaintiff was at the time of the exchange of the age of 64 years and infirm in mind and body" is outside the pleadings and unsupported by the evidence, it may be said that, conceding the contention to be correct, the finding is immaterial and in no way affects the judgment.

[6, 7] Appellant's claim that respondent is guilty of laches may be answered by saying that while the doctrine of laches applies equally to all frauds, each case must be considered on its own facts (Dufour v. Weissberger, 172 Cal. 223, 155 P. 984); that in applying the doctrine after discovery it must be borne in mind that a distinction exists between actions in which relief is sought by way of rescission and other actions based on fraud, such as actions for damages, for accounting, for the recovery of money, and the like (12 Cal. Jur. 796). Here, the Oakland flats having been sold to an innocent purchaser, plaintiff was merely seeking the money received from such sale on the return of the Idaho property. The court found that plaintiff first learned that the representations were false—which finding finds support in the evidence—on July 28, 1924, and sought restitution on September 30, 1924, two months thereafter. This delay in making demand under the circumstances was not unreasonable. Munson v. Fishburn, 183 Cal. 206, 190 P. 808.

From what has been said it follows that there is no merit in appellant's final contention that the court erred in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit.

We find no error in the record. The evidence sufficiently supports the finding of fraud and deceit, and the judgment rendered was the only one that in equity and good conscience could have been rendered.

The judgment is affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 25, 1928.
Rehearing Denied July 25, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 23, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨979(2)—Granting new trial for insufficient evidence is conclusive, where there is substantial conflict, in absence of abuse of discretion.

Granting or denying new trial on ground that evidence is insufficient to justify verdict, where there is substantial conflict in evidence, rests so fully in discretion of trial court that its action is conclusive unless it appears that there has been an abuse of discretion.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1015(1)—Order granting new trial for insufficient evidence cannot be sustained, where there is no sufficient material evidence to support contrary verdict.

Where there is no sufficient material evidence upon which contrary verdict could be based, order granting new trial for insufficiency of evidence cannot be sustained on appeal.

3. New trial ⇨70—Trial judge has absolute discretion and must grant new trial for insufficient evidence if not satisfied with verdict, where verdict for moving party would have had support in evidence.

Where motion for new trial is made on ground of insufficiency of evidence and verdict in favor of moving party would have had support in evidence, trial judge has absolute discretion and must grant new trial if he is not satisfied with verdict.

4. New trial ⇨70—Granting plaintiff new trial for insufficiency of evidence held not abuse of discretion in action for injuries in automobile collision.

In action for injuries received in automobile collision, trial court held not to have abused discretion in granting plaintiff new trial for insufficiency of evidence, where evidence would justify belief that defendant and another were both negligent and that their concurring negligence caused collision between cars.

5. Negligence ⇨56(1)—Before negligence is actionable, causal connection must be shown between negligence and injury.

Before negligence can be actionable, causal connection, which proceeds in an unbroken course to very point of infliction of injury, must be shown between negligent act and injury.

6. Automobiles ⇨167(2, 3)—Automobile driver, entering paved portion of highway without signaling intention or yielding right of way to approaching car, held negligent (Motor Vehicle Act, § 131, subd. b, as amended by St. 1925, p. 398).

Automobile driver, entering paved portion of highway without giving any signal of intention and failing to look for approachng car and to yield right of way to approaching car, held guilty of negligence under Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517) § 131, subd. b, as amended by St. 1925, p. 398.

In action for injury in automobile collision, evidence held sufficient to take to jury question whether negligence of defendant entering paved portion of highway without signal and without looking for approaching car, contrary to Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517) § 131, subd. b, as amended by St. 1925, p. 398, was direct contributing cause of plaintiff's injury, where approaching car struck defendant's car and bus before striking car in which plaintiff rode.

8. Automobiles ⇨244(36)—Where automobile after striking defendant's car caused injury, evidence to establish negligence of driver of such other car as sole proximate cause must show damage was not natural or probable consequence of defendant's original negligence (Motor Vehicle Act, § 131, subd. b, as amended by St. 1925, p. 398).

Where defendant drove automobile onto paved portion of highway without signal contrary to Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517) § 131, subd. b, as amended by St. 1925, p. 398, and approaching car, after striking his car, struck car in which plaintiff was riding and injured her, in order that independent negligence of driver of such other car might constitute sole proximate cause of injury and displace defendant's original negligence, evidence must show that damage was in no way natural or probable consequence of defendant's original negligence.

9. Automobiles ⇨245(64)—Where automobile caused injury after colliding with defendant's car, distance car might go after colliding with defendant's car before driver would be chargeable as independent actor held fact question (Motor Vehicle Act, § 131, subd. b, as amended by St. 1925, p. 398).

Where injury from automobile collision resulted when approaching automobile struck defendant's car entering paved portion of highway without signal contrary to Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517) § 131, subd. b, as amended by St. 1925, p. 398, and then struck car in which plaintiff rode, question as to how far such car might go after colliding with defendant's car before driver would be chargeable as independent actor held fact question.

★Rehearing denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Myrtle Springer and another against the Pacific Fruit Exchange and others. Verdict for defendant John Franzoia, and from an order granting a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Irving D. Gibson, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Evan J. Hughes, of Sacramento, for respondents.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendant John Franzoia from an order granting plaintiffs a new trial after a jury had rendered a verdict in his favor in an action against him for damages for personal injuries.

This action was originally brought by plaintiffs against the Pacific Fruit Exchange, a corporation; the appellant John Franzoia; and two fictitious defendants.

Plaintiffs alleged in their complaint, among other things:

> That "at the time of the accident a Buick automobile owned by Pacific Fruit Exchange was in charge of S. J. Ritchie, an employee of said exchange, and was being operated by Ritchie in the course of his employment; that defendants so carelessly drove their automobiles, that they ran into and collided with the car in which plaintiff Myrtle Springer was riding, and as a direct result of said negligence of defendant plaintiff Myrtle Springer was injured," etc.

Both appellant and the Pacific Fruit Exchange answered. When the case was called for trial plaintiff's counsel in open court dismissed the action as to the Pacific Fruit Exchange and proceeded to trial against appellant John Franzoia alone.

The jury returned a unanimous verdict in favor of the appellant John Franzoia. Subsequently, upon motion of plaintiffs, an order was made granting a new trial as against Franzoia, on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. The appeal is from this order.

[1-3] The rule is well established that the granting or denying a new trial on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, rests so fully in the discretion of the trial court that its action is conclusive upon this court, unless it appears that there has been an abuse of discretion. Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 413, 35 P. 1024; Warner v. Thomas, etc., Works, 105 Cal. 411, 38 P. 960; Eidinger v. Sigwart, 13 Cal. App. 667, 110 P. 521; Bjorman v. Fort Bragg Redwood Co., 92 Cal. 500, 28 P. 591; Waltz v. Silveria, 25 Cal. App. 717, 145 P. 169; Colusa R. R. Co. v. Glenn, 25 Cal. App. 634, 144 P. 993; People v. Petros, 25 Cal. App. 236, 143 P. 246; Gordon v. Roberts, 162 Cal. 506, 123 P. 288; Rosenberg v. Moore, 194 Cal. 392, 229 P. 34; Bledsoe v. Decrow, 132 Cal. 312, 64 P. 397. Appellant admits the correctness of this rule, but insists that in this case there is no evidence that would support a verdict against him and, therefore, the trial court abused its discretion in granting a new trial to plaintiffs.

If there is no sufficient material evidence upon which a contrary verdict could be based, the order granting a new trial cannot be sustained on appeal. Harvey v. Machtig, 73 Cal. App. 667, 239 P. 78; Empire Investment Co. v. Mort, 169 Cal. 732, 147 P. 960; Wendling Lumber Co. v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 153 Cal. 411, 95 P. 1029. On the contrary, if the case be one where a verdict in favor of the moving party would have had support in the evidence, the judge of the trial court is vested with absolute discretion in the matter and it would be his duty to grant a new trial if he is not satisfied with the verdict, and this court will not interfere with the action of the trial court in such a case, even if it believes that the weight of the evidence was the other way. Condee v. Gyger, 126 Cal. 546, 59 P. 26; Wendling Lumber Co. v. Glenwood Lumber Co., supra; Curtiss v. Starr, 85 Cal. 376, 24 P. 806; Bjorman v. Fort Bragg Redwood Co., supra.

With these rules in mind, the record has been examined with a view to determining whether it can be said that the trial court abused its discretion in granting the motion.

Appellant strenuously contends that there is a total failure of proof of negligence, and particularly any negligence whatever on his part, which was the proximate cause of the injury to plaintiff Myrtle Springer.

[4] The plaintiff Myrtle Springer was injured when a Buick touring car owned by defendant Pacific Fruit Exchange, and driven by its employee S. J. Ritchie, collided with a Franklin automobile driven by J. M. Bryan, in which plaintiff and others were riding. The Buick was traveling west and the Franklin car east. The accident occurred about 5:30 p. m. on Sunday, September 27, 1925, on the state highway in Yolo county, about three miles west of the city of Sacramento and at a point near a gasoline service station abutting the highway, known as "Hart's Service Station." The appellant Franzoia, prior to the accident, had parked his Peerless automobile off of the paved portion of the highway and on the private property or private driveway of the "Hart Service Station," and was headed west. Franzoia started his machine and turned it towards the highway and was attempting to drive onto the paved portion of the highway. A Buick automobile, driven west by said Ritchie, was approaching from the east on the right or north half of the 18-foot pavement. Many other machines were going east on the left or south half of the pavement. Franzoia's automobile had gone onto the pavement a distance of about 3 feet at the time it came in contact with the oncoming Buick. At the time the Peerless and Buick came together, both machines were moving, the Peerless very slowly and the Buick very fast, but according to Ritchie about 25 miles per hour, and came in contact with one another at an angle of about forty-five degrees, and on the right or north half of the pavement; both machines being headed in a general westerly direction. The left front wheel and fender of the Peerless came in contact with the right front wheel and fender of the Buick. The Buick, after colliding with the Peerless, went in a southwesterly direction across the highway a distance of about 30 or 40 feet, and hit a stage coach which was moving east on the south side of the highway and entirely off of the paved portion thereof. After hitting the stage coach back of the front seat, knocking a hole in its gasoline tank, tearing off part of the running board and back fender, and knocking the back wheel out of line, the Buick, apparently uninjured, did not stop, but veered back to about the center of the highway and traveled west on the paved portion thereof about 40 or 50 feet, and then turned south again and hit the rear end of a Franklin automobile that was moving east on the south side of the paved highway, and in which plaintiff Myrtle Springer was riding, overturning the Franklin and inflicting serious and permanent injuries upon plaintiff. There is no evidence in the record that the Buick was injured until it ran into the Franklin, and in this collision the radiator, front left wheel, and fender on the left side of the Buick were demolished. The Buick, after hitting the Franklin, continued west for about 30 feet, and when it came to a standstill was headed off the pavement to the southwest. The Franklin was also badly damaged.

Mr. Ritchie, the driver of the Buick, testified that he was within 25 or 40 feet of the Peerless when he first saw it approaching the paved portion of the highway in front of him; that he immediately applied the footbrake and held fast to the steering wheel; that at this time about 3 feet of the front portion of the Peerless car was on the pavement and that the driver was looking straight ahead and gave no signal that he intended to enter the highway, and that there was no automobile between his machine and the Peerless when he first saw the Peerless, and that the front wheel of his car came in contact with the left wheel of the Peerless. He further testified that when his machine came in contact with the Peerless, his machine skidded across the highway and struck the stage, which was traveling east, and he made every effort to steer his car in the middle of the road, but it would not respond to his efforts after he collided with the Peerless.

The respondents contend that the Peerless car driven by appellant incapacitated the Buick and its driver and forced the Buick off its course, and upon the left side of the highway, and rendered it uncontrollable by the driver. There is no testimony in the record, except that given by Ritchie, that the contact of the Peerless with the Buick in any way accelerated the motor of the Buick, and no evidence at all that any part of the steering gear or machinery of the Buick was injured, or that Ritchie himself was incapacitated by the collision with the Peerless.

[5] Counsel for appellant contends that if it be admitted that appellant was negligent in not giving the proper signal when he came upon the paved portion of the highway, still such negligence was not the proximate cause of the injury to plaintiff. The law is, of course, well settled that before negligence can be actionable, a causal connection, which proceeds in an unbroken course to the very point of the infliction of the injury, must be shown between the negligent act and the injury; for no matter how negligent a defendant may have been in the abstract, a cause of action is not made out unless that negligence is in some way fastened to the particular injury for which recovery is sought.

[6, 7] The Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1923, p. 517, and Stats. 1925, p. 398), section 131, subdivision b, provides:

> "The driver of a vehicle entering a public highway from a private road or drive shall yield the right of way to all vehicles approaching on said public highway."

It was therefore the duty of appellant, the operator of the Peerless, to yield the right of way in order to avoid the collision with the approaching Buick.

We think the evidence is sufficient to show that appellant failed to give any signal of his intention to enter the paved portion of the highway, and that he also failed to look out for the approaching Buick and to yield the right of way to avoid the collision with the Buick. Appellant was therefore guilty of negligence.

We also think, from a careful examination of the record, that there is abundant evidence to warrant the court or jury in finding that Ritchie, the driver of the Buick, was traveling at a dangerous and excessive rate of speed when he collided with appellant's Peerless, notwithstanding his testimony to the contrary. If Ritchie had been traveling at a lawful rate of speed and had his car under control, he could have avoided the collision with the appellant. On the other hand, if appellant, when he approached the paved portion of the highway, had looked in the direction from which the traffic was coming, he would have seen the approaching Buick and could have waited until it passed him, and thus have avoided the collision. The court or jury would therefore be warranted in saying that appellant and Ritchie were both negligent and that their concurrent negligence caused the collision between their two cars. This being true, the appellant would be a participant in whatever injury might reasonably follow from his negligent acts. The Peerless deflected the Buick from its course, and as the Buick veered from one side of the road to the other it finally came in contact with the Franklin and caused the injury to plaintiff.

The next question that arises is this: Was the negligence of appellant one of the direct contributing causes to plaintiff's injury, or was it the independent negligence of Ritchie, after he had collided with appellant, that was the sole cause of the injuries to plaintiff? We think this is a question of fact to be determined from all the evidence in the case.

Mr. Justice Henshaw, in the case of Merrill v. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co., 158 Cal. 499, 111 P. 534, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134, in discussing the proximate cause of an explosion, used an illustration which we think is applicable to the case at bar, to wit: An explosion occurred outside of a vessel which caused a leakage in the hold of the vessel through which sea water entered and damaged some goods. A logician would say that the sea water damaged the goods, while the law would say that the explosion was the proximate cause of the damage, and whosoever caused the explosion would be liable.

In 19 California Jurisprudence, 573, it is said:

> "Although, in order to be concurrent, the negligence of two persons must be simultaneous, a primary act of negligence may be so continuous in its character that it conjoins with an act of negligence of another committed at a much later date."

[8-11] In order that the independent negligence of Ritchie might constitute the sole proximate cause of the injury to plaintiff, and displace the original negligence of appellant, it must appear from the evidence that Ritchie's negligence was so disconnected in time and nature as to make it plain that the damage occasioned was in no way the natural or probable consequence of the original negligence of appellant. Therefore, how far the Buick car might go after it collided with the Peerless before the driver would be chargeable as an independent actor would also be a question of fact.

When we consider the evidence as disclosed by the record in the light of the foregoing well-established rules, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that the injuries to plaintiff were caused either by the concurrent negligence of appellant and Ritchie, or by the independent negligence of Ritchie, for, as heretofore stated, this is a question of fact for the court or jury. While we think that the greater weight of the evidence favors the contention of appellant, that plaintiff's injuries were caused by the independent negligence of Ritchie; still, there is substantial evidence in the record to support a finding that plaintiff was injured by the concurrent negligence of both appellant and Ritchie. If plaintiff was injured by the concurrent negligence of both appellant and Ritchie then each is and both are the proximate cause of her injuries, and she may recover from either or both at her election. Merrill v. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co., supra; Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (3d Ed.) § 338a; Doeg v. Cook, 126 Cal. 213, 58 P. 707, 77 Am. St. Rep. 171; Keiper v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 36 Cal. App. 362, 172 P. 180; Lininger v. San Francisco, etc., Railroad Co., 18 Cal. App. 411, 123 P. 235; Muller v. Hale, 138 Cal. 163, 71 P. 81; Blackwell v. American Film Co., 48 Cal. App. 681, 192 P. 189; Spear v. United Railroads, 16 Cal. App. 637, 117 P. 956; Noce v. United Railroads, 53 Cal. App. 512, 200 P. 819; Martin v. Southern Pacific Co., 44 Cal. App. 3, 185 P. 1030; Hansen v. Market St. Ry. Co., 64 Cal. App. 426, 221 P. 955.

Therefore, there being sufficient evidence to support a conclusion contrary to that reached by the jury, we are not authorized to hold that the trial court abused its discretion in granting plaintiffs a new trial.

The order appealed from is, therefore, affirmed.

We concur: HART, Acting P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

MEYER v. ZUBER. (Civ. 3540.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 26, 1928.

1. Contracts 🔑94(1)—Friendship and affection of parties do not constitute "confidential relation."

Mere friendship and affection existing between parties to contract do not constitute "confidential relation."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Confidential Relation.]

2. Pleading 🔑8(15)—Mere conclusions of pleader are not sufficient pleading of fraud.

Fraud cannot be pleaded by allegations consisting of mere conclusions of pleader without statement of any fraudulent act.

3. Mortgages 🔑369(3)—Inadequacy of price is not ground for setting aside sale under deed of trust.

Sale under deed of trust will not be set aside for mere inadequacy of price.

4. Mortgages 🔑356—In view of dates of execution of and sale under deed of trust and its requirement as to notice of sale, notice by publication held enough (Code Civ. Proc. § 692; Civ. Code, § 2924).

Where trust deed required only that notice of sale be published in a newspaper, it was immaterial that no other notice was given;

Code Civ. Proc. § 692, and Civ. Code, § 2924, being inapplicable, because the provisions of the former section relating to notice were added after the sale in question, and the similar provisions of the latter section were limited to sale authorized by instrument executed after a date subsequent to that of the trust deed in question.

5. Mortgages ⚷369(7)—Statement of mortgagee, after commencing proceedings for sale, that he would commence them unless further security was given, held shown harmless by complaint.

That five days before the sale under trust deed, but long after commencement of the necessary proceedings to effect the sale, mortgagor made the misleading statement to mortgagee that he was going to direct the commencement of such proceedings unless mortgagee gave further security, is shown not to have been injurious by allegation, of mortgagor's complaint to have the sale set aside, that mortgagee well knew that five days was not enough to enable mortgagor to acquire the money necessary to satisfy the trust deed.

6. Mortgages ⚷369(7)—Complaint to set aside sale held not to show compliance with condition of promise of forbearance—payment of interest as best mortgagor could.

Complaint to set aside sale under trust deed, alleging that mortgagee promised that he would not attempt sale if mortgagor paid the interest as best he could, does not show compliance with the condition on which the promise was dependent; it not alleging that mortgagor was unable to pay the interest, but alleging that he with reasonable notice of sale could have obtained funds to satisfy the indebtedness.

7. Mortgages ⚷335—Rule of waiver, by acceptance of overdue payment, to thereafter insist without demand on prompt payment, held not to affect sale proceedings after entire indebtedness is due.

Rule that mortgagee, by acceptance of overdue payment of interest, waives right thereafter to insist on prompt payments, without first demanding that such payments be made at the time specified in note and trust deed, applicable to prevent exercise of right under acceleration clause, has no application to prevent sale under the trust deed, where there was no election to accelerate time of payment by reason of mortgagor's numerous defaults, but proceedings for sale were commenced long after the entire indebtedness became due and payable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by H. E. Meyer against Herman Zuber. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Faucett & Ring, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Howard F. Sheperd and B. L. Hoyt, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The trial court sustained the defendant's demurrer to the third amended complaint, without leave to amend, and judgment was thereupon entered against the plaintiff, who prosecutes this appeal from the judgment.

The action was commenced January 20, 1926, for the recovery of certain real property purchased by the defendant at a sale under a trust deed on January 20, 1921. The facts herein stated are alleged in the complaint.

The trust deed was executed by the plaintiff October 18, 1915, to secure the payment of his promissory note of the same date for $13,868, payable to the defendant two years after date, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly, and if not so paid to be compounded quarterly. No payments were ever made on the principal, and only the following payments of interest were made: 1915, $250; 1916, $400; 1917, $950; 1918, $286.70; 1919, $582; 1920, $114.50.

At all times up to about five days before the sale, "the relationship between plaintiff and defendant Zuber was friendly and intimate and * * * Zuber pretended to said plaintiff and plaintiff believed that he, the said defendant, entertained an affectionate and friendly feeling and regard for him. * * * Zuber at all of the times herein mentioned represented to said plaintiff that if he paid the interest on said indebtedness, as best he could, said Zuber would not attempt to sell or foreclose for sale said property, * * * that he would not press plaintiff for the principal amount thereof, but that plaintiff could pay the same when and as he was financially able so to do. * * * Relying upon all of the foregoing representations and believing them to be true, said plaintiff made no effort or attempt to satisfy and was not financially able to satisfy said indebtedness, excepting the interest thereupon." Payments of interest were made as stated herein. "Said payments were made as aforesaid from time to time and at irregular intervals without objection or protest from the said Zuber. * * * At none of said times or at any time, except as hereinafter alleged, did said Zuber notify or intimate to said plaintiff that said interest and principal must be paid as in said trust deed provided, or that he would cause said premises to be sold because of the default of said plaintiff."

At the time of the sale "there was upon said premises a winery and distillery, tools, equipment and paraphernalia used for the fermentation and manufacture of wine, and several thousand gallons of wine; that at said time said personal property, equipment and wine was of the reasonable market value of upwards of $10,000. * * * No ready market was available for the sale of said wine in wholesale lots, and * * * said wine could only have been sold after considerable negotiation, requiring the expenditure of considerable time. * * * Said winery and equipment could have been moved therefrom in the course of a month or thereabouts, and said premises sold for upwards of $100,000 and on or about the 21st day of January, 1921, said premises were of a reasonable market value in excess of $100,000."

"Having fraudulently and deceitfully led plaintiff to believe that he would not cause said premises to be sold in satisfaction of the indebtedness secured by said trust deed, and having lulled plaintiff into a false security, * * * said defendant Zuber falsely, wrongfully and fraudulently suffered said belief to continue in plaintiff until such time as the said defendant well knew that * * * plaintiff could not readily and immediately market said wine or readily and immediately dispose of the said personal property used in the manufacture thereof, and * * * could not acquire the funds necessary to satisfy his said indebtedness to defendant Zuber, defendant Zuber, without reasonable notice and without any demand for his debt, wrongfully, fraudulently and deceitfully caused the trustee named in said trust deed to sell said premises that said defendant might acquire the same for a mere pittance without notifying said plaintiff of his intention so to do until about five days prior to said sale, and without theretofore demanding satisfaction of said indebtedness, and without affording plaintiff any reasonable opportunity to obtain the money necessary therefor, though defendant Zuber well knew that had he not deceived plaintiff by his representations that he would not press plaintiff for said money and that said premises would not be sold, said plaintiff with ample, reasonable and adequate notice of the intended sale, could have obtained the funds necessary to satisfy said indebtedness."

Five days before the sale the defendant "for the first time informed said plaintiff that he was going to direct the commencement of the necessary proceedings to effect such sale unless plaintiff gave defendant further security for said debt. * * * At that time, as said defendant well knew, plaintiff was in ill health and unable to attend to his business affairs. * * * Prior thereto * * * defendant had already caused to be published notice of said intended sale for the 20th day of January, 1921." Defendant then knew that the plaintiff was ignorant of the fact of such publication. "Zuber thus falsely, fraudulently, deceitfully and wrongfully misrepresented said matter to plaintiff that said plaintiff might not arrange for the satisfaction of said indebtedness prior to said trustee's sale. * * * Zuber then and there well knew that five days or less was an inadequate length of time to enable plaintiff to acquire the money necessary to satisfy said trust deed."

"Plaintiff is informed and believes, and accordingly avers, that said sale was advertised at least once a week for four successive weeks in the California Independent, an obscure newspaper published in Los Angeles, Cal., for the dissemination of trade and mercantile news, and the publication of legal notices, and not read by the public generally, to wit, on the 23d and 30th days of December, 1920, and on the 6th and 13th days of January, 1921." No notice was posted upon the premises or at any other place. "Plaintiff had no notice or knowledge of said sale until about three days prior to the date thereof. * * * Zuber wrongfully, fraudulently and deceitfully caused notice thereof to be withheld from plaintiff that he might not be afforded the opportunity of acquiring the funds necessary to satisfy said indebtedness, and that defendant Zuber might acquire said premises himself."

"At said sale, and according to the plan and design of said defendant Zuber, there was no competitive bidding. * * * No other bids were made for the purchase of said premises except the bid of said Zuber, as plaintiff is informed and believes, in the sum of $6,388. * * * At the time of said sale and during most of the time thereafter, the plaintiff has been feeble and ill and is now 74 years of age."

"Within two or three months after said trustee's sale, he sought the advice and counsel of several attorneys at law respecting his rights in said premises, and was by them advised, after stating the facts in the case to them, that said sale was valid and binding. * * * In reliance upon said advice and counsel, plaintiff did not institute any action for the prosecution of his rights in the premises." Plaintiff was first advised "as to his rights in the premises * * * shortly prior to the 20th day of January, 1926." The defendant has not been "prejudiced by reason of the delay in the institution thereof."

The trustee's deed, which is attached to and made a part of the complaint, recites that Zuber "has been obliged to and has paid out and advanced the sum of $2,016.88 on account of taxes and assessments levied and assessed against the property, * * * all of said payments and advancements having been made in accordance with the provisions of said deed of trust, * * * there being due and unpaid the total sum of $21,065," and that the property was sold by the trustee to Zuber for the sum of $14,000.

The defendant demurred to the complaint on the grounds that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, that the action was barred by the statute of limitations, that the plaintiff had been guilty of laches, and on numerous other grounds. It is unnecessary to consider any other than the first ground stated.

[1-3] The allegations to the effect that "the relationship between plaintiff and defendant Zuber was friendly and intimate" may be dismissed from consideration, as mere friendship and affection existing between parties to a contract do not constitute a confidential relation. Cox v. Schnerr, 172 Cal. 371, 378, 156 P. 509. The allegations of fraud, with one exception to be hereinafter discussed, consist of the mere conclusions of the pleader, without the statement of any fraudulent act. Fraud cannot be so pleaded. 12 Cal. Jur. 800. Mere inadequacy of price is not a sufficient ground for setting the sale aside. Winbigler v. Sherman, 175 Cal. 270, 275, 165 P. 943.

[4] The fact that no notice of sale was given except by publication is immaterial. The trust deed required only that notice of sale be published "at least once a week for two weeks, in some newspaper published in Los Angeles." The complaint alleges that notice was published for four weeks in "a newspaper published in Los Angeles." No other or different notice was required. Sargent v. Shumaker, 193 Cal. 122, 130, 223 P. 464. The provisions of section 692 of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to notice of sale under a trust deed were added to that section after the sale here in question had been made, and the similar provisions of section 2924 of the Civil Code are expressly limited to sales authorized by instruments executed after July 27, 1917. Neither of those sections, therefore, is applicable.

[5] Relying on Winbigler v. Sherman, supra, appellant contends that he was misled to his prejudice by Zuber's statement, made five days before the sale, "that he was going to direct the commencement of the necessary proceedings to effect such sale unless plaintiff gave defendant further security for said debt," the statement implying that such proceedings had not been commenced. It may be conceded that this is a sufficient allegation of a fraudulent act. Since the trust deed required a notice of two weeks to be given of any contemplated sale thereunder, the alleged statement tended to create a belief in the plaintiff's mind that he had at least two weeks thereafter in which to raise the money necessary to pay the indebtedness. The weakness of appellant's argument, however, appears from the further allegation in the same paragraph that "Zuber then and there well knew that five days or less was an inadequate length of time to enable plaintiff to acquire the money necessary to satisfy said trust deed." The plaintiff, therefore, was not injured by the defendant's alleged statement, because he could not have raised the money if he had been correctly informed at that time of the true facts, and the defendant was under no legal obligation, either at that or at any prior time, to give the plaintiff any notice other than by the publication which was made.

[6] The complaint alleges that the defendant's promise of forbearance was conditional upon the plaintiff's payment of "the interest on said indebtedness, as best he could." The complaint does not allege that the plaintiff was unable to pay such interest, even if it be conceded that he was justified in relying upon such an uncertain and indefinite promise. To the contrary, it is alleged that "plaintiff with ample, reasonable and adequate notice of the intended sale could have obtained the funds necessary to satisfy said indebtedness." If he could have obtained sufficient money to satisfy the whole indebtedness, he certainly could have obtained enough to pay the interest, and he was in default in the payment thereof from the first year. It does not appear, therefore, that the plaintiff performed the condition upon which the defendant's promise was dependent.

[7] Appellant contends that by accepting payments of interest from time to time long after the same became due the defendant waived his right thereafter to insist on prompt payments, without first demanding that such payments be made at the times specified in the promissory note and trust deed. The rule for which appellant contends has been applied to the acceptance of overdue payments by a mortgagee where the mortgage or the promissory note secured thereby contained an acceleration clause. The promissory note secured by the trust deed involved in this action contained such a clause, but the defendant did not elect to accelerate the time of payment by reason of the plaintiff's numerous defaults. This action was commenced long after the entire indebtedness became due and payable, without reference to the acceleration clause. The doctrine for which appellant contends is inapplicable in such a case.

The respondent contends that the complaint is insufficient in many other respects, but it is unnecessary to discuss any other alleged defects, as enough has been stated to show that the demurrer was properly sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SINGH. (Cr. 1036.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California. June 28, 1928.

1. Sodomy 🔑1—Sexual penetration is essential to offense under statute (Pen. Code, § 287).

Under Pen. Code, § 287, sexual penetration of the anus is essential to establish the crime against nature.

2. Sodomy 🔑6—Evidence held to sustain conviction of crime against nature (Pen. Code, § 287).

Evidence held to sustain conviction of crime against nature under Pen. Code, § 287.

3. Sodomy 🔑6—Penetration may be established by circumstantial evidence (Pen. Code, § 287).

Under Pen. Code, § 287, penetration may be established by circumstantial evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; E. P. McDaniel, Judge.

Rola Singh was convicted of the crime against nature, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Ray Manwell, of Marysville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was convicted in the superior court in and for the county of Yuba of the infamous crime against nature (Pen. Code, § 286), and he appeals from the judgment of conviction and the order denying him a new trial.

The alleged pederastic performance is alleged to have taken place in the city of Marysville, on or about the 4th day of February, 1928. The party upon whom the crime is alleged to have been committed was a boy approaching, if not just past, his majority.

It appears that two police officers, while patrolling their "beats" in the neighborhood of Tenth and D streets in the city above named, at or near the hour of 2 o'clock a. m. of the day, also named above, noticed a Ford coupé parked or standing "in a secluded spot," on the east side of D street, near Tenth, and facing or heading in a northerly direction. In that immediate vicinity there were no residences. Conceiving that an automobile parked in so unusual a place in the city at that time of the day was a circumstance of more or less a suspicious character, or at least one justifying an investigation, the officers went to the coupé, and, turning a flashlight into the car, found the defendant awake and "crowded right over" the young man referred to, who was asleep and lying across the seat of the coupé on his left side, with his head partly under the steering wheel. The officers testified that the trousers of the young man were down and below the posterior part of his anatomy, that his union undersuit was open behind, that his coat was turned up, and that his buttocks were bare or exposed. The officers awakened the young man and, when they attempted to take him from the car, he resisted and started to fight. They arrested and took the two men to the city jail. Suspecting from appearances that the crime charged in the information had been committed, the officers sent for Dr. P. B. Hoffman, a physician of Marysville, and the doctor, immediately after the arrest of the two men—near the hour of 3 o'clock a. m.—appeared at the jail and subjected the anus of the young man and the private parts of the defendant to a critical examination. He took from the private parts of the defendant some filthy matter, placed it in a tin box, and caused it to be subjected to a chemical test by the director of the laboratory at the Rideout Hospital in said city. The following day Dr. Hoffman, assisted by Dr. Sloan, a physician of Marysville, again made an examination of the rectal regions of the young man's anatomy and also the private parts of the defendant and found the physical condition of the young man and to some extent that of the defendant as Dr. Hoffman had found them an hour approximately after the two men were brought to the jail.

The foregoing comprehends a sufficient general statement of the facts.

[1] The only point urged here by the defendant for a reversal is that there was an utter failure on the part of the people to show that, assuming that the accused attempted or had an intent to commit the abomination of which he stands convicted, there was effected by the accused a sexual penetration of the young man's anus. Of course, as is true of the crime of rape, to establish the infamous crime against nature it must be shown by the prosecution beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused had effected a sexual penetration of the anus of the party upon whom it is alleged that he satiated his bestial lust. Pen. Code, § 287. That section of the Code, referring to the crime against nature as denounced and penalized by section 286 of said Code, declares that "any sexual penetration, however slight, is sufficient to complete the crime."

[2, 3] The record discloses sufficient evidentiary support to the verdict. The circumstances revealed by the testimony of the police officers and that of the two medical doctors who professionally examined the body of the young man and the private parts of the defendant within a short time after the latter and his companion were arrested and incarcerated in the city jail—Dr. Hoffman within an hour after the arrest and Dr. Sloan with Dr. Hoffman the following day—point with convincing directness to the guilt of the accused. The condition of unspeakable filth in which the doctors, upon a physical examination of the two men, found the respective parts of their bodies directly employed in the perpetration of the abomination, imperatively forbids, from every consideration of decency, a description thereof in this opinion. We therefore purposely refrain from reproducing herein the sickening results of the examination of the parts of the bodies of the two men as the doctors detailed them before the jury. It is enough to say that a reading of all the testimony of the police officers making the arrest, of the doctors who conducted the appropriate physical examination of the defendant and the young man, and of the testimony of the chemist who subjected to the test of a chemical analysis the filthy feces taken by Dr. Hoffman from the private parts of the defendant, will clearly show that the people, in their presentation of this case to the jury, developed facts and circumstances from which the jury, believing said testimony, as presumptively they did, were justified in inferring and concluding that sexual penetration was effected by the accused. People v. Howard, 143 Cal. 316, 317, 76 P. 1116. Obviously, the fact of penetration in a case of this character, as in that of rape, may be shown, as may any other ultimate fact, by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence. Indeed, it is undoubtedly true that in many of such cases as this, as well as of cases of rape, it is essential to prove the fact of penetration by means of circumstantial evidence.

The defense sought to show, by means of hypothetically framed questions to a local physician of Marysville other than either of those above named, that the filth removed from the private parts of the defendant consisted of matter which might naturally accumulate where a person is habitually lacking in cleanliness, so far as his person is concerned, and that the abrasions found by Drs. Hoffman and Sloan in the orifice of the anus of the young man could and might have been produced by certain causes other than that which, in the opinion of the physicians and the chemist testifying for the people, produced the conditions from which their opinions were formed. The most that can be said of the testimony thus presented by the defendant is that it created a substantial conflict in the evidence, the probative effect of which was solely for the jury's determination.

Both the young man and the defendant testified for the defense. The first named stated that he was under the influence of liquor when arrested, and the defendant testified that he was more or less in a like condition. The former declared that he had no recollection of anything which might have occurred prior to his arrest or thereafter until he found himself early in the morning of his arrest at the police station. He remembered having been subjected to a physical examination by Dr. Hoffman. He denied having permitted the accused to treat him in the manner indicated by the charge in the information. The accused denied having committed the offense charged. All this testimony was for the jury to consider in comparison with that introduced by the people showing circumstances which, as before we have stated, strongly support the truth of the charge against the accused.

No sound reason has been shown why the judgment and the order should not stand, and, accordingly, both are affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

ADAMS v. SLEE. (Civ. 3448.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 23, 1928.

1. Waters and water courses 🔑231—Statutory provision that certificate of sale must be dated on day of tax sale held merely directory (Irrigation District Act, § 45).

Provision of Irrigation District Act, § 45 (St. 1897, p. 269), that certificate of sale shall be dated on day of tax sale, held merely directory, since object of statute is satisfied if actual date of sale is recited, so as to enable those concerned to know when time for redemption expired.

2. Waters and water courses 🔑231—Delayed publication of delinquent tax list does not of itself invalidate tax sale and deed based thereon (Irrigation District Act, § 42).

Delayed publication of delinquent tax list of irrigation district does not of itself invalidate tax sale and deed based thereon, notwithstanding Irrigation District Act, § 42 (St. 1897, p. 268).

3. Waters and water courses 🔑231—Right of redemption is fixed and controlled by law in force at time of tax sale (Irrigation District Act, § 47 [1909, p. 429], as amended by St. 1921, p. 1109).

Right of redemption of property of irrigation district sold for taxes is fixed and controlled by law in force at time of tax sale, Irrigation District Act, § 47 (St. 1909, p. 429), providing for five-year period, having been amended by St. 1921, p. 1109, reducing period to three years.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑216—Provisions of Irrigation District Act requiring bidders to pay for duplicate certificate of sale, and excusing payment when district is purchaser, held not unconstitutional (Irrigation District Act, § 44).

Irrigation District Act, § 44 (St. 1897, p. 269), requiring bidders to pay $2 for duplicate certificate of sale and redemptioner to repay same, and excusing such payment when district is purchaser, held not unconstitutional as discriminatory.

5. Waters and water courses ⟹231—Description of property in tax deed held not fatally uncertain and defective, in view of recorded map and judicial knowledge of relative location of sections.

In action to quiet title, in which plaintiff's claim was based on tax deed executed by collector of irrigation district after sale of land for failing to pay taxes levied by such district, description of property in deed held not fatally uncertain and defective, in view of recorded map which was introduced in evidence and judicial knowledge that court may take of relative location of sections.

6. Evidence ⟹460(4)—Recorded map is admissible to make complete descriptions set out in tax deed.

It is proper to receive recorded map in evidence in order to make complete descriptions set out in tax deed.

7. Evidence ⟹10(4)—Court takes judicial notice of location of townships and sections and fact that they can be identified on ground by reference to government records (Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subds. 2, 3).

Court can take judicial notice of location of townships and sections and of fact that they can be identified on ground by reference to official government records, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subds. 2 and 3.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action to quiet title by David Adams against J. Noah H. Slee. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Walter C. Maloy, of Covina, for appellant.
H. E. Gleason and John F. Poole, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BUCK, Justice pro tem. The defendant appeals from a judgment quieting the title of plaintiff and respondent to 40 acres of land in Madera county within the boundaries of the Madera irrigation district. Plaintiff's claim of title is based on a tax deed executed by the collector of the Madera irrigation district after a sale of the land for failure to pay certain taxes levied by the irrigation district.

Appellant claims that the tax deed relied on by respondent is void for the following reasons: (1) That the tax deed was prematurely executed; (2) that there was an unlawful delay in the publication of the delinquent tax list; (3) that the provisions of section 44 of the Irrigation District Act (St. 1897, p. 269), requiring bidders to pay $2 for a duplicate certificate of sale and redemptioner to repay the same and excusing such payment when the district is the purchaser, is discriminatory and unconstitutional; and (4) that the description of the property in the deed is fatally uncertain and defective.

[1] And, first, as regards the claim that the deed was prematurely issued: It is true, as contended by appellant, that section 45 of the Irrigation District Act provides that a certificate of sale shall be dated on the day of the sale. But this provision has been held to be merely directory and not mandatory, since the object of the statute is satisfied if the actual date of sale is recited, so as to enable those concerned to know when the time for redemption expires. Corson v. Crocker, 31 Cal. App. 626, 161 P. 287; 26 Cal. Jur. p. 422.

[2, 3] In this case the sale was made August 26, 1921, the certificate of sale was issued August 27, 1921, and the tax deed was issued August 27, 1924. Appellant's point as to the delay in the publication of the delinquent tax list is made only in his closing brief and is made with the suggestion that it "may be met by oral argument." There, however, was no oral argument. But the point will be considered.

The district was required by section 42 of the Irrigation District Act to publish the delinquent list on or before the 1st day of February. The list must be published at intervals for a period covering 3 weeks. The sale must then take place within 28 days after the completion of the publication of the delinquent list. By the provisions of section 47 of the Irrigation District Act (Stats. 1909, p. 429), the delinquent taxpayer had the right to redeem his property at any time within 5 years after the date of the sale; and the purchaser, at the expiration of the 5 years after the date of the sale, had the right to have a tax deed issued to him, providing that the owner had not redeemed.

In this case the district, acting pursuant to a resolution of its board of directors, did not publish its delinquent list until July 30, 1921. On July 31, 1921, an amendment of section 47 of the act became effective (Stats. 1921, p. 1109). By this amendment the period of redemption was shortened from five years to three years, so that the taxpayer must redeem within three years instead of five years, as under the old law (Stats. 1909, p. 429). Under the new law, the purchaser could get his deed after the expiration of only three years and need not wait for five years, as under the old act.

It has been held, however, that the delayed publication of the delinquent tax list does not of itself invalidate the tax sale and the deed based thereon. Smith v. Los Angeles City, 158 Cal. 702, 112 P. 307; San Francisco v. Society etc., 131 Cal. 612, 614, 63 P. 1016. Also, it has been held that the right of redemption is fixed and controlled by the law in force at the time of the tax sale. Teralta Land, etc., Co. v. Shaffer, 116 Cal. 518, at pages 524, 525, 48 P. 613 (58 Am. St. Rep. 194); Biaggi v. Ramont, 189 Cal. 675, 209 P. 892.

[4] As regards the contention that the irrigation statute is unconstitutional for the reason indicated in appellant's third point, the principle enunciated in the following cases is sufficient to sustain the constitutionality of the act in the particular wherein it is attacked by appellant. San Francisco, etc., L. Co. v. Banbury, 106 Cal. 129, 39 P. 439; Russ & Sons Co. v. Crichton, 117 Cal. 695, 49 P. 1043; County of San Luis Obispo v. Murphy, 162 Cal. 588, 123 P. 808, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 712. In other words, the classification made by the Legislature was not an improper one.

Furthermore, even conceding that the provision of the statute attacked was not constitutional: In the case at bar, defendant and appellant was not affected for the reason that he had neither redeemed nor attempted to redeem his property.

[5] And finally, as regards the alleged uncertain description in the deed: The amended complaint described the property whose title is sought to be quieted as follows:

> "That certain real property situate in the county of Madera, state of California, and described as follows: The east one-half (E. ½) of the northeast quarter (N. E. ¼) of the southwest quarter (S. W. ¼) and the north half (N. ½) of the southeast quarter (S. E. ¼) of the southwest quarter (S. W. ¼) of block six (6) of the Chowchilla Ranch Subdivision No. 2, in section five (5), township eleven (11) south, range fifteen (15) east, M. D. B. & M., containing forty (40) acres, more or less."

The following is the description set out in the tax deed:

> "Chowchilla Ranch Subd. No. 2 Blk. 6, E ½ of NE ¼ of SW ¼—N ½ of SE ¼ of SW ¼ in Sec. 5 Tp. 11 S. R. 15 E., M. D. B. & M., 40 acres"

The description in the assessment roll for the district is set out as follows:

Description of property		Mt. Diablo Meridian			Number of acres.
	Block	Section	Township So.	Range East
Chowchilla Ranch Subdivision No. 2, Block 6, E^2 of NE^4 of SW^4-N^2 of SE^4 of SW^4		5	11	15	40

In the published delinquent list the description was set out as follows:

> "Chow. Ranch Sub. No. 2, blk 6, E ½ of N E ¼ of S. W. ¼, N ½ of S. E. ¼ of S. W. ¼, 40 acres."

The delinquent list as published also contained obvious explanations of the above abbreviations, and also stated as follows:

> "Wherever reference is made in the following descriptions of land in the Chowchilla Ranch Subdivision No. 2, it is understood that such reference is to the official map recorded Oct. 10, 1912, in Vol. 3 of Maps, page 9 Madera County Records."

[6, 7] At the trial the deed containing the description just referred to was offered in evidence and also the official record of the map in book 3 of official maps at page 9, Chowchilla ranch, subdivision No 2. The deed itself, however, makes no reference to the map. But it has been held proper to receive a recorded map in evidence in order to make complete the description set out in the deed. It was also testified that the lands shown on this map are "usually throughout the county referred to by reference to this map," and that it is a well-known map of the Chowchilla subdivision. Fox v. Townsend, 152 Cal. 53, at page 58, 91 P. 1004, 1007; Fitzimons v. Atherton, 162 Cal. 630, at page 632, 124 P. 250.

Furthermore there is delineated on said map the location of the northeast corner of township 11 south, range 15 east, in the United States government survey and also the north, east, south, and west township lines and government courses, together with distances and actual acreages, so that the survey and map of the subdivision was physically tied into and connected with the government surveys. As indicated on the map itself, the subdivision comprises all of sections 6, 7, 16 of township 11 south, range 16 east, and all of sections 1 to 21, inclusive, and 28 to 32, inclusive, and 38 of township 11 south, range 15 east, M. D. B. & M. The court can take judicial notice of the location of these townships and sections, and of the fact that they can be identified on the ground by reference to the official government records. Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subds. 2 to 3; Rogers v. Cady, 104 Cal. 288, 291, 38 P. 81 (43 Am. St. Rep. 100); vol. 23, Cor. Jur. p. 95. The distances from east to west indicated on the map give room for exactly seven sections, including section 5, having the contemplated official width of 320 rods, or 5,280 feet, and this is the exact width from east to west of each of the northern rows of blocks, including block 6.

Therefore, from this map and with the judicial knowledge that the court can take of the relative location of section 5, in township 11 south, range 15 east, it is evident that the north, east, and west boundaries of block 6 of the subdivision referred to in the deed and map are coincident with the north, east, and west boundary lines of section 5 of township 11 south, range 15 east. And, as regards the southern boundary of block 6 and section 5, respectively, it appears from the location of the northern and southern township lines on the map of township 11 south, range 15 east, and the distances between them as indicated on the map, that this township, if cut into official sections containing "as near as may be" 640 acres each, will then include a number of sections containing more than 640 acres. And non constat but what section 5 may be one of these.

Therefore, from the mere fact that block 6 contains 653 acres, it does not necessarily follow, as appellant appears to contend, that such block is not contained within section 5 or is substantially identical therewith, so far as the southern boundary also is concerned. It is therefore evident that the mere addition of the government description to the description by block in the subdivision is, at the most, a mere matter of supererogation and reiteration, which does not create any uncertainty as to the reasonable possibility of the definite location of the land on the ground.

Furthermore, even though it should be assumed (Quinn v. Windmiller, 67 Cal. 461, 8 P. 14) that the above government section 5 contains only 640 acres, nevertheless, by a plain mathematical computation, it was shown in respondent's brief, without denial, that only 6 acres of the 40 acres in question are outside of the east half of the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter and the north half of the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 5, township 11 south, range 15 east, while the balance of said 40 acres is within the above fractional portion of said government section No. 5; and, furthermore, that the whole of said 40 acres, including the said 6 acres, is definitely and certainly located in the above fractional subdivision of block 6 "of Chowchilla Ranch Subdivision No. 2." In other words, there was sufficient evidence to justify the trial court in rejecting as absurd and impossible any inference that the above 6 acres were in section 5 and in finding that there was nothing in the description in the deed or in the assessment roll or in the delinquent list, which, if taken in connection with the map and its markings, would prevent a person from locating on the ground a definite and specific 40 acres of land in block 6. And in this connection Mr. P. M. Stafford, a surveyor of 30 years' practice, stated:

> "I could make a survey of that portion of block 6 that laid within section 5 if I was confined to that description. I could make a survey of that portion of block 6 that is confined within the boundary of section 5."

In the case of Green v. Palmer, 68 Cal. App. 393, at page 400, 229 P. 876, 878, it was claimed that the description of the property in the assessment roll was ambiguous. But in that case the court said:

> "We do not believe that it is necessary in matters of this kind to argue from the point of the utmost absurdity, but even if we were to assume that anyone could have been misled by this description to the point of believing that his property was as described by respondent we would find that a portion at least of the property in suit was covered by this description and a mere reference to the assessor's block-book, or to the map of the Hougham Tract, would have enabled the investigator to have determined the true description."

Counsel in his brief refers to a map marked "Def't's Exhibit A-4," which he contends "shows a discrepancy between the block 6 referred to and section 5." But the record on appeal contains no exhibit bearing that designation, nor is there any such map brought up or properly described or authenticated. Also, the record is not clear as to the extent to which the witness was able to testify that said block 6 and section 5 were not identical, nor as to whether it was to a substantial extent, nor as to what county records the witness was relying on. Also, as a matter of fact, he did not testify that he could not locate the land in block 6.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: HART, Acting P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

92 Cal. App. 749

ALLEE v. SHAY, Sheriff. (Civ. 3545.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 26, 1928.

1. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑215—Minor, injured by automobile, became wrongdoer's "creditor" from time of injury, entitled to set aside wrongdoer's conveyance to defeat recovery (Civ. Code, § 3442).

Cause of action in favor of minor, injured by automobile, arose immediately at time of injury, and minor became "creditor" of wrongdoer from that time, within Civ. Code, § 3442, entitled to set aside any conveyance by wrongdoer with intent to defeat recovery on judgment based on that tort.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Creditor.]

2. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑230—Property conveyed with intent to defraud creditors remains in fraudulent grantor, subject to execution by creditor (Civ. Code, § 3442).

Title to property conveyed with intent to defraud creditors within Civ. Code, § 3442, remains in fraudulent grantor, which property creditor may seize and sell under execution to satisfy judgment.

3. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑93—Love and affection does not constitute "valuable consideration" for conveyance as respects existing creditors (Civ. Code, § 3442).

Conveyance purporting to be made for love and affection, though good as between the parties, does not constitute in law a valuable consideration so as to take it out of effect of Civ. Code, § 3442, providing that any transfer or incumbrance of property, made without valuable consideration by party while insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, shall be fraudulent, and void as to existing creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Valuable Consideration.]

4. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑300(1)—Evidence held to establish that transfer of property was made without consideration to defeat recovery by plaintiff in personal injury action (Civ. Code, § 3442).

Evidence held to establish that transfer of property by defendant in personal injury action to his niece was made without consideration and for purpose of defeating recovery by injured plaintiff in such action, under Civ. Code, § 3442, relating to fraudulent conveyances.

5. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑64(1)—Intent is immaterial, where transfer without consideration renders grantor unable to respond to creditors' claims (Civ. Code, § 3442).

Under Civ. Code, § 3442, relating to fraudulent conveyances, grantor's intent is wholly immaterial if his voluntary conveyance places him in a position where he is unable to respond to claims of creditors.

6. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑58—That some property was retained for short time after gift held not to relieve transfer from charge of being fraudulent (Civ. Code, § 3442).

That defendant in personal injury action retained some property for a short time after having made voluntary gifts to niece did not relieve transfer from charge of being fraudulent as respects injured plaintiff in such action, within Civ. Code, § 3442, where property retained was insufficient to satisfy judgment recovered in such action; whether sufficient property has been retained being determined by results.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

Action by Edna L. Allee against W. A. Shay, as Sheriff of the County of San Bernardino, to enjoin the sale by the Sheriff under execution of certain realty. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and rendered.

Zach Lamar Cobb and Earl A. Littlejohns, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Pollock & Mitchell, of Ontario, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This cause is before us on an appeal taken by the defendant from a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff, perpetually enjoining and restraining the defendant as sheriff of the county of San Bernardino from selling certain real property situate in said county under and by virtue of an execution issued out of the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles in an action wherein Lee E. West, a minor, by his guardian ad litem, Lillian Moran, was plaintiff, and J. H. Kienzle was defendant.

The record shows the following facts: On January 4, 1925, Lee E. West, a minor, was seriously injured by being struck by an automobile driven by J. H. Kienzle, the accident occurring in the county of Los Angeles. On or about October 1, 1925, said minor, through his guardian, obtained a judgment against said Kienzle for the sum of $5,777.80. This judgment is unsatisfied, save and except that $376.17 has been collected thereon, leaving a balance due at the time of the trial of this action of the sum of $5,401.63.

At the time of the injury suffered by Lee E. West through the operation of the automobile driven by Kienzle, the latter was the owner of certain real property in controversy in this action, of the value of between $6,000 and $7,000. This property was free of any incumbrances. The plaintiff in this action, Edna L. Allee, claims the property in controversy by virtue of a deed of gift from said Kienzle, executed and delivered to her on or about January 14, 1925. For approximately 8 years prior to the conveyance, Kienzle and Mrs. Allee (who was a niece of Kienzle), and her husband, lived together upon the property; Kienzle furnishing a home, which was an 8-room house, and Mrs. Allee doing the housework. After the accident on January 4, Kienzle returned to the home occupied by himself and the Allees at about 10 o'clock in the evening. Upon returning home, Kienzle informed the Allees that he had been involved in an accident, and that a boy had been apparently quite seriously injured. Kienzle asked Mrs. Allee if the premium on his $10,000 liability insurance had been paid. Mrs. Allee looked up the policy and informed Kienzle that it had not been paid. The next day, January 5, Mrs. Allee paid the premium on the insurance and reported the accident. On the 6th of January, Kienzle went to Imperial Valley and did not return for several days. During the absence of Kienzle, J. W. Moran, the stepfather of Lee E. West, went to the Kienzle residence and inquired for him of the Allees, and had a talk with Mr. Allee about the boy's injury. Kienzle returned home about January 10, and Mr. Allee informed him that Mr. Moran had been there to see him about the accident, and that Mr. Moran considered it was Kienzle's fault, and that the boy was in a hospital in a serious condition, and that they were making a claim against Kienzle, and that Kienzle had run away because he knew that he was at fault. Moran also left his address, requesting that Kienzle communicate with him. The payment of the premium by Mrs. Allele upon the insurance policy referred to, not having been made within the time allowed by the terms of the policy, the company refused to renew the policy, and conveyed this information to Keinzle prior to the execution of the deed referred to. On January 14, 1925, Kienzle conveyed the property in controversy by deed of gift to the plaintiff in this action; the deed, so far as pertinent here, being in the following words and figures, to wit:

"Know all men by these presents, that John H. Kienzle, a widower, of Upland, California, in consideration of $10.00 and love and affection, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, grants to Edna L. Allee, a married woman, by this deed of gift, of Upland, California, all that real property situate in the city of Upland, county of San Bernardino, state of California, bounded and described as follows:" (Here follows description of the property.)

That at the same time, Kienzle transferred to his niece a 1922 Studebaker sedan worth about $600. No consideration was paid for this transfer.

During the month of October, 1925, Kienzle converted a $2,000 mortgage into cash, withdrew $600 from the Building & Loan Association and $1,900 from a savings account, aggregating the sum of $4,500, and gave the same to a nephew named William Kahrig. At the time of this gift, Kienzle was not indebted to Kahrig in any sum whatever. Upon receiving the money, Kahrig immediately sent it to Kienzle's brother in the state of Kansas. After making these gifts, Kienzle had property left of the value of $700—if we adopt the highest figures. Kienzle testified that he could not pay the judgment obtained by West, that he did not intend to pay it, and also that he would not. Kienzle further testified that he made the deed to his niece to save the expense of probating his estate, although at the time he knew that if he died leaving personal property it would be necessary to have the same probated. Kienzle also testified that his reason for making the gift was that his niece had always been kind to him, and he thought that she should have it. Both the plaintiff, Edna L. Allee, and Kienzle testified that at the time of the execution and delivery of the deed, Kienzle was not indebted to his niece, Edna L. Allee, in any sum whatever. It was stipulated during the trial that the plaintiff in the case of West against Kienzle had used every reasonable effort to collect the judgment, without avail, and that Kienzle did not have any property in the state of California subject to execution unless it be the real estate involved in this action. On November 16, 1925, the execution hereinbefore referred to was levied upon the property conveyed by Kienzle to his niece, whereupon his niece, the plaintiff, brought this action for an injunction, and had judgment as prayed for.

The complaint alleges that the said Edna L. Allee is the owner of lot 8 in block 6 of Magnolia, as per plat recorded in Book 9 of Maps, page 15, records of the county of San Bernardino; that the defendant, as the sheriff of San Bernardino, has levied upon said property by virtue of an execution issued in the case of Lee E. West, a minor, against J. H. Kienzle, and will, unless restrained by the court, proceed to sell the same. The answer denies the ownership of the plaintiff, sets forth that the conveyance referred to was made voluntarily and to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, that no consideration was paid therefor, and also sets forth the facts showing the judgment obtained by Lee E. West against J. H. Kienzle, and its remaining unsatisfied, and also that J. H. Kienzle was in fact the owner of the property described in plaintiff's complaint. The court made the following findings:

"(1) That all of the allegations contained in plaintiff's complaint are true.

"(2) That it is not true that J. H. Kienzle is the owner in fee of the property described in plaintiff's complaint.

"(3) That it is not true that J. H. Kienzle conveyed or attempted to convey said property to Edna L. Allee without any consideration.

"(4) That it is not true that plaintiff will not suffer any damages by reason of said sale attempted to be made by said defendant.

"(5) That it is not true that the said J. H. Kienzle made a conveyance of said property described in plaintiff's complaint to said Edna L. Allee with the intention or for the purpose of defrauding Lee E. West or defeating the execution of any judgment.

"(6) That it is not true that said Edna L. Allee conspired with said J. H. Kienzle to accept said conveyance for the purpose of defrauding said J. H. Kienzle's creditors.

"(7) That it is not true that the conveyance of said property, made by said J. H. Kienzle to said Edna L. Allee, was or is fraudulent or void, and it is not true that said Edna L. Allee has no right or title or interest in or to said property."

The appellant challenges these findings as unsupported by the evidence.

Before setting forth any testimony relevant to the issue presented, it will clarify the situation to state that the record shows that, after the transfer by Kienzle to his niece of the real estate and automobile, he still had in his possession property of the value of $5,200—taking his own statement. This sum is $577.80 less than the judgment obtained against him by Lee E. West on account of injuries suffered at his hands on January 4, 1925.

Edna L. Allee, the plaintiff in this action, testified that she and her husband lived with Kienzle, and had lived with him in the residence on lot 8 in block 6 of Magnolia in Upland about 8 years; that Kienzle executed and delivered a deed to her, to said property, as a deed of gift; that she did not pay anything for the conveyance; that the $10 mentioned therein was not paid; that the first knowledge she had of the deed was when it was given to her; that she did not see the deed until after it had been recorded; that it was given to her on account of love and affection; that she knew that Mr. Kienzle had been involved in an automobile accident on January 4, 1925, prior to the execution of the deed; that she learned of the accident by talking it over with Mr. Kienzle on the evening that it occurred; that her husband was present at the time; that she did not know who the boy was that had been injured; that Kienzle told her he had had an accident, that a couple of boys on a motorcycle had run into him; that before this time Kienzle told her he was going to give her the property; that Kienzle had given her the automobile at the time he bought it; that the registration certificate conveying the automobile to her was made at the time of the execution of the deed. This is shown by the following questions and answers:

"Q. You think it was in January. Was it before or after the transfer of the property that has been referred to? A. It was about the same time. Q. Now, at that time, did you pay him any money for the automobile? A. I did not. Q. And he was not indebted to you in any way, was he? A. No."

The witness then testified as to the mortgage, the money in the savings bank and building and loan association to which we have referred, and to her knowledge that it was given by Kienzle to his nephew, Kahrig. The plaintiff, in direct relation to the conveyance, testified as follows:

"Q. Now, will you tell the court just what was said, so the court may know what the situation was? A. Well, he has evidently appreciated what I have done for him. Q. What did he say? A. And he told me that he has. He said that many times. He said that he did not know what he would do if it was not for me. And how happy that I had made him, and how I had helped him in a lot of little troubles—loneliness for his wife—and that he did not think he could ever repay me for what I had done for him. He said that—oh, I don't remember how many times. Q. Now, with reference to this lot, what did he say he was going to do with that? A. He did not say exactly, that is, to come right out and say, 'this house will be yours,' although he left that impression. Q. What did he say to you when he delivered you the deed? Did you know from anything that was said what that deed was or what place it was—whether this house or some other house? A. Well, I will say that I was surprised, and still I felt that I really should have it; and I thanked him, and he, of course, was glad for me to get it; and I think that I told him, as well as I remember, that he never need worry, that he would always have a home there with me, because he had given it to me, and that I never would turn him out, and that we would live just like we had always lived, and be as happy, and continue as we had."

J. H. Kienzle, the grantor named in the conveyance in question, testified that his niece, Mrs. Allee, and her husband, had been living with him 7 or 8 years in the house situate on lot 8 in block 6, and upon direct examination further testified:

"Q. At that time, the date the deed was made, did you know of any liability against you in favor of anybody? A. No, sir. Q. Were you indebted to Lee E. West at that time? A. No, sir. Q. On January 4, you had an accident, an automobile accident, with Lee E. West, had you not? A. Yes. Q. When you made the deed, was it with any intent or purpose on your part to avoid any payment of any sum of money to him, or to anybody else? A. No, sir; none whatever. Q. You knew the facts of the accident? You knew how it had happened? A. Yes, sir. Q. Had there been any claim for damages made against you by Mr. West or anybody else on his behalf, on the 14th day of January, 1925, the day that you transferred this property to your niece? A. No, sir; none whatever."

That J. H. Kienzle did know that a claim was being made against him, and that he would be held liable for the injury to the boy, is made manifest by the following excerpt taken from his testimony, given upon cross-examination:

"Q. Isn't it a fact that after you got back Mr. Allee told you that Mr. Moran, Mr. West's father, had been to see him regarding the accident? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you knew that Moran had been out there making a claim, did you not? A. I didn't know what he was there for; I had no conversation with him; and Mr. Allee told me that Mr. Moran had been there, that he would—Q. He had been there regarding the accident? A. Yes, sir. Q. And that was immediately after you got back from this hunting trip? A. No; that was while I was gone. Q. But you found that out—A. I found it out after I got back. Q. And that was within one week after the accident? A. Yes, sir. Q. And before you made the deed? A. Before I made the deed. Q. Yes. A. Yes. Q. Now, didn't Mr. Allee tell you what Mr. Moran said? A. Yes. He made several mistakes, I think. He said that I was driving a Buick car, a red Buick; and Mr. Allee corrected him and said, 'There is the car right here; this is the car.' And the man that he had with him, he says, 'John, you have got this balled up.' Whoever John was, I don't know. And he said I had run over the boy. Q. Then you knew that he felt as though that had been quite a serious injury? A. Well, he told Mr. Allee that I ran over his boy, and that I was to blame, and that I ran away because I knew I was at fault. Q. And what else did Mr. Allee tell you that Mr. Moran had said? A. Well, nothing much more than that. Q. Did he tell you that this boy was in the hospital? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did he tell you that his leg had been broken? A. Yes; he told Mr. Allee that his leg was broken. Q. What else did he tell you? A. Well, that is about all. Q. Well, now, didn't you believe from that that he would possibly make a claim for damages against you? A. I never thought of such a thing, because I did not consider myself to blame at all. Q. Well, you knew, nevertheless, that the people considered that you were at fault, from what Mr. Allee had told you that Mr. Moran had said? A. Well, you could take it for that; yes. Q. And you knew that those people considered that it was your fault? A. They claim it was. Q. And all of that occurred before you made this deed, did it not? A. Yes, sir."

In relation to the transfer of the automobile, Kienzle testified as follows:

"Q. You think it was in January. Was it before or after the transfer of this property that has been referred to? A. It was about the same time. Q. About the same time? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, after making this gift of this house and lot and the $4,500 worth of property, what did you have left? A. My little business was all. Q. Your little business in Upland? A. Little business in Upland. Q. What is the value of that business? A. Total, perhaps $600. Q. And that includes your tools, does it? A. Yes; and a small amount of material."

In another place this witness testified that the value of this property was $700, and in our calculations, hereinbefore set forth, we have accepted the highest figures. Kienzle also testified that Mrs. Allee paid him no consideration for the conveyance, not even the $10, and that he was not indebted to her in any sum. That Mrs. Allee had been kind to him, etc. With reference to the payment of the West judgment, the testimony of Kienzle is as follows:

> "Q. Now, isn't it a fact, Mr. Kienzle, that you stated you did not intend to pay this judgment in the case of West against Kienzle? A. I have not anything to pay it with; no. Q. And isn't it a fact that you said that you did not intend to pay it? A. I said I would not. Q. Isn't it a fact that you said that it would not be paid in your lifetime? A. I said that I could not pay it; I couldn't pay it in my lifetime. Q. That you could or couldn't pay it? A. That I couldn't. Q. Now, you stated that you transferred this property to Mrs. Allee to save probate expenses and attorney's fees? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you knew that there would be probate expenses and attorney's fees on the mortgage, did you not? A. Yes. Q. And also on the money in bank and the loan association? A. Yes, sir."

The transcript discloses a somewhat lengthy examination of the witnesses Allee and Kienzle, but there is nothing contained therein which changes the force and effect of what we have set forth herein. Does this testimony support the findings of the trial court, or does it not irresistibly lead to findings directly opposite thereto? The answer is found in the application of the last clause of section 3442 of the Civil Code, which reads:

> "Provided, however, that any transfer or incumbrance of property made or given voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration, by a a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, shall be fraudulent, and void as to existing creditors."

[1, 2] On January 4, 1925, at the instant the automobile driven by Kienzle injured the minor, Lee E. West, a cause of action arose in favor of West against Kienzle, and a claim for damages then and there instantly arose, of which claim J. H. Kienzle then and there had immediate notice. We make this statement upon the authority of Cioli v. Kenourgios, 59 Cal. App. 690, 211 P. 838, and the case of Chalmers v. Sheehy, 132 Cal. 459, 64 P. 709, 84 Am. St. Rep. 62. In the latter case, the opinion quotes from Freeman on Executions, as follows:

> "That one having a claim for a tort is a creditor before the commencement of an action thereon, as well as after, and, as such creditor, is, upon recovering judgment, entitled to avoid a fraudulent transfer antedating the commencement of his action." Freeman on Executions (4th Ed.) § 137a.

A number of other cases are then cited in Chalmers v. Sheehy, supra, to the effect that a person having a cause of action on account of tort is a creditor of the wrongdoer before judgment is obtained, and is entitled to set aside any conveyance made with the intent and purpose of defeating recovery upon any judgment based upon the tort. To the same effect is the language of this court in Benson v. Harriman, 55 Cal. App. 483, 204 P. 255. That the minor, Lee E. West, has pursued, and was at the time of the beginning of this action pursuing, the proper remedy to secure satisfaction of his judgment against Kienzle is clearly established by the following authorities: Ohio Electric Car Co. v. Duffet, 48 Cal. App. 674, 192 P. 298, where it was held that the title to property conveyed with intent to defraud creditors remains in the fraudulent grantor, which the creditor may seize, etc. See, also, 12 Cal. Juris. p. 1029, where the three remedies open to a creditor are pointed out, one of which is by way of sale, under execution, of real property fraudulently conveyed.

[3] None of the findings of the trial court is to the effect that the conveyance from Kienzle to Allee was made for a valuable consideration. Finding No. 3 simply is that it is not true that J. H. Kienzle conveyed, or attempted to convey, said property to Edna L. Allee without any consideration. This is not a finding that it was made for a valuable consideration. There is a distinction between a good and a valuable consideration, and where, as in this case, the conveyance purports to be made for love and affection, it is universally held that, while such a conveyance may be good as between the parties, it does not constitute in law a valuable consideration so as to take it out of the statute of frauds.

[4] The following facts stand out undisputed in the testimony: That on the 4th day of January, 1925, Kienzle was the owner in fee of the real property involved in this action; that he was the owner of an automobile of the value of about $600; that he had other personal property of the value of $5,200; that on the 4th day of January, 1925, the automobile, while being driven by Kienzle, struck and injured Lee E. West, a minor; that shortly thereafter and prior to any conveyance of his property, Kienzle learned that West had been seriously injured; that upon returning home, on the evening of January 4, Kienzle immediately informed his niece of the accident, and asked her if the premium on his liability policy had been paid; that an attempt was made the next day to pay the premium on the policy, but that the policy had already lapsed; that, prior to the conveyance, Kienzle knew, not only that West had been injured, but that he (Kienzle) was held responsible therefor; that the conveyance of the real estate and automobile to his niece, the plaintiff in this action, was purely voluntary, without any valuable consideration whatever; that, after making the gifts referred to, and conveying the real estate and automobile to the plaintiff herein, Kienzle did not have sufficient property remaining to meet the claim held against him by the minor, Lee E. West, on account of the tort set forth herein; that a few months after making the gifts referred to herein, and shortly following the entry of judgment in favor of the minor, Lee E. West, Kienzle gave away money to the extent of $4,500, and this money was immediately sent beyond the jurisdiction of California courts; that, after making the gift of the real estate and automobile to the plaintiff herein, Kienzle was at all times insolvent and unable to meet the amount of the claim found against him by the judgment entered in favor of the minor, Lee E. West; that Kienzle's own statement is and was to the effect that he could not pay West's judgment, and also that he would not pay the same. The testimony heretofore set forth also shows that Kienzle's grantee, the plaintiff in this action, was aware of all the circumstances disclosed by the record and summarized herein.

That these acts are all indicia of fraud is fully established. Benson v. Harriman, 55 Cal. App. 483, 204 P. 255; Cioli v. Kenourgios, 59 Cal. App. 690, 211 P. 838; Mump on Fraudulent Conveyances, p. 33, § 47, also page 36, § 50; 27 Cal. Juris. p. 488; Daugherty v. Daugherty, 104 Cal. 221, 37 P. 889; Bull v. Bray, 89 Cal. 286, 26 P. 873, 13 L. R. A. 576. If the question of intent were decisive of this case, we think it is evident that the findings of the trial court could not be sustained. This is indicated by the reasoning of the court in the case of Bull v. Bray, supra, and the language of the court in the case of Benson v. Harriman, supra, and Tobias v. Adams (Cal. Sup.) 258 P. 588. In the case of Benson v. Harriman the defendant had testified that he had no fraudulent intent. This court thus spoke of such testimony:

> "Quite naturally, the defendant * * * denied that he had any intention of defrauding the plaintiff, and he even went so far as to claim that he was able and willing to pay the plaintiff what he owed him. But his actions speak louder than his words and his declared willingness to pay could avail nothing in the face of the determined efforts that were required to collect the judgment."

In the case at bar, Kienzle declared his unwillingness and his inability to pay; the inability being created by his own acts. In the case of Tobias v. Adams, supra, the Supreme Court thus speaks of the testimony of one stating that he entertained no fraudulent intent after conveying all his property in such a manner as if valid, to place it beyond the reach of creditors:

> "We are much inclined to agree with appellant. For, if a man keeps his bank account in the name of another admittedly to prevent his creditor from reaching it by legal process, and then takes his entire estate, and either puts it in his wife's name or deposits it in the name of his secretary, knowing that the judgments are in existence, his mere ipse dixit that it is not to defraud his creditor would hardly create a bona fide conflict in the testimony. 'While a finding will not be disturbed on appeal if there is a substantial conflict in the evidence from which it springs, "the evidence, in order to raise a conflict, must be such as to present a fair and reasonable ground for a difference of opinion."' "—citing authorities.

In the case of Knox v. Blanckenburg, 28 Cal. App. 298, 152 P. 59, this court expressed its views as to the weight of such testimony in the following words:

> "According to the defendant's * * * own testimony, he transferred all his property, both real and personal, to his wife, without receiving any consideration therefor and when in debt to his brother and others, thus making himself impotent, however willing, to pay any of his debts, removed all his property from the reach of his creditors and put it beyond their power, if the transfer is to stand, to enforce payment. The inevitable result of this act on the part of the defendant * * * was to hinder and delay his creditors in the enforcement of their just claims. His own bare statement, unsupported by any facts, that in giving the property to his wife he did not intend to hinder or delay his brother in collecting his debt, cannot overcome the presumption that he intended the inevitable consequences of his willful and intentional acts."

When Kienzle made the voluntary conveyance of his real estate and automobile to Edna L. Allee, coincident with the conveyance, he rendered himself unable to respond to the claims of Lee E. West, who became a creditor of Kienzle immediately upon the commission by Kienzle of the tort referred to herein on the 4th day of January, 1925.

[5] Thus far we have considered this cause in the light of the provisions of section 3442 of the Civil Code other than as contained in the concluding proviso, relating to the transfer of property made without a valuable consideration while one is insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency. Since this proviso was added to the section by the Legislature in 1895, the intent of the grantor is wholly immaterial if his voluntary conveyance places him in a position where he is unable to respond to the claims of his creditors. In the case of Hemenway v. Thaxter, 150 Cal. 737, 90 P. 116, the Supreme Court thus speaks of the proviso:

> "That the conveyance, if voluntary, was in fraud, * * * scarcely requires argument. Section 3442 of the Civil Code provides that 'any transfer * * * made or given voluntarily, or without valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, shall be fraudulent, and void as to existing creditors.' Hemenway admits that by this conveyance he divested himself of all property liable to execution; that he became thereby, and has ever since remained, insolvent. The consequence of this conveyance being, then, to render Hemenway insolvent, he will be presumed to have intended its natural consequence, from which follows an intent to become insolvent, or contemplated insolvency, in the language of the act."

In 12 Cal. Juris. 1019, § 60, after referring to section 3442 of the Civil Code as it read prior to 1895, the rule applicable to this case is thus stated:

> "The amendment of 1895 completely changed this rule (as to intent). By express provision a voluntary conveyance made by an insolvent or by one in contemplation of insolvency, is now conclusively presumed to be fraudulent as to existing creditors. The insolvency of the voluntary grantor is conclusive of fraudulent intent, and no other facts can control, influence or overcome this presumption. The question of actual intent is immaterial."

In the case of Hanscome, etc., v. Ainger, 71 Cal. App. 735, 236 P. 325, this court speaking through Mr. Justice Hart, in considering section 3439 and the proviso in section 3442 of the Civil Code, speaks, first, of the intent necessary when the grantor is not insolvent, and, then, when the grantor is insolvent, thus disposes of the question of intent:

> "On the other hand, if as said paragraph of the complaint also avers, the conveyance was made by D. N. Ainger voluntarily or without a valuable consideration, while said Ainger was insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, his 'intent is immaterial and the transfer, regardless of the actual intent, is void as to his creditors'"—citing Atkinson v. Western Development Co., 170 Cal. 503, 150 P. 360, and the case of Benson v. Harriman, 55 Cal. App. 483, 204 P. 255, also decided by this court.

In Lefrooth v. Prentice, 259 P. 947, the Supreme Court of this state having before it the proviso added to section 3442 of the Civil Code, where a voluntary conveyance had been made, states the law in these words, "Under such a showing the fraudulent intent on the part of the grantee of such transfer is immaterial" (citing a number of authorities), and concludes with these words:

> "If these conditions, to wit, a grant made without consideration by a person insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, are present, the intent of the grantor is immaterial and the transfer, regardless of the actual intent, is void as to creditors."

To the same effect is the case of Southwick v. Moore, 61 Cal. App. 585, 215 P. 704, where the insolvency was created by the act of making the voluntary conveyance.

[6] The fact that Kienzle retained some property for a short while after having made the gifts to his niece does not relieve the transfer from the charge of being fraudulent. In 27 Corpus Juris. p. 550, § 250, we find a pertinent statement of the law supported by numerous authorities. It is there stated:

> "The presumption of fraud, as against existing creditors, raised by a voluntary conveyance by the debtor of his property, becomes conclusive where there is no evidence that he retained sufficient property to satisfy his creditors, and the fact that there was no actual fraudulent intent on the part of either party to the transfer does not in any way affect the operation of the rule. In order that a voluntary conveyance may be upheld as against existing creditors, it is essential that the property retained by the debtor should be clearly and amply sufficient to satisfy all his existing debts. The test for determining the validity of a voluntary conveyance * * * is whether sufficient property remains to pay the grantor's debts, and to satisfy this test, the property must be actually sufficient and not apparently so."

The text further shows that whether sufficient property has been retained must be determined by results. The result in the case at bar conclusively establishes the insufficiency of the remaining estate of Kienzle to satisfy the West judgment after the voluntary conveyances made to his niece, even though we do not consider the subsequent acts of Kienzle in sending all of his available cash, through the intermediary of his nephew, to his brother in the state of Kansas.

The respondent cites the cases of Bank of Willows v. Small, 144 Cal. 709, 78 P. 263, and Marple v. Jackson, 184 Cal. 411, 193 P. 940, and the part of section 3442 of the Civil Code, exclusive of the proviso, in support of the judgment herein. These cases are not authority here by reason of dissimilarity of facts. In the Bank of Willows Case, it was held that, before the plaintiff could complain of the deed in question, it was necessary to show that its claim could not be collected. In the instant case, it is admitted that Kienzle has nothing out of which the West judgment may be realized, and the facts show that, after the conveyances referred to, he had insufficient assets to meet the judgment. In the case of Marple v. Jackson, the deed involved was executed and delivered some 10 years preceding the creation of the indebtedness. In the case at bar, the indebtedness existed, even though the amount was unascertained, prior to the time of the execution of any of the conveyances. What we have before said disposes of the respondent's reliance upon the intent portion of section 3442, Civil Code.

In view of the authorities cited and the facts set forth herein, it must be found and held that J. H. Kienzle, in making the voluntary conveyances to his niece, Edna L. Allee, the plaintiff in this action, rendered himself unable to respond to the claims of Lee E. West, a minor; that such conveyances were made in contemplation of insolvency, and that the said J. H. Kienzle intended to place all his property beyond the reach of execution; that the conveyance of the real property referred to in this action is void as against the claims of Lee E. West; that the trial court's finding to the contrary is not supported by the evidence, but is contrary thereto; that the conclusions of law drawn by the court upon its findings are erroneous; that the evidence in this case is without conflict upon all the material points involved in this action, and cannot truthfully be changed; and that proper findings may be drawn therefrom and a correct judgment entered, and this cause terminated without further litigation, by this court exercising the authority conferred by the recent constitutional amendment empowering an appellate court so to do, and also in accordance with the provisions of section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure (St. 1927, p. 583) where trial by jury is not a matter of right, or where trial by jury has been waived.

It is hereby ordered that the findings, conclusions of law and judgment of the trial court be, and the same are hereby, set aside, and the following findings, conclusions of law, and judgment substituted therefor:

Findings of Fact.

(1) That all the allegations contained in the defendant's answer are true and correct.

(2) That, as against the judgment in favor of Lee E. West, a minor, against J. H. Kienzle, the said J. H. Kienzle is the owner in fee of all the property described in plaintiff's complaint.

(3) That on or about the 14th day of January, 1925, the said J. H. Kienzle, by deed of gift, without any valuable consideration whatever, conveyed to his niece, Edna L. Allee, the plaintiff in this action, the real estate described in plaintiff's complaint, and at about the same time, without any consideration, conveyed to her a certain Studebaker automobile.

(4) That, after said conveyance, the said Kienzle was not possessed of sufficient property to meet the indebtedness owing by him to the said Lee E. West, a minor.

(5) That the indebtedness to Lee E. West, a minor, accrued and became fixed against the estate and property of J. H. Kienzle immediately upon the injury inflicted upon the person of Lee E. West, by the automobile owned and driven by J. H. Kienzle on the 4th day of January, 1925.

(6) That, in pursuance of an intent to prevent a recovery by Lee E. West of any damages by reason of the tort committed by the said J. H. Kienzle, the said J. H. Kienzle divested himself of the real estate referred to in plaintiff's complaint, the automobile mentioned in the testimony, and the $4,500 in cash, which latter sum has been sent to the state of Kansas and beyond the jurisdiction of California courts.

Conclusions of Law.

From the foregoing findings of fact, the following conclusions of law are drawn:

That the conveyance by J. H. Kienzle to Edna L. Allee, of the real estate mentioned in plaintiff's complaint, on the 14th day of January, 1925, was and is fraudulent and void, and creates no title in the said Edna L. Allee, as against the unsatisfied judgment now held by Lee E. West, a minor against the said J. H. Kienzle.

That Lee E. West is entitled to have the property mentioned sold under execution issued in said action, and the plaintiff is not entitled to an injunction restraining the sheriff of the county of San Bernardino from making sale of said property under said execution, or any execution that may be issued upon said judgment.

Judgment.

And it is further ordered that following the words, "found between the parties," the judgment be, and is hereby, corrected to read as follows:

It is hereby adjudged that the plaintiff has no title to the premises involved herein as against the claim of Lee E. West, a minor, based upon his judgment against J. H. Kienzle.

That the conveyance made by J. H. Kienzle to lot 8 in block 6, of Magnolia, as per plat recorded in Book 9 of Maps, p. 15, records of the county of San Bernardino, state of California, was and is fraudulent and void as against the claim of Lee E. West, a minor, and the plaintiff herein has no title or right to said property as against the claim of the said Lee E. West.

That the defendant, as the sheriff of the county of San Bernardino, has a legal right, and may properly proceed to sell the property referred to under an execution issued upon the judgment in favor of the said Lee E. West, against the said J. H. Kienzle, referred to in this action.

And it is further adjudged that the plaintiff take nothing by reason of this action, and that the defendant have and recover his costs and disbursements incurred herein.

In re MILLSAP. (Civ. 5182.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 21, 1928.

1. Attorney and client 🔑57—Bar association held not entitled to dismissal of appeal on motion notwithstanding transcript was filed late.

In disbarment proceedings, where no reporter's transcript was filed, but defendant did file duly certified clerk's transcript, which contained judgment roll, together with notice of appeal and notice demanding transcript of testimony, held that, on record so made, bar association was not entitled to dismissal of appeal on motion, since defendant may have relied on error shown by clerk's transcript.

2. Attorney and client 🔑57—On appeal under alternative method in disbarment proceeding, court could not order that exhibits need not be copied into reporter's transcript, but that clerk of superior court file originals (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

In disbarment proceedings, where appeal was taken under so-called alternative method, provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, appellate court was without authority to order that certain exhibits need not be copied into reporter's transcript, and that clerk of superior court be directed to produce and file original exhibits to be used at hearing of appeal.

In the matter of the proceedings for disbarment of Homer C. Millsap. Judgment of disbarment, and the respondent appealed. Motion by the Bar Association for an order to dismiss the appeal, and motion by the respondent for an order relieving him from default on appeal. Denied and dismissed.

L. E. Dadmun, of Los Angeles, for appellant Millsap.

Ovila N. Normandin, Kenyon F. Lee, and W. I. Gilbert, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Los Angeles Bar Ass'n.

CONREY, P. J. [1] Pursuant to notice, respondent bar association presented its motion that the appeal be dismissed on the ground that appellant had failed to file transcript on appeal within the time provided by law. It is true that no reporter's transcript has been filed, but appellant did, on the 21st day of August, 1925, file a duly certified clerk's transcript, which contains the judgment roll, together with the notice of appeal and notice demanding a transcript of the testimony. On a record so made, respondent is not entitled to a dismissal of the appeal, since it may be that appellant relies upon some error shown by the clerk's transcript. Locke Paddon v. Locke Paddon, 194 Cal. 73, 77, 227 P. 715.

[2] It further appears, however, that at or near the time of filing said clerk's transcript appellant presented to this court a petition for an order that certain exhibits need not be copied into the reporter's transcript, and that the clerk of the superior court be directed to produce and file herein said original exhibits, to be used at the hearing of the appeal. That application was denied, for reasons set forth in an opinion of the court. In re Millsap, 75 Cal. App. 25, 241 P. 920. Our attention has been drawn to the fact that, upon a somewhat similar showing of facts in relation to extensive and bulky exhibits, the Supreme Court recently, in a case appealed to that court, directed that those exhibits need not be included in the transcript on appeal, and that the original exhibits be transmitted to the Supreme Court, "When the transcript on appeal shall have been filed." Glassell v. City of Los Angeles, L. A. No. 10367, 270 P. ——. However, it was the opinion of this court that, in an appeal taken under the so-called "alternative method" provided by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, this Court was without authority to make the requested order. As we are not informed of the reasons which may have guided the Supreme Court in making an order which assumes the existence of such authority in the Supreme Court, we do not at present deem it advisable to modify our own views, which were set forth, as above stated, in this case.

The motion of appellant for relief from default was made informally in open court, and upon waiver of notice to respondent. This motion is directed to the fact that, since the order of October 31, 1925, denying appellant's application to which we have referred, no further transcript has been filed, and no brief has been filed on behalf of appellant. Appellant during that period of time, by prolonged inaction, has abandoned, or at least has neglected, his appeal. We think that there has been no sufficient showing of excuse for such delay in further prosecution of his appeal. If appellant was of the opinion that this court's order denying his application was erroneous, and if he was advised that there was authority in law for the omission of exhibits, or of any part of the evidence, in a reporter's transcript prepared under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, he might have proceeded in an attempt to obtain in the superior court a certification of the reporter's transcript without those exhibits. In his affidavit filed on the 21st day of August, 1925, appellant stated that the reporter's transcript had been prepared, consisting of about 500 pages, but not containing said exhibits. He does not now claim that he has made any effort to have the transcript, which thus had been prepared, certified either by the reporter or the trial judge. Technically, however, no default has yet been taken by means of any order or adverse proceedings against appellant on account of such delay, and it is unnecessary to pass upon the merits of his motion.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied. The motion of appellant for relief from his assumed default is dismissed. It is directed that counsel for appellant be notified to appear before this court at its session on the fourth Monday of July, 1928, to show cause why the appeal should not be dismissed for failure to prosecute the same, and particularly for failure to file any brief, as required by the rules of court.

In re WEYMANN. (Application No. 5189.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 21, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 20, 1928.

1. Attorney and client ⚷1—State Bar Act held to repeal statute under which District Courts of Appeal admitted attorneys to practice (St. 1927, p. 38; Code Civ. Proc. § 279).

The State Bar Act (St. 1927, p. 38), giving the Supreme Court jurisdiction to admit attorneys and counselors to practice, impliedly repeals Code Civ. Proc. § 279, under which District Courts of Appeal exercised a like function.

2. Attorney and client ⚷1—Right to exercise vocation of attorney is one which Legislature may bestow or may empower judicial department to bestow on fitting terms.

The right or privilege of exercising the vocation of attorney and counselor at law is a right or privilege which the Legislature may bestow or may empower the judicial department of the state government to bestow upon such terms as are deemed consistent with the nature and purpose of the right or privilege.

3. Statutes ⚷158, 167(1)—Repeals by implication are not favored, but will prevail where later statute is revisory of entire matter and designed as substitute for earlier statute.

Repeals by implication are not favored; but, when it is apparent that a later statute is revisory of the entire matter of an earlier one and designed as a substitute for it, the later will prevail.

4. Statutes ⚷114(1)—State Bar Act, divesting District Courts of Appeal of jurisdiction to admit to practice, held not to involve more than one subject expressed in its title (Const. art. 4, § 24).

State Bar Act (St. 1927, p. 38), entitled "An act to create a public corporation to be known as 'The State Bar of California,' * * * to regulate the practice of law, * * *" in so far as it operates to divest the District Courts of Appeal of jurisdiction to admit attorneys and counselors to practice, held not violative of Const. art. 4, § 24, requiring that every act shall embrace but one subject which shall be expressed in its title.

5. Statutes ⚷109—Courts may look to history of particular legislation in determining whether title of act sufficiently embraces its subject-matter (Const. art. 4, § 24).

In determining whether the subject-matter embraced within the body of a legislative act is sufficiently referred to in its title (Const. art. 4, § 24), court is entitled to look to the history of the particular legislation to which the act in question relates.

Application by August Weymann for admission to practice as an attorney and counselor at law. Application dismissed.

August Weymann, in pro. per.

R. H. Purdue, of Los Angeles, for respondent Los Angeles Bar Association.

CONREY, P. J. On the 5th day of January, 1927, petitioner filed his application for admission to practice law in this state, the application being based upon a certificate showing his admission to practice law in the state of New York. On the 7th day of November, 1927, the state board of bar examiners filed its report recommending that the application be denied, solely on the ground of insufficient practice for three years within the period of seven years immediately preceding the filing of his application. Code Civ. Proc. § 279. On the 28th day of May, 1928, pursuant to notice, the applicant presented his motion that he be admitted to practice notwithstanding said adverse recommendation.

It will not be necessary to pass upon the sufficiency of the evidence offered by the applicant to show that he had in fact practiced law for the necessary period of time as claimed by him if, as contended by respondent, this court is now without authority to grant an application of this kind.

The Legislature at its session of the year 1927 adopted the statute known as the "State Bar Act" (Stats. 1927, p. 38, Deering's 1927 Supp. to Gen. Laws, Act 591). Prior to the organization of the State Bar of California in accordance with the provisions of that act, the subject of admission to the practice of law in this state, including the procedure therefor, was governed by the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure. Under sections 276 and 277, the applicant was required to apply for admission to the District Court of Appeal of the appellate district in which he resided, and the admission to practice was made by order of that court. The conditions on which attorneys might be admitted who previously had been admitted to practice law in the highest court of a sister state were defined in Code of Civil Procedure, § 279. Pursuant to the provisions of the State Bar Act, organization of the State Bar of California was completed on the 18th day of November, 1927.

The State Bar Act is entitled "An act to create a public corporation to be known as 'The state bar of California,' to provide for its organization, government, membership and powers, to regulate the practice of law, and to provide penalties for violations of said act." The act by its terms creates the corporation, and provides that its first members "shall be all persons now entitled to practice law in this state." It is further provided in section 7:

> "After the organization of the state bar, as herein provided, all persons who are admitted to practice in accordance with the provisions of this act shall become by that fact members of the state bar."

Section 24 reads as follows:

> "Admission to the Bar.—With the approval of the Supreme Court, and subject to the provisions of this act, the board shall have power to fix and determine the qualifications for admission to practice law in this state, and to constitute and appoint a committee of not more than seven members with power to examine applicants and recommend to the Supreme Court for admission to practice law those who fulfill the requirements. With the approval of the Supreme Court the board shall have power to fix and collect fees to be paid by applicants for admission to practice, which fees shall be paid into the treasury of the state bar; provided, however, that until otherwise fixed and determined, the requirements for admission to practice under this act shall be the same as those now prescribed by the Supreme Court for admission to practice in this state and shall be enforced as the same now are enforced through the state board of bar examiners."

[1] It is contended by the applicant herein that the State Bar Act does not divest the District Courts of Appeal of the jurisdiction conferred by section 279 of the Code of Civil Procedure to admit attorneys from other states to practice. He points out that there is no express repeal of said section 279; and he contends that the State Bar Act and chapter 1, title, 5, part I, of the Code of Civil Procedure are statutes in pari materia and are to be construed together and both given force and effect as far as possible, and that even if section 24 of the State Bar Act be held to vest jurisdiction in the Supreme Court to admit attorneys and counselors to practice, it does not ipso facto divest the District Courts of Appeal of the jurisdiction they formerly had. It is said by the applicant in his brief that the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure embody a complete and comprehensive scheme for establishing the legal status of attorneys at law, defining generally the prerequisites for admission, and granting authority to the courts, or to such agencies as the courts by authority of the Legislature may create for that purpose, to carry those provisions into effect. With this statement as to the nature of those provisions we agree; but the same statement is equally applicable to the State Bar Act. The fact that this later legislation has for its object the substitution of a complete and comprehensive scheme in the place of the former provisions constitutes the principal ground upon which we base our opinion that the enactment of the State Bar Act is in itself an implied repeal of all of the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure which provided for the admission of attorneys by the District Courts of Appeal.

[2, 3] The right or privilege of exercising the vocation of attorney and counselor at law is a right or privilege which the Legislature has the power to bestow, or to empower the judicial department of the state government to bestow, upon such terms as are deemed consistent with the nature and purpose of the right or privilege to be exercised. In re Collins, 188 Cal. 701, 704, 206 P. 990, 32 A. L. R. 1062; Matter of Mock, 146 Cal. 378, 80 P. 64.

It being thus established that the subject-matter under consideration is entirely within legislative control, it only remains to consider whether or not the later statute has in fact repealed the Code provisions relating to that same subject-matter although there are no express words of repeal.

> "While it is true that repeals by implication are not favored, whenever it becomes apparent that a later statute is revisory of the entire matter of an earlier statute, and is designed as a substitute for it, the later statute will prevail, and the earlier statute will be held to have been superseded, even though there be found no inconsistencies or repugnancies between the two." Mack v. Jastro, 126 Cal. 130, 132, 58 P. 372, 373; Suydam v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 27 Cal. App. 157, 161, 149 P. 55, 57; 23 Cal. Jur. p. 702; McGranahan v. Police Court, 56 Cal. App. 372, 374, 205 P. 98.

We are of the opinion that in accordance with the principles stated in the foregoing decisions the entire subject of admission of attorneys and counselors to the practice of law in this state is now governed in accordance with the provisions of the State Bar Act, and that the District Courts of Appeal are without authority at this time to make orders of admission to the practice of law in this state.

[4] The foregoing conclusion has been reached upon the presumption that the State Bar Act is not an act in any respect violative of the provisions of the Constitution of the state. It is contended by the applicant here that in so far as the State Bar Act may purport to divest the District Courts of Appeal of jurisdiction to admit attorneys and counselors it is unconstitutional and void; and particularly that the statute is violative of the constitutional provision that every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title. Const., art. 4, § 24. The applicant claims that the subject expressed in the State Bar Act is not logically germane to the subject of divesting the District Courts of Appeal of jurisdiction to admit attorneys and counselors to practice. We have quoted in full the title of the State Bar Act. The applicant contends that the phrase "to regulate the practice of law," as contained in said title, should be construed as meaning "to regulate the practice of lawyers," and not to include the admission of persons to the practice of law or the limitation of the authority of the courts in relation to the admission of attorneys to practice. We are of the opinion that the quoted phrase is sufficiently comprehensive in itself to include the admission of attorneys to practice; and further, that when taken in connection with the preceding words of the title all doubt is removed. The subject of the act as a whole is of such unity, and so completely interrelated in all of its parts that it constitutes but "one subject," within the meaning of those words as used in the Constitution.

> "It is now well settled that the constitutional provision requiring the subject of the act to be expressed in its title must be liberally construed, and that all that is required to be contained therein in order to meet the constitutional requirement is a reasonably intelligent reference to the subject to which the legislation of the act is to be addressed. It is not necessary that it should 'embrace an abstract or catalogue of its contents.'" Estate of McPhee, 154 Cal. 385, 389, 97 P. 878, 880.

See. also, Matter of Schuler, 167 Cal. 282, 293, 139 P. 685, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 706, applying to the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517) and its title the "broad interpretation" given by the Supreme Court to said section of the Constitution. In Matter of Maginnis, 162 Cal. 200, 203, 121 P. 723, 725, the Supreme Court said:

> "The particular requirement that acts should contain but a single subject, which should be expressed in the title, was, no doubt, intended to guard against the inclusion in a single or general act of various disconnected provisions—a practice which might well prevent the consideration upon its own merits of legislation on each of the various subjects embraced in the bill. Thus, the constitution of New Jersey prefixes to a similar provision a recital that its purpose is 'to avoid improper influences which may result from intermixing in one and the same act such things as have no proper relation to each other.' (See Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, 7th Ed., p. 203.) All of these limitations are to receive 'a reasonable, and not a narrow construction.' (Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 226, 24 Pac. 383; Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 633, 29 Pac. 251.) The requirement that an act shall not contain more than one subject does not mean that a number of specific provisions, all designed to aid in the accomplishment of a single purpose, may not be united in one act. * * * In Ex parte Kohler, 74 Cal. 38, 41, 15 Pac. 436, [437] it was said: 'However numerous the provisions of an act may be, if they can be fairly considered as falling within the subject-matter of legislation, or as proper methods for the attainment of the end sought by the act, there is no conflict with the constitutional provision.'"

Again:

> "Where the body of an act embraces provisions which are germane to the general subject stated in its title, the title will be held sufficient to comprehend all of the provisions of the act itself; and where the title suggests to the mind the field of legislation which the text of the act includes, the title will not be held misleading or insufficient, or the act restricted in its operation." People v. Jordan, 172 Cal. 391, 394, 156 P. 451, 453.

Again:

> "The provisions of the various Constitutions relating to the subject-matter and titles of acts should be construed liberally to uphold proper legislation, all parts of which are reasonably germane on the one hand, and to prevent trickery on the other hand. The restrictions requiring the subject of an act to be expressed in its title should be reasonably construed, considering substance rather than form, to require the expression in the title of the general object but not the details or incidents, or means of effecting the object sought, and to include the subject and not the purpose of the act and the reasons which brought about the enactment of it by the legislature." McClure v. Riley, 198 Cal. 23, 26, 243 P. 429, 430.

[5] In the foregoing case of McClure v. Riley this rule of liberal construction was applied in relation to the title of an act appropriating money for the completion of construction, etc., of state buildings in the city of Sacramento. The court pointed out that, in determining whether the subject-matter embraced within the body of a legislative act is sufficiently referred to in its title, in conformity with the foregoing rule of interpretation, the court was entitled to look to the history of the particular legislation to which the act in question, when read as a whole, relates. If in like manner we look to the history of the particular legislation to which the State Bar Act relates, the result of that historical view strongly tends to support the conclusion that the State Bar Act, both as indicated in its title and more fully embraced in the body of the act, was intended to legislate concerning the entire subject indicated, covering and including the method of admission of attorneys and counselors to the practice of law in this state.

In accordance with the foregoing opinion, the application of petitioner is dismissed, without prejudice and solely upon the ground that this court is without authority to act on the merits of the application.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 27, 1928.

1. Principal and agent 🔑173(3)—Evidence held to sustain court's conclusion that owner ratified contract with dealer to pay for automobile in merchandise.

In claim and delivery for possession of automobile taken by defendant owner on plaintiff's default in payment of purchase-money installment, evidence held sufficient to sustain court's conclusion that owner ratified, accepted, and received and applied payments under, contract with dealer for payment in merchandise, instead of cash as provided by separate contract assigned to owner by dealer, with full knowledge of terms and conditions of merchandise contract, and hence was bound thereby.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Conflicting evidence on fact issue must be resolved in favor of trial court's decision.

Conflicting evidence as to whether automobile purchaser, contracting with dealer to pay in merchandise, agreed to abide by separate cash contract as between himself and owner to which dealer assigned it, if owner induced dealer to apply proceeds of sale of automobile, taken in part satisfaction of initial payment under merchandise contract, as part payment on cash contract, must be resolved in favor of trial court's decision to contrary.

3. Principal and agent 🔑164(1), 175(1)—Principal may ratify agent's unauthorized act, and is then bound as if originally authorizing.

When agent, acting under specific authorization, exceeds his authority in performance of lawful act, which principal could have authorized, principal may ratify such act and is then equally bound as if original authority had been ample or act performed by him in person.

4. Principal and agent 🔑175(2)—Owner ratifying and accepting benefits under contract with dealer to pay for automobile in merchandise is bound thereby (Civ. Code, § 1589).

Under Civ. Code, § 1589, finance corporation ratifying and accepting benefits under contract between dealer and purchaser of automobile owned by it for payment of purchase-money installments in merchandise, instead of cash as provided by separate contract assigned to corporation by dealer, is bound by merchandise contract, though dealer had no authority to sell automobile except for cash payments.

5. Principal and agent 🔑195—Specific finding that owner ratified contract with dealer to pay for automobile in merchandise was not essential to valid judgment.

Where dealer's authority as agent of finance corporation to sell automobile for merchandise was not made an issue by pleadings in claim and delivery by purchaser, on whose default in payment of cash installment under contract assigned by dealer to such corporation it took possession, a specific finding on question of ratification of merchandise contract was not essential to validity of judgment for plaintiff.

6. Trial 🔑396(3)—No finding as to automobile purchaser's oral agreement to abide by cash contract was necessary, where defendant pleaded only such contract in purchaser's action for possession.

Where finance corporation, sued for possession of automobile taken from plaintiff on default in payment of cash purchase-money installment, pleaded only cash contract assigned to it by dealer, no finding was necessary on question of asserted oral agreement by plaintiff to abide by terms of such contract, instead of separate contract for payment in merchandise, if dealer was induced to apply proceeds of sale of automobile, accepted in part satisfaction of initial payment, as payment on cash contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph S. Koford, Judge.

Action by E. A. Moody against the Judah Boas Finance Corporation and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. L. Weil, Forrest A. Cobb, and Harris F. Shaw, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

L. V. Starr and C. H. Patterson, both of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action in claim and delivery, involving the possession of an automobile. Judgment was entered for plaintiff, and defendants have taken separate appeals, which are presented in one record. Briefs supporting the appeal have been submitted by the defendant finance corporation alone, however, and therefore, for convenience, it will be hereinafter referred to as appellant.

The automobile in question belonged to appellant, who consigned it to the defendant Danker, an automobile dealer in Stockton, to sell. On November 14, 1924, Danker sold and delivered the same to respondent under a conditional sales contract of which appellant subsequently became the assignee. Thereafter and on March 3, 1925, appellant took possession of said automobile, claiming that the monthly installment which fell due the preceding month had not been paid. The next day this action was commenced, pursuant to which the automobile was seized by the sheriff.

The first disputed question arises over the terms of the agreement under which the sale to respondent was made. With respect thereto the evidence shows that the transaction between Danker and respondent resulted in the execution of two separate documents bearing the same date, November 14, 1924, but evidently executed on different days. Each provided for an initial payment of $595 and monthly installments of $96 each; but so far as we are here concerned the essential difference between the two was that under the terms of one all payments were required to be made in cash, and in the other it was agreed that in satisfaction of the initial payment Danker would accept respondent's Ford automobile at a stipulated value of $500 and merchandise of the value of $95; that the succeeding monthly installments should be paid to Danker in merchandise; and that Danker would assume payment of the cash installments, the exact language of the provision being:

> "Mr. Moody (the respondent) agrees to furnish Mdse. at distributors price, 50% dsct. to cover the amt. of monthly payment. Payment of contract assumed by L. A. Danker."

[1, 2] The foregoing documents, when considered in the light of the circumstances under which they were executed, established beyond question that as between respondent and Danker the so-called merchandise agreement was controlling; but appellant alleged in its counterclaim, and contended at the trial, as on this appeal, that it was not bound by such agreement and that its rights must be measured by the terms of the cash contract, which alone it claims to have accepted. The trial court determined otherwise, however, and after a review of the entire evidence we are of the opinion that it is legally sufficient to sustain the trial court's decision. The evidence supporting this conclusion is, in part, as follows: Respondent was a dealer in automobile polish, and he informed Danker in the beginning that he could purchase the car only by being allowed to make the payments in merchandise. This proposition was acceptable to Danker, but he told respondent that appellant was the owner of the car and that in order to complete the sale it would be necessary to obtain from respondent a regular form of cash contract, because without it he would be unable to discount the merchandise contract with appellant; whereupon the two documents were signed, and in accordance with the terms of the merchandise agreement respondent delivered to Danker his automobile, and polish of the value of $95, in liquidation of the initial payment, and took possession of appellant's car. Immediately upon doing so, however, and on November 17, 1924, respondent, accompanied by a business associate named Mrs. Cummings, called on Mr. Boas, president of the appellant corporation, at his office in San Francisco, and in the presence of a Mr. Theobold, who represented the agency handling this particular make of automobile, fully informed Boas of the nature of the trade he had made with Danker and of the execution of the two contracts. Boas at first declined to consider acceptance of the merchandise contract and informed respondent that unless he was willing to stand on the cash contract alone he would be required to return the automobile. But later another conference was held between the same parties, the purport of which is in dispute. Boas and Theobold claim that respondent agreed that as between himself and appellant he would abide by the cash contract provided Boas induced Danker to apply as part payment on the cash contract the proceeds received by Danker from the sale of respondent's automobile. Respondent and Mrs. Cummings testified to the contrary, however, claiming that the proposition mentioned was not made by respondent, but was advanced by Boas and that respondent expressly refused to accede to it or to do anything else other than as required by the merchandise contract. Under the established rule, we must, of course, resolve the conflict in favor of the trial court's decision. However, as a result of this conference Theobold went to Stockton, accompanied by respondent and Mrs. Cummings, and induced Danker to turn over to appellant the sum of $350 representing the sale price of respondent's automobile. Thereafter and on November 24, 1924, appellant accepted the assignment of the cash contract and immediately credited Danker's account with $1,300; and after applying $21 of the $350 to the payment of a back interest account due from Danker, appellant opened a special account with Danker and respondent and credited the same with the remaining $329. Subsequently and on November 28, 1924, respondent mailed a copy of the merchandise contract to appellant accompanied by a letter stating in part:

> "My contract with Mr. Danker, as you know, specifies that he is to assume all payments on said Moon Sedan and therefore you will have to look to Mr. L. A. Danker for any and all payments that are or may become due."

Appellant replied in substance that it would refuse to recognize any equities between respondent and Danker and would insist on compliance with the terms of the cash contract. Two subsequent monthly payments were made to appellant, one in December, 1924, and the other in January, 1925; each payment being made by check drawn by Danker in favor of respondent and by the latter indorsed and sent to appellant.

As indicated, the foregoing evidence is legally sufficient in our opinion to sustain the conclusion that after having full knowledge of the terms and conditions of the merchandise contract appellant ratified and accepted the same, and that thereafter it received payments thereunder and applied the same on its books in a manner indicative of and entirely consistent with such ratification. Consequently, as the trial court held, appellant was bound thereby.

[3, 4] Appellant makes the further contention that in any event Danker had no authority to sell said automobile except for cash payments, and that the attempted sale thereof under the merchandise contract was therefore in excess of his authority and consequently not binding on appellant. It is well settled, however, that whenever an agent acting under a specific authorization has exceeded his authority in the performance of a lawful act, which the principal could have authorized, the principal may thereafter ratify such unauthorized act, and when so ratified it acts retrospectively and the principal is equally bound as he would have been had the original authority been ample, or had he originally performed the act in person (Market Street Ry. Co. v. Hellman, 109 Cal. 571, 42 P. 225); and, furthermore, as declared by section 1589 of the Civil Code, a voluntary acceptance of the benefit of a transaction is equivalent to a consent to all the obligations arising from it, so far as the facts are known, or ought to have been known, to the person accepting. As already shown, the evidence in the present case is legally sufficient to support the inference that appellant ratified the merchandise contract and accepted benefits thereunder. Therefore the legal rule contended for by appellant is inapplicable.

[5] A specific finding upon the question of ratification was not essential to the validity of the judgment, as appellant claims, because the matter of Danker's authority as agent was not made an issue by the pleadings; appellant having chosen to stand or fall on the question of the existence of the cash contract and a negative finding was made thereon.

[6] Appellant further contends that it was necessary for the trial court to make a finding upon the question of the asserted oral agreement which Boas and Theobold claim respondent made to abide by the terms of the cash agreement in the event that Danker was induced to apply as payment thereon the proceeds derived by him from the sale of respondent's automobile. We think such finding was not necessary for the reason that appellant pleaded only the cash contract, the allegations of paragraph 2 of the counterclaim being that respondent agreed to purchase said automobile pursuant to the terms of a written contract, a copy of which was annexed to the counterclaim and designated "Exhibit A," which was the cash contract. The ultimate fact to be determined, therefore, was whether or not that contract was controlling, and the trial court found thereon:

> "That the allegations of paragraph 2 thereof are not and each of them is not true, and that the said automobile was delivered to plaintiff under a written modification of said defendant's Exhibit A," etc.

If therefore appellant relied on any other contract with reference to which a finding was desired, it should have pleaded the same in the beginning or by amendment.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

CALIFORNIA DELTA FARMS, INC., v. CHINESE AMERICAN FARMS, Inc.*

(Sac. 4148.)

Supreme Court of California. July 6, 1928.
Rehearing Granted Aug. 6, 1928.

1. Conspiracy 🔑28—Intentional acts to carry out contract to convey land to corporation, majority of whose stockholders were aliens ineligible to citizenship, constituted "conspiracy" (Alien Land Act 1920, § 10, as amended by St. 1923, p. 1020, § 9).

Intentional acts of two parties in concert after December 9, 1920, to carry out provisions of contract for conveyance of agricultural land to corporation majority of whose stock was beneficially owned by persons ineligible to citizenship, with knowledge of the alienage, constituted "conspiracy," in violation of Alien Land Act 1920 (St. 1921, p. lxxxiii) § 10, as amended by St. 1923, p. 1020, § 9.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Conspiracy.]

2. Conspiracy 🔑24—Act lawful if done by one person may be unlawful if done or attempted by several.

An act may be lawful if done by one person and unlawful if done or attempted by a concert of action on the part of two or more persons.

3. Conspiracy 🔑37—Successful fruition of conspiracy does not bar prosecution for conspiracy itself.

The successful fruition of a conspiracy is no bar to a prosecution for the conspiracy itself.

4. Contracts 🔑107—Contract founded on act penalized by statute is void.

When a statute pronounces a penalty for an act, a contract founded on such act is void, though the statute does not pronounce it void nor expressly prohibit it.

5. Aliens 🔑10—Transfer knowingly violating Alien Land Act is invalid as between parties (Alien Land Act 1920, § 10, as amended by St. 1923, p. 1020, § 9).

Transfer made knowingly in violation of Alien Land Law effective Dec. 9, 1920 (St. 1921, p. lxxxiii) § 10, as amended by St. 1923, p. 1020, § 9, is invalid whether vendor was cognizant of extent of alienage in corporate purchaser, and statute renders illegal consideration underlying executory provisions of such contract, as against vendor's contention that alien would get a defeasible title and that defect therein could not be raised between the parties but only by the state.

6. Aliens 🔑10—Corporation prevented from completing land purchase contract because of alienage of majority of its stockholders held entitled to accounting and lien for payments on price (Alien Land Law 1920, § 10, as amended by St. 1923, p. 1020, § 9).

Where contract for transfer of land to corporation failed because majority of beneficial owners of corporation's stock were aliens ineligible to citizenship under Alien Land Law 1920 (St. 1921, p. lxxxiii) § 10, as amended by St. 1923, p. 1020, § 9, vendee was entitled to accounting in equity as of December 9, 1920, the effective date of statute and lien on property for amount found due it for its payments on purchase price less proper set offs, since contract when made and until December 9, 1920, was valid as against every one other than the state.

7. Vendor and purchaser 🔑54—Vendee's full equitable title matures only on full payment of purchase price.

Equitable doctrine that vendee under land contract is owner of property applies only to payments made on purchase price, and full, equitable title matures only on full payment of price.

8. Aliens 🔑10—Statute authorizing alien ineligible to citizenship to acquire title to realty to satisfy lien thereon held not to authorize completion of existing land contract to alien purchaser (Alien Land Act, § 7, as amended).

Provision of Alien Land Act (St. 1921, p. lxxxiii) § 7, as amended (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, p. 1, Act 261, § 7) that act shall not apply to realty acquired in enforcement or satisfaction of any lien existing upon "or interest in such property" so long as realty so acquired remains property of alien acquiring it in such manner, and in limiting time for which land so acquired may be held to two years, held to constitute an exemption of real property acquired in satisfaction of any lien on such property or on any interest therein, and did not permit completion of executory contract to purchase on theory that alien purchaser, ineligible to citizenship, had equitable interest.

9. Vendor and purchaser 🔑335—Vendee in default not entitled to lien may have judgment for purchase money paid if consideration has failed without his fault (Civ. Code, § 3050).

Under Civ. Code, § 3050, vendee, though not entitled to lien for purchase money, may, even when in default, have judgment for purchase money paid if consideration for contract has without his fault failed.

PRESTON, J. The able briefs on file in this cause cover a wide range of subjects, but we will consider only a few of them, as we have been led to the conclusion that the appeal is controlled by the provisions of the Alien Land Law, which became effective December 9, 1920 (Stats. 1921, p. lxxxiii), and particularly by section 10 thereof, which reads as follows:

> "If two or more persons conspire to effect a transfer of real property, or of an interest therein, in violation of the provisions hereof, they are punishable by imprisonment in the county jail or state penitentiary not exceeding two years, or by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars or both."

This provision was broadened to cover any violation of the act by an amendment passed in 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 1020).

The complaint in this action sets up a contract of sale and purchase, dated August 1, 1919, between plaintiff and one C. C. Wing, a native-born citizen of Chinese descent, covering 3437.58 acres of agricultural land, situate in San Joaquin county. Said contract provided that the total purchase price should be $893,770.80, $50,000 of which was paid upon execution thereof, and the balance of $651,000 was to be paid in yearly installments terminating January 1, 1928. The final balance of the purchase price remaining due on said date, to wit, $291,770.20, was to be paid by the assumption and discharge of an assessment made by Delta Farms Reclamation District 2030, amounting to $325,436, then outstanding as a lien upon said land, upon which reclamation bonds, bearing 6 per cent. interest, had been authorized and would be payable in approximately equal amounts annually from 1928 to 1938, inclusive.

It is further pleaded that all payments called for by said contract were made up to January 1, 1922, on which date there became due and payable $51,563.70, a like sum on January 1, 1923, and a like sum on January 1, 1924; that the total of said sums, plus interest on contract and other items due thereunder, less payments amounting in the aggregate to $151,649.63, made thereon, left a balance due of $231.263.42; that plaintiff had demanded repeatedly from said defendant payment of the said installments due on the purchase price, together with interest, assessments and taxes, and, after waiting more than 30 days, declared the rights of said defendant under said contract forfeited. The prayer is that said contract be declared no longer binding upon plaintiff, that said defendant be directed to deliver same up for cancellation, and that possession of said premises be ordered surrendered to plaintiff. The complaint was filed September 15, 1924.

Defendant, in a second amended answer and cross-complaint, admitted said default in payments, but set up, as an alleged waiver of plaintiff's right to claim a forfeiture under the contract, certain acts and conduct of plaintiff. The pleading alleges: That said C. C. Wing, an American-born Chinese, was acting on behalf of a corporation, to be thereafter organized, and which was later organized and became the defendant herein; that the $50,000 paid upon said contract prior to the formation of said corporation was more than 80 per cent. advanced by Chinese aliens, which fact plaintiff well knew, and that after said corporation was formed and transfer of said contract made thereto, although more than 50 per cent. of the issued and outstanding capital stock thereof stood of record in the name of native Chinese, eligible to citizenship, nevertheless at all of said times more than 50 per cent. of said stock so issued, to wit, 80 per cent. thereof, was actually, equitably and beneficially owned by aliens ineligible to citizenship, and this situation continued throughout the time covered by said contract. Further: "That the Alien Property Law of 1913, hereinabove particularly referred to, was changed and a new alien land law passed by initiative proceedings approved by the electors of the state of California November 2, 1920, Statutes of 1921, p. lxxxiii, in effect December, 1920, and which said Alien Land Law of 1920 was amended in 1923 by act of the Legislature of the state of California, and that from and after the time of the effective date of the Alien Land Law of 1920 the contract and agreement herein referred to as Exhibit A became impossible of performance; that the agreements, understandings, plan, and scheme of the plaintiff and defendant corporations to effect a transfer of the real property mentioned in said agreement became and were and now are in violation of the terms and provisions of said Alien Land Law of 1920 and 1923"; that by reason of said statute respondent was not able to carry out said agreement to convey or transfer merchantable or any title to or interest in the land the subject of the contract; that the agreement had become void in that the consideration therefor had wholly failed; that the terms of said agreement had become impossible of performance on the part of either party; that the objects and purposes of the agreement had become unlawful, and this without fault on the part of appellant.

It was further pleaded that at the time of the commencement of this action, appellant had paid to respondent under said contract the sum of $466,702.26, which sum, with interest thereon, appellant was entitled to have returned to it; that appellant had enjoyed the possession and benefits of said real property during all the times mentioned in the complaint and was ready, able, and willing and offered (and alleged that it had theretofore offered, also) to return possession of said real property to respondent, together with all benefits and profits which had accrued to it, together with interest at 7 per cent. from the dates when same was received and to restore plaintiff to its original position and status and to do all things in equity the court might determine to be meet and equitable to restore respondent to its original position, provided respondent pay to appellant the sum of $244,135.99, together with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, said sum representing the total amount of payments made by appellant on account of said contract, together with the value of improvements made upon said property, after deducting therefrom the proceeds, income, revenues, and every other receipt or money accruing to appellant from said possession and farming operations upon said property.

The prayer of the cross-complaint was that it be decreed, determined and adjudged that there had been a total failure of consideration in connection with said agreement; that the same had become impossible of performance by the parties; that said agreement be declared of no force and effect in law or equity; and that the purposes and objects thereof had become and were unlawful and that said agreement was for that reason void; and that said court determine the respective rights of the parties thereto after a full accounting and that equity in the premises be done; that plaintiff have and be restored to possession of said real property upon payment to defendant of the sum of $244,135.99, or such other sum, of greater or lesser amount, based upon a full accounting between the parties.

Plaintiff filed an answer denying the allegations of the cross-complaint, claiming, among other things, that it was without any knowledge or information whatsoever relative to the alleged participation of ineligible aliens in the transaction and their ownership of stock of defendant; that it was innocent of any intention to violate the provisions of the Alien Land Law; that defendant was an insolvent corporation, without funds or assets other than its pretended interest in said real property, and praying that the prayer of its complaint be granted.

From the findings and admissions of the pleadings, the following pertinent facts appear: (1) That the majority of the stock of defendant corporation has at all times herein been beneficially owned by Chinese aliens, hence by persons ineligible to citizenship in the United States (numerically the stockholders being about 1000, with 95 per cent. aliens, all Chinese); (2) that on December 9, 1920, when said Alien Land Law came into effect, there had been paid to plaintiff on account of said contract the sum of $297,557.21; (3) that up to and including January 1, 1922, there was no dereliction whatever on the part of defendant in making the payments called for by said contracts of sale and purchase; (4) that between January 1, 1922, and the time of commencement of this action, there had accrued upon said contract, and was then due and owing as a balance, the sum of $236,186.11; (5) that defendant went into possession of said property on January 1, 1920, and remained in possession thereof until the rendition of judgment herein on May 29, 1926; (6) that said property, and the whole thereof, is agricultural land and was during all times herein cultivated by said defendant and its lessees and sublessees as agricultural land; (7) that when said Alien Land Law of 1920 went into effect no particular attention was paid thereto by either party, but defendant, acting in apparent good faith in all other respects, proceeded until January 1, 1922, to carry out literally the terms of said contract, and apparently used its best efforts to continue to comply with said contract, but partially failed, as above noted; (8) that plaintiff in this action likewise gave no heed to the enactment of said statute, the court finding that it had no actual knowledge of the exact alien ownership of said stock, but the court also found that defendant corporation was organized for the purpose of taking over said contract and that it was known to plaintiff that ineligible aliens would be the owners, to some extent at least, of said stock and that 80 per cent. of the first payment on said contract was made by persons who were ineligible aliens and that during the whole period between the date of said contract and the commencement of this action, aliens, ineligible to citizenship, were owners and holders of at least part of the stock of said corporation.

The question for solution is the effect of said section 10 of the Alien Land Act of December 9, 1920, upon the contract here involved. The validity of this section of the act has been upheld. In re Akado, 188 Cal. 739, 207 P. 245. Criminal prosecutions have been carried on under it. People v. Cockrill, 62 Cal. App. 22, 216 P. 78; In re Okahara, 191 Cal. 353, 216 P. 614. Prosecution of the seller and buyer under a general conspiracy statute occurred in Washington. State v. McGonigle, 144 Wash. 252, 258 P. 16.

[1-3] The acts of the parties intentionally done with knowledge of the alienage of defendant and in concert to carry out the provisions of this contract were after December 9, 1920, a clear violation of this statute, so clear that it occurs to us that extended discussion is unnecessary. It is true the statute does not punish criminally the substantive act of making or receiving the transfer of title, but it is an accepted holding that an act may be lawful if done by one person and unlawful if done or attempted by a concert of action on the part of two or more persons. In re Akado, supra; 5 R. C. L. § 9, p. 1070. It is also true that the successful fruition of a conspiracy is no bar to a prosecution for the conspiracy itself. The completion of this contract would form conclusive proof of a conspiracy under the act if plaintiff possessed knowledge of the extent of the ownership of defendant's stock by ineligible aliens.

[4] We then come to the application of the well-known doctrine that, "Where a statute pronounces a penalty for an act, a contract founded on such act is void, although the statute does not pronounce it void, nor expressly prohibit it." Berka v. Woodward, 125

[5] But counsel for respondent contend that this rule is here inapplicable, stating their views as follows:

> "Even if it were true that a criminal conspiracy was consummated by conveying title to an alien, yet under the 1920 law the alien would get a defeasible title and the defect of the title still could not be raised between the parties."

This contention really forms the foundation upon which respondent rests its claims. In other words, it declares the existence of an exception to the general rule and cites in support of this contention such cases as Suwa v. Johnson, 54 Cal. App. 119, 203 P. 414; In re Akado, supra; In re Okahara, supra; Mott v. Cline, 200 Cal. 434, 253 P. 718.

In the first-mentioned cause the lessor attempted to avoid his lease to a Japanese alien under the provisions of the Alien Land Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 206), declaring agricultural lands thereafter acquired by aliens ineligible to citizenship subject to escheat at the hands of the state. The court, following some of our own decisions and a score or more from other jurisdictions, said:

> "The question presented is not new and the act of 1913 discloses no intention on the part of the Legislature to provide any new rule for its determination. It has uniformly been held under statutes forbidding ownership of land by aliens that, an alien grantee takes a defeasible estate, 'free from attack by any one except the government' in a direct proceeding." Suwa v. Johnson, supra, at page 121 (203 P. 414).

It is true that some of the provisions of the 1913 act are carried into the 1920 act, but section 10, above quoted, is entirely new and is sui generis. It provides an additional deterrent, one which may reach the owner of the soil about to be conveyed to the alien. It is true that in Re Akado, supra, some unfortunate expressions are found, parenthetically intimating that this action might not change the rule announced in Suwa v. Johnson, supra, in the respect before us, but there is much other language therein found indicating that the Legislature was applying a drastic policy "to prevent any attempts to create relations between such aliens and other persons whereby the title to land would be taken by any other person and the use thereof would be enjoyed by the alien" In re Y. Akado, supra, pp. 742, 743 (207 P. 246). "Furthermore, it is to the interest of the state that all persons owning land should be effectively deterred from attempting to evade or frustrate the provisions of the act forbidding the acquisition of such land by such alien, by means of colorable conveyances and unrecorded trusts." In re Y. Akado, supra, p. 742 (207 P. 246).

In Re Okahara, supra, it is said:

> "The purpose of the Alien Land Law, as is well said in O'Brien v. Webb [(D. C.) 279 F. 117] supra, 'was apparently to prevent ownership and legal interest in farming lands from passing to aliens who never could become citizens.'"

And in Mott v. Cline, supra, at page 445 (253 P. 724) it is said:

> "This question depends largely upon the legislative intent and upon whether or not the objects sought to be attained are within the police power of the state. There is no direct language upon this point, but there is general language which necessarily implies an intention to prevent an executory contract from ripening into a fee simple. * * * It is appellant's view that the option provision has been rendered void by section 10 of the act of 1920, which makes it a crime punishable as a misdemeanor or felony to conspire to effect a transfer of real property or an interest therein in violation of the law. This is the only act that is made a public offense and penalized by imprisonment or fine or by both (In re Akado, 188 Cal. 739 [207 P. 245]). The exaction imposed for all other violations of the act inhibiting transfers is that the conveyance is rendered void as to the state and the real property escheats to the state upon action brought by the Attorney General or district attorney of the county in which the violation occurs. People v. Cockrill, 268 U. S. 258 [45 S. Ct. 490, 69 L. Ed. 944]. Our statute follows the common law as to the escheat proceedings. It cannot be said that Ah Chue violated any provision of the conspiracy section."

These authorities not only do not offer comfort to respondent's position, but clearly point to the opposite conclusion. We see no room for the contention that this provision is not effective to invalidate any contract made knowingly in defiance of its terms. The object of the law was to strengthen the act of 1913 and to make effective the inhibition against allowing our agricultural lands to get either directly or indirectly into the hands of aliens ineligible to citizenship. This view is confirmed by the act of 1923 (Stats. 1923, supra), which, as above noted, extends the provision to cover conspiracies to violate any of the provisions of the act. The executory provisions of the contract before us, if knowingly acted upon, are within the condemnation of this section. The police power is used in its "highest and truest sense" in confining the ownership of the soil to persons who are and from whom may be made citizens of the republic (Mott v. Cline, supra, and other cases there cited). We therefore interpret said section of the act as an innovation upon the common law and effective to destroy and render illegal the consideration underlying the executory provisions of the contract before us.

If respondent knowingly acted with appellant in any effort to effect a transfer of the lands here involved it would be committing an offense. Appellant, which is little less than an aggregation of ineligibles, and the stockholders and agents thereof, would after December 9, 1920, certainly be consiping to violate said section if it pursued its efforts to obtain title to the lands, and this is true whether the seller was or was not cognizant of the extent of the alienage in the corporate ownership.

[6] Appellant invokes the rule announced in Montgomery v. Meyerstein, 186 Cal. 459, 199 P. 800 and 195 Cal. 37, 231 P. 730, to the effect that if a contract fails for any reason not due to the default of the vendee he may recover from the vendor in an accounting the amount paid on the purchase price less proper credits and set-offs. And under this head it demands an accounting in equity as of December 9, 1920, and a lien on the property for the amount found due it. This, we hold, it is entitled to have. It has already appeared that it was in possession of the lands from January 1, 1920, to the date of the judgment, May 29, 1926. It also appears that subsequent to the effective date of said act it has paid large sums of money to respondent amounting to some $151,649.63. While appellant is certainly entitled to no affirmative advantage growing out of anything occurring subsequent to December 9, 1920, and while it was proceeding in violation of the statute, still we see no reason resting in law or equity to deny it the rights accruing to any other person or corporation up to said date. And this embraces the right to employ any remedies the law affords to eligible persons to secure those rights. Under the universal doctrine announced in Suwa v. Johnson, supra, and Mott v. Cline, supra, and elsewhere, the contract when made was not void but valid and binding as against everyone other than the sovereign state, which condition obtained until December 9, 1920. Appellant could have legally assigned, prior to said date, its rights under said contract to an eligible person. Mott v. Cline, supra. The provisions of section 7 of said Alien Land Act are in part as follows:

> "* * * The provisions of this section and of sections two and three of this act shall not apply to any real property hereafter acquired in the enforcement or in satisfaction of any lien now existing upon or interest in such property so long as such real property so acquired shall remain the property of the alien, company, association or corporation acquiring the same in such manner. No alien, company, association or corporation mentioned in section two or section three hereof shall hold for a longer period than two years the possession of any agricultural land acquired in the enforcement of or in satisfaction of a mortgage or other lien hereafter made or acquired in good faith to secure a debt." Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, p. 1, Act 261, § 7, p. 82.

[7, 8] Under this section the act itself allows appellant to secure to itself the proceeds of an accounting in equity as to all lawful matters pertaining to said transaction, including the assertion of a lien upon the property for the amount found due, and this carries the right to continue in possession of the property until same is satisfied. But respondent not only denies consolation to appellant from the provision of the act last above quoted but advances a construction thereof which will allow such contracts as we have before us to ripen into full title without penalties, civil or criminal, of said statute. The contention is that in equity the vendee under a contract of purchase is the owner of the property; hence the exemption of "the interest in such real property" is effective to allow the completion of title. We can give this contention no weight.

The equitable doctrine above referred to is sometimes applied, but only to the payments made on the purchase price; the full equitable title matures only upon the full payment of such price. Montgomery v. Meyerstein, supra. This doctrine would not allow the completion of the contracts before us, as about one-third only of the purchase price had been paid on the effective date of the act. Moreover, this equitable doctrine has often been held inapplicable in the construction of statutes conferring or withholding rights in real property. Belieu v. Powers, 54 Cal. App. 244, 201 P. 620; Allen v. Wilson, 178 Cal. 674, 174 P. 661. But the whole contention of respondent is based upon a misconstruction of the language of this proviso. For we construe the meaning to be as though it read as follows: An exemption for "real property acquired in satisfaction of any lien upon such property or upon any interest therein." This construction would allow the foreclosure of mortgages and other liens held by the alien, and in so doing would concede to him the right to acquire the property if necessary with the restriction that he must dispose of same within two years after so acquiring it. Still again this question is settled contrary to respondent's contention by the holding in Mott v. Cline, supra, where it is stated that there is general language which necessarily implies an intention to prevent an "executory contract from ripening into a fee simple." It is also stated "it was the purpose of the act to cut off instanter the right to thereafter acquire the fee." It is true that the executory contract there under consideration was a lease with an option to purchase. Nevertheless, it was an executory contract based upon a valuable consideration and every reason for applying the doctrine to that contract exists with respect to the contract before us.

It may be that respondent is not in pari delicto with appellant as to matters occurring subsequent to December 9, 1920. If this indeed be true, an accounting as to such matters may be had to ascertain if the value of the use and occupation of this property by appellant is greater than the payments and benefits received from it and, if so, respondent would be entitled to have such excess credited on its obligation to appellant arising out of payments made and other legal benefits received from it that are properly referable to said contract and antedate December 9, 1920.

[9] The question of rescission and the rules governing this subject are not, strictly speaking, involved here, as the rights of the parties are not determined by these rules. Civil Code, § 3050, governs the situation and provides as follows:

> "One who pays to the owner any part of the price of real property, under an agreement for the sale thereof, has a special lien upon the property, independent of possession, for such part of the amount paid as he may be entitled to recover back, in case of a failure of consideration." Montgomery v. Meyerstein, supra.

Although not entitled to the lien, the vendee may, even when in default, have judgment for the purchase money paid if the consideration for the contract has, without his fault, failed. Merrill v. Merrill, 103 Cal. 287, 35 P. 768, 37 P. 392; Wilson v. Smith, 69 Cal. App. 211, 213, 230 P. 963; Haile v. Smith, 113 Cal. 656, 664, 45 P. 872.

It is likewise unnecessary to extend this discussion by a consideration of the claim that appellant has estopped itself to resist a forfeiture under the contract by its subsequent conduct. The rule we have invoked is one of public policy which is not controlled by the subsequent conduct of the parties. To give ear to this plea would be to admit life in a contract during the period we have declared it to be illegal for it to operate.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to proceed in said cause in a manner not inconsistent with the holding herein made.

Nutter, Hancock & Rutherford and A. P. Hayne, all of Stockton, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. Appellant correctly states the question presented on this appeal as follows: "This is an appeal taken from an order denying the motion of appellant to set aside and vacate the judgment, and for the entry of another and different judgment on the findings made, upon the ground that the conclusions of law were incorrect, erroneous, and not consistent with or supported by the findings of fact."

The appeal is ruled by the case of California Delta Farms, Inc., v. Chinese American Farms, Inc. (Sac. No. 4148) 268 P. 1050, this day decided, to which reference is hereby made. This is true because the facts upon which the determination in that case was made appear from the findings of fact. This motion being based upon the same findings, the conclusion reached must of necessity be the same. It is unnecessary to order or give another judgment as the reversal in the main cause will necessitate a consideration by the court below of some issues made by the answer and cross-complaint which could not be fully disposed of under the findings of fact as made.

The order is reversed.

True Van Sickle and D. C. De Golia, both of Oakland, and Albert L. Johnson, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, C. J. Respondents move to dismiss the appeal. The judgment appealed from was entered on October 19, 1927, in a proceeding brought under section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure to determine heirship. A motion for new trial interposed by the defendants was denied December 16, 1927, and on December 24 the defendants filed their notice of appeal, together with a notice and request to the clerk for the preparation of a transcript. On March 1, 1928, on motion of the respondents, an order was made and entered by the trial court dismissing the proceedings to obtain a transcript under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. In support of the present motion to dismiss, the respondents urge that the appeal is without a record to support it, and that it was not taken within the time required by law.

[1] The first ground of the motion is without merit, and the appeal will not be dismissed for the asserted lack of a record. At the time the motion was noticed and made here (April 3, 1928), the forty-day period (after March 1) prescribed by rule 2 of this court, within which a record must be filed, had not expired. The motion, as to the ground first mentioned, is premature. Moreover, the appellants have expressed their intention of seasonably filing a transcript constituting the judgment roll, and for that purpose have kept their time open by stipulation and order.

[2] As to the second ground of the motion, the respondents contend that an appeal from a judgment in a proceeding under section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure must be taken within sixty days after the entry thereof, and this despite the institution of new trial proceedings. In other words, it is urged that, while new trial proceedings are expressly authorized by the provisions of the section, such proceedings do not, as is ordinarily the rule, serve to extend the time for appeal from the judgment. So far as is pertinent here, the section reads:

> "Such parties are allowed twenty days after the service of the complaint, as aforesaid, within which to plead thereto, and thereafter such proceedings shall be had upon such complaint as in this Code provided in case of an ordinary civil action; and the issues of law and of fact arising in the proceeding shall be disposed of in like manner as issues of law and fact are herein provided to be disposed of in civil actions, with a like right to a motion for a new trial and appeal to the Supreme Court; and the provisions in this Code contained regulating the mode of procedure for the trial of civil actions, the motion for a new trial of civil actions, statements on motion for a new trial, bills of exception, and statements on appeal, as also in regard to undertakings on appeal, and the mode of taking and perfecting appeals, and the time within which such appeals shall be taken, shall be applicable thereto; provided, however, that all appeals herein must be taken within sixty days from the date of the entry of the judgment or the order complained of."

It is upon the last clause of the foregoing quotation that respondents base their contention. Section 1664, supra, was enacted prior to the 1915 amendment of section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure providing that, if proceedings for a new trial are pending, the time for appeal from the judgment shall not expire until thirty days after entry in the trial court of the order determining such proceedings, or other termination in that court of the proceedings on such motion. Section 1714 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares that—

> "The provisions of part two of this code [of which section 939 is a constituent part], relative to new trials and appeals, except in so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of this title, apply to the proceedings mentioned in this title. * * *"

Sections 1664 and 1714 form parts of the same title. It therefore becomes necessary to determine whether the provisions of section 939 are so inconsistent with those of section 1664 as to render the former inapplicable to proceedings instituted under the latter.

Section 1715 of the Code of Civil Procedure governs appeals in probate and guardianship proceedings generally, and is equally as definite as section 1664 as to the time within which such appeals may be prosecuted. It provides:

> "The appeal may be taken at any time after the order, decree, or judgment is made or rendered, but not later than sixty days after the same is entered in the minute book of the court as provided in section 1704."

Despite this very explicit language requiring the prosecution of an appeal within sixty days after entry of judgment in a proceeding governed by the provisions of section 1715, this court has held that, under the provisions of section 939, the institution of new trial proceedings served to extend the time within which an appeal had to be taken from an order admitting a will to probate. Estate of Seiler, 174 Cal. 498, 164 P. 401. The matter came on before the court on a motion to dismiss an appeal from an order admitting a will to probate, on the ground that the appeal was not taken within the time allowed by law. It was not taken within sixty days after the date of the entry of the order, as required by section 1715, but was taken within thirty days after a motion for a new trial duly made was determined. The court said, in that case that it was "of the opinion that the provision of section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 205), providing that if proceedings on motion for a new trial are pending, the time for appeal from the judgment shall not expire until thirty days after entry in the trial court of the order determining the motion for a new trial, or other termination in the trial court of the proceedings upon such motion, is applicable in the matter of an appeal from an order admitting a will to probate, and for that reason the motion to dismiss the appeal [was] denied."

If it can with propriety be held that new trial proceedings served to extend the time of appeal from an order admitting a will to probate, it can equally as well be held in the instant case that the timely institution of new trial proceedings had the effect of extending the time for appeal from the judgment entered in this proceeding. Moreover, if new trial proceedings are applicable to causes finding their inception in the provisions of section 1664, supra, and that they are applicable cannot be questioned, it is but reasonable to hold that such proceedings serve to extend the time of appeal in conformity with the provisions of section 939, supra. The correctness of this assumption is fortified if it be kept in mind that the provision of section 939, providing for appeals within thirty days after termination of new trial proceedings, was added in the year 1915, long subsequent to the enactment of section 1664.

The motion to dismiss is denied.

KELLY v. SMITH et al. (MIDDLECOFF, Intervener). (Sac. 4046.)

Supreme Court of California. July 12, 1928.

1. Attorney and client 🔑190(4)—Intervention of plaintiff's discharged attorney in suit to quiet title after defendant defaulted and lien claimant agreed on compromise held premature.

Where plaintiff, holder of tax title suing to quiet title to realty, employed attorney under written agreement providing that, when plaintiff was declared by judgment or compromise to be owner of the property, he should have his money invested back, and the overplus of land should be equally divided between plaintiff and attorney, and during first trial defendant defaulted, and thereafter plaintiff discharged attorney, held, that attorney's intervention by complaint claiming undivided one-half of said lots, filed, after the only lien claimant and plaintiff had agreed on compromise of said action, and compromise judgment was entered quieting plaintiff's title, was properly dismissed as premature.

2. Attorney and client 🔑134(2)—Attorney for plaintiff suing to quiet title could not, by his wrongful discharge, be divested of any interest in realty given by employment contract, regardless of plaintiff's insolvency.

If attorney for plaintiff, suing to quiet title, was given any interest in realty involved by his agreement of employment, he could not be divested thereof by his wrongful discharge, but plaintiff would hold whatever property he recovered in trust for his attorney to extent of attorney's interest, which would not be subject to claims of plaintiff's general creditors, and plaintiff's insolvency would therefore not affect attorney's right to recover his interest or to intervene.

3. Attorney and client 🔑190(4)—Right of attorney to intervene in client's action should be limited to actions in which attorney is given specific present interest in subject-matter of litigation.

Cases in which attorney is authorized to intervene, in action instituted by him in behalf of his client, for purpose of settling dispute with client as to fees for services rendered in the same action, should be limited to those actions wherein, by contract of employment, attorney is given a specific present interest in the subject-matter of the action which might be jeopardized by client's discharge of attorney and employment of others to prosecute the action.

4. Parties 🔑42—No intervention is permissible after judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 387).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 387, no intervention is permissible after judgment.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; K. Van Zante, Judge.

Action by J. J. Kelly against M. N. Smith and others, in which W. W. Middlecoff intervenes. From an adverse judgment, intervener appeals. Affirmed.

Feemster & Cleary, of Visalia, and Joe E. Greene, of Dinuba, for appellant.

Fred G. Kline and D. E. Perkins, both of Visalia, and Chas. N. Sears, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Plaintiff instituted this action against the defendants to quiet his title to seven lots in the city of Tulare. Plaintiff held a tax title to said lots and employed intervener, who is an attorney at law, to act as his attorney in the prosecution of this action under a written agreement that "Middlecoff will render the necessary legal services to determine the title to said lands, and in cases where Kelly is declared by judgment or by compromise to be the owner, then said Kelly shall have his money invested back, and the overplus of the land shall be divided equally between them." The original owners of the land, three of the defendants, although regularly served with process, made no appearance in the action, and their default for failure to answer the complaint was duly entered. The Federal Construction Company, also made a defendant, appeared in said action by answer, and claimed a lien upon said lots. Upon the issues thus framed a trial was had, and resulted in a judgment in favor of the Federal Construction Company and against plaintiff. A new trial, however, was thereafter granted by the trial court, and the case was set for trial the second time. In all these proceedings the intervener acted as plaintiff's attorney. When the action came on for trial the second time, the intervener appeared ready and willing to proceed with the trial as plaintiff's attorney, but the plaintiff without just cause discharged the intervener, and employed other counsel to conduct the litigation. Immediately thereafter, and with consent of court, the intervener filed a complaint in intervention in this action, and claimed to be the owner of an undivided one-half of said lots. His complaint in intervention was subsequently dismissed, and immediately thereafter the plaintiff and defendant Federal Construction Company announced in open court that they had agreed upon a compromise of said action, and, in pursuance thereof, a compromise judgment was, on May 4, 1925, entered in favor of plaintiff, quieting his title to said lots, and that intervener take nothing by his complaint in intervention. Pursuant to said compromise agreement, Kelly conveyed to the Federal Construction Company four of said lots. Thereafter, upon the motion of the intervener, a new trial was granted, and the case was again set for trial on September 22, 1926, on which day intervener appeared and filed a supplemental complaint in intervention, setting up the compromise agreement between the plaintiff and defendant Federal Construction Company, in which supplemental complaint he asked to have it decreed that he was the owner of an undivided one-half of the three lots which, it is claimed by the intervener, plaintiff acquired in the compromise agreement with the defendant Federal Construction Company. The trial court denied the intervener any relief, and rendered judgment against him for costs, on the ground that plaintiff's title to said lots had not been quieted or his interest therein determined, either by judgment or compromise, at the time of the filing of intervener's supplemental complaint in intervention.

[1] We think the determination of the trial court in holding that the intervener's entry in said action was premature is correct. By his agreement with the plaintiff he was not entitled to any interest in any of the lots involved in the action until "Kelly is declared by judgment or by compromise to be the owner," and then only after "Kelly shall have his money invested back, and the overplus of the land shall be divided equally between them." Kelly, the plaintiff, received no title to any of the lots by compromise, for the reason that no compromise was made by any person holding the legal title. The compromise was made with the Federal Construction Company, who at best held only a lien against the lots. It could give Kelly no title, and did not purport to. All it did was to relinquish its lien against three of the lots in Kelly's favor. Neither Kelly nor the construction company would become the owner of all or any of the lots as contemplated by the agreement whereby intervener was employed by the plaintiff until the entry of the decree of court quieting plaintiff's title. While such a decree was entered on May 4, 1925, which was before the filing of intervener's supplemental complaint, yet this decree was, at the instigation of the intervener, set aside by the trial court, and, at the time of the filing of said supplemental complaint, no decree had been entered quieting Kelly's title, which was then in force. As no judgment had been entered which was in force at the time intervener filed his supplemental complaint, Kelly had not up to that time been "declared by judgment" to be the owner of any of the lots involved. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that the intervener was, at the time of his attempted intervention in said action, entitled to no relief against any person connected with the action regarding the property in controversy.

[2] The court found that the plaintiff was, at the time the intervener filed his original complaint in intervention, and at all times subsequent thereto, insolvent and unable to pay his debts, and a money judgment against him would be worthless and without value. Intervener contends that insolvency is often an important circumstance in prompting a court of equity to grant relief where he would otherwise be relegated to an action of law. Conceding this to be the rule, it can have no weight in determining any question involved in this action. If the intervener has been given any interest in the real property by his agreement of employment, he cannot be divested of this interest by a wrongful discharge from said employment. The plaintiff under such circumstances would hold whatever real property he recovered in said action, in so far as the interest of the intervener therein is concerned, in trust for the intervener, and it would not be subject to the claims of plaintiff's general creditors. Hoffman v. Vallejo, 45 Cal. 564; Luco v. De Toro, 91 Cal. 405, 18 P. 866, 27 P. 1082. Therefore the solvency or insolvency of the plaintiff would not affect the right of the intervener in a proper action to recover whatever interest he is given in the lots in question. This proceeding, however, cannot be instituted under the contract between plaintiff and the intervener, at least before plaintiff has become the owner of said lots, and, as we have already shown, he was not such owner at any time when the intervener filed either his original or supplemental complaint herein.

Intervener contends that, having entered the default of the defendants, who were the owners of the legal title to said lots, Kelly, the plaintiff, became entitled to a judgment quieting his title thereto. Unquestionably this is true. It is just as true, we think, that until the judgment had been entered Kelly had not been "declared by judgment" to be the owner of the legal title to said lots.

[3, 4] We think the cases are and should be very rare when an attorney is authorized to intervene in an action instituted by him in behalf of his client for the purpose of settling a dispute between him and his client as to his attorney's fee for services rendered in the same action. They should be limited at least to those actions wherein, by virtue of the contract of employment between the attorney and client, the former is given a specific present interest in the subject-matter of the action, which interest might be jeopardized by the client's discharge of his original attorney and the employment of other attorneys to prosecute the action. Usually in cases where the attorney is given a present interest in the subject-matter of the action, it has been held that the attorney has a contract coupled with an interest, in which case the client would be powerless to discharge him. Todd v. Superior Court of San Francisco, 181 Cal. 406, 184 P. 684, 7 A. L. R. 938; Gage v. Atwater, 136 Cal. 170, 68 P. 581. A case like the present one, however, where the attorney is given no present interest in the subject-matter of the suit, but only an interest in the overplus of the land recovered, after the plaintiff has been repaid the money invested by him therein, presents no proper case, at least before recovery of judgment, for the interposition of a complaint in intervention by the attorney against his client. Of course, after recovery of judgment, no intervention is permissible, as in all cases it must be made before trial. Code Civ. Proc. § 387.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BULLOCK. (Cr. 1037.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 27, 1928.

Embezzlement 🔑44(1)—Evidence held insufficient to sustain conviction for embezzlement (Pen. Code, § 506).

Evidence in prosecution for embezzlement, under Pen. Code, § 506, showing that checks claimed to have been embezzled were delivered to defendant as advances on contract, held insufficient to sustain conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; H. S. Gans, Judge.

W. B. Bullock was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Reversed.

A. H. Ludeman, of Red Bluff, and R. Probasco, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The appellant was convicted upon an information based upon section 506 of the Penal Code, and appeals from the judgment based thereon, and also from the order of the court denying his motion for a new trial.

The information upon which the defendant was arraigned contained three counts. A verdict of not guilty was rendered upon counts I and II, and a verdict of guilty upon count III, which reads as follows:

> "That said W. B. Bullock, on or about the 17th day of September, at and in the county of Tehama, state of California, and prior to the filing of this information, he then and there being a contractor employed by Jerry Myers and Alice P. Myers to construct and remodel a certain dwelling house there situate, was then and there intrusted with, and there was paid to him by said Jerry Myers and Alice P. Myers, the sum of $250 in lawful money of the United States, for the payment of materialmen and laborers, for work performed and material furnished in the performance of his said contract for the construction and remodeling of the said dwelling house; and that the said defendant, after being intrusted with the said sum of money as aforesaid, did thereafter, on or about the 14th day of October, 1927, willfully, unlawfully, fraudulently, and feloniously, appropriate and convert to his own use and embezzle the said sum of $250 paid to him as aforesaid.
> "Contrary to the form, force and effect of the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California."

The record shows that on or about the 8th day of September, 1927, the appellant entered into a building agreement with one Alice P. Myers for the rebuilding and remodeling of a small dwelling house in the town of Corning, county of Tehama; that, for and in consideration of the sum of $2,500 to be paid therefor, the appellant agreed to furnish all the material and supply all the work and labor to be performed thereon, at his own proper cost and expense. The contract provided for progressive payments.

Upon this appeal it is urged that every legal question involved herein was passed upon and decided in favor of the appellant in the case of People v. Holder, 53 Cal. App. 45, 199 P. 832.

The testimony set forth in the transcript bears out this contention, and shows that the property alleged to have been embezzled was paid to the defendant under and by virtue of the building contract entered into between the defendant and said Myers, and that the money received by him was not received in trust, but as and for his own money under the contract. The testimony of Mrs. Myers, in so far as it relates to count III, is as follows:

"Q. (By Mr. Pugh, District Attorney): Now, in connection with the delivery of the check of October 18th for $250, state whether Mr. Bullock at that time, at the time of the request for you to advance any checks, did he give you some sort of a slip of paper or a piece of paper with certain names on it? A. He gave me a paper. Q. A paper? A. Yes, sir; pay roll. Q. Now, the paper that I just handed to you he gave to you when? A. Before I gave him the $250; he said he wanted to pay the men. Q. He said this statement was a statement of what he owed the men? A. Yes, sir. Q. Well, what did you tell him, if you told him anything? A. I told him I would have Mr. Myers write him a check so he could pay the men. Q. And Mr. Myers, was he there at that time? A. No; he was not there. I told him when he came home and I told Mr. Bullock I would have him write a check. Q. Well, then, did you deliver that check which was written by Mr. Myers, that evening? Did you deliver it that evening or the next morning? A. I think it was the next morning. Q. Where was Mr. Bullock when you gave him the third check? A. He came to my house. Q. Was there any conversation at that time there between—was there any conversation that you recall between yourself and Mr. Bullock? A. Yes; he said he would give me a deed to Mr. Zubro's lot as security for the last check that I handed him. Q. Now, the last check, the last check is the $250, dated October 12, 1927? A. Yes, sir; so when he told me that, I asked where it was, and he said it was down town, he would have to go and get it; and I never saw him any more. Q. You say he was going to get Mr. Zubro's deed for you? A. Yes; he was going to give me the deed as security to the last $250 check that I gave him. Q. That is Mr. Bullock told you that he had a deed coming from Mr. Zubro for this lot or did have a deed from him? A. Yes. Q. And he was going to deliver to you that deed? A. Yes; he was going to let me have it to hold as security for the last $250 check that I gave him."

And upon cross-examination the witness further testified:

"Q. And then he came to you and asked for an advance on this contract, did he? A. Then he asked me for $1,000, the next time. He said he wanted to pay the men their wages. Q. You were advancing him that money on the contract? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, isn't it true, with reference to all of the three checks, these checks, that on each occasion he said he would like to have an advance of money on the contract? A. Yes; and he wanted to finish the work; and we, of course, wanted to keep it going, and were anxious to have the house finished so we could have the house, and I gave him the money so he could get it finished soon."

The testimony of J. V. Myers, who drew the checks in question, shows that he had no conversation with the defendant in relation to the $250 check mentioned in the third count, but that he did have a conversation with the defendant as to two former checks which is directly in line with that of Mrs. Myers that the money was all advanced upon the contract, as shown by the following questions and answers:

"Q. When Mr. Bullock came to you about getting the advances on the contract and getting the money to work with, etc., what did he say to you when he asked you for this first $300 check? A. He asked me if I was willing to advance any money, that he might pay his carpenters, and for the material, and keep the building going on steady, and I said sure I would. Q. Now, what did he say when you gave him the $1,000 check? A. He asked me if I could advance him a pretty good amount of money, and I asked him why, and he said he would like to have about $1,000, and I said, 'Fine; I am glad to help you out to help the building get along faster.' Q. What did he say he wanted to do? A. He said he wanted to get some machinery so he could progress faster on the job; also I think he had some men he wanted to pay off there is what he told me. Q. That is, he wanted some money to work on, some surplus money, is that it? A. I don't know as to that. Yes; I think he did; he wanted something to work on."

This witness, who drew the check involved in this appeal, had no conversation with the defendant in relation thereto.

This testimony shows very clearly that the checks delivered to the appellant were delivered to him as advances upon the contract, and became his property, and were not received by the defendant in any trust capacity. It thus appears that no case is made out against the defendant under section 506 of the Penal Code as it stands "shorn of its unconstitutional provisions," as held in the case of People v. Holder, supra.

The opinion in the case of People v. Holder, supra, is so full and complete in its presentation, reasoning, and conclusions upon all the questions presented to us in this case, and which are identical with the questions considered in that case, that nothing more can be added to what is there stated, and it would be only a useless effort on our part to prolong this opinion by following the reasoning therein, and coming to the same conclusion.

Upon the authority of the case of People v. Holder, supra, the order and judgment appealed from herein are reversed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

93 Cal. App. 1

WALTERS v. EVICK et al.

BLANE v. SAME.

(Civ. 3454.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 27, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑930(1)—In determining on appeal sufficiency of evidence to support verdicts for defendants, defendants' evidence on matter in question must be accepted as true.

In determining, on appeal, question of sufficiency of evidence to support verdicts for defendants, latter's testimony on matter in question must be accepted as true, since it is assumed jury so accepted it.

2. Automobiles 🔑244(53)—In actions by pedestrians for injuries when struck by automobile after leaving street car, evidence of contributory negligence held to support verdicts for defendant.

In actions by pedestrians for damages for personal injuries sustained when struck by defendant's automobile after they had alighted from street car and were attempting to cross street, evidence of plaintiff's contributory negligence held sufficient to support verdicts for defendant.

3. Witnesses 🔑275(2)—Defendant's counsel could cross-examine plaintiffs regarding reasons for amending complaints if he believed amendments were made with plaintiff's knowledge that amendments were not based on truth.

Defendant's counsel was within legal rights in questioning plaintiffs on cross-examination regarding reasons for amending complaints, if in good faith he believed that amendments were inspired or made with knowledge by plaintiffs that amendments were not based on truth.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1060(4)—Misconduct of defendant's counsel, in reviving scandal involving attack on personal character of plaintiff's counsel, held not to result in miscarriage of justice, where verdict was sustained by plaintiff's evidence.

In action by pedestrians for personal injuries caused by automobile, misconduct of defendant's counsel in reviving before jury a scandal involving an attack on personal character of plaintiff's counsel, in measure invited by plaintiff's counsel, held not to result in miscarriage of justice, in view of fact that testimony of plaintiffs and of certain other of their witnesses would stand as sufficient support to verdicts for defendants.

5. Appeal and error 🔑699(4)—Complaint that instructions were erroneous cannot be reviewed, where record does not show who requested instructions.

Complaint that certain instructions contained erroneous statements of law cannot be reviewed, where record did not show by whose request instructions were given; presumption in such case being that they were given at request of appellants' counsel.

6. Trial 🔑253(4)—Instruction to effect that, if motorist was negligent, pedestrians could recover, held properly refused as disregarding question of contributory negligence.

In action by pedestrians for injuries caused by automobile, instruction to effect that, if motorist was guilty of negligence in operating car at time of accident, then plaintiffs would be entitled to recover, held properly refused, since it failed to take into consideration fact that plaintiffs could not recover, if they were guilty of contributory negligence.

7. Automobiles 🔑246(6)—Instruction based on inapplicable statute relating to automobiles passing street cars held properly refused (State Vehicle Act, § 134).

In action by pedestrians struck by automobile coming from opposite direction to that of street car, after they had alighted from street car and were attempting to cross street from rear of street car, instructions based on State Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553), § 134, relating to vehicles traveling in same direction as street car, which was inapplicable to facts, held properly refused.

8. Automobiles 🔑164(2)—Statute relating to vehicles passing street cars applies only to vehicles traveling in same direction as street car (State Vehicle Act, § 134).

State Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553), § 134, relating to vehicles passing railroad, interurban or street car while passengers are alighting, applies only to vehicles traveling in same direction in which street cars, etc., are traveling, and not to vehicles traveling in opposite direction.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Actions for damages for personal injuries by George Walters and by Lottie Blane against E. M. Evick and E. M. Evick, doing business under the fictitious name of the Yellow Cab Company. The cases were consolidated and tried together. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs separately appeal. Affirmed in both cases.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellants.

Cooley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HART, Acting P. J. These are actions for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the respective plaintiffs and appellants through the negligence of the defendants. The injuries to the two plaintiffs occurred at the same time under precisely the same circumstances and from the same alleged cause. At the opening of the trial, it was expressly stipulated by and between the respective parties that, inasmuch as the witnesses and the testimony would be the same, the two cases be consolidated and tried together before the same jury, and the court made an order in accordance with said stipulation.

The jury, by whom the cases were tried, found in favor of the defendants and against the plaintiffs, and, upon the verdict thus arrived at and returned, judgment was entered awarding the defendants the costs and disbursements incurred and made in each of the actions. The plaintiffs separately appeal from the judgment so entered, and support the same by a record made up in accord with the provisions of the so-called alternative method.

The points urged for a reversal are: Insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdicts, alleged misconduct on the part of counsel for the defendants during the course of the trial, which, it is claimed, prejudiced the jury against the plaintiffs, and error in giving and refusing to give certain instructions, the rejected instructions being proposed by the plaintiffs.

The defendant, as the complaint and the evidence show, was, at the time the plaintiffs received the injuries complained of herein, and had been for some time prior thereto, maintaining and conducting in the city of Stockton a taxicab service for hire.

[1, 2] The injuries for which plaintiffs by their respective actions are suing for compensatory relief were caused by their being struck, knocked to the ground, and dragged a considerable distance on and over the street in the city of Stockton on which the accident occurred by a taxicab of the defendant operated at the time by one Charles Johnson, an employee of the former. It appears that in the early evening or late afternoon of February 22, 1925, the plaintiffs attended, in the company of each other, a moving picture show at one of the theaters in the city just named; that they left the theater together a few minutes after 8 o'clock p. m. of the day named, and, the night being "stormy" and dark—a heavy rain falling at the time—they boarded a street car traveling east on Main street, in said city, their destination being a candy store, where the plaintiff Blane was then and had been employed for about nine years, and which store was located in the center of the block, on the north side of said street, between Grant and Aurora streets; that, as the car was approaching the point of location of the candy store, Miss Blane directed the motorman to stop the car so that she and her escort (plaintiff Walters) could leave the car; that, upon reaching a point a little east of, and a short distance from, the candy store, the motorman stopped the car; that the plaintiffs thereupon, from the front end thereof, stepped therefrom to the pavement, and, Walters holding Miss Blane by the left arm, walked or ran to and around the rear end of the car, and thence in the direction of the sidewalk on the north side of the street; that, on reaching the northwest corner of the car, they halted for a second, looked to the east to see if any vehicle was approaching from the east, and, almost simultaneously with that act and their observance at the same time of the flash of the headlights of the taxicab traveling toward them, they were struck by the cab, with the general result as above stated, inflicting upon the persons of both plaintiffs severe injuries.

The complaints, with the usual particularity, describe the circumstances leading to and attending the accident as they are above briefly stated, and likewise describe the physical injuries which the respective plaintiffs sustained by reason thereof. The answers specifically deny the material facts alleged in the complaints, and also, by way of a special defense, charge that the accident and its consequences were the direct result of the plaintiffs' own negligence; that is, that they were themselves guilty of negligence which contributed proximately to the accident and the personal injuries received by them as a result thereof.

A careful reading of the testimony can leave no room for a reasonable doubt that the verdicts are afforded abundant support by the evidence. The plaintiffs introduced as a witness in their behalf Charles Johnson, who, as above stated, was operating the cab at the time of the accident, and who testified that the "weather was bad that night" (referring to the time of the mishap); it was raining very hard, and the streets were very slippery; that about 8:33 that evening (February 22, 1925) he was driving the cab "west on Main street, in Stockton," having a few minutes previously been at and started from the Stockton station of the Southern Pacific Company, said street running directly west from said station into the "heart" or business center of said city; that he "was running with two wheels of the cab just about in the middle of the west-bound track (that is, the north street car track), and the other two just half way over the car track on the right-hand side of the car track." In other words, as he later explained, the cab was at the time "straddling" the north or right-hand rail of the north street car track, so that the two left-hand wheels of the cab, so Johnson in effect stated, were about half way between the two rails of the north or "west-bound" street car track. Being asked how he was able to describe the position of the cab as he was driving it along said track, the witness stated:

> "I am positive that I was in that position, because that is about the only position you can drive on Main street at that time of the evening. It is a narrow street, and there are always machines, more or less, parked along the curb. If I get over any further the other way I would be getting too close to the (street) car going in the other direction."

Proceeding, on direct examination by plaintiffs' counsel, the witness testified that he was traveling "about 15 miles an hour"; that he observed the street car going east in "about the middle way of the block; it was moving slowly—just a little"; that he did not observe whether it was "just starting"; that he did not see the plaintiffs, or either of them, before the accident. He stated that the headlights on the cab "were lit"; that they (the headlights) would and did, on the occasion of the accident, reflect the distance usual with headlights of the average machine—"probably about 25 feet"; that he was able to see further ahead of him by the aid of the headlights than 25 feet, for the reason that, while "the lights first hit the road about 25 feet, from there they scatter out," so that one "can generally see quite a distance further"; that "on that particular night I could see at least for two blocks." He stated that the first "I saw of the people (plaintiffs) was when they ran out from behind the street car in front of the car (the cab). * * * I was just past the end of the street car when they came out from behind it. * * * I will say that I was about 2½ or 3 feet from the street car, which was on my left" (at the time the collision occurred). The witness stated that the instant he saw the plaintiffs step in front of the cab he tried to stop the cab; that it was not an easy matter to stop the cab, because of the slippery condition of the street; that, when he realized that he had struck the plaintiffs, he succeeded in stopping the cab after it had gone about 20 feet; that he stopped it (giving his opinion) at a point "practically straight in the direction I was going"; that, if he turned towards the curb at all, in trying to stop the cab, it was only "a few inches." The witness testified that the point where he stopped the cab was about 15 feet beyond and west of the candy store. He said that when the cab was stopped Miss Blane's body "was just behind one of the front wheels, kind of diagonal across the front of the machine and behind the front wheel," or, in other words, "back of the front axle." The witness stated that plaintiff Walters, after the cab was stopped, was lying in the street a distance of about 10 feet in front of the cab; that, after lying on the street a very few minutes, he arose to his feet and "staggered" about some, being in a dazed condition produced by his injuries. He appeared to be "groggy," as the witness expressed it, meaning, as the witness explained, that he (Walters) was in a more or less semiconscious condition of mind. Miss Blane, so Johnson testified, was taken from underneath the cab by several of the persons that had gathered at the scene of the accident, they having lifted the cab from her body and removed her from the position under the cab into which her body had been thrown by the impact. Miss Blane was carried into the candy store referred to above, from which, a few minutes later, both she and Walters were taken to the city emergency hospital and there given treatment.

T. E. Seaich, a merchant by occupation, testifying for the defendant, stated that on the night or evening the accident occurred, and at the time of the happening thereof, he was riding in his automobile and driving the same on Main street, in Stockton, immediately back or west of the street car concerned herein, and, going in the same direction; that, in other words, he was following said street car; that the street car stopped "about the middle of the block between Grant and Aurora streets; that, upon the stopping of the street car, he saw the plaintiffs leave the car and proceed towards the rear end of the car, "and run across the street right in front of the cab"; that, before the accident happened, he saw the taxicab traveling west, and, according to his opinion, at the rate of between 12 and 15 miles an hour. The witness said that he first observed the taxicab when it was about 10 feet from where the impact occurred; that the plaintiffs, on reaching the northwest corner of the street car, hesitated an instant, and that it was then that they were struck by the cab; that as soon as the accident happened he drove his car to, and parked it at, the north curbing of Main street, at a distance approximately of 25 feet east of the candy store; that the taxicab was stopped from 35 to 50 feet west of where he parked his car; that the point in the street car track where the plaintiffs were struck by the cab was "right alongside" the candy store. On cross-examination, the witness said that in following the street car he was driving at a rate of speed of about 12 or 15 miles an hour—that he was driving "in low"; that he stopped when the street car stopped; that he had driven an automobile long enough to be able to give a fair judgment as to the rate of speed at which an automobile is being driven. He further testified:

> "I threw out the gear with my foot and started to stop as soon as I seen them (plaintiffs) run out in front of the cab; as soon as I seen them run out behind the car, in front of the cab, I started to stop. I expected them to be hit as soon as I seen them run out."

The witness stated that by saying that plaintiffs "hesitated" when they reached the northwest corner of the street car he did not mean to say that they "stopped," but thereby meant to say that they (plaintiffs) "slowed up" a little; that they did not stop moving; that, when he first observed the plaintiffs, Walters was holding the arm of Miss Blane; and that their movement in going towards the rear end of the street car was "just a dog trot." He further said that, although the night was dark and a heavy rain was then falling, he could then, nevertheless, see a distance of 20 or 30 feet ahead of him as well as he could at any time.

E. M. Evick, one of the defendants, testified that on the night of the accident, at the emergency hospital in the city of Stockton, the plaintiff Walters, in a conversation with the witness, stated to the latter that the accident occurred through his (Walters' fault). Evick, on cross-examination, stated that at the time of said conversation Walters did not seem to be seriously hurt—he did not complain of any internal injury or of symptoms indicating such injury—and that mentally he appeared to be sound or not in any degree affected.

The above brief recital, in substance, of the testimony of the operator of the cab at the time of the accident and the testimony presented by the defense very clearly confirms the declaration made at the outset of this opinion that the verdicts stand upon a strong evidentiary foundation. From that testimony the jury, believing it to be true, as presumptively they did, were justified in concluding, as impliedly they did conclude, that the plaintiffs stepped from the car to the pavement; that they thereupon, with Walters holding Miss Blane's left arm, proceeded hurriedly—if not running, walking faster than the usual gait—to the rear end of the car, and likewise started to cross the north railroad track, but, instantly observing the taxicab within a few feet of them, indeed, so near that neither they nor the driver of the cab could have done anything or adopted any course which would or could have averted a collision, they hesitated, or diminished the gait at which they went from the front to the rear end of the street car, and, having already stepped into the path of the cab, were, while still moving, practically at the same instant of time struck by the front end of that vehicle. That the finding of these facts, with the further fact that the night was dark and the rain falling heavily, and also the fact that the street car stopped in the center of the block—an unusual place for street cars to stop to discharge passengers—amounted to a finding of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiffs, negligence without which the accident would not have occurred, is not a debatable proposition. And, when we turn to the testimony of the plaintiffs themselves, as well as the testimony of some of their witnesses, we find, upon a careful analysis thereof and its like comparison with that of the operator of the cab and defendants' witness, Seaich, that, substantially, it tends to support, rather than to negative, the theory of the defense that the plaintiffs were each guilty of negligence which proximately caused or contributed to the accident and its consequences. In the first place, it is to be remarked that it is very clear, from weather conditions, that the plaintiffs were bent on getting into the candy store, and thus sheltering themselves from the storm, as hastily as possible.

Walters testified that Miss Blane, just before the street car reached the center of the street, or, what was the same thing, just before the car reached the point of location of the candy store, spoke to the motorman of the car. Walters did not, so he declared, hear the remark made to the motorman by Miss Blane, but it transpired that almost immediately after the latter spoke to the motorman the car was stopped in the middle or center of the street, and the plaintiffs there permitted to leave the car. The jury were legally authorized to find, in the determination of the probative effect of the evidence, and all the various circumstances thereby disclosed, conspicuously significant among which was the fact that she was employed at the candy store, that Miss Blane directed or requested the motorman to stop the car, for the convenience of herself and her companion, near where said store was located. Again, neither Walters nor Miss Blane had an umbrella with them at the time, nor, as she stated, was she wearing a hat on that occasion. The circumstances here adverted to added singularly strong support to the theory of the defendants that the plaintiffs, being more or less overwhelmed with anxiety to get into the candy store as hastily as possible, proceeded, on leaving the car, with considerable alacrity to the rear end of the street car, on reaching which they likewise proceeded to cross the north or "west-bound" street car track to the sidewalk in front or within a few feet of the entrance to the candy store. Moreover, the circumstances thus adverted to are more or less supported by the testimony of the plaintiffs' witness, Sharpstein, who stated that he witnessed the accident from an oil station situated about a block distant from the point at which the impact occurred, and that he had a "faint recollection" (the trial having taken place over a year after the accident) that the street car stopped in the center of the block, and that he saw the two passengers leave the car and run across, or attempt to cross, the street, when they were struck by the cab. Shown a written statement, signed by him a very short time after the happening of the accident, in which he stated that the street car was stopped in the middle of the block, and that he saw two persons leave the car and run across, or attempt to cross, the street, he was asked by counsel for the defendant whether his recollection was good at the time he made and subscribed his name to the statement, to which he replied in the affirmative, and further declared that the said statement contained a truthful narrative of the circumstances of the accident as he saw it. Furthermore, C. R. Smith, a witness for the plaintiffs, testified that the street car stopped almost directly opposite the candy store; that is, in the center of the block between

Grant and Aurora streets. As to the point in the street at which the street car stopped, Miss Blane herself stated that, when the car stopped, the rear end of the same was about on a line with the easterly boundary line of the candy store building, although it should be stated she elsewhere in her testimony declared that the street car had passed the candy store by about 20 feet before it stopped. And Walters testified that the point where the street car stopped was about 5 or 6 feet east of the easterly line of the candy store building.

It is true that the plaintiffs each denied that they ran from the front to the northwest corner of the street car, and also denied stepping in the space between the north and south rails of the "west-bound" track. Miss Blane testified that she walked at a "natural gait" to the rear end of the street car, and that, when she and Walters reached a point a little over 3 feet from the northwest corner of said car, and were in the space between the two tracks, that is, between the north rail of the south track and the south rail of the north track, they paused or stood still and looked east to see if any vehicle was approaching or traveling west. It was at this time, she stated, that she and Walters were struck by the cab; Walters then being a trifle behind or back of her. It is also true that the testimony of both the plaintiffs is widely different from that of Johnson and Seaich with respect to the distance the cab proceeded over the street from the time the collision occurred. The former testified that they were drawn or "dragged" by the cab for a distance of from 50 to 75 feet. The testimony of Johnson, operator of the cab (and, as seen, introduced by plaintiffs as their witness) and that of Seaich (defendants' witness) substantially harmonize (as shown above) to the effect that the distance the cab proceeded before it was stopped after striking the plaintiffs was about 20 or 25 feet; and, of course, the testimony of the latter as to that matter must be accepted by this court as involving the truth, since, as is to be assumed, the jury so accepted it. As to the rate of speed at which the cab was traveling when the accident occurred, it can hardly be said that a conflict in the evidence of a substantial character arose or exists, since, as already shown, Johnson and Seaich were in a better condition of mind to express an approximately correct opinion as to the rate of speed at which the cab was being operated before and at the time of the accident than was either of the plaintiffs. The latter, as seen—or at least the jury were warranted in so finding—were struck almost simultaneously with their appearance beyond the northwest corner of the street car. The suddenness of the perilous situation by which the plaintiffs were thus beset, and the necessarily coincident perturbation of mind of the average person so circumstanced, would hardly justify acceptance of the proposition that they could have estimated, with a satisfactory degree of accuracy, the speed at which the cab was traveling before or at the time the accident occurred. Walters said that he judged, from the speed with which he was shoved along the street by the cab for the distance of the first foot from the point in the street where they were struck, that the cab was being driven at the rate of from 30 to 35 miles an hour. This testimony was probably given by the jury little, if any, weight upon the question of the rate of speed at which Johnson was then operating the car. And his (Walters') is the only testimony which in any way contradicts, or purports to contradict, the testimony of the witnesses Johnson and Seaich with regard to the rate of speed at which the cab was traveling before or at the time the plaintiffs were struck down. But it is not necessary further to review the testimony analytically or otherwise. It is perfectly clear that the jury were warranted in finding that the plaintiffs stepped directly in front of the cab immediately upon their passing around the northwest corner of the street car. The position of Miss Blane's body under the cab—directly under the front axle and crank case of the cab—and the position of Walters' body as it was dragged along the north track of the street car, and the parts of their bodies injured, plainly indicate that they stepped in the pathway of the cab. All these matters were, of course, for the jury's determination, yet, as to the position of the plaintiffs with reference to the cab at the moment they were hit, the undisputed physical facts themselves clearly show that, when struck, they were directly in the pathway of the cab. But it may here well be suggested that, even if, in point of fact, the driver of the cab, at the time of the accident, was driving on or over the two north tracks instead of straddling the north rail of said track, as he testified, and as the jury impliedly found, and it was also true that the street car stopped at or near the intersection of Grant and Aurora streets, instead of the center of the block between those streets, as a number of the witnesses, including several introduced by plaintiffs, testified, and that in so doing he was guilty of negligence, in the absence of which the accident would not have occurred, it would also still be true that the admitted act of plaintiffs in going to the rear of the street car, and attempting to cross the street, beyond the established foot crossing, before the street car had passed on, and thus a clear open view of the street to the east afforded them, was one of negligence which manifestly contributed as a proximate cause to their injuries, for which, therefore, they would not be entitled to compensatory relief.

[3, 4] The misconduct assigned against the attorney for the defendants arose under the following circumstances: Each of the complaints as originally framed and filed alleged that the street car stopped at the west line of the intersection of Main and Aurora streets—east, by practically half a block, from the location of the candy store—and that "as plaintiff stepped to the ground at the rear end of the street car, he (and 'she') was struck with great force and violence and felled to the ground, and drawn thirty-five feet along said Main street," etc. At the beginning of the trial counsel for plaintiffs asked for, and was by the court given, leave to amend the complaints by substituting for the word "thirty-five" the word "seventy-five," and also by substituting for the word "rear" the word "front." As so amended, each of the complaints in the respect here considered reads as follows: That "as plaintiff stepped to the ground at the front end of said street car, he (and 'she') was struck with great force and violence and felled to the ground, and drawn seventy-five feet along said Main street," etc. Cross-examining the plaintiffs, counsel for the defendant asked each whether the indicated amendments of the complaints were suggested by counsel for plaintiffs. Each plaintiff denied that such was the fact, but the question so asked caused a bitter controversy between the respective counsel. The attorney for the plaintiffs, in objecting to the question, declared that thus it was unjustifiably insinuated that the plaintiffs were guilty of perjury, and he (counsel) was guilty of suborning perjury. The attorney for defendants, addressing plaintiffs' attorney, in effect retorted with the statement that he (counsel for defendants) was not the first one that had accused plaintiffs' counsel of subornation of perjury. Later, and in the course of the cross-examination of Miss Blane, counsel for the defendants asked the witness if she had not, on direct examination, at first stated that she and Walters were a little over 3 feet from the northwest corner of the street car when they paused to look and see whether a vehicle of any kind was approaching from the east, and then changed said statement in response to a suggestive question by her attorney so that she was then made to say that they were 3 feet from the north rail of the north track at the time referred to. This question brought an objection from the attorney for plaintiffs (not stating the grounds) and the following remarks:

> "That is insulting to me; that is insulting to the witness, and it is done for the purpose of prejudicing this plaintiff before the jury, and not only that, but it states a falsehood."

To those remarks counsel for defendants replied:

> "It comes within—even for a man of counsel's stamp, to accuse anybody of falsehood, who is a suborner of perjury—" (here the judge interrupted by saying that there was no objection before the court for the court to rule on).

In the same connection counsel for the defendants asked Miss Blane a question predicated upon the assumption that she, on direct examination, had testified that the point where she and Walters stopped after passing around the rear end of the street car was "3 feet from the northwest corner of the street car." Plaintiffs' counsel, in objecting to the question, declared:

> "He (counsel for defendants) is trying to falsify this witness' testimony."

Counsel for defendants answered:

> "No jury ever found that I falsified any witness' testimony as they did you."

In the course of his argument to the jury, counsel for plaintiffs, among other things, said:

> "At the opening of this case I asked the court if it would permit me to make some modifications of the complaint. * * * I drew that complaint some months ago. * * * I drew it, as I supposed, in accordance with the facts of the case * * * as they were presented to me. I had no intention, ladies and gentlemen of the jury, to put into that complaint anything that was false or untrue. I never read that complaint after the time that I drew it until a day or two before this case was called in this court. I read it to the plaintiff who sits there, and he called my attention to the fact that—" (here counsel for the defendants objected to the recital by counsel for plaintiffs of any conversation he might have had with his clients "which was not in testimony").

After some further remarks by counsel for plaintiffs, the court interrupted him, saying:

> "If you attempt to go outside of the record, of course that opens the door, to some extent, for a reply on the other side,"

—to which counsel for plaintiffs replied:

> "If the court please, I welcome it. If there is anything that the gentleman can say that would tend to show that I intended to urge one single thing before this jury that was false or untrue, let him do it. I challenge him to do it,"

—whereupon the attorney for the defendants retorted: "I accept it." In addressing the jury, on the close of the opening argument by counsel for the plaintiffs, counsel for defendants introduced his argument by stating that, having been challenged by his antagonist to point to any occasion when the latter had been charged with "having done anything to stretch the imagination of any witness' testimony," he would call attention to the fact that counsel for the plaintiffs had once been accused and convicted "in this very county," of the crime of subornation of perjury. Here defendants' counsel was interrupted by plaintiffs' counsel as follows: "There is no objection whatever to that statement, only I would like to have him tell the result, if he wants to." Mr. Gallagher, the counsel for defendants: "I will read the decision," referring to the opinion of the Supreme Court reversing the judgment of conviction against counsel for plaintiffs in said case. Counsel for plaintiffs: "I am asking for the conclusion." Mr. Gallagher: "I will read the decision, if you want." Counsel for plaintiffs: "All right, go ahead." Thereupon counsel for defendants proceeded to, and did, read the entire decision of the Supreme Court. The reading of the decision having been concluded by Mr. Gallagher, counsel for plaintiffs in effect asked the former to state to the jury what the final disposition of the case was after the reversal, and, no response by Mr. Gallagher to that request having been essayed, the counsel for plaintiffs denounced the former in bitter terms; but, in his closing argument to the jury, explained that, a short time after the remittitur in the subornation of perjury case was received by the clerk of the San Joaquin county superior court, the indictment therein was dismissed on the motion of the district attorney of said county, counsel further stating that, on the dismissal of said indictment, the district attorney who prosecuted the case declared to him (counsel for plaintiffs) that there never existed any real grounds for the institution of the criminal action, and that he (the district attorney) very much regretted that he had permitted the prosecution of the case.

Of course, counsel for the defendants was within his legal rights when questioning, on cross-examination, Miss Blane and Walters regarding the reasons for amending the complaints, if, in good faith, he believed that said amendments were inspired or made with knowledge by the plaintiffs that the amendments were not based upon the real truth of the matter to which they related. An attorney can always lay the foundation for the impeachment of a witness against his client, even if the impeachment questions be pregnant with accusation of crime against the witness or a party to the action. But, in this instance, while the conduct of counsel for the defendants in reviving before the jury a scandal involving an attack upon the personal character of counsel for the plaintiffs which had long been relegated to a forgotten past was highly improper, and, indeed, reprehensible, yet the record shows that the attack was in no small measure invited by counsel for the plaintiffs himself, not alone in the challenge he issued to counsel for the defendants, but also in that he charged the latter with attempting by cross-examination to make Miss Blane falsify her testimony, and further charged that the basic foundation of a certain question propounded by defendants' counsel to that plaintiff involved the statement of a falsehood. But the whole matter was grossly improper, and so far removed from any pertinency to the case or its issues, and so far in contravention of the decorum which should uniformly be maintained in courts of justice, that it should have been stopped by the court at the very inception thereof. If the verdicts were resting upon a narrow evidentiary margin, we would be compelled to send the cases back for a retrial for the misconduct assigned and as above explained. But, eliminating from consideration the testimony of Seaich, testifying for the defense, and the admission by Walters to defendant Evick (denied by Walters, it is true) that they (plaintiffs) were to blame for the accident, the testimony of the plaintiffs and of Johnson and certain other of their witnesses would stand as a sufficient support to the verdicts. In fact, considering all the testimony together or as a whole, it is plainly manifest that no other verdicts than those returned could have justly been reported by the jury. It is therefore perfectly clear that no miscarriage of justice resulted from the misconduct referred to.

[5-8] The complaint that certain instructions embraced within the court's charge to the jury contained erroneous statements of the law cannot be reviewed, for the reason that it is not shown by the record by whose request said instructions were given—whether at the request of the plaintiffs or of the defendant; the presumption in such case being "that they were given at the request of the" appellants' counsel. Gray v. Eschen, 125 Cal. 1, 5, 57 P. 664; Sutter Butte Canal Co. v. Am. Rice & Alfalfa Co., 182 Cal. 549, 553, 554, 189 P. 277; Bognuda v. Pearson, 71 Cal. App. 105, 234 P. 857; Finkelstein v. Cosgrove (Cal. App.) 256 P. 608; Murray v. Kunde (Cal. App.) 267 P. 158. The reason of this rule is lucidly explained in Gray v. Eschen, supra. We have, however, read the court's charge, and thus have found that it covered every principle of law applicable to the issues. The disallowance of certain instructions proposed by the defendants and rejected by the court, upon the question of negligence, did not constitute error. They failed to take into consideration the proposition that, even if the evidence was such as to show that the driver of the cab was negligent in such driving, the plaintiffs could not recover if the evidence also showed that they themselves were guilty of negligence which contributed proximately or directly to the injuries they received. Said instructions merely stated that, if the operator of the car was guilty of negligence in operating it at the time of the accident, then the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover. Among the instructions, however, proposed by the plaintiffs and disallowed by the court was one based upon and in the language of the following provision of section 134 of the State Vehicle Act (Stats. 1923, p. 553 et seq.):

"In passing any railroad, interurban or street car while passengers are alighting from or boarding the same, vehicles shall be operated or driven on the right-hand side of such cars and at a rate of speed not exceeding ten miles an hour and no portion thereof or of any load thereon shall come within six feet of the running board or steps of such cars, and shall at all times be operated with due care and caution so that the safety of such passengers shall be assured."

It is plainly apparent from its very language that section 134 of the Vehicle Act, upon which the instruction referred to was based, has application entirely to vehicles traveling in the same direction in which such street car is traveling, and not to vehicles traveling in the opposite direction to that in which such car is going. Manifestly, the instruction was wholly inapplicable to the facts of the present case.

The judgment in the case of George Walters v. E. M. Evick and E. M. Evick, etc., is hereby affirmed, and the judgment in the case of Lottie Blane v. E. M. Evick and E. M. Evick, etc., is hereby affirmed.

SEVERANCE v. BALL, County Treasurer.
(Civ. 3603.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 29, 1928.

1. Officers 🔑100(1)—Claims of persons employed to perform duties required of county surveyor are not allowable, because indirectly increasing surveyor's salary (Pol. Code, § 4214, and section 4267a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1122; Const. art. 11, § 9).

Allowance to third parties by board of county supervisors of labor claims for work required to be performed by county surveyor under Pol. Code, § 4214 and § 4267a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1122, is improper as indirectly increasing surveyor's salary, in violation of Const. art. 11, § 9, which provides compensation of county officers should not be increased during time of office.

2. Officers 🔑100(1)—Claims presented by county surveyor's assistants for taking levels, services as transitman, and levelman on field survey work held not allowable, because increasing surveyor's compensation; "surveyor" (Pol. Code, § 4214, and section 4267a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1122; Const. art. 11, § 9).

Claims presented to county supervisors for services rendered by assistants of county surveyor in taking levels, for services as transitman, and for hiring levelman on field survey work, held not properly allowable because coming within definition of duties of county surveyor required to be performed by him under Pol. Code, § 4214, and section 4267a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1122, since allowance of claims to assistants would indirectly increase surveyor's compensation during term, in violation of Const. art. 11, § 9, "surveyor" being one who makes surveys, determines area of portion of earth's surface, length and direction of boundary lines, and contour of surface.

3. Evidence 🔑19—Court takes judicial notice that surveyors must have chainmen and rodmen with them, and that carrying chain or holding rod is not "surveying."

Court takes judicial knowledge that surveyor in field must ordinarily have with him chainmen and rodmen, and that carrying chain or holding pole or rod, though necessary to performance of surveyor's duties, is not surveying.

4. Officers 🔑100(1)—Allowance of claims of county surveyor's assistants as chainmen and for typing specifications held not to increase surveyor's compensation during term (Pol. Code, § 4214 and section 4267a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1122; Const. 11, § 9).

Claims presented to county supervisors for work as chainmen and for typing specifications by assistants to county surveyor held properly allowable, as not constituting part of duties of county surveyor under Pol. Code, § 4214 and § 4267a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1122, and allowance of such claims would therefore not indirectly increase surveyor's compensation while in office, in violation of Const. art. 11, § 9.

5. Officers 🔑100(1)—Allowance of claim of chainmen for measuring rods of road for county map held not to increase surveyor's compensation (Pol. Code, § 4214, and section 2655a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1682, and section 4267a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1122; Const. art. 11, § 9).

Claim for services as chainmen in measuring rods of road for county map under Pol. Code, § 2655a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1682, held not to involve any part of duties of county surveyor under Pol. Code, § 4214, and section 4267a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1122 and claim was therefore properly allowable, as not increasing surveyor's salary while in office, in violation of Const. art. 11, § 9.

Application by S. Severance, Jr., for writ of mandate to be directed to S. E. Ball, as Treasurer of Glenn County, to pay certain claims. Writ granted as to some claims and denied as to others.

H. W. McGowan, of Willows, for petitioner.
Guy L. Louderback, Dist. Atty., of Willows, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This matter is before us upon the application of the petitioner praying that a writ of mandate be issued directed to the respondent as treasurer of the county of Glenn to pay certain claims allowed by the board of supervisors of said county. Omitting Exhibit A, which is not properly before us, the claims involved in this proceeding are as follows: Exhibit B—claim of A. A. Millsaps, for the sum of $5 for labor as levelman on county roads in Glenn county; Exhibit

C—claim of S. Severance, Jr., for the sum of $5 for one day's labor as rodman in taking levels, elevations, and setting grade stakes, etc., in the construction of the Wood street road; Exhibit D—claim of August J. Hoever in the sum of $10 as transitman running levels on Villa street in West Willows, in said county; Exhibit E—claim of Bayard Knock, county surveyor of Glenn county, $5 for expense in hiring levelmen on field work survey; Exhibit F—demand of Thomas Myers, work for county surveyor taking yardage on Culver road, 2 days' work as chainman at $5 per day; Exhibit G—claim of Heloise Dahlgren for $10 for typing specifications of four corners on Princeton road; Exhibit H—claim of A. A. Millsaps for the sum of $80 for services as chainman, measuring rods for map of county, 16 days' work at $5 per day (all of the claims, except those of the petitioner, being assigned to him).

The respondent refused to pay the claims on the ground that they were not proper charges against the county, and constituted items of expense for labor that should have been performed or paid for by the county surveyor of Glenn county.

Section 4214 of the Political Code provides that—

> "The surveyor must be a licensed land surveyor of the state, and must make any survey that may be required by order of the court or of the board of supervisors," etc.

Section 4267a of the Political Code, as added by St. 1927, p. 1122, which applies to the county of Glenn, provides that on and after December 31, 1927, the surveyor of the county of Glenn shall be paid, in equal monthly installments, a salary of $2,700 per annum for all work performed for the county, and, in addition thereto, he shall receive his actual traveling and other necessary expenses incurred by him while engaged in work in the field for the county.

Section 9 of article 11 of the state Constitution specifies:

> "That the compensation of any City, County, town or municipal officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term of office," etc.

[1] While there is no express provision in any section of the Political Code requiring the board of supervisors to direct the performance of any particular work by the county surveyor, the question is presented in this case whether in employing or paying persons for doing work that comes within the purview of what is contemplated as a surveyor's duty does not indirectly do what the board of supervisors would be prohibited from directly doing, to wit, increase the compensation of the county surveyor. The section of the Political Code fixing the compensation of the surveyor of the county of Glenn specifies that it shall be compensation for all work performed for the county. In addition to this compensation, however, he is allowed his traveling expenses and other necessary expenses incurred by him while engaged in work in the field for the county. Section 4214 of the Political Code refers to the qualifications of a surveyor, to wit: "He must be a licensed land surveyor of the state." Webster's International Dictionary defines "surveying" as follows: "The operation of finding and delineating the contour, dimensions, position, etc., as of any part of the earth's surface, whether land or water; * * * also, a measured plan and description of any portion of country, or of a road or line through it"; and "surveying," as "the act or occupation of making surveys; that branch of applied mathematics which teaches the art of determining the area of any portion of the earth's surface; the lengths and directions of the boundary lines; the contour of the surface," etc. A surveyor necessarily would be one who ascertains these facts or performs the duties necessary to their ascertainment.

Whenever a board of supervisors employ or approve the claim of any one who has been employed either by themselves or by the county surveyor of the county of Glenn to do the work which the law contemplates that the surveyor of that county should perform, then and in that case the same principle is involved as where an attempt is made to pay a deputy or an officer where the law does not provide for the employment of such a deputy, but casts the duty of performance upon the principal officer. It has been frequently held that the compensation of an officer cannot be increased by the method of allowing compensation to deputies or assistants. Sarter v. Siskiyou County, 42 Cal. App. 530, 183 P. 852; Welsh v. Bramlett, 98 Cal. 219, 33 P. 66; Humboldt County v. Stern, 136 Cal. 63, 68 P. 324; Humiston v. Shaffer, 145 Cal. 195, 78 P. 651. Other cases might be cited, but these are sufficient to illustrate the rule applicable here.

We do not deem it necessary to take up and consider at length the general powers of boards of supervisors as presented by counsel for the petitioner, for the simple reason that the general powers of boards of supervisors to make employments must be exercised in the light of constitutional provisions prohibiting the increase of the compensation of county officers either directly or indirectly. If an officer of the county is paid to perform certain work, it is his duty to perform such services, and the board of supervisors, under the constitutional provision prohibiting the increase of an officer's salary by way of relieving an officer either of doing the work himself or bearing the expense of hiring assistants, possesses no power to employ or approve the claim of any one whose employment results in the acts prohibited.

[2] With these premises laid down, we have only to consider the legality of the claims as they appear upon their face. Exhibits B, D, and E, upon their face, show that they are for services that should have been rendered by the county surveyor of Glenn county. They are for services which come within the definition of the duties of a surveyor, which we have set forth herein, to wit: Taking levels, services as a transitman, which is a part of the services of a surveyor in taking levels, and of hiring a levelman on field survey work, which is explicitly within the definition of the duties incumbent to be performed by the county surveyor. All of such work involved the taking of dimensions, positions, measuring the plans, description, or length of any particular portion of the earth's surface, running lines upon roads, contour lines of the surface, etc. Thus the claim of A. A. Millsaps for $5 as a levelman, the claim of August J. Hoever for services as a transitman, and the claim of Bayard Knock for expense in hiring a levelman on field survey work, must be held invalid.

[3-5] The section of the Political Code fixing the salary of the surveyor of the county of Glenn allows him actual traveling expenses and other necessary expenses incurred by him while engaged in work in the field for the county. Common experience, of which we must take judicial knowledge, teaches that a surveyor in the field must ordinarily, in order to perform his duties as a surveyor, have with him men, in common parlance denominated "chainmen" and "rodmen." We know that carrying a chain, while necessary to surveying, is not surveying. We know that holding a pole or a rod, while necessary to the performance of his duties by a surveyor, is not surveying. Thus the claim of Thos. Myers for two days' work as chainman appears upon its face to be a legal charge, and, having been approved by the board of supervisors as a necessary expense, should have been paid. Exhibit G, being the claim of Heloise Dahlgren for typing specifications, not showing upon its face that it is for work which should have been performed by the county surveyor, and having been approved by the board of supervisors as a proper county charge, must be so held. The claim of A. A. Millsaps for services as a chainman, for sixteen days at $5 per day, aggregating $80, stands upon an entirely different basis from any of the other claims assigned to the petitioner.

Section 2655a of the Political Code, as added by the act of the Legislature of 1927 (Stats. 1927, p. 1682), reads:

> "The board of supervisors shall make and keep on file a road mileage record, and keep the same corrected to date showing every road in the respective road districts of the county, upon which county funds are expended for construction or maintenance, and may determine such mileage by automobile speedometer. Each supervisor shall keep an account of the actual work done in his district and the cost per mile thereof, except in a county in which the road work is in charge of a road engineer or highway engineer or in a county governed by a county charter," etc.

This work is no part of the duties of a county surveyor. The board of supervisors might have had the mileage measured in a different manner, but that does not prevent the board of supervisors from adopting the method pursued in the instant case. It therefore follows that the claim of A. A. Millsaps is a legal charge against the county.

As a conclusion from the foregoing, the petitioner is entitled to a writ of mandate directing the payment of the claim of S. Severance, Jr., for one day's labor as a rodman, in the sum of $5, the claim of Thos. Myers for two days' work as chainman, in the sum of $10; the claim of Heloise Dahlgren for typing work, in the sum of $10; and the claim of A. A. Millsaps for measuring county roads, in the sum of $80. As to the other claims the petitioner is not entitled to a writ.

Let a writ of mandate issue for the payment of the claims herein found legal.

PEOPLE v. GARRETT. (Cr. 1662.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District. Division 2, California. July 5, 1928.

1. Criminal law ⚷369(6)—Refusing to strike witnesses' nonresponsive testimony on cross-examination indicating defendant's guilt of other offenses held error.

In prosecution for unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors, refusing to strike nonresponsive testimony of witness for prosecution on cross-examination indicating that defendant had sold liquor at other times was error.

2. Criminal law ⚷775(3)—Refusal of instruction on proof necessary to establish alibi held error under evidence.

Refusal to give instruction that if evidence was sufficient to create reasonable doubt whether defendant was present at place where crime charged was alleged to have been committed or at some other place where he could not have committed it, then jury should acquit defendant, held error in liquor prosecution, where evidence of alibi was given.

3. Criminal law ⚷823(6)—Prejudice resulting from instruction to scrutinize alibi evidence held not removed by general instruction to acquit if not convinced of guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

In liquor prosecution, where evidence tending to show alibi was introduced and correct instruction on alibi refused, prejudice resulting from instruction that evidence of alibi should be scrutinized with care and jury should avoid being imposed upon by fabricated evidence held not removed by general instruction to effect that jury must be convinced of guilt of defendant beyond reasonable doubt.

4. Criminal law ⚷1186(4)—Prejudice resulting from instruction warning jury against alibi required reversal of conviction (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In liquor prosecution, where evidence of alibi was introduced and correct instruction on alibi refused but instruction given specially warning jury against defense of alibi, held that record did not warrant upholding conviction appealed from under Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing judgment should not be reversed for harmless error.

5. Criminal law ⚷795(3), 1172(1)—Instructing that sale of liquor constituted "high misdemeanor" as termed in information held error though not prejudicial.

In prosecution for unlawful sale of liquor, where offense charged was improperly designated as crime of high misdemeanor, court should not have enlarged on mistake by using same designation in its instruction, there being no such offense though error was not prejudicial, where offense was otherwise correctly described in information.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, High Crimes and Misdemeanors.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; E. J. Marks, Judge.

James Garrett was convicted for unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors, and he appeals. Reversed.

George W. Rochester, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction and an order denying a motion for new trial. He was charged by information with the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor, the offense being also designated as "the crime of high misdemeanor." A number of alleged errors of the trial court are assigned as grounds for reversal. From the view we take of some of them it will be unnecessary to consider others.

[1] During the trial the witness Matthews, called by the prosecution, and while under cross-examination, was asked, reference being made to the defendant: "You have seen him at other times, have you?" The witness answered: "Yes, I have been out there before and bought liquor from him." Defendant's counsel moved to strike the answer as not responsive, and the court denied the motion, saying: "You brought it out on cross-examination." Of course, the question did not call for that part of the answer which indicated that the defendant had been guilty of other offenses of the same character as the one for which he was on trial. All of the answer except the word "Yes" should have been stricken out, and the denial of the motion was error.

[2] The following instruction was offered by the defendant, and refused:

> "I further instruct you that if this evidence, which is for the purpose of establishing an alibi, is sufficient in your minds to create a reasonable doubt whether defendant was present at the place where the crime charged is alleged to have been committed, or at some other place where he could not have committed it, then you should give defendant the benefit of such doubt and acquit him."

This instruction was a proper one, and contained a correct statement of the law. People v. Winters, 125 Cal. 325, 57 P. 1067. It should have been given, for where evidence tending to prove an alibi is given the defendant is entitled to a specific instruction dealing with that issue. People v. Wong Loung, 159 Cal. 520, 114 P. 829; People v. Visconti, 31 Cal. App. 169, 160 P. 410. No element of such an instruction could be of greater importance than that which would inform the jury as to the degree of proof required of the defendant to support his claim of alibi. If he is entitled to a special instruction upon any point, it is upon this one. The effect of the error in refusing to give an instruction of the same import as that offered is clearly made more deleterious by the court having, by another instruction, warned the jury against the danger of alibi evidence being fabricated, using the following language:

> "The court instructs you that evidence to establish an alibi, like any other evidence, may be open to special observation; persons may perhaps fabricate such evidence with greater hopes of success, or less fear of punishment, than most other kinds of evidence, and honest witnesses may often mistake dates and periods of time, identity of persons seen, and other things about which they have testified, and such evidence should be scrutinized with care, and the jury should avoid being imposed upon by a fabricated defense."

The giving of this instruction is also assigned as error. It is true that in a number of cases where an instruction similar to the one in question was given convictions were upheld. However, in no decision in this state to which our attention has been called has this form of instruction been given unqualified approval. On the contrary, it has repeatedly been the subject of adverse criticism. The reference in it to evidence of an alibi as a defense is objectionable. People v. Roberts, 122 Cal. 377, 55 P. 137; People v. Winters, supra. There is no reason why evidence tending to show that at the time of the commission of the offense the defendant was at another place than that at which it was committed so that he could not have been a party thereto should be scrutinized differently from any other proof. As was said in People v. Lattimore, 86 Cal. 403, 24 P. 1001:

> "If trial courts will cease to give this particular form of instruction, the ends of justice will be equally as well subserved, and the administration of the laws less embarrassed."

That opinion then adds:

> "But in this case, as in the Levine case, the charge of the court, taken as a whole, was so full and fair to the defendant that we cannot conceive that any injury resulted to the defendant from this unnecessary instruction in regard to the scrutinizing of the evidence given in support of the defense of alibi."

[3] In this and other decisions, where it has been said that it is undesirable to give instructions of this nature, the instructions, taken as a whole, have been full and fair and have made the law clear as to the particular issues tendered by the evidence of an alibi; but in the instant case this is not true. No other instruction was given on the subject, and the one first above quoted containing a correct statement of the law was refused. The giving of a general instruction to the effect that the jury must be convinced of the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt to convict was not sufficient to remove the prejudice to the defendant necessarily resulting from the errors above specified. People v. Visconti, supra.

[4] The record presented does not warrant upholding the judgment appealed from under article 6, § 4½, of the Constitution. Without reciting the evidence in detail, it is sufficient to say that in addition to the testimony in support of the defendant's claim of alibi, a direct conflict was presented upon all other material points. It is not only possible, but quite probable, that had the members of the jury been informed that if the evidence tending to prove an alibi was sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt in their minds as to the guilt of the defendant they must acquit, the result might have been different and the defendant found not guilty.

[5] Of course, it is improper to designate the offense charged as a "crime of high misdemeanor." There is no grade of misdemeanors legally known as "high misdemeanors" in this state. However, in view of the fact that the offense is clearly and unambiguously charged in the information as follows: "That the said James Garrett on or about the 6th day of December, 1927, at and in the county of Orange, state of California, and before the filing of this information, did willfully and unlawfully sell, for beverage purposes, about one pint of intoxicating liquor, * * * then and there containing alcohol in excess of one-half of one per cent."—we do not deem the misnomer of its classification as prejudicially erroneous. But since the information is subject to criticism in that regard, of course, the court should not, as it did, have enlarged upon the mistake by using the same designation in its instructions.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

DYMENT v. BOARD OF MEDICAL EXAMINERS OF CALIFORNIA et al.

(Civ. 5216.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 3, 1928.

1. Physicians and surgeons 🔑11(3)—Prejudice of members of board of medical examiners does not affect jurisdiction to revoke license to practice medicine (Code Civ. Proc. § 170, subd. 4).

Bias or prejudice of any of members of board of medical examiners does not affect board's jurisdiction to revoke license to practice medicine and surgery; there being no provision in Code Civ. Proc. § 170, subd. 4, relating to judges, affecting members of boards of medical examiners.

2. Pleading 🔑214(8)—For purpose of ruling on demurrer, well-pleaded allegations are presumed to be true.

For purpose of ruling on demurrer, all well-pleaded allegations contained in complaint are presumed to be true.

3. Physicians and surgeons 🔑11(3)—On appeal from judgment sustaining demurrer in certiorari proceeding reviewing board of medical examiner's action revoking license, court was bound by allegations in petition regarding evidence introduced at hearing.

On appeal from judgment sustaining demurrer in certiorari proceeding to review order of board of medical examiners revoking petitioner's license to practice medicine, appellate court was bound by allegations contained within petition presented to lower court as to evidence introduced at hearing of charge against petitioner.

4. Physicians and surgeons 🔑11(3)—Board of medical examiners had no jurisdiction to revoke license to practice medicine, where all evidence received by board was inadmissible (St. 1913, p. 722, § 14, as amended).

Under St. 1913, p. 722, § 14, as amended, providing that, in determining whether license of medical practitioner should be revoked, board "shall hear such proper evidence as may be adduced before it," board of medical examiners was without jurisdiction to revoke license to practice medicine, where none of evidence received by board on hearing of charges was properly admissible.

5. Judgment 🔑572(2)—Judgment on sustaining of demurrer for failure to state cause of action does not bar subsequent action in which essential fact missing in first case is supplied.

Judgment, on sustaining of demurrer to complaint before board of medical examiners to revoke license to practice medicine for failure to state cause of action, did not bar subsequent action in which essential facts missing in first case were supplied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

In a proceeding instituted before the State Board of Medical Examiners, composed of Percy T. Phillips and others, the license of Philip Dyment to practice medicine and surgery was revoked. Philip Dyment thereafter filed a petition for a writ of certiorari to review the order of revocation. From a judgment for the Board, the petitioner appeals. Reversed.

L. E. Dadmun, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Otto J. Emme, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. In a proceeding instituted before the respondent board of medical examiners, the license of appellant to practice medicine and surgery in this state was revoked. Thereafter appellant filed in the superior court a petition for a writ of certiorari, in which it was prayed that the proceedings before said board which resulted in the order for the revocation of petitioner's license to practice medicine and surgery be reviewed, and said order annulled. The respondent board demurred to said petition, with the result that the demurrer was sustained without leave to amend the petition. Thereupon judgment was entered in favor of respondent; and it is from such judgment that this appeal is prosecuted.

[1] In substance, one of the contentions of appellant rests upon the allegation in his petition for a writ of certiorari to the effect that, because one of the members of respondent board of medical examiners was prejudiced against petitioner, and because, in the circumstances, the vote of such member was necessary in order that a legal order of revocation of the license of petitioner be made by said board, a qualified quorum of said respondent board was not present at its proceedings in said matter, and, consequently, that it was without jurisdiction in the premises. It thus appears that, as to this contention, specifically the question of whether the petition presented to the superior court stated a cause of action depended upon whether the alleged prejudice toward the accused of an essential member of the trial board amounted to his legal disqualification.

It is urged by appellant that, in the matter of determining the issues in the proceeding before the board of medical examiners, such board was necessarily acting in a quasi judicial capacity; and, consequently, that any disqualification arising from bias or prejudice which, in similar circumstances, would so affect a judge as to prevent him from acting judicially in a matter pending in the court in which he was presiding, would also act as a like disqualification when applicable to a member of a board sitting in a quasi judicial capacity.

Subdivision 4 of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure (amended St. 1927, p. 1403) in substance provides that no justice, judge, or justice of the peace shall sit or act as such in any action or proceeding when it appears that either party to such litigation cannot have a fair and impartial trial before such judicial officer by reason of his prejudice or bias. As originally enacted, prejudice or bias of the judge before whom an action or proceeding was to be tried was not a ground for his disqualification. Beginning as early as the case of McCauley v. Weller, 12 Cal. 500, and continuing in an unbroken line of decisions through the Supreme Court of this state, as expressed in People v. Mahoney, 18 Cal. 185; People v. Williams, 24 Cal. 31; People v. Shuler, 28 Cal. 490; Hibberd v. Smith, 39 Cal. 145; Bulwer Mining Co. v. Standard Mining Co., 83 Cal. 613, 23 P. 1109; and In re Jones, 103 Cal. 397, 37 P. 385, it is held that bias or prejudice on the part of the trial judge constitutes no legal incapacity to sit on the trial of a cause. That such was the law of this state until the adoption of an amendment to section 170, Code of Civil Procedure (St. 1897, p. 287), by which bias and prejudice of a trial judge was expressly made a ground of disqualification, is attested by the statement occurring in People v. Compton, 123 Cal. 403, 412, 56 P. 44, 48, that:

> "While at civil law the bias or prejudice of a judge against a litigant was a valid ground of recusation, as it was valid ground of challenge against a juror, it was not so at common law, nor has it been so in this state until the change effected by a recent amendment to the Code."

Since before the enactment of the special statute relating thereto bias or prejudice did not constitute a valid ground of disqualification of a judicial officer, it is apparent that, in the absence of an inclusion in the statute of a provision affecting members of boards of medical examiners, any bias or prejudice of any of such members in a matter pending before such board would have no effect upon its jurisdiction. The case of Butler v. Scholefield, 54 Cal. App. 217, 201 P. 625, is decisive of the point. The authorities are there reviewed, and it is held that, although, while engaged in the prosecution of a charge against an employee of the county, its board of supervisors in a sense exercises judicial functions, strictly speaking its action is merely administrative, and that a member of the board who is biased or prejudiced, as evidenced by his activities in the matter preceding or during the hearing, is not for such reason disqualified to sit in such matter as a member of the board.

[2-4] It is next contended by appellant that, because the petition contained an allegation to the effect that the only evidence introduced at the hearing of the charge against petitioner was hearsay, the demurrer to the petition was improperly sustained.

In addition to the allegation to which attention has just been directed, the petition purports to set forth a substantial résumé of all the evidence adduced before the board of medical examiners on the hearing of the charge. It is a well-established rule that, for the purpose of ruling on a demurrer, all the well-pleaded allegations contained within the complaint are presumed to be true. It would serve no useful purpose to herein set forth the evidence introduced before the respondent medical board in support of the charge against petitioner herein. Suffice it to say that, assuming, as it must, that the evidence to which attention is directed by the allegations of the petition was all the evidence presented in substantiation of the charge, this court is convinced that, under the ordinary rules of evidence, while (assuming its substantiation) in substance it may have been properly admissible in evidence, nevertheless, in the form in which it was attempted to be introduced, it was altogether hearsay and incompetent.

Section 14 of the act regulating the examination of applicants for license to treat diseases, etc. (Stats. 1913, p. 722, and various amendments thereto), among other things, provides in effect that, in determining the issues presented in a charge wherein the object is the revocation of the license of a medical practitioner, the board "shall hear such proper evidence as may be adduced before it."

Analogously, it may be noted that, by section 77 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act as originally enacted in this state (Stats. 1913, p. 279), it was provided that the industrial accident commission should not be bound "by the technical rules of evidence." Nevertheless, it was held in the case of Englebretson v. Industrial Accident Commission, 170 Cal. 793, 151 P. 421, that the commission had no power to make an award where the only evidence in the case consisted of hearsay testimony. To the same effect is the ruling in Connolly v. Industrial Accident Commission, 173 Cal. 405, 410, 160 P. 239.

The case of Thrasher v. Board of Medical Examiners, 44 Cal. App. 26, 185 P. 1006, like the instant proceeding before this court, was an appeal from a judgment of the superior court made and entered upon a hearing of a writ of review on an order made by the board of medical examiners revoking a license to practice medicine and surgery in this state. The chief contention on the appeal related to the admissibility and the effect of hearsay evidence. The matter was thoroughly considered, especially in view of the provision of the statute that on the hearing of charges against a medical practitioner the board of medical examiners had power to "hear such proper evidence" as might be adduced before it. It was there held that an order made by such board, based solely upon hearsay evidence, was without legal support, and consequently was beyond the jurisdiction of the board. While in the later case of Minaker v.

Adams et al., as Members of the Board of Medical Examiners, 55 Cal. App. 374, 203 P. 806, the correctness of the ruling in the Thrasher Case is recognized, it is held that because, aside from the hearsay evidence introduced at the hearing before the board of medical examiners, other unobjectionable evidence was introduced which in itself was sufficient to sustain the order of the board, the error relating to the hearsay evidence was overcome, with the result that the board had jurisdiction to make the order of which complaint was made.

On this appeal this court is bound by the allegations contained within the petition presented to the lower court. As hereinbefore indicated, in the state of the record it appears that none of the evidence received by the respondent board on the hearing of the charges against the appellant was properly admissible, from which it results that said board was without jurisdiction to make its order revoking the license of appellant to practice medicine and surgery in this state.

[5] Further history of the present litigation discloses the fact that some time in the month of August, 1920, in a proceeding brought before the board of medical examiners, appellant was charged "with having been guilty of unprofessional conduct by violating section 14 of chapter 354 of the Statutes of 1913, and acts amendatory thereof, of the state of California, in that he, Philip Dyment, procured by fraud and misrepresentation a certificate to practice medicine and surgery in the state of California." After hearing thereon, the board of medical examiners adopted a resolution by which the license of appellant to practice medicine and surgery in this state was revoked. Thereafter, on appeal from a judgment in a proceeding in certiorari in the superior court by which the order of the board of medical examiners was affirmed (57 Cal. App. 260, 207 P. 409), it was held by this court, as well as by the Supreme Court in a memorandum opinion rendered on the denial of an application for hearing in that court, that the complaint before the board of medical examiners by which the appellant was charged "with having been guilty of unprofessional conduct" was insufficient to give the board jurisdiction. The judgment of the superior court was reversed, with directions to it to enter judgment annulling the order made by the board of medical examiners, and directing the board to take such further proceedings in the matter "as it might be advised. * * *" Pursuant to such last-mentioned order and direction, the superior court caused to be entered a judgment which, among other things, provided for the annulment of the order of revocation of the license of appellant, but "that the board of medical examiners may take any and such further proceeding as they may see fit. * * *" Thereupon the complaint upon which this proceeding is founded was filed, wherein it was charged that appellant was "not a fit and proper person to practice medicine and surgery in the state of California"; the specific acts and conduct of appellant leading to which statement or charge being specifically set forth. In his answer to such charge, among other things, in effect the accused pleaded "res adjudicata."

In the former proceeding between the same parties, the effect of the judgment rendered by this court (57 Cal. App. 260, 207 P. 409) is that, by reason of the fact that the complaint failed to set forth sufficient facts, the board of medical examiners was without jurisdiction to enter its order in the premises; or, in other words, that a demurrer to the complaint on the ground that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action should have been sustained. By California authorities (15 Cal. Jur. p. 127), the law appears to be settled that, while a judgment upon the sustaining of a demurrer to the complaint for failure to state a cause of action is a bar to a subsequent action setting up the same facts, that effect is not produced, if in the second case an essential fact, missing in the first case, be supplied. It follows that the plea of "res adjudicata" cannot be sustained. It therefore becomes unnecessary to consider other reasons suggested as being fatal to such plea.

It is ordered that the judgment be, and it is, reversed.

RINALDO v. BOARD OF MEDICAL EXAMINERS OF CALIFORNIA et al.

(Civ. 5217.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 3, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 23, 1928.

Physicians and surgeons 🔑11(3) — Board of medical examiners had no jurisdiction to revoke license to practice medicine, where evidence heard by board was hearsay.

Board of medical examiners was without jurisdiction to make order revoking license to practice medicine and surgery, where all evidence introduced before board at hearing of charges was hearsay, and consequently inadmissible.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

In proceeding before the State Board of Medical Examiners, composed of Percy T. Phillips and others, the license of Eugene J. Rinaldo to practice medicine and surgery was revoked. Eugene J. Rinaldo thereafter filed a petition for writ of certiorari to review the proceedings before the board. From a judgment for the board, petitioner appeals. Reversed.

L. E. Dadmun, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Otto J. Emme, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of respondent board of medical examiners rendered on a petition for a writ of certiorari presented to the superior court for the purpose of reviewing certain proceedings before said board wherein and whereby the license of the petitioner (appellant herein) to practice medicine and surgery in this state was revoked.

With one exception, to wit, that relating to the defense of "res adjudicata," the points presented by appellant herein for a reversal of the judgment are identical with those urged in the case of Dyment v. Board of Medical Examiners (No. 5216) 268 P. 1073, this day decided by this court. The record herein discloses the fact that all the evidence introduced before the respondent board at the hearing of the charges against the accused was hearsay, and consequently inadmissible—with the legal result that the board was without jurisdiction to make the order of which complaint is made.

Relying upon the authority of the said case of Dyment v. Board of Medical Examiners, supra, it is ordered that the judgment be, and it is, reversed.

LINDER HARDWARE CO. v. KELLEY et al.

(Civ. 3456.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 27, 1928.

Agriculture 🔑11—Claim for hay furnished contractor and used in feeding horses employed in leveling, checking, and ditching land held not lienable (Const. art. 20, § 15; Code Civ. Proc. § 1183).

Hay supplied to contractor, and used by him in feeding horses employed in leveling, checking, and ditching land, held not lienable material under Const. art. 20, § 15, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, permitting persons furnishing materials to have lien on property for value of the materials furnished, and for the use of appliances, teams, or power.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by the Linder Hardware Company against Niel Kelley and C. S. Roby. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant last named appeals. Reversed.

Russell & Heid, of Tulare, for appellant.

G. W. Zartman, of Tulare, for respondent.

HART, Acting P. J. This is an action for the foreclosure of certain alleged materialmen's liens for materials furnished defendants, which, it is alleged, were used in the work of improving certain real property. The complaint is in three counts, and thus sets forth the alleged claims of three different alleged lien claimants, to wit: W. H. Wilbur (count 1), J. M. Dye (count 2) and B. S. Gurnee (count 3). Each of said alleged lien claimants, so the complaint states, by an instrument in writing, assigned his alleged claim to the plaintiff here, "who is now the owner and holder thereof." At the trial, the alleged claim of lien of J. M. Dye was abandoned. The court found that the defendants were indebted to the plaintiff in the total sum of $448.45, representing the respective claims of the plaintiff's assignors, Wilbur and Gurnee, and by its decree adjudged that said total sum constituted "a valid lien on the premises" therein described, and further adjudged that "said premises be sold, or so much thereof as may be necessary to raise the amount due to the plaintiff from said defendants," etc. A motion for a new trial by the defendants was denied. This appeal is from the judgment.

The record shows that during the month of January, 1925, the defendant Kelley and the defendant Roby entered into a written agreement whereby Kelley agreed to level, check, and ditch for Roby 100 acres of a certain tract of land belonging to the latter, and which is situated in Tulare county. It is averred in each of the counts or causes of action set forth in the complaint that each of the alleged lien claimants, at different times during the progress of the work which said Kelley had agreed to perform for said Roby, "furnished to said Neil Kelley, and which was used feeding the teams employed in doing the work done on said land under said contract * * * a certain quantity of hay at the agreed price" of ($20 per ton in the case of Wilbur, of $18 per ton in the case of Dye, and of $20 per ton in the case of Gurnee); that none of said claims has been paid; that on the 8th day of July, 1925, said Wilbur and said Dye, and on the 13th day of July, 1925, said Gurnee, each "filed in the office of the county recorder of said county of Tulare a notice of lien for the purpose of securing and perfecting a lien for the moneys due him as aforesaid, upon the lands hereinbefore described, under the provisions of chapter 2 of title 4 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California, and which lien was on said day recorded in volume ——, at page ——, a copy of which lien is hereto attached," etc.

It is contended by the defendants that hay supplied to the contractor to be used and used by the latter in feeding horses or other work animals employed in the performance of any work of improvement upon the real property of the owner thereof does not constitute lienable material under the mechanics' and materialmen's lien law of this state. The contention is sound, and must be sustained. In support of this conclusion, if it needs support other than that afforded by the language itself of the provisions of the statutes enacted in pursuance of the mandate of section 15 of article 20 of our Constitution, we need go no further than the case of Arata & Peters, Inc., v. Snow Mountain Water & Power Co., recently decided by the Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, in an opinion by Justice Nourse, and reported in 267 P. 932. We here quote from the opinion in that case the following:

> "The amended complaint alleges that the plaintiff furnished to the contractor certain articles of food consisting of fruit, vegetables, onions, beans, and potatoes, all of which 'were actually used and consumed in the construction work' on a dam which the contractor was building for the water company under written contract. The usual allegations as to the failure to pay, the filing of a lien, and the amount due the contractor from the owner followed, but these do not call for consideration on this appeal. The essential question is whether a mechanic's lien will lie under our statutes for the character of supplies alleged to have been furnished.
> "Section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, permits 'mechanics, materialmen, * * * and all persons * * * furnishing materials to be used or consumed in * * * the construction * * * of any building, * * * or other structure' to have a lien upon the property 'upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished materials, for the value of such * * * materials furnished and for the value of the use of such appliances, teams or power.' Prior to the amendment of the section in 1911, it was held that the section did not authorize a lien for the wages of a cook engaged to cook meals for the employees of a contractor under a private contract (McCormick v. L. A. C. W. Co., 40 Cal. 185, 187), or for one who supplied meat to be consumed by the employees of a mine. Malone v. Big Flat G. M. Co., 76 Cal. 578, 586, 18 P. 772. The purport of the decisions is that the materials which are made lienable are those only which have entered into the construction of the structure under contract. Ensele v. Jolley, 188 Cal. 297, 300, 204 P. 1085, and cases cited. This rule has been uniformly followed in other states. Carson & Co. v. Shelton, 128 Ky. 248, 107 S. W. 793, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 509; Ferguson v. Despo, 8 Ind. App. 523, 34 N. E. 575, 576; Pennsylvania Co. v. Mehaffey, 75 Ohio St. 432, 80 N. E. 177, 181, 116 Am. St. Rep. 746, 9 Ann. Cas. 305; Armour & Co. v. Western Construction Co., 36 Wash. 529, 78 P. 1106, 1107; Tsutakawa v. Kumamoto, 53 Wash. 231, 101 P. 869, 871, 102 P. 766; Dudley v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. Ry. Co., 65 Mich. 655, 32 N. W. 884, 886."

The opinion proceeds to negatively answer the argument of the appellant (the alleged lien claimant), by which it undertook to maintain that, after the decision of the cases referred to in the above quotation, the Legislature, by an amendment of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure (involving the basic provisions of the mechanics' lien statutes), had "broadened the scope of the Mechanic's Lien Act so as to include all persons 'bestowing skill or other necessary services' or furnishing materials to be used 'or consumed' in the construction or alteration of any building or structure, and because the Legislature declared that the act of 1911 should be liberally construed (section 14, St. 1911, p. 1313)," and that, therefore, the cases cited in the opinion were not in point. As already in effect stated, we agree with the reasoning and the conclusion in that case. It is decisive of the instant case.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. TOLLI. (Cr. 1466.) ✱

District Court of Appeal. First District, Division 1, California. June 30, 1928.
Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 27, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑829(3)—Refused instruction that no larceny can be committed unless there is asportation and animus furandi held sufficiently covered by instruction given.

Defendant's refused instruction that no larceny can be committed unless there is an asportation of personal property, not the property of defendant, with an animus furandi, held sufficiently covered by given instruction to acquit of burglary, unless jury believed to moral certainty and beyond reasonable doubt that defendant when he entered premises intended to commit larceny.

2. Criminal law 🔑829(3)—Refused instruction to acquit of burglary if defendant formed intent to commit larceny as he entered, held sufficiently covered by instruction given.

Defendant's refused instruction to acquit of burglary or attempt to commit burglary, if defendant formed intent to commit larceny as he entered building, held sufficiently covered by given instructions to acquit, if defendant went into the building merely to investigate or look about and not with intent to steal, and to acquit unless jury believed to a moral certainty and beyond reasonable doubt that he intended to commit larceny when he entered.

3. Criminal law 🔑814(20)—Where evidence required acquittal if defendant was not guilty of first degree burglary, court properly refused to instruct respecting lesser degree.

Where evidence was such that defendant must have been acquitted had jury not been satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that he was guilty of first degree burglary, court properly refused instruction authorizing conviction of burglary, second degree.

4. Criminal law 🔑833—Court's statement that instructions to be read were offered by defendant, and were to be accepted as law of case, held not prejudicial.

Trial court's statement that certain instructions about to be read to the jury were offered by defendant, and that they were to be accepted as the law of the case and as such entitled to the jury's consideration, held not prejudicial.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

John Tolli was convicted of burglary in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli, Wm. F. Herron, and Joseph M. Trusty, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CASHIN, J. The defendant was charged, by an information filed in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, with the crime of burglary. On the trial he was convicted of burglary in the first degree, and, from the judgment entered, an appeal was taken to this court.

The evidence shows that the defendant was apprehended in a hardware store in San Francisco while attempting to open a safe with an electric drill. Another safe in the same premises had been previously opened with a drill, and a money box removed therefrom, which was placed near the rear entrance to the store. It was further shown that the defendant was armed with a loaded revolver, and that the door of the storeroom had been forced, a padlock thereon broken, and the door lifted from the rolls sufficiently to effect an entrance into the building.

It is claimed that the trial court erred in giving and in its refusal to give certain instructions to the jury and that the judgment for this reason should be reversed.

[1] Appellant complains that the following instruction was refused:

> "You are instructed that no larceny can be committed unless there is an asportation—that is, a taking and carrying away of personal property not the property of the defendant—and that there must also exist an animus furandi."

The court, however, gave the following instruction, which in every particular material to the issues covered that offered by the defendant:

> "You cannot convict the defendant of burglary unless you believe to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant when he entered the premises described in the information intended to commit larceny."

[2] The court was also asked to instruct that:

> "If the defendant formed an intent to commit larceny after he entered the premises or the building, he cannot be convicted of burglary or of an attempt to commit burglary."

This instruction was also refused, but it was likewise sufficiently covered by two instructions given by the court, which were as follows:

> "If the defendant went into the building and store in question merely to investigate or look about and not with any intent to steal, then you cannot convict the defendant of the offense charged."

And: "You cannot convict the defendant of burglary unless you believe to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant when he entered the premises described in the information intended to commit larceny."

[3] The following instruction was also refused:

> "If you believe the evidence warrants it, you are at liberty to find the defendant guilty of an attempt to commit burglary of the second degree."

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

In the present case the evidence was such that the defendant must have been acquitted had the jury not been satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that he was guilty of burglary of the first degree; and, as held in the following cases, it was proper to refuse to instruct as to a lesser offense or degree included within the offense charged where the evidence was of such a nature as to warrant, in the event that the defendant was guilty at all, only a verdict for the higher offense or degree. People v. Swist, 136 Cal. 520, 69 P. 223; People v. Rogers, 163 Cal. 476, 126 P. 143. The instruction was properly refused.

[4] Appellant further contends that the motion in arrest of judgment, based upon the claim that the information was insufficient to state a public offense, should have been granted, and assigns as error a statement by the trial court that certain instructions about to be read to the jury were offered by the defendant, that they were to be accepted as the law of the case and as such entitled to the jury's consideration. We find no merit in the first contention, nor in our opinion was the statement complained of prejudicial. People v. Wilder, 134 Cal. 182, 66 P. 228. A reading of the evidence shows that the verdict of the jury was fully supported, and the record discloses no ground for a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

BURT v. HELLMAN. (Civ. 5805.) *

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 6, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 6, 1928.

1. Covenants ⚷79(3)—Deed reserving right to use particular lots in tract for hotel did not give owners of other lots benefit of restrictions.

Paragraph in deed referring to fact that grantor reserved right to use or deed for use certain numbered lots in tract for hotel site did not purport to provide that all deeds issued in tract other than as to particular lots enumerated in paragraph would have any particular form or character of restriction, and did not indicate that restrictions were intended for benefit of lots in entire tract.

2. Covenants ⚷79(3)—Grantor's reservation of certain use of certain lots in tract does not grant right to every owner to enjoin such use of other property.

Reservation of right in grantor to use certain lots in certain manner does not in itself indicate that grantor is granting right to every owner of lots in tract to enjoin any use of other property in particular manner, but such reservation may be only attempt by grantor to save himself blameless from damages that might be sustained by reason of use to which grantor reserves right to put any property in tract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

On petition for rehearing. Petition denied. For former opinion, see 268 P. 436.

Page, Nolan, Rohe & Hurt, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In the petition for a rehearing, the statement is made that the court inadvertently overlooked a contention of petitioner which petitioner says is supported by the case of Gamble v. Fierman (Cal. App.) 255 P. 269. As a matter of fact, this court was well aware that in the deed involved in the case of Gamble v. Fierman, the following was part thereof:

> "The restrictions and conditions contained in this deed shall be covenants running with the land, and shall operate for the benefit of, and may be enforced by the seller or the owner of any lot in said tract 'Vista Del Oro.'"

Although the language used in this petition for a rehearing may be construed, if it is not carefully read, to contain a statement that in the deed in question in the case at bar there was some similar provision as was in the deeds in the case of Gamble v. Fierman, as a matter of fact there is in the case at bar no reference to any other lot within the tract or how it may be used, excepting only paragraph 6 of the restriction, which merely and only provides as to certain other lots in the tract:

> "Provided further that nothing herein contained shall be construed as in any manner prohibiting or preventing the party of the first part from constructing upon lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 21 of block 75 of said Beverly Hills, or of causing to be constructed thereon, or of selling said property for the purpose of having constructed thereon, a hotel, nor as prohibiting or preventing the person or persons managing and operating said hotel from dispensing liquors with meals to the bona fide guests of such hotel."

There is nothing in the language used in Gamble v. Fierman, supra, which in any way conflicts with the decision now on file herein. In the case of McBride v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 152, 215 P. 678, there was in the deed a reference to other lots in the tract and how they might be used. Among other restrictions in the deed in that case was the following:

> "Subject to following building restrictions: No offices, stores, flats, lodging or apartment or any business building of any description to be erected, kept or maintained on said property, but a residence, same when erected to cost not less than three thousand ($3,000) dollars on lots 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53 and south 30 feet of lot 47; to cost not less than thirty-five hundred ($3,500) dollars on lot 44 and north 15 feet of lot 43; to cost not less than four thousand ($4,000) dollars on north 90 feet of lot 47: and all to be placed at a uniform distance of forty-two and one-half feet from front property line on Willard avenue."

There was in the complaint in the case of McBride v. Freeman an allegation that all of the lots in the tract had been sold, or were being offered for sale, in accordance with a general plan or scheme, and all subject to the restrictions and conditions, and that said restrictions were imposed and said general plan or scheme adopted for the general benefit of all lots in said tract, and that the respective lots owned by plaintiffs, and each of them, and the lots owned by defendants, and therein described, and the other lots in said tract sold and conveyed as set out, were each and all conveyed by a common grantor, to wit, by one E. L. Allen, and subject to the restrictions and conditions set out and pursuant to and in accordance with a general plan or scheme for the improvement of said tract and the several groups of lots as shown on the map referred to in the respective deeds. There was in the complaint in the case of McBride v. Freeman also an allegation that:

> "Prior to on or about February 25, 1919, plaintiffs or their respective predecessors in interest, in reliance upon said general plan or scheme as hereinbefore alleged, and in reliance upon the restrictions and conditions imposed upon and limiting the use of said lots in the said Minalita tract, and in particular those lots hereinbefore enumerated, purchased their respective lots and erected and completed the erection in each instance of a first-class private residence in compliance with said restrictions and conditions, and each of plaintiffs ever since the said date hereinbefore in paragraph III alleged, has maintained his said residence so erected and each is still maintained and occupied by plaintiffs respectively and their respective families as a private residence."

Upon the trial of that case in the superior court (as shown by the recitals in the judgment), objection was made to the introduction of any evidence in support of the complaint, which objection was sustained, and judgment was thereupon ordered in favor of the defendants. Affirming that judgment, the Supreme Court held that the complaint had failed to state a cause of action.

[1] It was considered by this court, when the main opinion was written, that paragraph 6 in the deeds in evidence (referred to in this application for a rehearing), which referred to the fact that the grantors reserved the right to either use or deed for use certain lots in the tract for a hotel site, and on which they might provide for the sale of liquor, did not in any way on its face purport to provide that all deeds issued in the tract other than as to those particular lots enumerated in such paragraph 6 would have any particular form or kind or character of restriction. We could not read into it anything of the kind. We did not say that the restrictions were identical, but merely that the dispute was almost identical with the disputes in the case of McBride v. Freeman and the case of Werner v. Graham, 181 Cal. 174, 183 P. 945. We considered that the nature of the dispute was best shown by the briefs and transcript in McBride v. Freeman, which were read by the writer of the opinion in this case before the opinion was prepared.

This court meant to hold that there is nothing in any of the deeds shown in evidence in this matter which would entitle the plaintiff to maintain the cause of action brought herein, and we so hold upon the authority of the case of McBride v. Freeman and the case of Werner v. Graham. We purposely avoided any reference to the decision in the case of Gamble v. Fierman, supra, which was discussed on oral argument, as we found that in that case the deeds involved contained a direct and positive statement that the restrictions should operate for the benefit of and be enforced by any owner of any lot in the said tract. As was said in the case of Gamble v. Fierman, supra:

> "As already noted, the first question to be considered is whether or not the foregoing language in the deed to defendants' grantor, construed in the light of the surrounding circumstances, contains expressions from which may be inferred any intent on the part of the parties thereto to create the equitable easement sought to be invoked in this action. In the Werner and McBride cases cited above, and in the case of Berryman v. Hotel Savoy, 160 Cal. 559, 117 P. 677, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 5, and in [Bresee] v. Dunn, 178 Cal. 96, 172 P. 387, the deed relied upon contained no language, express or implied, referring to any general plan or scheme of building improvement, and contained no language showing that it was the intent of the parties to the deed that the restrictions in the deed should be for the benefit of the subsequent owners or holders of all the lots in a defined or designated tract of land subdivided into residence lots."

[2] An examination of all of the restrictions contained in the deeds before the court in the instant case discloses the fact that there is nothing in any language used that indicates the intention of the grantor and grantees that the restrictions were intended to be for the benefit of all the lots in the tract. If the deed in the instant case contained the language apparently claimed in the petition for a rehearing, we would certainly have had to discuss the case of Gamble v. Fierman, supra, but we find no language used in the deeds themselves which provides or which contains anything indicating in any manner that the restrictions contained therein were intended to be for the benefit of all the owners of lots in the whole tract. A reservation of a right in a grantor to use a certain lot or lots in a certain manner does not in itself indicate that he is granting the right to every owner of lots in the tract to enjoin any use of any other property in any particular manner. Such reservation may be only an attempt of the grantor to save himself blameless from any action in damages or otherwise for any damage that might be sustained by any person by reason of the use to which the grantor reserves the right to put any property in the tract, either by himself or his grantees.

The petition for a rehearing is therefore denied.

BRAY v. SUPERIOR COURT, IN AND FOR SISKIYOU COUNTY et al. (DUKE et al., Interveners). (Civ. 3609.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 6, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 6, 1928.

1. Prohibition 🔑28—On application for prohibition, whether trial court has jurisdiction is only question that may be considered (Code Civ. Proc. § 1102).

On application for prohibition as defined in Code Civ. Proc. § 1102, only one question can be determined, and that is whether trial court has jurisdiction to proceed.

2. Prohibition 🔑11—Prohibition will not issue to restrain exercise of jurisdiction of trial court, no matter how erroneous (Code Civ. Proc. § 1102).

Writ of prohibition, as defined by Code Civ. Proc. § 1102, will not issue to restrain exercise of jurisdiction of trial court, no matter how erroneous.

3. Prohibition 🔑3(2)—Alleged unconstitutionality of section of act held not ground for writ of prohibition; trial court not being thereby deprived of jurisdiction and remedy being afforded by appeal (Code Civ. Proc. § 1102).

When application for prohibition as defined by Code Civ. Proc. § 1102, was made on ground that section 32 of Water Commission Act (St. 1913, p. 1012) was unconstitutional and section 46 of the act (St. 1913, p. 1012) provided that unconstitutionality of some of act should not affect rest, it appearing that trial court had jurisdiction to proceed under section 36b (St. 1917, p. 236), held prohibition would not be granted, since question of constitutionality was immaterial; there being complete remedy in appeal from any error resulting from alleged unconstitutionality.

On petition for rehearing. Petition for rehearing denied.

For former opinion, see 268 P. 374.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court: SEAWELL, RICHARDS and CURTIS, JJ., voting for a hearing.

Horace V. Ley, of Yreka, and Wm. V. Cowan, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Allen & McNamara, of Yreka, for respondents.

Nathan Moran, of San Francisco, for interveners.

PER CURIAM. This cause is again before us for consideration upon the petition of interveners for a rehearing. The petition for rehearing is based upon the alleged unconstitutionality of section 32 of the Water Commission Act (St. 1913, p. 1012), and is urged upon our attention by reason of the fact that in the opinion herein filed (268 P. 374) upon petition for a writ of prohibition the provisions of that section were not referred to, set forth or discussed.

[1-3] Upon an application for prohibition, only one question can be considered, and that is whether the trial court has jurisdiction to proceed. See section 1102, Code Civ. Proc., and the annotations thereto, contained in Kerr's Cyc. Codes. If, under the Water Commission Act, and the provisions of section 36b (St. 1917, p. 236) thereof, the trial court has jurisdiction to proceed, it is utterly immaterial, for the purposes of the determination of the merits of the petition for prohibition, whether section 32 of the act is or is not unconstitutional. If section 32 of the Water Commission Act is void, as alleged by the interveners, then and in that case the interveners have a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy to remove any alleged cloud that might be cast upon the title to their property by reason of any acts of the water commission or by appeal from any decree or judgment of the trial court assessing any of the costs mentioned in said section 32 against the property belonging to any of the petitioners. As stated by this court in Lightner Mining Co. v. Superior Court, 14 Cal. App. 642, 112 P. 909, a writ of prohibition will not issue to restrain the exercise of jurisdiction by a trial court, no matter how erroneous. Section 46 of the Water Commission Act specifies that the intent of the Legislature is to pass the act, even though certain sections thereof may be held unconstitutional, and that such holding shall not affect the validity of the remaining portions of the act. As we read section 32 of the Water Commission Act, all its provisions may be held unconstitutional without affecting the validity of any other section of the act. Section 32 in its provisions is not so interdependent with or upon any other section of the act that the holding thereof void would affect the validity of any other section. Nor do we find, nor has our attention been called to any other section of the act which is so interdependent with or upon section 32 as to render them incapable of enforcement, or uncertain or inoperative in the event that section 32 of the Water Commission Act is finally held unconstitutional. While section 32 was referred to and mentioned in the original petition for a writ of prohibition herein, its provisions were not considered and set forth in the opinion of this court, for the reasons which we have herein stated.

Being of the opinion that the trial court has jurisdiction to proceed as stated in our opinion heretofore filed, no basis for the issuance of a writ of prohibition has been presented by the interveners herein, even though their contentions as to the invalidity of section 32 of the Water Commission Act be meritorious. The contentions of the interveners may properly be presented to the trial court, and, if the trial court holds adversely thereto, a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy exists for the correction of any error if such determination be erroneous.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

PEOPLE v. LAMANUZZI. (Cr. 1461.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 27, 1928.

1. Indictment and information 🔑114—Information alleging previous plea of guilty of possessing intoxicating liquor and judgment thereon held sufficient, though not alleging "unlawful" possession (Pen. Code, § 960).

Information alleging that defendant "previously pleaded guilty to the offense of possessing intoxicating liquor," and "that the judgment upon said plea of guilty was pronounced" on certain date, held not insufficient in failing to allege that possession charged was unlawful; judgment of conviction being sufficiently described, and no substantial right of defendant prejudiced within Pen. Code, § 960.

2. Criminal law 🔑1202(6)—Judgment fixing punishment for "offense" of possessing intoxicating liquor held to show prior conviction, though not reciting that possession was unlawful.

Police court judgment, adjudging "as a punishment for the offense of possessing intoxicating liquor * * * as charged in the information * * * that defendant pay a fine," etc., held not void because not expressly reciting that possession charged was unlawful, but sufficient to show prior conviction of such offense.

3. Criminal law 🔑1202(3)—Testimony that intoxicating liquor was found on defendant's premises twice before offense charged held competent on issue of prior conviction of possessing such liquor.

In trial for unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, and previous conviction of like offense, testimony that intoxicating liquor was found on premises in possession or control of defendant on two occasions preceding date of offense charged was competent on issue of prior conviction of like offense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Victor Lamanuzzi was convicted of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor and previous conviction of a like offense, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Lindsay & Gearhart, of Fresno, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CASHIN, J. Defendant was charged by an information filed in the superior court of Fresno county with the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, and with having been previously convicted of a like offense. He was convicted on each charge, and appeals from the judgment entered thereon.

It is urged that the previous conviction was not charged by the information in the manner required by law; that the evidence was insufficient to support this charge; and that the court erred in admitting certain testimony over objection.

[1] The information alleged that the defendant "in the police court of the city of Fresno previously pleaded guilty to the offense of possessing intoxicating liquor; that the judgment upon said plea of guilty was pronounced, rendered, given, and made on the 3d day of May, 1923, and has never since been reversed, annulled, or set aside." It is contended that the information was insufficient, in that it failed to allege that the possession charged in the police court was unlawful.

[2] We find no merit in this, as the pleading sufficiently described the judgment of conviction, and no substantial right of the defendant was prejudiced by reason of the defect or omission, if any. Pen. Code, § 960. It appears from the record of the police court introduced in evidence that a plea of guilty was entered by the defendant to the charge upon which the judgment in question was based. The material portions of this judgment were as follows:

> "On the 3d day of May, 1923, said defendant Victor Lamanuzzi appeared for judgment, and thereupon the court ordered judgment as follows, to wit: Wherefore it is ordered and adjudged as a punishment for the offense of possessing intoxicating liquor committed at the city of Fresno in said county on or about April 18, 1923, as charged in the information aforesaid, that you, the said defendant Victor Lamanuzzi, do pay a fine," etc.

Defendant contends that it was not shown by the judgment of the police court or from the complaint referred to therein that the possession charged in that proceeding was unlawful, and that the evidence was consequently insufficient to support the verdict that a prior offense had been committed. Although the complaint was not offered in evidence, and the judgment fails to expressly recite that the possession charged was unlawful, it is nevertheless stated therein that such possession, as the same was charged, in the complaint, was an offense to which the defendant had entered a plea of guilty. The judgment was not void, and was sufficient to show a prior conviction of a like offense. Ex parte Murray, 43 Cal. 455; Ex parte Raye, 63 Cal. 491; People v. Kelly, 120 Cal. 271, 52 P. 587; People v. Gregory, 8 Cal. App. 738, 97 P. 912.

[3] A witness for the prosecution testified, over objection, that intoxicating liquor was found on premises in the possession or control of the defendant on two occasions which preceded the date of the offense charged. This testimony was competent for the purpose offered, and properly admitted. People v. Johnson, 63 Cal. App. 178, 218 P. 449; People v. Silva, 67 Cal. App. 351, 227 P. 976; People v. Petrovich, 67 Cal. App. 405, 227 P. 978; People v. Buttulia, 70 Cal. App. 445, 233 P. 401; People v. Mullaly, 77 Cal. App. 60, 245 P. 811.

We find no error in the record, and the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

GORMAN v. SACRAMENTO COUNTY.
(Civ. 3466.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 21, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 20, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑930(1)—On appeal, all reasonable inferences must be indulged in support of conclusion reached by jury.

Jury having determined that deceased met death through negligence of defendant in failing to place guard rails on bridge, all reasonable inferences must be indulged on appeal in support of conclusion reached by jury.

2. Appeal and error 🔑996—Where two or more inferences can be deduced from facts, reviewing court cannot substitute its deductions for jury's.

When two or more inferences can be reasonably deduced from certain set of facts or circumstances, reviewing court cannot substitute its deductions for those of jury.

3. Bridges 🔑46(6)—Connection between county's negligence in failing to place guard rails on bridge and deceased's death could be proved by circumstantial evidence.

Connection between county's negligence in failing to place guard rails on bridge and death of boy from drowning could be proved by circumstantial evidence, and it was unnecessary that an eyewitness be produced to testify directly to fact.

4. Death 🔑75—Presumption that deceased, falling off bridge and drowning, exercised ordinary care for his safety, constituted prima facie evidence that deceased was free from contributory negligence (Code Civ. Proc. § 1961).

Presumption that boy, falling off bridge and drowning, exercised ordinary care for his own safety, was sufficient, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1961, to constitute prima facie evidence that deceased, at time he was drowned, was free from contributory negligence.

5. Death 🔑68, 103(1)—Evidence of deceased's cautious habits held admissible to throw light on probable conduct at time of accident, where there were no eyewitnesses, weight being for jury.

In action for death of boy falling off bridge and drowning, evidence of boy's cautious habits held admissible as tending to throw light on his probable conduct at time of accident, where there were no eyewitnesses to accident, and weight of evidence was for jury.

6. Trial 🔑194(16)—In action against county for death of boy falling off bridge without rails, instruction regarding county's liability for failure to provide rails, and regarding evidence relating to other bridges, held not invasive of jury's province (St. 1923, p. 675, § 2).

In action against county for damages for death of boy, falling off bridge without guard rails and drowning, instruction, first part of which was almost in identical language of St. 1923, p. 675, § 2, relating to liability of county for failure to provide rails, and stating that evidence regarding other bridges in vicinity maintained by county was no evidence on question of bridge involved, held not to invade province of jury.

7. Trial 🔑208—In action for death of boy falling off bridge, instruction striking out evidence regarding other bridges, improperly admitted, held not error.

In action for damages for death of boy, falling off bridge without rails and drowning, instruction in effect striking out evidence, improperly admitted, to effect that other bridges over similar canals in vicinity had no guard rails thereon, held not error.

8. Bridges 🔑46(5)—In action for death of boy, falling off bridge, evidence regarding other accidents at bridge held admissible.

In action against county for death of boy, falling off bridge and drowning, evidence that automobiles had fallen off bridge into canal before boy was drowned held admissible, to show dangerous character of bridge and cause of boy's death, and as tending to bring home to defendant knowledge of dangerous condition of bridge.

9. Bridges 🔑46(5)—In action for death of boy, falling off bridge without rails, evidence that machinery could not be moved across bridge with rails held properly excluded.

In action against county for death of boy, falling off bridge without rails and drowning, evidence that farm machinery could not be moved across bridge, if guard rails were maintained thereon, held properly excluded, where bridge was on public highway, used daily and constantly by traveling public, in automobiles, by teams, and on foot, since defendant would not be excused from maintaining bridge in unsafe condition, because such condition was necessary to accommodate persons occasionally moving machinery over it.

---

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1050(1)—In action for death of boy, falling off bridge without rails, admitting evidence that guard rails were erected after accident held harmless error.

In action against county for damages for death of boy, falling off bridge without rails and drowning, admitting evidence that guard rails were erected on bridge subsequent to accident held harmless error, where court made it plain to jury that evidence of subsequent repairs was not to be considered by them.

11. Bridges 🔑37—County was liable for death of boy, falling off bridge over canal, where evidence showed bridge was repaired and maintained by county.

County was liable for death of boy, falling off bridge over canal, where evidence showed bridge was repaired by county, and that it had charge of maintenance of bridge, even though there was no evidence to show whether bridge was constructed first, or whether canal was constructed first.

12. Death 🔑103(4)—Amount of damages for death is committed first to jury's discretion, and next to trial court's discretion.

Amount of damages in action for death is committed, first to sound discretion of jury, and next to discretion of judge of trial court.

13. Appeal and error 🔑1004(1)—Decision of trial court and jury on amount of damages for death cannot be set aside, unless verdict is plainly excessive.

Decision of trial court and jury on amount of damages for death cannot be set aside on appeal, unless verdict is so plainly and outrageously excessive as to suggest at first blush passion, prejudice, or corruption on part of jury.

14. Death 🔑99(3)—$7,500 for death of boy aged 10 years held not excessive.

Judgment for $7,500, reduced by court from $10,000 awarded by jury, for death of boy 10 years and 7 months old, in good physical condition, and in full possession of all his faculties, held not excessive.

15. Statutes 🔑65—Law presumes Legislature, in passing act, were familiar with acts of previous Legislatures (St. 1923, p. 675, § 2).

Law presumes that Legislature, in passing St. 1923, p. 675, § 2, relating to liability of counties, fully investigated all acts and matters in regard thereto, and were familiar with acts of previous Legislatures.

16. Counties 🔑143—Rule regarding proof of lack of contributory negligence, under statute relating to liability of county officers, cannot be read into statute relating to liability of counties (St. 1919, p. 756; St. 1923, p. 675, § 2).

Even though St. 1923, p. 675, § 2, relating to liability of counties, is in pari materia with St. 1919, p. 756, relating to liability of county officers, rule under latter statute as to proof of lack of contributory negligence cannot be read into section 2 of act of 1923, since section 2 is complete in itself.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Action for damages for death of a minor son by Barton L. Gorman against the County of Sacramento. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Henderson, Dist. Atty., and Wm. A. Green and J. F. O'Shea, Deputy Dist. Attys., all of Sacramento, for appellant.

J. Q. Brown, Jr., Gerald R. Johnson, and Hinsdale, Otis & Johnson, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendant, county of Sacramento, from a judgment entered against it upon a verdict of a jury in the sum of $10,000 and reduced to $7,500. The plaintiff, Barton L. Gorman, brought this action to recover damages for the death of his minor son, George Andrew Gorman, charging that his son's death was caused by the negligent manner in which the defendant, county of Sacramento, maintained a certain bridge across a canal or slough near the town of Ryde. It is the claim of plaintiff and respondent that the boy, while riding his bicycle along the public highway and over this bridge, met his death by falling from the bridge into the water below and drowning, and that the fall was caused by the lack of guard rails upon the bridge.

Many contentions are made for a reversal of the judgment. Appellant first contends that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict of the jury.

It was stipulated at the trial that the boy met his death by drowning. The boy, at the time of his death, was of the age of 10 years and 7 months, in good physical condition, and in full possession of all his faculties. He resided with his mother near the town of Ryde, in Sacramento county. In order to reach the town of Ryde from the residence of the deceased, it was necessary to cross a wooden bridge over a canal or slough, which contained about 7 feet of water. This bridge and road leading from the residence of the deceased to Ryde was maintained and controlled by said defendant and appellant, county of Sacramento. For some time prior to his death it had been the habit and custom of the boy to ride his bicycle across this bridge to the post office at Ryde every evening between 6 and 7:30 p. m. for the purpose of getting the mail. The bridge in question is located about two-fifths of a mile from Ryde and on an "S," or double turn, and at the time of the accident was without guard rails, approach rails, warning lights, or signals of any kind.

On the evening of April 3, 1924, the boy rode his bicycle across this bridge to the post office at Ryde, called for the mail as usual, and received the daily paper; he tied the paper onto his bicycle, mounted his bicycle, and started for home. At the time he left the post office it was between 6:30 and 7 p. m., and it was getting dark. He was never seen alive after this time. Not reaching home at the usual time, a search was instituted for him, and his body was found in the middle of the canal, about midway under the bridge, and his bicycle at a point near the bridge, in the canal, and about one-third of the way across and a few feet from the body. The boy's hands were uplifted as if he had been struggling. There were no marks on the body or bicycle, and nothing at all to indicate any act of violence or injury. There was no current in the water of the canal at the time; it being practically stagnant. On both sides of the approach to the bridge along the bank of the canal was a heavy growth of willows and underbrush.

Appellant admits that the boy met his death by drowning in this canal, and also admits there were no guard rails, approach rails, or warning lights or signals on the bridge, but argues that the manner and cause of the boy's death rests in surmise and conjecture, and that the evidence fails to establish that his death was proximately caused by the negligence of the county of Sacramento. Appellant further argues that deceased might have stopped to play near the bridge on the banks of the stream and fallen into the water, or might have been forced into the stream from the road by a reckless motorist, or he might have stopped on the bank of the stream to fish and fallen in; that it is just as reasonable to assume that the boy met his death in one of these ways as it is to contend that he met his death through the negligence of appellant.

We are unable to agree with appellant upon any of its theories as to how the boy might have met his death. The foregoing argument of appellant is one that could have been more appropriately addressed to the jury that tried the case, whose duty it was to weigh the evidence, than to a reviewing court, whose duty is to pass upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support the conclusions reached by the jury.

[1, 2] The jury having determined that deceased met his death through the negligence of appellant in failing to place guard rails on said bridge, the rule of law is, of course, well settled that all reasonable inferences are to be indulged in support of the conclusion reached by the jury. Furthermore, when two or more inferences can be reasonably deduced from a certain set of facts or circumstances, a reviewing court is not permitted to substitute its deductions for those of the jury. Wilbur v. Wilbur, 197 Cal. 1, 239 P. 332.

[3] It is true, as contended by appellant, that by proving a defendant's negligence, without in some way fastening that negligence to the injury, a case is not made out. Union Investment Co. v. San Francisco Gas & Electric Co., 168 Cal. 58, 141 P. 807. This rule, however, does not require demonstration of the connection between the proved or admitted negligence and the resulting injury. It is not necessary that an eyewitness be produced to testify directly to the fact. The connection may be made by circumstantial evidence in the same way that any other fact can be proved. County of Alameda v. Tieslau, 44 Cal. App. 332, 186 P. 398; Ross v. Railways Co., 47 Cal. App. 753, 191 P. 703.

[4] There is also another well-recognized rule of law applying to accidents like the one in the case at bar, to wit, that deceased is presumed to have exercised ordinary care for his own safety. This rule is fully and clearly stated by Mr. Justice Henshaw in the case of Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel G. M. Co., 168 Cal. 500, at page 506, 143 P. 714, 716, as follows:

> "Where death is occasioned under circumstances such as this, without eyewitnesses, the law comes to the aid of the plaintiff who is pressing a suit for damages for the death, and that law is found in the presumption of the Code of Civil Procedure, namely, that a person takes ordinary care of his own concerns. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 4. * * * This is a controvertible presumption, it is true, but until controverted it is evidence in accordance with which the jury is bound to decide."

See, also, Boyle v. Coast Imp. Co., 27 Cal. App. 714, 151 P. 25; Kreitzer v. Southern Pacific Co., 38 Cal. App. 654, 177 P. 477; section 1961, Code Civ. Proc.; Ross v. Railways Co., supra.

In applying this principle of law to personal injury cases the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Landrigan, 191 U. S. 461, 24 S. Ct. 137, 48 L. Ed. 262, said:

> "The presumption is founded on a law of nature. We know of no more universal instinct than that of self-preservation, none that so insistently urges to care against injury. It has its motives to exercise in the fear of pain, maiming, and death. There are few presumptions based on human feelings or experience, that have surer foundation. * * *"

When recourse must be made to this rule of human conduct in determining the question of responsibility in cases of accident like the one in the case at bar, it is fair to assume, there being no evidence in the record to the contrary, that when deceased met his death he was exercising due and proper care for the protection of his person and the preservation of his life. This presumption is sufficient to constitute prima facie evidence that the deceased at the time he was drowned was free from contributory negligence. Fleenor v. Oregon Short Line R. Co., 16 Idaho, 781, 102 P. 897; Ross v. Railways Co., supra.

This is a complete answer to most all of the theories advanced by appellant as to how the boy may have gotten into the canal, and especially the theory that the boy may have stopped to play or fish near the bridge and fallen in. There is no evidence, and not a single circumstance, that would indicate that any such thing happened, so this is a mere theory of appellant, which finds no support whatever in the evidence and therefore, amounts to nothing. The theory advanced by appellant that the boy may have been forced off of the bridge by a reckless motorist is also answered by the fact that there is no evidence, and not a single circumstance revealed by the record, to indicate that this happened. This theory is further answered by the fact that, even if the boy had been struck by an automobile, he would not have been knocked off the bridge, if proper guard rails had been maintained thereon. Furthermore, contributory negligence was not even pleaded by the appellant in this case.

We think the only reasonable inference that can be deduced from all the facts and circumstances revealed by the record is that deceased met his death by falling from the bridge into the canal and drowning, and that the fall was caused by the lack of guard rails on said bridge. In fact, we do not believe, when all the evidence in the record is carefully considered, that any reasonable person would doubt for a moment that the boy met his death by riding his bicycle off of the bridge into the water. All surrounding facts and circumstances point unerringly to this conclusion.

[5] Appellant next contends that the trial court erred in admitting evidence of the cautious habits of the deceased. There is no merit in this contention. As we have already seen, there were no eyewitnesses to the fatal accident, and respondent relied entirely upon circumstantial evidence to show that deceased met his death by reason of the negligence of the appellant. Therefore evidence of the boy's cautious habits was admissible as tending to throw light upon his probable conduct at the time of the accident. The weight to be given to this class of evidence was a question solely for the jury. Wallis v. Southern Pacific Co., 184 Cal. 662, 195 P. 408, 15 A. L. R. pages 117, 138; Starr v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 187 Cal. 270, at page 281, 201 P. 599.

[6, 7] Appellant next contends that the court erred in giving the jury the following instruction:

> "I instruct you that, if you find that under all the circumstances of this case the failure of the county to provide adequate guard rails or warning signals at this bridge rendered this bridge dangerous and defective, which condition was known to the county officers in authority, who failed to alter this condition within a reasonable time after obtaining such knowledge, and that this condition of said bridge was the negligence which proximately caused the death of George Gorman, then you shall render judgment for the plaintiff, and that any evidence which you may have heard regarding the construction and maintenance of other like bridges in the vicinity by the county of Sacramento is no evidence on the question of the particular bridge involved in this action."

Appellant contends that this instruction is erroneous for two reasons:

First. It invaded the province of the jury by instructing them upon a question of fact. There is no merit in this contention. The first part of the instruction which is criticized is in almost the identical language of the statute under which this action is brought (Stats. 1923, p. 675, c. 328, § 2), and when read in its entirety is not subject to the criticism made against it, and did not invade the province of the jury.

Second. The trial court permitted the appellant, over the objection of respondent, to introduce evidence to the effect that other bridges over similar canals in Sacramento and Yolo counties had no guard rails thereon. After permitting this evidence to be introduced before the jury, appellant claims that it was error for the trial court to instruct the jury to disregard all evidence relative to other Sacramento county bridges in the vicinity of the bridge in question. In the first place, the testimony referred to should not have been admitted. To permit the appellant to prove that the bridge in question was of a common design, adopted by its board of supervisors, and therefore free from all negligent construction or maintenance, because it followed the same plan, is not competent testimony. The jury would be led thereby to believe that negligence would depend upon the facts surrounding the bridge, taken in conjunction with all the Sacramento county bridges. If this were allowed, it would violate the very primary principles of the law of negligence. Negligence depends upon all the facts and circumstances surrounding the particular case. If appellant's theory be correct, the board of supervisors, having once adopted a common design and plan of construction and maintenance of bridges, could never be negligent, if they followed the same design and plan on other bridges. This is certainly not the law. The trial court, no doubt, realized when the evidence was concluded that this testimony should not have been admitted, and gave the instruction above quoted, the last part of which was, in effect, striking out the objectionable evidence, and this action was entirely proper. The evidence being incompetent in the first place, we cannot see how appellant could be prejudiced by the court instructing the jury to disregard it.

[8] Appellant next contends that the court erred in permitting respondent to introduce evidence that other accidents had occurred at this bridge; that is, that at least four automobiles had fallen off of this bridge into the canal prior to the time the boy was drowned. We think the evidence was properly admitted as tending to show the dangerous character of the bridge and the cause of the boy's death, and, furthermore, it tends to bring home to appellant knowledge of the dangerous condition of said bridge. Long v. John Breuner Co., 36 Cal. App. 639, 172 P. 1132; Dyas v. Southern Pacific Co., 140 Cal. 296, at page 305, 73 P. 972; Malone v. Hawley, 46 Cal. 409; 10 Cal. Juris. 827.

[9] Appellant also contends that the court erred in excluding evidence that farm machinery could not be moved across this bridge, if guard rails were maintained thereon. We think that no prejudice could have possibly resulted to appellant by the exclusion of this testimony. This bridge was on a public highway, used daily and constantly by the traveling public, both in automobiles, by teams, and on foot, and certainly should not be stripped of all guard rails, approach rails, or other means of protecting the general public against danger, simply in order to accommodate some farmer who might at some time want to move heavy machinery across this bridge.

We find a complete answer to appellant's contention in the case of Commonwealth v. Allen, 148 Pa. 364, 23 A. 1117, 16 L. R. A. 148, 33 Am. St. Rep. page 833, where this language is used:

> "As a general rule, highways and bridges are constructed for ordinary use in an ordinary manner, and not for an unusual or extraordinary use, either by crossing at great speed, or by the passing of a very large and unusual weight."

Certainly appellant would not be excused for maintaining this bridge in an unsafe and dangerous condition for use by the traveling public, simply by saying that this dangerous condition was made necessary in order to accommodate some person or persons who might occasionally want to move heavy machinery over it.

[10] Appellant further contends that the court erred in permitting evidence to be introduced that guard rails were erected on the bridge in question subsequent to the accident. The rule is well established that evidence of this character is inadmissible. Sappenfield v. Main St. & A. P. Ry. Co., 91 Cal. 62, 27 P. 590; Hager v. Southern Pacific Co., 98 Cal. 311, 33 P. 119; Turner v. Hearst, 115 Cal. 401, 47 P. 129; Limberg v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 127 Cal. 598, at page 604, 60 P. 176, 49 L. R. A. 33; Webster v. Orr, 174 Cal. 426, at page 428, 163 P. 361; Morris v. Sierra, etc. Power Co., 57 Cal. App. 281, at page 296, 207 P. 262. However, a careful examination of the record will show that the jury could not have been misled, nor could appellant's rights have been prejudiced, by the evidence admitted on this subject. Mr. Eastman, an overseer of bridges and roads for the county of Sacramento, was produced by appellant and testified, among other things, that a common plan or design for all bridges of a similar character to the one in question, had been adopted by the board of supervisors. On cross-examination these questions were asked him by one of the attorneys for respondent:

> "Q. I will ask you, Mr. Eastman, if there is any bridge that you know of that is on a curve like that? A. Not with a double curve.
> "Q. Not with a double curve; I will ask you, Mr. Eastman, since this is the type of bridge common to this county, why you put guard rails after this accident."

This question was objected to on the ground:

> "That it was not proper cross-examination and on the further ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and that it would go to show subsequent repairs, which was inadmissible."

This objection, in our opinion, should have been sustained. However, after considerable discussion by the court and counsel, the court overruled the objection, saying:

> "The objection, I think, should be overruled. Now, as I admonished the jury the other day or yesterday, in fact, this evidence is not for the purpose of showing any alteration in this bridge or for the purpose of admissions on the part of anyone that the original construction was faulty in any way, but this is cross-examination of Mr. Eastman, and is for the purpose of testing his knowledge of construction of bridges in this particular district, and the reason for the particular type of construction used."

After the ruling and discussion, the question was again read to the witness and the witness answered:

> "Well, we thought of putting them up at that time on all bridges.
> "Q. On all bridges? A. We thought of it, and the farming people did not want them; they was always moving their heavy machinery across. That will answer for all of them.
> "Q. Now, how long after George Gorman was drowned, Mr. Eastman, did you put side rails on this bridge?
> "Mr. Green (one of the attorneys for appellant): May it be understood that I am objecting to all these questions on the grounds heretofore stated? * * *
> "The Court: The objection will probably be good as to that. It is immaterial, I think, when they were erected. Objection sustained."

The court also sustained objections to similar questions propounded by respondent, and made it plain to the jury, it seems to us, that evidence of subsequent repairs was not to be considered by them.

[11] It is next contended by appellant that the county is not liable, because there is no evidence to show whether the bridge was constructed first, or the canal was constructed first. There is no merit whatever in this contention. The evidence shows that the bridge was repaired by the county and that it had charge of the maintenance of the bridge. Furthermore, the answer of appellant does not deny that the county had charge of the maintenance of this bridge.

[12-14] It is also contended by appellant that the verdict is excessive. The jury, as above stated, returned a verdict of $10,000. A motion for a new trial was made upon a number of grounds, among them being that the verdict was excessive. After hearing the motion, the trial court made an order to the effect that, if plaintiff would agree to a reduction of $2,500 in the amount of the judgment, the motion for a new trial would be denied. This was agreed to by plaintiff, and a written stipulation to that effect filed, the judgment was reduced to $7,500, and the court thereupon denied the motion for a new trial.

The amount of damages in this kind of an action is committed first to the sound discretion of the jury, and next to the discretion of the judge of the trial court, who, in ruling upon the motion for a new trial, may consider the evidence anew, determine anew the facts, and set aside the verdict if it is not just. Upon appeal, the decision of the trial court and the jury on the subject cannot be set aside unless the verdict is so plainly and outrageously excessive as to suggest at first blush passion, prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury. Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 270, 113 P. 366, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50; Wiezorek v. Ferris, 176 Cal. 353, 167 P. 234; Varcoe v. Lee, 180 Cal. 338, 181 P. 223; Reneau v. Hirsch (Cal. App.) 262 P. 1100, and cases there cited. The present case does not come within this rule. The trial judge has exercised his discretion, and caused the judgment to be reduced to $7,500, and there is nothing in the record that would authorize us to disturb the judgment as it now stands.

[15, 16] Appellant, through counsel other than those who participated in the trial, has filed herein a supplemental brief, in which the question is raised for the first time, that the act of 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 675, subd. 2), under which this action was brought, is in pari materia with the act of 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 756), and therefore must be construed together, and that any of the provisions contained in the act of 1919, and omitted from the act of 1923, should nevertheless be read into the act of 1923. The act of 1919 is relative to the liability of public officers, etc., the title reading:

> "An act relating to the liability in damages of the officers of districts, towns, cities, cities and counties, counties and of the state of California for injuries to person or property resulting from defects and dangers in public streets, highways, bridges, buildings, work or property," etc.

The title of the 1923 act reads:

> "[Section 1] An act limiting the liability of supervisors, city trustees, city councils, boards of education and school trustees, [section 2] and making counties, municipalities and school districts liable for the negligence of their respective officers in certain instances, and [section 3] providing for the payment of costs of actions in certain instances."

As the title indicates, the act of 1923 consists of three different parts—the first part further limiting the liability of the supervisors and other officials, and further protecting them from personal actions; the second part, as the title also indicates, creates an entirely new and different liability, to wit, the liability of the county, making the county a legal entity, liable for the negligence of its officers in certain cases. An examination of the 1919 act shows that a person suing an officer for negligence has not only to plead, but also to prove, that the injury and damage complained of was sustained while such public street, highway, bridge, building, work, or property was being carefully used, and that due care was being exercised to avoid damage due to such condition, or, in other words, this act changes the general rule that the burden of showing contributory negligence is upon the defendant, and requires an affirmative showing on the part of the plaintiff that he was using the road, bridge, or street with due care. No such provision or requirement is found in the act of 1923, and it is reasonable to assume that the Legislature did not intend to place it therein, or to change the general rule as to the proof of contributory negligence, when a county is being sued. If the 1923 Legislature had intended that the same burden be placed upon a litigant, who was seeking recourse against the county as a legal entity, as those placed upon one seeking recourse against its officers in their personal capacities, it had the 1919 act before it and could have incorporated all of its provisions in the second subdivision of the 1923 act. The law presumes that the Legislature, in passing this 1923 act, fully investigated all acts and matters in regard thereto, and were familiar with the acts of previous legislators. 23 Cal. Juris. 783; Old Homestead Bakery v. Marsh, 75 Cal. App. 247, 242 P. 749.

Conceding that appellant's position is sound that the act of 1919 and section 1 of the act of 1923 are in pari materia, nevertheless we fail to see how section 2 of the act of 1923, and the one under which this action is brought, can be brought within that doctrine, for section 2 is complete in itself and needs nothing read into it to make it a complete piece of legislation. If we read into section 2 of the act of 1923 the rule relative to the proof of lack of contributory negligence, or as it is termed the "due care clause," contained in the act of 1919, we would be adding something which it is clear to our minds, the Legislature did not intend should be included therein.

Complaint is also made that other instructions given in the case were prejudicial to the rights of appellant. We have examined all the instructions with care, and we think the instructions, as a whole, were more favorable to appellant than to the respondent, and there is no prejudicial error therein.

A careful review of the entire evidence leads us to the conclusion that the judgment must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: HART, Acting Presiding Justice; PLUMMER, J.

YOUNG v. BOARD OF MEDICAL EXAMINERS OF CALIFORNIA et al. ★

(Civ. 5309.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 3, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 30, 1928.

1. Physicians and surgeons 🔑11(3)—Sale of spurious medical diplomas held to authorize annulment of license to practice medicine; "medical business;" "business" (Medical Act, § 14, subd. 3).

Annulment of petitioner's license to practice medicine and surgery under complaint charging unprofessional conduct in advertising medical business, intended, and having a tendency, to deceive the public and impose on credulous and ignorant persons, in violation of Medical Act (St. 1913, p. 722), § 14, subd. 3, held sustained by proof that he conducted a medical college which issued spurious medical diplomas, conduct of medical college and issuance of diplomas being incidental to "medical business"; physician's occupation though commonly referred to as a profession being included within broader word "business."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Business.]

2. Physicians and surgeons 🔑11(3)—Order revoking license to practice medicine must be affirmed on certiorari review if sustained by any competent evidence, though hearsay evidence also admitted (Medical Act, § 14, subd. 3).

On appeal in a certiorari proceeding to review an order of the board of medical examiners revoking petitioner's license to practice medicine and surgery for unprofessional conduct violating Medical Act (St. 1913, p. 722), § 14, subd. 3, the order must be affirmed, even though it appears that hearsay and incompetent evidence was introduced on the hearing before the board, if it also satisfactorily appears that other competent evidence was introduced sufficient in itself to support the order.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Certiorari proceeding by Frank P. Young against the Board of Medical Examiners of the State of California and others to review and annul an order revoking petitioner's license to practice medicine and surgery. From a judgment in favor of respondents, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

L. E. Dadmun, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Otto J. Emme, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. This appeal is prosecuted from a judgment rendered in favor of respondent board of medical examiners in a certiorari proceeding instituted for the purpose of reviewing and annulling an order made by said board whereby the license of appellant to practice medicine and surgery in the state of California was revoked.

[1] The first point advanced by appellant as a reason why the judgment of the lower court should be reversed is that the complaint on which appellant was tried before the respondent board did not state facts sufficient to constitute a violation of the so-called Medical Act (Stats. 1913, p. 722, and amendments thereto). It is urged by appellant that, whereas the charge against him in substance was that he was guilty of unprofessional conduct in that "he did use and employ advertising of medical business intended, and having a tendency, to deceive the public and impose upon credulous and ignorant persons in a manner harmful and injurious to public morals and safety," as a matter of fact, as shown by the evidence, if appellant was at all guilty of the specific acts set forth in the complaint, such conduct did not constitute a violation of the provisions of the Medical Act in question. With reference thereto, appellant directs particular attention, first, to the language of the act, which inhibits "all advertising of medical business * * *" (subdivision 3, § 14, Stats. 1913, p. 722); secondly, appellant adverts to the evidence adduced before the respondent board on a hearing of the charge, which in substance was to the effect that appellant was engaged in the false and fraudulent business of selling medical diplomas and other credentials from a medical college, proposed to be used by the purchaser thereof in obtaining for his use a necessary certificate or license to enable him to practice medicine and surgery in this state. More particularly, it is contended by appellant that the act, by whatever means of falsely and fraudulently furnishing to any person a spurious medical diploma for the purpose of enabling him to obtain a license to practice medicine, did not amount to "advertising of medical business," and consequently did not come within the purview of the statute.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

That the means and method employed by appellant in procuring purchasers of spurious medical diplomas constituted "advertising" appears to be conceded; which leaves for determination the element of whether such practice was part of a "medical business."

While the occupation of a physician more commonly is referred to as a profession, nevertheless it may properly be included within the broader word of "business." Earle v. Commonwealth, 180 Mass. 579, 63 N. E. 10, 57 L. R. A. 292, 91 Am. St. Rep. 326; Semple v. Schwarz, 130 Mo. App. 65, 109 S. W. 633.

The evidence introduced at the hearing of the charge against the appellant disclosed the fact that he conducted a medical college and that the diplomas which were issued therefrom fraudulently purported to be in recognition of faithful and conscientious work and study for the prescribed period in such college by the person to whom such diploma or certificate of graduation therefrom was issued. It is apparent that the proper conduct of a medical college necessarily would deal with the physicians' art, or what might be termed the "medical business," and the issuance of a diploma from such college would be but incidental to such business. Such an act could not be said to be a part or parcel of any other occupation, profession or business; to the contrary, it related to and formed a part of the "medical business" only. That, as shown by the evidence, the acts and conduct of appellant, of which complaint is made, necessarily had a tendency to impose upon credulous and ignorant persons and be harmful and injurious to public morals and safety, is so apparent that the fact may be neither dispelled nor in any wise affected by argument or other form of disputation. This court is therefore unable to agree with appellant in the point presented by him.

[2] It is also urged by appellant that his guilt was determined on hearsay and incompetent evidence alone. While it is undoubtedly true that much of the evidence to which appellant refers was properly open to the objection that it was hearsay, it is equally satisfactorily shown that considerable additional evidence, not subject to such or any other legal infirmity, was presented to the respondent board on a hearing of the charge—in fact, so much is admitted by appellant. However, it is claimed that none of such competent evidence was sufficient to sustain the action of the respondent board in revoking the license of appellant. It would serve no useful purpose to set forth herein the facts upon which the respondent relies as sufficient to support the conclusion that appellant committed the acts particularly described in the accusation against appellant. It may be sufficient to say that, after an examination of the record herein, this court is of the opinion that the evidence adduced before the respondent board was ample in quantity and quality to justify the order of which complaint is made. In such circumstances, the rule which is applicable is to the effect that on an appeal from an order made in a certiorari proceeding to review an order of the nature of that here under consideration, made by the board of medical examiners, even though it appears that much of the evidence introduced on the hearing before the board was hearsay and incompetent, if it also satisfactorily appear that other competent evidence was introduced sufficient in itself to support the order in question, this court is powerless to interfere—with the result that the order of which complaint is made must be affirmed. It is so held in Minaker v. Adams, 55 Cal. App. 374, 203 P. 806, and cases there cited.

The judgment is affirmed.

I concur: CONREY, P. J.

Mr. Justice YORK, deeming himself disqualified, does not participate in the foregoing decision.

In re HORGAN'S ESTATE.☆

O'CONNOR v. SCHROYIER et al.

(Civ. 6213.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 29, 1928.

Rehearing Denied July 28, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 27, 1928.

1. Evidence ⟹291—Declarations of deceased member of family made ante litem motam are admissible to prove "pedigree" (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1852, 1870, subds. 4, 11).

Declarations of member of family made ante litem motam, declarant being deceased at time of giving of testimony, may be received in evidence to prove "pedigree," under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1852, 1870, subds. 4, 11; "pedigree" being history of family, descent, which is transmitted from one generation to another by oral and written declarations.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Pedigree.]

2. Evidence ⟹291—Heir's testimony, based on deceased father's statements, held of evidentiary value to prove she was cousin of decedent.

In proceeding for partial distribution of decedent's estate, heir's testimony by deposition of facts of family history, relation, descent, births, marriage, and death connected with and concerning family of herself and decedent, based on statements deceased father had made to her, held of evidentiary value to prove she was cousin of decedent.

3. Names ⟹18—Identity of person is presumed from identity of name (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 25).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 25, identity of person is presumed from identity of name.

☆Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

4. Descent and distribution ⚷71(6)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that petitioner was cousin of decedent.

In proceedings on petition for partial distribution of decedent's estate, evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that petitioner was cousin of decedent.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Mary A. Horgan, also known as Harrigan, deceased, of which J. B. Schroyier was executor. Elizabeth O'Mahoney petitioned the court for partial distribution, and the petition was opposed by Elizabeth A. O'Connor and others. From the decree granting partial distribution, Elizabeth A. O'Connor appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph Farry and John O'Gara, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Julian D. Cohn and William A. Breen, both of San Francisco, for respondent O'Mahoney.

Stanislaus A. Riley and J. C. Quinlan, both of San Francisco, for respondent O'Connor.

William A. Kelly, of San Francisco, for respondent Schroyier.

BEAUMONT, Justice pro tem. Mary Ann Horgan died testate in San Francisco August 15, 1925, leaving certain property to charitable institutions and the remainder of her estate to her heirs at law. Elizabeth O'Mahoney, respondent, petitioned the court for partial distribution, alleging she was an heir, to wit, cousin of decedent. Elizabeth A. O'Connor, assignee of Thomas O'Connor, one of the heirs, opposed the petition, denying that petitioner was such heir, and alleging that the said petitioner was not related whatever to decedent. The court found that there were three heirs at law, to wit, Richard O'Connor, a cousin, Thomas O'Connor, a cousin, and Elizabeth O'Mahoney, a cousin. The petition for partial distribution was granted, and from the decree Elizabeth O'Connor is the only appellant. She contends that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding that Elizabeth O'Mahoney was the cousin of decedent.

John Horgan, a native of Ireland, came to the United States prior to 1849. He was married to Bridget O'Connor, and one child was the issue of the marriage, namely Mary Ann Horgan, decedent herein. John Horgan lived in San Francisco for many years prior to his death there in 1886. He was a blacksmith. Mary Ann Horgan was never married.

Respondent gave testimony, by deposition, of many particular facts of family history, relationship, descent, birth, marriage, and death connected with and concerning the family of herself and decedent, which, she testified, she learned from her father. Among other things, she testified that her father's name was Patrick Horgan, and his brother's name was John; that their father's name was John Horgan, and their mother's name was Johanna Horgan, née Flynn; that her uncle, John Horgan (father of decedent), was a blacksmith by trade. She testified that she based her statements as to those matters upon, to quote the witness, "talks I had from time to time with my father," "information passed on to me from my father," "family knowledge, and from information given to me by my father during his lifetime." Some of the answers, for example, given by respondent were: "The decedent never married, as my father in his lifetime always told me;" "I always heard my father say that decedent was an only child." Respondent further testified in various parts of the deposition, both in answer to interrogatories and cross-interrogatories, that she and decedent were "first cousins," that "her father and my father were brothers," and that she learned this, as she stated, "from what my father used to tell me."

No objection was made to any question, nor was there any motion made to strike out any answer or any part of the deposition. In fact, the deposition of respondent was read in evidence with the consent of counsel for appellant expressed in open court. Appellant now contends that the answers of respondent were not declarations within the meaning of the hearsay rule, that they have no evidentiary value, and should not have been considered by the trial court in determining the issue, for the reason that they were simply conclusions of the witness.

[1, 2] Declarations of a member of a family made ante litem motam, the declarant being deceased at the time of the giving of the testimony, may be received in evidence for the purpose of proving pedigree. Estate of Williams, 128 Cal. 552, 61 P. 670, 79 Am. St. Rep. 67; Estate of Hartman, 157 Cal. 206, 107 P. 105, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 530, 21 Ann. Cas. 1302. Section 1852 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

> "The declaration, act, or omission of a member of a family who is a decedent, or out of the jurisdiction, is also admissible as evidence of common reputation, in cases where, on questions of pedigree, such reputation is admissible."

It is further provided that evidence may be given of "the act or declaration, verbal or written, of a deceased person in respect to the relationship, birth, marriage, or death of any person related by blood or marriage to such deceased person" and of "common reputation existing previous to the controversy * * * in cases of pedigree." Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subds. 4 and 11.

"Pedigree is the history of family descent, which is transmitted from one generation to another, by both oral and written declarations, and, unless proved by hearsay evidence, not competent in general issues, it cannot in most instances be proved at all. Matters of pedigree consist of descent and relationship evidenced by declarations of particular facts, such as births, marriages and death." (Italics ours.) Jones' Commentaries on Evidence, vol. 2, § 312.

To the foregoing is added by Greenleaf (16th Ed.) vol. 1, p. 202:

"* * * As well as, in general, any notable fact in the life of a member or in the family history which might well be supposed to be known to the members in general."

Mr. Wigmore says:

"The evidence may be in the form of individual declarations, though it may also be in the form of family reputation. In general, the scope of the present exception has been much enlarged during the past century in this country. Occasionally a statute has attempted to define its terms."

Under this statement a reference is made to the California statutes above mentioned. Wigmore on Evidence, § 1480.

In Watson v. Brewster, 1 Pa. 381, a witness, through interrogatories, was asked:

"Are you acquainted with the age of Mrs. Watson? if so, when was she born? state how you know her age; state, is she older or younger than yourself? if so, how much?"

The defendants objected to the testimony on the ground that it appeared that the witness spoke from recollection of the contents of the family Bible. The plaintiff contended "that the witness recollected it from information received from her deceased mother." The court said:

"The witness knows the age of her sister from the declarations of her mother, who is deceased. Now, that this species of evidence must be admitted has always been held, for otherwise a person could not prove his own age; for where no family record is made, he can only show it from the declaration of his parents or others cognizant of the fact."

The question in the present case does not concern the admissibility of testimony. As heretofore pointed out, it was received into the record without objection and was before the court. Estate of Friedman, 178 Cal. 27, 172 P. 140. We find no merit in the contention that such evidence was without evidentiary value.

[3, 4] In addition to the testimony hereinbefore referred to, there were introduced in evidence on behalf of respondent certificates of baptism which stated that a certain John Horgan, born of John Horgan and Johanna Flynn, was baptized in the parish of Doneraile and Shanballymore (Ireland) on September 3, 1820; and that one Patrick Horgan, born of John Horgan and Johanna Flynn, was baptized in the same parish May 18, 1823.

Thomas O'Connor, one of the heirs at law, a witness for appellant, testified that he was born in the parish, as he called it, of "Doneraile or Shanballymore, if you will"; that he knew Mary Ann Horgan, the decedent, and her father, John Horgan; that he visited John Horgan and his family in San Francisco in 1876; that John Horgan questioned him at length about certain persons by the name of Flynn who lived in Ireland; that he (O'Connor) knew the said Flynns; that he learned that these Flynns were the first cousins of John Horgan; that he was informed of this relationship by John Horgan's wife; that his (O'Connor's) home was about one-fourth of a mile from where respondent, Elizabeth Horgan (now O'Mahoney) and her father, Patrick Horgan, resided; that "I could not say where John Horgan, the father of Mary Ann Horgan, was born, but I know he kept a blacksmith shop in a place called Carker Pike; that was one mile from where I lived, from where I was born; Carker Pike is two miles east of Doneraile; it was one mile from where I was born and lived."

Questions of fact for the trial court to determine were: Did respondent, who lived near Doneraile, county of Cork, Ireland, have an uncle named John Horgan? If so, was he the same John Horgan (father of decedent) who died in San Francisco in 1886, but who was born in Ireland, and who at one time had a blacksimth shop near Doneraile in said county of Cork? These questions were answered in favor of respondent.

Identity of person is presumed from identity of name. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 25; Estate of Williams, 128 Cal. 552, 61 P. 670, 79 Am. St. Rep. 67. In the Estate of Williams, supra, the court, after observing that the presumption arising from identity of name is rebuttable, said:

"The question was one of fact, and there was certainly sufficient evidence to justify the court in finding that the petitioners were the nephews of the testator, and entitled to the whole of the residuary estate, if George Williams died before the testator leaving no issue. Upon this point the declarations of William Frederick Williams, deceased, as to the family understanding and belief, to the effect that he enlisted in the army, when a boy, on the federal side of the Civil War, and was believed to have been killed, and that he never married, was competent evidence and sufficient to sustain the finding of the court. * * * But it was for the trial court to determine the weight to be given to each and every particular statement, and I am satisfied with the correctness of its conclusions."

We are of the opinion, after a scrutiny of the entire record, that there was sufficient evidence to sustain the finding of which appellant complains.

Appellant makes a specification of error regarding the admission in evidence of the above-mentioned certificates of baptism. The record shows that the appellant made an objection when the certificates were first offered, on the ground that they were not properly authenticated. The court did not rule upon the objection as, apparently from the record, it was deemed withdrawn. When the certificates were again offered there was no objection.

Judgment affirmed.

MASKUNS v. MASKUNS. (Civ. 3528.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 28, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 27, 1928.

1. Husband and wife ⇨262(1)—Property acquired separately or jointly by husband and wife during marriage is presumed community in character.

The presumption that property acquired during marriage is community in character applies not only to property acquired by either the husband or the wife separately, but also to property acquired jointly.

2. Husband and wife ⇨262(2)—Where separate and community property are commingled so as to make tracing impossible, burden of proving separate property is on spouse asserting claim.

When separate and community property are commingled in such a manner that it is impossible to trace the funds, the whole fund will be treated as community property, and the burden of proof is on the spouse who claims that the property is separate in its nature.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1071(6)—Court having found husband's and wife's earnings were intermingled, failure to find that bank account included husband's separate funds held not prejudicial to him.

Where court found that entire earnings of husband and wife were intermingled and deposited in husband's bank account, and that balance of purchase price of certain lot purchased by husband before marriage was paid with money withdrawn from said account after marriage, court's failure to find that community bank account included some of husband's separate funds was not prejudicial to husband.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1071(1)—Clerical error in finding date of marriage held not prejudicial to husband, whose admission that he made payment on purchase price from community fund after marriage settled principal issue.

In action involving question whether half interest in lot was community property, in which action the chief issue whether a final half of purchase price was paid after marriage from community funds was settled by husband's admission that he made payment after marriage from the common bank account, husband was not prejudiced by clerical error of finding that marriage occurred June 12, 1907, instead of January 12, 1907, which was correct date.

5. Trial ⇨404(2)—Correct finding of fact lost none of its force merely because inadvertently included among conclusions of law.

Where court correctly determined ultimate fact presented by issue tendered in complaint, such finding of fact lost none of its force merely because it was inadvertently included among the conclusions of law.

6. Husband and wife ⇨270(9)—Finding that plaintiff was sole owner of undivided half interest and that remaining half was community property held sufficient finding of ownership.

Finding that plaintiff was sole owner of undivided half interest in property described in complaint as his sole and separate property, and that remaining half was community property of plaintiff and defendant, held sufficient finding respecting ultimate fact of ownership and relative interests of respective parties therein to support judgment that undivided half interest in lot was community property of parties.

7. Trial ⇨395(5)—Judgment supported by findings will not be disturbed merely for failure to directly pass on particular issue necessarily determined by general findings.

When findings fully support judgment, it will not be disturbed merely for failure to directly pass on some particular issue when ultimate fact therein contained is necessarily determined by general findings.

8. Trial ⇨395(7)—Judgment may be sufficiently announced as conclusions of law, where specific conclusions, if drawn, would necessarily favor prevailing party.

Judgment may be sufficiently announced as court's conclusions of law, where it is evident that specific conclusions of law, if drawn, must necessarily have been in favor of prevailing party, and their omission will not necessitate reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. C. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Adolph S. Maskuns against Maggie Maskuns. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Martin Forrest, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Albert E. Sherman and Sherman & Sherman, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment determining that an undivided one-half interest in a certain Los Angeles lot is the community property of the appellant and respondent, who are husband and wife.

These litigants intermarried January 12, 1907, and lived as husband and wife until the commencement of this action. In June, 1906, appellant contracted to purchase lot 3 of Vermont place, in Los Angeles, Cal., for the sum of $1,400, one-half of which purchase price he paid prior to his marriage with respondent. The balance was paid after the marriage. A deed of conveyance to this lot was executed and delivered to the appellant July 18, 1908. The appellant was a tailor by occupation, and both before and after their marriage the respondent worked in his shop for wages. Prior to their marriage the appellant possessed $600 separate funds, together with some real property. The respondent also had $160 of her own separate money which she delivered to her husband. After their marriage both spouses mingled their separate funds and community earnings in a bank account, which was carried in the appellant's name. After their marriage, upon different occasions, appellant drew upon this community fund to pay the remaining $700 upon the purchase price of the lot in question.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

The appellant contends that the findings are not supported by the evidence, and that the trial court failed to adopt findings upon material issues included within the pleadings.

The court found that:

> "* * * The entire earnings of the husband and wife * * * were intermingled * * * and were deposited in the bank account of the husband; * * * that the balance of the purchase price on said lot 3, Vermont place, to wit, the sum of $700, was withdrawn from the said bank account after the marriage of the parties hereto, and the balance of payments were made therefrom upon the property described in plaintiff's complaint."

[1-3] This finding is in strict accordance with the evidence. It does, however, appear that with the mingled earnings of the spouses there was also deposited several hundred dollars of the appellant's separate money. But this fact does not alter the effect of the court's findings. Even if the appellant did mingle his separate funds with the community earnings of himself and wife, the identity of the separate money would be lost in the common bank account. The presumption that property acquired during marriage is community in character applies not only to property acquired by either the husband or the wife separately, but also to property acquired jointly. 5 Cal. Jur. 313, § 22; section 164, Civ. Code; Jordan v. Fay, 98 Cal. 264, 33 P. 95. When separate and community property are commingled in such a manner that it is impossible to trace the funds, the character of the whole fund will be treated as community property, for the burden is upon the spouse who claims that the property is separate in its nature to affirmatively prove the assertion. 5 Cal. Jur. 298, § 16; McKay's Community Prop. 215, § 308; Estate of Bauer, 79 Cal. 304, 21 P. 759. The appellant was therefore not prejudiced by the court's failure to find that the community bank account, from which the balance of the purchase price of the lot in question was paid, also included some of his separate funds.

[4] The appellant was not prejudiced by the clerical error of finding that the marriage between these parties occurred June 12, 1907, instead of January 12, 1907, which was the correct date according to the undisputed evidence. The chief issue in this case was the question as to whether the final $700 of the purchase price of the lot in question was paid after marriage from the community funds of the spouses. This question was settled by the admission of the appellant himself, who testified: "I paid $700 on lot 3, after marriage," from the common bank account.

[5, 6] Finally, it is contended that the findings are fatally defective for failure to determine the issues presented by paragraphs 2, 3, and 4 of the complaint. Paragraph 2 alleged that the appellant was the owner of the lot in question. In the court's findings, under the caption of "conclusions of law," the court decreed:

> "* * * The above-named plaintiff is the sole owner of an undivided one-half interest in the property described in plaintiff's complaint as his sole and separate property; that the remaining one-half of said property is the community property of this plaintiff and defendant."

It will thus be seen that the court correctly determined the ultimate fact presented by the issue tendered in paragraph 2 of the complaint by finding that the appellant was not the sole owner of the entire lot in question, but that the respondent owned an undivided one-half community interest therein. Vieux v. Vieux, 80 Cal. App. 222, 251 P. 640. A finding of fact loses none of its force merely because it has been inadvertently included among the conclusions of law. Estate of Forrester, 162 Cal. 493, 495, 123 P. 283.

[7, 8] Moreover, when findings fully support the judgment, as they certainly do in the present case, the judgment will not be disturbed merely for failure to directly pass upon some particular issue, when the ultimate fact therein contained is necessarily determined by the general findings. 24 Cal. Jur. 974, § 207, and cases cited. Nor may it be said that, if the foregoing findings that the appellant is not the sole owner of the lot in question, and that, upon the contrary, the respondent is the owner of an undivided one-half in community with the appellant, there then remains no sufficient declaration of the court's conclusions of law. It has been held that the judgment of the court may be sufficiently announced as its conclusions of law, where it is evident that specific conclusions of law, if drawn, must necessarily have been in favor of the prevailing party. Their omission will not then necessitate the reversal of a judgment. 24 Cal. Jur. 1002, § 222, and cases cited.

Paragraphs 3 and 4 of the complaint, upon the issues of which it is claimed specific findings were omitted, allege that the respondent claims some interest in the property in question, but that her claim is without merit, and, further, that the appellant purchased the property before their marriage, with his own separate funds. These allegations are merely the formal allegations of an ordinary suit to quiet title, and in effect were specifically refuted and fully covered by the court's finding No. IV first above quoted.

It must be conceded that the findings were carelessly prepared and might have been more specific, but we are of the opinion that the ultimate fact of the ownership of the lot in question, together with the relative interests of the respective parties therein, having been adequately found, are sufficient to support the judgment. In the case of Daly v. Sorocco, 80 Cal. 367, 22 P. 211, which was an attack upon a judgment for the omission of findings in an appeal from a suit to quiet title, the court said:

> "* * * His [appellant's] right to maintain the action was based wholly on his ownership and right of possession, and these being found against him, it was immaterial to him whether the court found as to the other facts or not, as the judgment must have been against him, whatever the other findings might have been."

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

MICHELL et al. v. GRASS VALLEY GOLD MINES CO. (Civ. 3464.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 30, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Aug. 27, 1928.

1. Licenses 🔑39—Issuance and sale of capital stock of foreign corporation without permit by commissioner of corporations held void (Corporate Securities Act).

Issuance and sale by foreign corporation of capital stock or agreement for such sale without permit being issued by commissioner of corporations, as required by Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673), held void.

2. Licenses 🔑39—Purchasers of stock of foreign corporation held not precluded by reason of assisting in organization from canceling stock issued without permit (Corporate Securities Act).

Purchasers of stock in consideration for conveyance of mineral rights in land, assisting in organization and incorporation of foreign corporation, and serving as directors at time of passing deeds and issuance of stock, held not to have taken a part therein other than investors in usual sense, so as to preclude cancellation of stock, on ground issuance was void, as being without permit by commissioner of corporations, in accordance with Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673).

3. Licenses 🔑39—Mistake in issuing stock of foreign corporation without permit justified cancellation of conveyance to corporation (Corporate Securities Acts; Civ. Code, §§ 1689, subd. 1, 1576–1578).

Mistake of foreign corporation and purchasers of stock therein in issuing stock without permit therefor, as required by Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673), held mutual mistake, justifying cancellation of purchaser's conveyance of mineral rights to corporation, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1689, subd. 1, 1576–1578.

4. Licenses 🔑39—Notice of rescission of sale of stock 17 days after discovering mistake authorizing rescission held sufficiently prompt (Corporate Securities Act; Civ. Code, § 1691).

Notice of cancellation by purchasers of stock 17 days after discovering mistake of foreign corporation in issuing stock without having secured permit therefor, as required by Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673), held sufficiently prompt to justify cancellation of purchasers' conveyance of mineral rights to corporation, in view of Civ. Code, § 1691; there having been complete offer of restoration.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; Raglan Tuttle, Judge.

Action by P. W. Michell and others against the Grass Valley Gold Mines Company. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. H. Armstrong and Frank R. Wehe, Jr., both of Grass Valley (Frank R. Wehe, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Nilon & Nilon, of Grass Valley, for respondents.

HUGHES, Justice pro tem. This is a proceeding in equity, seeking to rescind an agreement to convey mineral rights in certain lands and to cancel a certain deed given thereunder, and directing the defendant to reconvey to plaintiffs the said lands described in said deed. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

The facts as disclosed by the record are as follows: P. W. Michell and Nellie Michell, his wife, were tenants in common with W. J. Michell, a brother, in the ownership of certain lands situated in Nevada county, Cal., comprising about 108 acres, which it was claimed and believed contained valuable minerals. Contiguous to said lands were nine other parcels separately owned which likewise were considered valuable for mining purposes. All these parcels combined with that of plaintiffs constituted a tract of land of about 188.84 acres. Any one parcel was considered too small to mine to an advantage, but all combined presented an attractive mining unit. One Roy J. King, engaged as a mining engineer and promoter, conceived the idea of combining all these lands into a single mining unit, and to form a corporation for the purpose of developing and working the same as a mine. He pursued this idea over a long period of years prior to the date of the incorporation of the defendant, and at different times possessed options to purchase this very same property. Immediately prior to the organization of the defendant, King had been active in promoting the enterprise, and carried on interviews and conducted correspondence with men assisting him in "floating the properties," among them being, locally, D. E. Matteson, Oscar Coflin, and John Mulroy, and the outside associate was Charles E. Knox of San Francisco and New York. Mr. Knox was dealing with a Mr. Thompson in the East. The following telegrams were exchanged between King and Knox:

"New York, July 13, 1922.

"Roy J. King, Grass Valley, California Your Tonopah wire received yesterday, did not get to see Thompson until today. He thinks something can be done on basis our agreement June first but no chance whatever on Coflin contract of June twelfth. * * * Will allow Friday and Saturday for you discuss matter with Matteson and others and mail report to you Sunday night. [Signed] Chas. E. Knox."

"Grass Valley, California, July 15, 1922.

"Chas. E. Knox Hotel Belmont New York City Your telegram thirteenth. Owners accept our proposition of June first in principle. They agree to deed property to a corporation known as Grass Valley Gold Mines Company, to be incorporated under laws of Delaware and take stock in lieu of cash for purchase price. Thompson to be given six months option on this property purchase stock of 342,500 shares at forty (40) cents net to them. Company officers to be local people until this stock is sold and money distributed to owners. Matteson accepts presidency and I the vice presidency and general managership. Do you and Thompson agree, and if so, will you incorporate now from that end? [Signed] Roy J. King."

"New York, N. Y., July 17, 1922.

"Roy J. King Grass Valley, California. Your telegram July fifteenth submitted to Thompson today. Have also shown him our proposition of June first which as we see it is in accord with your telegram. Thompson assures me he has strong people ready to go, and we accept your proposition. Officers satisfactory, name corporation good, and either Delaware or Nevada will do. Will get figures on cost of incorporation here tomorrow but it appears to me this could be done to better advantage in Grass Valley. Advise how soon stock can be placed in escrow and contract forwarded. Every promise of quick success. [Signed] Chas. E. Knox."

"Grass Valley, California, July 18, 1922.

"Chas. E. Knox Hotel Belmont New York City. Your telegram seventeenth. Stock in escrow and contract mailed to Thompson within twenty days. Nevada selected to save time. Capitalization one and one half millions par value one dollar. Brodigan, phones incorporation fees three hundred dollars and thirty additional for three certified copies. Articles of incorporation to be mailed Carson City tomorrow night. [Signed] Roy J. King."

"New York, N. Y., July 21, 1922.

"Roy J. King Grass Valley, California. Much pleased with rapid progress on organization. Thompson thinks stock should be issued and registered here. Registration necessary if stock listed on curb. As soon as contract received will have registrar company send you instructions. Thompson leaves for Montreal tomorrow returns Wednesday.

"[Signed] Chas. E. Knox."

His plan was consummated, and on July 25, 1922, the defendant corporation was formed, under the laws of the state of Nevada, with its principal place of business at Reno, Washoe county, Nev., and having a capital stock of 1,500,000 shares of the par value of $1 each. The several landowners agreed that their lands, some in fee simple, and as to others only the mineral rights, would be conveyed to the corporation so formed, and that, in payment of the purchase price thereof, they were to receive a certain designated number of shares, and likewise King was to receive 15,000 shares for his services, the total for all being 343,090 shares, and the shares to be received by plaintiffs being 135,000. These shares were to be issued upon a previously agreed price for each parcel of land and at the rate of 40 cents a share. The agreed price to be paid plaintiffs was $54,000.

The original incorporators of defendant were D. E. Matteson, C. S. Morgan, W. J. Michell, Louis Wheeler, Roy J. King, T. M. Harris, and Oscar L. Coflin, who were the duly chosen directors to serve said corporation for the period of one year. Of these directors, D. E. Matteson, as president of the St. Johns Quartz Mining Company, a corporation, G. S. Morgan, W. J. Michell, and T. M. Harris were all owners of parcels of land to be conveyed to the corporation. The other directors, Roy J. King, Louis Wheeler, and Oscar L. Coflin, had been engaged in the promoting and interesting eastern capital in the matter of this investment. These persons continued to act as such directors until August 20, 1923, at which time they were supplanted by others, excepting D. E. Matteson and plaintiff W. J. Michell, who were retained on the board. At the first meeting of the board of directors of the defendant corporation, held on July 26, 1922—which meeting was not attended by plaintiff W. J. Michell—the minutes disclose, in substance, the following proceedings:

Roy J. King had assembled into a mining unit certain mineral properties, referring to the property of the associates hereinabove set forth, and that he had collected valuable structural and geological data concerning the possibilities of ore in said lands, and that said King had succeeded in interesting certain strong financial people in said mining property; that D. E. Matteson, at the solicitation of said King, had made two trips to New York City to meet a Mr. Thompson and a Mr. Knox for the purpose of aiding and helping the latter in the purchasing, financing, and development of this property; that Charles E. Knox and Roy J. King, who had been chief promoters of the proposition, had consulted with the said Thompson and Knox as to the terms upon which they would agree to finance the corporation, and reciting therein the different parcels of land to be taken, together with their appraised value, the stock to be issued therefor, and setting forth in full telegrams exchanged between the said Knox and the said King as to the financing of said property, the issuance of shares to the owners of the several parcels, and as to the placing of said shares in escrow in the Nevada County Bank; and that it be—

> "Resolved, that the foregoing proposition of said W. J. Michell and P. W. Michell, St. John Quartz Mining Company et al., be and the same is hereby accepted; and the president and secretary of this corporation are hereby authorized and instructed to receive from said W. J. Michell, P. W. Michell, St. John Quartz Mining Company et al., proper deeds, duly executed, conveying and transferring said mining ground to this corporation free and clear of incumbrances, as in said proposition recited and deliver to said W. J. Michell, P. W. Michell, St. John Quartz Mining Company et al. in consideration of and in payment for said mining ground, three hundred forty-three thousand and ninety (343,090) shares of the capital stock of this corporation to be issued to said W. J. Michell, P. W. Michell, St. John Quartz Mining Company, Maude Granger Stokes, Ella Granger Elliott, Alison F. Watt, Gordon S. Morgan, Thomas M. Harris et al., M. Alice Greene, Robert Ford, Elizabeth and Fred Mounday, Patrick J. Keane, L. B. Jones, Roy J. King, in accordance with the number of shares set aside for each in the above proposition; and the stockholders of this corporation are hereby requested to ratify the acquisition of said mining ground as required."

Thereafter the plaintiffs, on the 27th day of July, 1922, made, executed, acknowledged, and delivered their deed of bargain and sale conveying to defendant that portion of their property which they were to receive under said agreement, namely, all excepting the surface of said land, to a depth of 100 feet, and providing that defendant or its assigns were not to approach closer than 100 feet of the surface of said property; and which deed was, on August 8, 1922, recorded in the county of Nevada. There was expressed in said deed, as consideration therefor, "five and no one-hundredths dollars lawful money of the United States of America, and other valuable considerations." No money whatsoever was paid for said deed, none was intended to be paid, and the only thing plaintiffs were to receive therefor was 135,000 good, valid, legal, and authorized shares of the capital stock of the defendant corporation. On the 28th day of July, 1922, the defendant corporation caused to be issued and delivered to plaintiffs a certificate and paper, which purported, on its face, to be a stock certificate for 135,000 shares of the capital stock of the defendant corporation. Said plaintiffs, together with the other owners of contiguous lands, upon receiving said certificate of stock, did, on August 4, 1922, place the same with the Nevada County Bank, under an instrument reading as follows:

> "To the Nevada County Bank, Grass Valley, California—Gentlemen: We hand you herewith certificates of stock standing in the following names and amounts:

St. John Quartz Mining Co., D. E. Matteson, President; E. S. Matteson, Secretary. Robert Ford. Mary C. Ford. Elizabeth Mounday. Fred Mounday. D. E. Matteson. C. G. Greene. Roy J. King."

Said escrowed stock not having been purchased within the time allowed, the board of directors of the defendant corporation attempted to extend said escrow at its meeting on February 13, 1923, under the following motion:

> "Motion made by Director Harris and seconded by Director Michell that the foregoing proposition of Mr. M. K. Harr be accepted and adopted. The motion carried unanimously. On motion duly made and carried, a one (1) year's option was given on the 343,090 shares of escrowed stock, to Mr. M. K. Harr, reading as follows:
> " 'This agreement made this 13th day of February, 1923, between Grass Valley Gold Mines Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Nevada, the party of the first part, and the Hilltop Nevada Mining Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Nevada, and M. K. Harr, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, the parties of the second part, witnesseth:
> " 'In consideration of one (1) dollar, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, the party of the first part hereby agrees to sell to the said parties of the second part three hundred forty-three thousand and ninety (343,090) shares of the capital stock of the Grass Valley Gold Mines Company, at forty (40c) cents per share net, at any time within one (1) year from the above date.
> " 'In witness whereof the parties hereto have hereunto set their hand and seal, the date and year first above written. Grass Valley Gold Mines Co. [Seal]. [Signed] D. E. Matteson, Pres. [Signed] Oscar L. Coflin, Sec. Hilltop Nevada Mining Co. [Signed] M. K. Harr, Pres. [Signed] W. J. Michell. Gordon S. Morgan. P. W. Michell. Witnesseth: Louis Wheeler.' "

Said stock remained in escrow from the time it was received by plaintiffs and their associates up until the time of the trial of this action. Said options were never exercised.

On February 13, 1923, the defendant issued and sold, outside of the state of California, some 751,000 shares of the stock, and from the sum received therefor $51,000 was expended in the development of the property. This development consisted of sinking a vertical shaft 310 feet deep on a parcel of land other than plaintiffs' and distant therefrom some 350 feet. The court found, under conflicting evidence, that plaintiffs' land was not benefited or developed by the sinking of this shaft. Defendant had not, at any time, applied for or received permission of the corporation commissioner of the state of California to issue said shares or any shares of its capital stock. It was alleged in the answer, and the court found, that plaintiffs and defendant were advised by the same attorney that a foreign corporation need not secure a permit from the corporation department of the state of California to issue and sell the capital stock of such corporation; that each, relying upon said advice, consummated the transaction as above narrated; that about October 10, 1923, plaintiffs discovered the mistake in the advice of said attorney, and that the defendant discovered the same about October 25, 1923; that on October 27, 1923, plaintiffs gave their notice of rescission, and offer of restoration, which was served on defendant on November 1, 1923. The complaint was filed on November 3, 1923. Thereafter, on January 8, 1924, defendant applied to the corporation commissioner for a permit to approve this transaction and to issue the necessary shares to fulfill the same. Thereafter, on February 5, 1924, plaintiffs filed with the corporation commissioner a protest to said application. The application was never acted upon.

The Corporate Securities Act (Stats. 1917, p. 673), and as subsequently amended, provides that no corporation shall sell its capital stock, except for a delinquent assessment, until it has secured from the commissioner of corporations a permit authorizing it to do so. Section 3.

The word "security" as defined in section 2, includes shares of the capital stock of a corporation which makes such sale. The act also provides that every corporation "which shall directly or indirectly issue or cause to be issued any security contrary to the provisions of this act * * * shall be punishable by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars." Section 13. Also that any agent of such company who does the like is guilty of a felony. Section 14.

[1] The issuance and sale by defendant of the capital stock, or an agreement for such sale, without a permit being issued by the commissioner of corporations therefor, is illegal and void. Such a contract is not voidable, but is void, being in contravention of the statute providing a punishment for the act complained of. Reno v. American Ice Machine Co., 72 Cal. App. 409, 237 P. 784; Nannizzi v. Caprile, 43 Cal. App. 498, 185 P. 673; Reilly v. Clyne, 27 Ariz. 432, 234 P. 35, 40 A. L. R. 1005; Smith v. Bach, 183 Cal. 259, 191 P. 14.

Since the issuing of the stock was unauthorized, and the act in so doing void, it results that plaintiffs have received nothing whatsoever for the lands conveyed by them to the defendant. There has been a total failure of consideration. Counsel for appellant in its opening brief asserts:

> "If it had been true, as assumed by plaintiffs and the court at the trial of the case, that defendant had induced the plaintiffs to consummate a conveyance of their property for shares of its capital stock to be thereafter issued, that the same was issued to plaintiffs without a permit of the corporation commissioner of this state, in obedience to the provisions of the Corporate Securities Act, and that plaintiffs had no part therein, other than as investors in the usual sense, this appeal would not have been taken; it being assumed that the case of Reilly

v. Clyne, 27 Ariz. 432, 234 P. 35, 40 A. L. R. 1005, would control."

[2] Counsels' contention is that plaintiffs had a "part therein other than as investors in the usual sense." This is based on the facts that plaintiffs W. J. Michell and three other associate landowners were organizers and incorporators of the defendant, and served as directors at the time of the passing of deeds and the issuance of stock, and that the real consideration in the transaction was the interest that each landowner had in the assets of the corporation, as evidenced by the stock certificates; that such a connection with defendant, and the conditions attending the conveyance and issuance of shares, transferred plaintiffs into a different class from that of the ordinary investor.

As above stated, the evidence clearly shows that the idea of combining the properties into one unit and forming the defendant corporation to take them over and operate and develop the same was not the conception of the property owners, but was, instead, that of Roy J. King. It is true that they acted upon the suggestion and assisted in carrying it out, but it was upon an agreed basis of value per acre of each parcel of land, and that stock was to be issued to meet that value at the rate of 40 cents a share. Almost immediately after the issuance of this stock, it was placed in escrow to be sold at the said agreed price, and so remained in escrow until the time of the trial of this action. Had the lands so conveyed to defendant proved to be fabulously rich in minerals, yet plaintiffs and their associates would not have profited in excess of the agreed value of the land, because their stock at all times was subject to be taken over at the previously agreed price. To them, the value of the land was fixed and determined, and the facts do not bear out the statement that the real consideration was their prospective interests in the corporation. It thus becomes patent that the associate landowners were not engaged in a mining venture, but had adopted this means as a way of selling and disposing of their lands. It is difficult to differentiate, in legal contemplation, between one who furnishes money to finance the operation of a corporation and one who furnishes to that corporation the necessary mining ground with which to pursue its declared purposes. In one case he furnishes money for his shares of stock; in the other he supplies the land at an agreed money value which the corporation expects to work at a profit. We cannot subscribe to the doctrine that a corporation may take a person's real property and pay for it in worthless stock, without being amenable to the laws, yet, if it accepts money instead, and gives him the same character of stock, it would have to respond, under the law. We are not able to see wherein a proper legal distinction can be drawn between "investors in the usual sense," and the plaintiffs in this case.

But the facts of this case justify the consideration of other reasons than those above given. A party to a contract may rescind the same if his consent thereto was given by mistake. Civ. Code, § 1689, subd. 1. Mistake may be either of fact or law. Civ. Code, § 1576. Unconscious ignorance of a fact material to the contract, or belief in the present existence of a thing material to the contract, constitutes a mistake of fact. Civ. Code, § 1577. And a misapprehension of the law by all parties, all supposing that they knew and understood it, and all making substantially the same mistake as to the law, constitutes a mistake of law. Civ. Code, § 1578.

[3] The answer alleged, and the court found, that plaintiffs and defendant were advised by the same attorney that it was not necessary for a foreign corporation to secure a permit from the corporation department to issue and sell the capital stock of such corporation. It is therefore clear that there is a mutual mistake either of fact or of law, and as to which it is we deem it unimportant to determine. Except for this mistake, plaintiffs undoubtedly would not have consented to the making of the conveyance. The evidence clearly shows that each of the parties negotiated and acted upon the assumption that shares of stock could be issued for the land so conveyed, without the necessity of first obtaining a permit so to do; that plaintiffs thought they were receiving legal stock; and that the defendant thought it was issuing legal stock. This is conceded by appellant. The stock being invalid, it is of no value to plaintiffs, and they obtained nothing for their lands. We therefore conclude that the mistake was material to the contract, as that expression is used in the Codes.

In the case of Hannah v. Steinman, 159 Cal. 142, 112 P. 1094, while the facts are entirely different from the case at bar, the reasoning and language of that decision, as well as the authorities therein cited, are almost as appropriate as though written especially for the instant case, and furnish ample authority to sustain the foregoing conclusions. The case uses this significant language:

> "We cannot believe that the equitable rules relative to mistake should be so narrowly construed as to require us to hold that this mistake did not go to the very essence of the contract between these parties."

The following authorities support the right to rescind for mistake: Mosher v. Lack, 41 Cal. App. 23, 181 P. 813; Tetenman v. Epstein, 66 Cal. App. 745, 226 P. 966; Johnson v. Withers, 9 Cal. App. 52, 98 P. 42; Butte Creek, etc., Co. v. Olney, 173 Cal. 697, 161 P. 260.

[4] Appellant complains that plaintiffs did not rescind promptly. Section 1691 of the Civil Code provides that, except where effected by consent, rescission can be accomplished only by the use on the part of the party rescinding of reasonable diligence to comply with the following:

> "1. He must rescind promptly, upon discovering the facts which entitle him to rescind, if he is free from duress, menace, undue influence, or disability, and is aware of his right to rescind; and,
> "2. He must restore to the other party everything of value which he has received from him under the contract; or must offer to restore the same, upon condition that such party shall do likewise, unless the latter is unable or positively refuses to do so."

We can see no merit in appellant's contention. The evidence discloses and the court found that plaintiffs first discovered the mistake and became aware of the facts which entitled them to rescind on October 10, 1923; that on October 27, some 17 days later, they gave their notice of rescission, and made offer of restoration, and 8 days thereafter actually commenced the action in the present case. This fully meets the requirements of the Code. There is not the slightest evidence to indicate that the defendant was injured by the delay or that the proceedings were delayed because of any uncertainty as to whether it would be to plaintiffs' benefit or otherwise to prolong the existing situation. Plaintiffs' offer of restoration was full and complete.

In view of our conclusions herein expressed, it becomes unnecessary to consider other points advanced by appellant. The facts support the findings, and the findings, in turn, are sufficient to support the judgment.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS

204 Cal. 423

Minnie Mabelle WING and E. P. Wing (Her Husband), Plaintiffs and Appellants, v. Maude DENNIS (also known as Maude Dennis Brown), Defendant and Respondent. (L. A. 9293.) Supreme Court of California. June 25, 1928. Department 2. Appeal by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Albert Lee Stephens, Judge, in an action to establish and enforce trust. Fred N. Arnoldy, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Gilbert F. Wyvell, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an action to establish and enforce a trust in a renewal lease of a hotel in favor of a partnership existing between the plaintiff Minnie Mabelle Wing and the defendant. The partnership was formed on May 25, 1921, solely for the purpose of conducting the hotel under said lease. The lease, by its terms, would expire on May 31, 1925. On March 1, 1925, the defendant procured in her own name a renewal of said lease for a term of six years, commencing June 1, 1925. This action was instituted on April 8, 1925. Judgment went for the defendant and this appeal is taken therefrom. The principal contention on the appeal is that the evidence was insufficient to support the finding that the renewal of the lease taken in the name of the defendant and for her sole use was so taken with the consent, express or implied, of the plaintiff Minnie Mabelle Wing. The record has been examined. We are of the opinion that the evidence is sufficient to support said finding. No other points require comment. The judgment is affirmed.
